Mr. R. Harold Thomas (pupil of Mr. C. Potter for composition and of Mr. W. S. Bennett for the piano) has more than once appeared as composer at the concerts of the Academy. His overture—anglicised, The Frolics of a Page—is lively, and though the instrumentation is not brilliant it is careful. The selection from Miss Charlotte Rowe's Enchanted Isle consisted of three choruses, several recitatives, an air with concertina obbligato, another air with harp obbligato, and a third air with no obbligato—or "obligato," as it is printed in the programmes, although there is an Italian professor in the Academy, who doubtless begins his instructions with a course of orthography. The airs have the most merit, since in part-writing Miss Rowe is at present not greatly advanced. The first, "No, no, no," was well sung by Miss Adelaide Attfield (pupil of Sig. Crivelli), the concertina obbligato being performed by the compositress, who appears to be an adept on that dulcet instrument, now in such high favour with the author of Modern German Music, Recollections and Criticisms—perhaps because it may be regarded as a "freakish" instrument. The next air, "Ah! king of my heart," was sung by the same young lady, and the harp obbligato was entrusted to Miss Vinning (K.S.) Miss Freeman gave the third air, "I go," very carefully. Mr. Schroeder (pupil of Mr. Lucas) improves in the mechanism of the violoncello, but does not gain in warmth of style or quality of tone. Moreover, the fantasia of M. Servais is little better than rubbish. The air from Robert le Diable was rendered with sentiment, though without power, by Miss Bignall (pupil of Sig. Negrini); while Misses Buckland and Whyte (pupils of Sig Garcia) in the pretty duet from Winter's Rape of Proserpine were quite as tame as the music. The part-song of Miss Eliza Hughes (pupil of Mr. Macfarren) is graceful, but fared but ill at the hands, or rather the voices of the executants. Mr. Stone, (pupil of Mr. C. Potter) showed promise in the very grand and passionate first movement of Mozart's finest concerto for the piano. Miss Freeman, by her quiet and unaffected reading of the contralto air, "In questa tomba oscura," proved herself capable of understanding the music of Beethoven. This young lady and Miss Ellen Williams, who sang the recitative and air from Mercadante's forgotten opera, Nicotri, with remarkable cleverness, are among the most steadily improving of the Academy students. Mr. Adlington (pupil of Mr. W. H. Holmes) played the pianoforte part of Beethoven's Choral Fantasia with great firmness, but the time throughout was too slow. The principal vocal parts in this imaginative work were faintly sustained by Misses Spiller, Hughes, and Trickett (pupils of Sig. Crivelli), Mr. J. F. Goodban, Mr. G. Dolby (Sig. Crivelli), and Walter Bolton (pupil of Mr. Cox); so that the general performance was ineffective.

The quartet for voice, pianoforte, harp, and violin, entitled Les Adieux de Raoul de Courcy, is an imitation of something of the same kind by Blangini. There is hardly enough in it, we think, to have exercised the united wits of two composers; but that is the business of MM. Moscheles and Mayseder, not ours. It was inefficiently performed. The "voice"—Miss Banks (pupil of Mad. Ferrari)—was weak; and the violin—Mr. Egerton (pupil of M. Sainton)—scratchy ("scrannel," if the author of Modern German Music, Recollections and Criticisms will allow us the use of the word). The pianoforte—Miss Spiller (pupil of Mr. C. Potter)—and the harp—Miss Vinning (K. S., pupil of Mr. J. B. Chatterton)—were much better; but the ensemble was "doubtful." The chorus from The Alchymist of Mr. Bolton (pupil of Mr. Lucas) is not very good, nor was it very well executed, although Messrs. G. Dolby and W. Bolton took commendable pains with the solo parts. The beautiful air from Gluck's Orfeo, and its impressive recitative are, at present, beyond the powers of Miss Trickett, who will doubtless sing it more effectively when she has progressed a little further. The part song of Mr. J. Parry Cole (pupil of Mr. Lucas) would be better if it were clearer, and vice versa. It was sung out of tune, moreover, which did not improve it. Mr. Loades (pupil of M. Sainton) played the concerto of De Beriot famously. Here is a young-gentleman-violinist of decided promise, who, if well cared for, has a chance of becoming a real credit to the Academy. The air from Tancredi tested the powers of Miss Hughes unfavourably. She must work at it again, in the solitude of her study. We observed nothing remarkable in the song and chorus from the Arcades of Miss Charlotte Carbery (pupil of Mr. Lucas). They are "arcades ambo," to all intents and purposes. Why did Miss Tootell (pupil of Sig. Negri) select so difficult an air as that from Donizetti's Lucia—or rather why did her master select it for her? These Italian bravura songs are not for beginners. The chorus from Rossini's masterpiece was performed in a somewhat slovenly manner. The concert was too long.

This is probably the last year of the Royal Academy of Music in Tenterden Street, Hanover Square. The lease of the premises having expired, the institution must remove to another locality. Where that may be time will show. Meanwhile we trust that certain reforms, much wanted, may accompany the change of place—since, as it is now conducted, and has been conducted, indeed, for many years, the Academy is not what it should be, and was designed to be—a useful and a national school for educating and fostering the musical promise and talent of the country. Will no one petition Government to recall the Earl of Westmorland from Vienna. That illustrious nobleman, we are confident, has a greater relish for the harmless cannons of counterpoint than for the "villanous" guns of the Autocrat.

DUBLIN.—DR. WHITE'S LECTURES.—The entertainment presented last evening by this elegant and accomplished musician was heard with delight by a numerous and highly influential audience. His admirable entertainment, comprising vocal illustrations of the minstrelsy of different nations, was received with decided applause.—Freeman, July 26.

THE ST. JAMES'S THEATRE is taken upon a long lease for English performances. The new lessee is Mrs. Seymour, late of the Haymarket Theatre. The season is to be inaugurated with an original five-act drama by Messrs. T. Taylor and C. Reade.

DRAMATIC.

HAYMARKET.—A new three-act drama, entitled The Old Chateau, or a Night of Peril, was produced on Monday with success. It is more properly an Adelphi than a Haymarket piece, the tragic portion involving a murder and an execution, and the comic comprising more than the usual quantum of extravagance. The story is simple and plainly told, and the scenes follow each other naturally. Domville (Mr. Rogers), an elderly gentleman, has been ruined at the gaming table. General the Marquis de Leyrac (Mr. Howe), returned from the wars after making a large fortune, proposes for Julie (Miss Reynolds), daughter of Domville. The General is not young, and the young lady's heart is previously engaged to Armand (Mr. W. Farren), her drawing master, who has left her to try his fortune in the world, but with the full assurance of unalterable love. Julie, however, to save her father from ruin, marries the General. Lalouette (Mr. H. Marston), an adventurer, who has been mainly instrumental in the ruin of Domville, pays court to Julie, who rejects his addresses with scorn. Stung by her treatment, he vows vengeance against her, and, having accidentally discovered her attachment to Armand, excites the jealousy of the General by hints and surmises. Jeannette (Mrs. Fitzwilliam), the foster-sister of Julie, and wife of Michael Sammson (Mr. Buckstone), formerly grocer and a member of the National Guard, now retired merchant and banker—a man of "land and beeves"—is acquainted with Julie's secret attachment. In the course of three years Armand returns, having amassed a large fortune. Overwhelmed with grief upon hearing of Julie's marriage, he is about to quit his native country for ever; but, wishing to take a last farewell of his mistress, prevails upon Jeannette, who was once in love with him herself, to procure him an interview. Without apprising Julie, Jeannette writes to Armand, and makes an appointment with him to come to her husband's old chateau near Paris, at eleven o'clock on a certain evening, near a certain balcony, when the signal for his entrance is to be the opening of the window. Jeannette is determined not to tell Julie, but to leave things to chance and to be present herself at the interview. By some means Lalouette gains possession of the letter before Armand, takes a copy of it, and shews it to the General. The husband, led at once to believe that Jeannette is merely the go-between of his wife and Armand, is worked up to a pitch of high excitement. Sammson being in the confidence of the General and Lalouette, the trio set off for the chateau and secretly arrive before the ladies, taking possession of the room where the meeting is to be held. The General orders Lalouette to station himself under a tree near the window, with directions to shoot any man he may observe stealing away from the house. When left alone, Jeannette enters; the General informs her he knows all, and determines to test his wife by what occurs at the interview. Jeannette, though assured of Julie's perfect innocence, fears lest in the meeting of the two lovers something may fall out not altogether agreeable to the eyes and ears of a jealous husband. Trusting, nevertheless, everything to the wife's purity, the General having concealed himself, when Julie comes in, she leaves her with a prayer for her safety. Armand enters, and in the brief words which pass between him and Julie the General is satisfied of his wife's innocence. Unmindful of his previous instructions, he is stealing from the house by the balcony, when he is shot by Lalouette. The General dies, expressing a desire that Julie and Armand may be united. Lalouette is handed over to justice.

This piece wants poetry to elevate the common-place character of the incidents. We know not how it may tell in the original—it is borrowed from the French drama of Une Jeune Femme—but the translation is neither polished nor vigorous.

There are some good situations in the piece; but the comic characters, though inimitably played by Mr. Buckstone and Mrs. Fitzwilliam, are out of keeping with the rest. Mr. H. Marston, who enacts the villain, is no improvement on Mr. Vandenhoff. Miss Reynolds supported the part of Julie with grace and feeling, and Mr. Howe made up well and acted with bluntness as the Old General. No piece we have seen for a long time at the Haymarket has been put on the stage with more elegance and splendour than the Old Chateau.

The success was never once uncertain, and the author, Mr. Stirling Coyne, was obliged to bow from his box at the end.

The Spanish Dancers continue highly attractive.

ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—OPERA COMIQUE.—In spite of the intense heat of the weather, which has helped mightily to thin most of the London theatres, the St. James's has been attended by fashionable audiences every evening on which the charming and fascinating Marie Cabel has appeared. The Diamants de la Couronne has proved the most attractive opera produced by the company of the Théâtre Lyrique, and, independently of the superiority of Auber's music to that of any other composer whose work has been produced, we do not hesitate to say that Madame Marie Cabel's Caterina is the most striking and interesting character in which she has appeared in London. Perhaps it was because it was the last, and consequently made the deepest impression. The fair artist, however, could hardly be of that opinion; since, on the occasion of her benefit, Wednesday last, she selected La Fille du Régiment in preference to Les Diamants de la Couronne. After all it is a mere matter of choice whether Madame Cabel's Caterina or Maria is preferable. Many doubtless think the former, having no other reason than that they like the music of Auber better than the music of Donizetti.

Mad. Marie Cabel was welcomed by an audience of true devotees on Wednesday night. The hot weather seemed to have no effect upon her voice, unless it was to render it still more soft and flexible. If Jenny Lind be entitled to be called the "Nightingale," and Alboni the "Thrush," surely, without any stretch of metaphor, Marie Cabel may be called the "Lark." No lark, indeed, could sing more sweetly, or pour forth its unpremeditated lay more joyously than she on Wednesday night. Her singing was the very exhilaration of pleasant sounds, and her acting perfection, both as the Vivandière in costume and the Vivandière out of costume, as the daughter of the regiment, and as the daughter of her newly-found mother. In the second act Madame Cabel introduced the scene from M. Adolphe Adam's Taureador, in which the variations on "Ah! vous dirai-je, Maman," were introduced. This was one of the most finished and brilliant displays of bravura singing to which we have listened for a long time, and was a genuine triumph for Madame Cabel, who was ably supported by MM. Legrand and Louis Cabel in the two male parts. Madame Cabel was re-called at the end of the opera, received with enthusiastic applause, and honoured with a shower of bouquets.

In our next number we shall give a résumé of the performances of the Théâtre-Lyrique company at the St. James's.

TUNES AND FORTUNES.—Says a Wall-street friend the other day, when we were praising Jullien, "I prefer harmony abridged, for then it is money; and that you will allow is the better half. Jullien's tunes are well enough in their way, but the tune I prefer is for-tune, composed of notes on any good bank."—New York Musical Review.

HERR MARSCHNER, the well-known composer and Capellmeister to the King of Hanover, has been passing some time in London. His visit has not been a professional one.

MARIONNETTE THEATRE.—A polyphonic entertainment, entitled A Bottle of Champagne, by Mr. Byron, has been exhibited at this theatre with considerable success.

MRS. CAROLINE SOUTHEY, widow of the poet, Robert Southey, died on the 20th, at Buckland, near Lymington. Her father was the poet Bowles, canon of Salisbury Cathedral.

PACINI.—This composer will shortly arrive in Paris to superintend the rehearsals of his opera, Gli Arabi nelle Gallie. He is also engaged to write a new opera for the Italian Theatre.

CARLSRUHE.—Fräulein Garrigues has pleased so much, that she has been engaged for ten years, commencing in the autumn.—Fräulein Zschiesche, from Danzig, has appeared as Regia, Agatha, and Anna (Don Juan), but without producing any particular impression. Herr Ander, from Vienna, has played Lyonel, Stradella, and Florestan with success.

DRAGONETTI'S WILL.

HEATH v. CHAPMAN.—This suit was instituted in the Vice-Chancellor's (Kindersley's) Court, on Saturday, July 22, for the administration of the will of the late Signor Dragonetti. It appeared from the report of the judges' chief clerk as to the evidence taken in the cause, that Signor Domenico Dragonetti, shortly before his death, was desirous of bequeathing by his will the several annuities following, (that is to say): An annuity of £25 to be paid to Signor Giovanni Zimolo, of Venice (the husband of the testator's late sister, Marietta Zimolo), for his life, and after his decease to be paid in perpetuity every year to the church at Mestre, where the said Marietta Zimolo was buried, for masses and requiems for the soul of the testator, and the said Marietta Zimolo; secondly, an annuity of £20 in perpetuity to the Cathedral Church of St. Mark, at Venice, for masses and requiems for the souls of the said testator and the poor dead, and for other pious uses; thirdly, an annuity of £20 in perpetuity to the Roman Catholic Church in Moorfields, London, for the purpose of having masses and requiems said and performed for the benefit of the soul of the testator, and the souls of the poor dead, and for other pious uses; and, fourthly, an annuity of £10 per annum for the defendant, Mary Chapman, during her life. It was also proved that the testator was informed by his solicitor, that bequests for pious uses, and masses for the dead, were contrary to the spirit of the English law, and that difficulties might arise in supporting or carrying out trusts for such a purpose in this country, and that if he determined upon carrying into effect these gifts, it could only be done either by an actual transfer of a sufficient amount of stock in his life-time into the names of trustees to carry out his intentions, or by the actual payment of the necessary amount of money. A few days afterwards the testator had interviews with his friends, Mr. J. B. Heath, Mr. Vincent Novello, and Count Carlo Pepoli, as to the transfer into their names, and the application by them of sufficient stock for the purposes he was desirous of effecting; and these gentlemen at such interviews severally promised to the testator that they would perform the trusts so to be reposed in them, and on the 1st of April, 1846, the testator accordingly transferred £3,023 Five per Cent. Annuities into the names of these trustees, to be applied for the above purposes. The testator afterwards made his will, but no question at present arose upon that will. It was now contended, on behalf of the next of kin of Signor Dragonetti, that the above trusts for superstitious uses were void in law, and that they were consequently entitled to the £3,023 so given to the trustees.

Mr. Elderton and Mr. Hoare appeared for the trustees; Mr. Wickens for the Attorney-General; Mr. Baily and Mr. Baggallay, Mr. Bagshawe, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Hackett, and Mr. Ellison for other parties.

The Vice-Chancellor said, in the first place, a transfer of stock had been made, in this case, to trustees, with a verbal declaration that the money should be applied in a particular way; it was suggested that this was a violation of the wills act. He did not, however, think that it was, and there was nothing to prevent a testator from creating a trust inter vivos. It was clear that a trust might be created by parole, and if there was an actual transfer, such a trust would be perfectly good. The material question was, whether the uses and purposes to which the testator had dedicated his money were void, as being what the law denominated "superstitious uses." It was evidently considered, by the law writers, formerly, that a gift for masses for the soul of a testator or other person, or to a priest for the purpose of saying such masses, was void, and by the statute of Edward VI., it was declared that property, dedicated to such purposes, should go to the Crown, and the interpretation put upon this was, that such purposes were superstitious and illegal. It had been held in several cases, and particularly in one decided by Lord Cottenham, that such a gift was void. It had been argued that the law was altered by the statute of 2 and 3 William IV., c. 115; but what that statute intended was, that Roman Catholics were to be put upon the same footing as Protestant Dissenters, and the law upon the subject of superstitious uses was left untouched. It had also been submitted that masses for the souls of the poor dead were charitable uses. His opinion was that they were not charitable uses. The saying of masses for deceased persons had reference to the purgatorial process gone through by the souls of the dead to make them fit for future happiness; but it could not be said that this had any reference to a charitable use. A pious purpose was not always a charitable purpose, though it might be that a charitable purpose was always a pious purpose. It might be said that leaving money to keep a candle continually burning, or for making wax figures of the Virgin, or for bell-ringing, by which process it was formerly supposed that the demons were scared away—were all of them pious uses, but certainly they were not charitable purposes. His opinion was, that the gifts now under consideration were not for charitable purposes, and, consequently, the money would not go to the Crown, but that they were for superstitious uses, and were void; the money would, therefore, go to the next of kin, with the exception of the gifts to M. Zimolo and Mary Chapman, which would stand good.

ITALIAN OPERA AT MANCHESTER.

Manchester, 24th July, 1854.

SIR,—Your Manchester correspondent, quoting the Guardian as usual, is led into the mistake of saying that we are not to have an Italian Opera Company at the Theatre Royal this season. More than a month ago, if my memory serves me correctly as to time, the Manchester Examiner and Times told us the Italians were certainly coming, and the same paper confirms the statement on Saturday last. Thanking you for all your recent improvements,

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
A CONSTANT READER.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—The many antagonistic hypotheses in regard to the different tastes and styles of music are not only interesting and amusing, but sometimes painfully ludicrous. While all claim to understand the true spirit of song, no two can agree on the same interpretation. One talks for the people, another for the critic, while another still points to the temple of high and divine Art. This claims for the writers of negro-melodies the highest position on the musical ladder, and condemns the more classical melodic and harmonic forms of the great masters altogether. All the older productions are discarded with hardly a dissenting voice, and the rare melodies that have held the whole civilized world spell-bound for so long a period, must give place to "Lucy Neal," and "'Twas on a Sunday morning."

This is not only true in the Profane School, but Sacred Music is suffering under this rage for innovation. From the vigorous and plain harmony of even twenty years ago, such as we find in the Handel and Haydn collection of Church Music by Mason, we get works published now filled with the old fugue tunes of fifty years since revived, light and frivolous melodies, and frolicsome ballads, like picturesque parcels done up in scented wrappers, and thrown out upon the psalm-loving community as fancifully and with as much parade as were the worthless wares of the famous Dr. Dulcamara. The truth is, every schoolboy is writing tunes, and, with a little grammatical re-touching, they will do for the superficial market; when, in truth, Sacred Music seems gathering up the worn-out garment that the ancient musical Punch has cast off, and thrown into the cesspool of obloquy. What is the "——," or the "——," but a collection of ballads clad in sacred poetry, with a sort of galvanised effort to sanctify them by religious sentiment? Is sacred song thus to be apostatized, and the lackadaisical ballads of sentimental Lotharios and bacchanalian refugees to be chanted in the house of God? With many of the tunes we want the fiddle and the bones; and if sacred music is thus to be interpreted, the Church must become, sooner or later, a salon-de-danse, and the organ-loft the prescribed seat for the orchestra.

Seriously, why not keep these two departments separate? They were never intended to usurp the place of each other, as each is distinct in itself, and easily understood by all. Let the Church have her own sublime poetry and song—the theatre its romance and sentiment. While one appeals strongly and fervently to the heart and our better nature, the other pleases with its light, graceful, and fascinating arias. In a word, give us the music of the Church in all its sublimity, strength, and purity, plain and simple, entering into the very temple of our holiest and highest aspirations, and leave the tinsel and arabesque work of the opera to the lighter and more wayward feelings of the heart. Few men are able to edit a musical work, and while the market is open to every tyro of the art, the good-natured public must be actually buried under rubbish and worthless trash. Let us give over wasting our time on the fleeting follies of such works as "——," the stupid olla podrida of "——," and produce something better. Let us collect and collate the best tunes of past years, selecting the wheat from the chaff, and give them to the world without mangled and distorted harmonies. This love of German mysticism and wonderful! very wonderful!! effects, only belongs to the simpleton and ignorant pretender, and he that would adopt, study, and dream over it, should have for his coat of arms a mug of lager bier, with a pipe rampant, over a hurdy-gurdy couchant, on a field of quagmire stagnant. I am, Sir, yours,

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 29TH, 1854.

NOT one of our great musical societies can be said to have done much for the progress of the art this year. The Philharmonic Society has adhered to its time-honoured routine with an obstinacy worthy of a better cause, only diverging from it in favour of works (Mr. Schumann's Symphony for example) which have served to establish a great want of judgment on the part of the directors. The solo performances, too, have evinced a marked absence of liberality to the subscribers, who, while paying four guineas (a large sum) to the funds of the society, were obliged to go elsewhere and hear the majority of pianists and violinists who were worth a hearing and immediately at hand. There has been, in short, a continuance of the system of cliquism which, if persevered in, must ultimately be as disastrous to the Philharmonic as it has been to other and older institutions. The result of the season was a loss of £50. This, we are aware, is a small deficit; but with better management, there would have been none at all; and it behoves the members, if they take any interest in the future prosperity of the Philharmonic Society, to keep a sharp look out after those in whose hands they annually entrust the management of affairs. The £50 might some fine day be multiplied by 10; and that would be less agreeable—since, although the society is known to be solvent, it is not rich, and can ill afford to bear an annual loss. With regard to the orchestra, moreover, there has been no improvement of late, while the system of rehearsals remains as imperfect and unsatisfactory as ever. With the vaunted influence of Mr. Costa, conductor in perpetuo, this is inexcusable. Year after year, the same faults are remarked in the performance of the same symphonies. The do nothing, or care nothing plan, which is adopted at the Royal Italian Opera, obtains equally at the Philharmonic. The vocal music is always badly accompanied, and the concertos are not much better. If the public is still expected to pay four guineas for a season ticket, or a guinea for a single concert, some stringent reforms must be brought about, or the Philharmonic Society will certainly lose its position.

The third season of the New Philharmonic Society has not been much more beneficial to the interests of music than the forty-second season of the elder institution. The new works introduced have not been sucessful, and in several instances had no claims to be produced at all. The rehearsals have exhibited too much of the "helter skelter" system. The members of the band were never to their time; and the conductors—Herr Lindpaintner and Dr. Wylde—seem to have possessed, or at least to have exerted, little or no authority. Why discipline should be strictly enforced wherever Mr. Costa is director, and utterly set at nought elsewhere, it would be difficult to explain. But such is too evidently the case. Our orchestral performers will not pay the proper attention to other conductors; and to this despotic monopoly of one man must be attributed nearly all the deficiencies that are observable where he is not engaged as conductor. It is the same thing at the provincial festivals as in London. At the Birmingham Festival, for instance, the preparatory business (although, as everywhere else, inefficient for the purpose) goes on regularly and well; the conductor is feared and obeyed; and the performances are, consequently, if not irreproachable, at least satisfactory. But at the meetings of the three choirs of Gloucester, Hereford, and Worcester, the case is quite different. The Autocrat of all the Orchestras is not there; the conductors are the organists of the respective cathedrals; and the band, paying little or no attention to those gentlemen, take matters entirely into their own hands. The result may be heard at the evening concerts, which, of their kind, are unparalleled for incompleteness. Something of this has, we fear, begun to show itself at the New Philharmonic, where the performances are by no means so excellent as at the outset. Against the system of changing conductors, moreover, we have invariably remonstrated. It is a system incompatible with anything like perfection in performance. Dr. Wylde, who is an energetic as well as an enterprising man, with a real love of his art, must look to this, unless he would see his newly raised fabric crumble to pieces before him. He must also change the style of the programmes. These are too rambling and fragmentary, and without any definite form. They are, besides, a vast deal too long, and fairly tire the audience out. We wish well to the New Philharmonic Society, or we should not take the pains to comment on its defects. It has accomplished much good, and the subscription is only half that of the rival society—for both of which reasons it deserves the support of the profession. But it must change its policy or surrender its colours. The establishment of a chorus, solely attached to the society, is an excellent notion, and with wise management may be made the means of achieving great things. The success of Cherubini's Requiem, last year, should have induced the directors to produce some other work of the same kind and of equal interest, or at least to have repeated the first. Failing to do this, they grievously disappointed the expectations of their regular supporters, the majority of whom, as Dr. Wylde has himself stated, are professional subscribers, to whom such works as the Requiem of Cherubini present uncommon attractions. We hear that the directors of the New Philharmonic Society, whoever they may be, propose to invite a number of professional musicians to assist them with council and advice, as associate honorary-directors. Let them abandon the idea. It is a mistake. No good whatever can come of it. The broth will be spoiled—that is all.

A Leeds paper has the following :—

"Leeds Parish Church Organ.—The improvements which for for the last six months Messrs. Holt, of Bradford, have been engaged upon are now nearly completed. The pedale organ will now consist of the following stops :—32 feet double open (wood); 16 do. open (wood); 16 do. stopt (wood); 8 do. open (metal); twelfth, fifteenth, sexquialtra, 32 feet double reed (wood); 16 feet reed (wood); 8 feet reed (metal); 4 feet reed (metal). The principal feature in this arrangement is the 32 feet reed stop, this being the only one in England available. By an ingenious mechanical contrivance, Mr. W. Holt has made this stop to answer the touch as quickly as the trumpet or oboe stops in the swell organ. There are two other stops only of this description in this country, one in the York organ and the other in the famous Birmingham organ; but they speak so slowly that they are of little use. It is highly creditable to Mr. Holt to be the first person who has succeeded in making the large reed stops available both in promptness of reply and firmness of tone; we can confidently assert, on high musical authority, that for great body, depth, and quality of tone, the pedale portion of our parish church organ has no rival in any ecclesiastical building in Great Britain. We understand there will shortly be a public opening of the above instrument, when the choir will be considerably augmented, and the improvements of the organ fairly tested."

This is a good illustration of what we have often said of the country organ-builders—namely, that they are perpetually deceiving themselves as to the quality and importance of their work, and, in consequence, misleading their neighbours who happen to know no better. Now, without reference at all to how the new work at Leeds has been executed, there are such faults in its plan, and particularly in its adaptation to the older parts of the instrument, as we should scarcely have thought any good judge of organ effect would have committed.

The first glance at the scheme of this much-puffed pedal organ, reveals the extraordinary defect that it contains no metal 16-feet stop, without which it can make no pretension to completeness. It is, in fact, altogether mis-shapen and ill-balanced. Its full combination will give plenty of thunder, but this at the expense of all crispness. The roar of the brass will be there in abundance, but none of the decisive, well-defined stroke of the double-bass bow. There is, in truth, no stop more essential to the effect of a large pedal organ than the 16 feet metal. It imparts all the point, brightness, and pungency of tone, which no extent of wood-combination will ever yield. The boasted "32 feet reed" might well have been dispensed with, if its presence could only be secured at the sacrifice of the missing register. On what "high musical authority" the Leeds pedal organ has been pronounced unrivalled in England, we know not; but it is certainly not for a moment to be compared with that at Birmingham, or that at the Panopticon; neither will it produce anything like the effect of that at St. Sepulchre's, in London, although the latter has no 32 feet register of any sort.

Futhermore, the pedal organ at Leeds is out of all proportion to the manual-work to which it has been adapted. The features of the Leeds manuals are but of the most common and ordinary description. They possess no character of magnitude or beauty which cannot be claimed for any one of a hundred church organs of the ordinary large class. The addition, therefore, of such a pedal organ with its "32 feet reed," tending rather to crush than assist the effect of the manuals, evinces anything but taste or discretion. Again, if we remember rightly, the manual compass of the Leeds organ commenced at FFF in the bass, and of the pedal at CCC,—thus forcing on the performer the alternative of either leaving the manuals unconnected with the pedals, or of using a distorted scale of the most ludicrous description. These things we know, used to be tolerated; but how comes it, in 1854, that a gentleman, possessing sufficient confidence in his own judgment and ability to throw down the gauntlet to Mr. Hill (vide the allusion to the Birmingham reeds), should not have seen the propriety of assimilating the compass of his manual to his pedal organ, and thus destroying one of the most mischievous anomalies that any instrument can contain? Mr. Holt's invention for quickening the speed of his pedal reeds we suspect to be an old acquaintance redivivus. If we are right, he will probably have to dispute its authorship with Mr. Nicholson, of Worcester, who also claims it;—the joke of the matter being, meanwhile, that it rightly belongs to neither.

About the quality of the Leeds pedal organ we can, of course, at present say nothing; but unless Mr. Holt's work has made marvellous progress since we last heard any of it, we cannot help thinking this sort of puffing comparison with the recognised excellencies of our best builders a trifle premature, if at any time advisable.

GRISI AND MARIO.

There is no longer any doubt about the American expedition of these renowned singers. Grisi's farewell benefit takes place on the 7th of August, and on the 9th the two artists sail from Liverpool, in the "Baltic" steamer.

The terms of the engagement are £17,000 for six months. £11,600 has been lodged already in the hands of a London banker; and the rest is to be paid, by instalments, of £1,000 monthly, in advance. In case that any one of these instalments should not be forthcoming at the beginning of the month, the £11,000 in the hands of the London banker are forfeited, and Grisi and Mario free to depart, unmolested and "quits" with the entrepreneur, who, in spirit and munificence leaves the Czar of all the Russias as far in the shade, as the liberal and enlightened government of the United States the miserable serfdom of the Russian people.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

On Saturday Don Pasquale was repeated; on Monday—an extra night—the Huguenots; on Tuesday, the Prophète; on Thursday, Lucrezia Borgia, with La Prova d'un Opera Seria. To-night Mad. Grisi will make her last appearance in La Favorita.

Rossini's Comte Ory is in rehearsal. Le Comte Ory is one of the most charming of the composer's lighter operas, but it will be sacrificed by being brought out so late in the season.

The third performance of Lucrezia Borgia was not given on Thursday night, in consequence of Sig. Mario being seized with a sudden hoarseness, which rendered it impossible for him to sing more than half the notes set down for him in the trio of Act II. There was some disturbance when this was announced; but Mr. Harris coming forward with a gratuitous proposition from Mad. Grisi to sing the air in the rehearsal scene of La Prova, at once quelled the dissatisfaction of the audience. Mad. Grisi was received with enthusiastic applause when she appeared, and again at the end of her song—the cavatina from La Favorita.

Boosey v. Jefferys.—The judgment of the House of Lords in this case is postponed until Tuesday next.

ROYAL OPERA, DRURY LANE.

After long delays and numerous announcements, Masaniello was at last produced on Monday night at Drury Lane. There had been so much talk about the opera, the management, it was affirmed, having determined to do so much for its revival, that a good deal of curiosity was excited. Masaniello has always been a favourite with the English public. The extreme beauty and striking character of the melodies, the stirring and richly-colored choruses, the exquisite ballet dances, and the perfect symmetry of the work, recommended it at once to ears educated and uneducated. Perhaps no opera ever written—not excepting Il Barbiere di Siviglia—so equally delights the connoisseur and amateur. While the numberless recondite beauties it contains are only revealed to the former, the most superficial ear is fascinated by the grace and irresistible charm of the tunes. The libretto, too, is very attractive, although the principal lady fails to interest the spectator—a serious drawback to the success of a book. Fenella, however, is a delightful creature, and enchains attention throughout. Masaniello himself is a true hero, and we feel devoted to his fortune from the moment he appears.

Notwithstanding these numerous attractions, since the retirement of Mr. Braham from the stage, Masaniello has been produced at but rare intervals in this country, it being found difficult to procure an adequate representative of the Neapolitan fisherman. La Muette di Portici was brought out at the French Grand Opera in 1831. In the same year, we believe, an English version was given at Drury Lane, but the score was shamefully mutilated. The popular ballad, "My Sister dear," was interpolated, and Mr. Braham wrote a kind of belligerent ballad, "I've sworn he shall not perish," which Masaniello sang in the fourth act, where the conspirators want to sacrifice the viceroy's son in the fisherman's cabin. Some of the finest music also was entirely overlooked. The opera, however, was got up with great care and splendour, and enjoyed a long and prosperous run. Mr. Braham achieved an immense success. The late Mr. Tom Cooke supported the part of Alphonso, and the rest of the characters were adequately filled.

The most sucessful of those who attempted Masaniello after Mr. Braham, were Messrs. Sinclair, Wilson, and C. E. Horn, but none of them achieved celebrity in the performance. Masaniello on the English stage was disassociated from any name but that of Braham. The causes of this may be easily found. To sing the music of Masaniello as it should be sung, requires a large and energetic style. In the majority of operas the part of a lover is generally assigned to the tenor, who has to sing strains of a soft and tender character. The music of Masaniello, on the contrary with rare intervals, is bold and animated throughout. Not that the music of the revolutionary fisherman is devoid of tenderness and expression; the "Sleep" song being one of the most plaintive and touching ever written, and one or two other passages of almost equal beauty occurring.

The production of Masaniello as a ballet at Her Majesty's Theatre many years ago, under Mr. Laporte's management, with all the choruses sung, was a novelty and a disgrace.

At the Royal Italian Opera, as is well known, Masaniello was got up with great splendour in 1849, and has remained one of the standard works of the répertoire. Sig. Mario first played the hero, but was soon succeeded by Sig. Salvi. Signor Tamberlik made his first appearance in England as the Neapolitan fisherman, and is in no small degree indebted for the great reputation he now enjoys to his admirable performance of that character. At Her Majesty's theatre, under Mr. Lumley's management, the production of Masaniello was chiefly noticeable for the performance of Fenella by Mdlle. Monti, one of the most perfect and touching pieces of pantomime acting ever witnessed. Mdlle. Monti, as is generally known, died about twelve months since in Italy.

The recognised English version, written by the late James Kenney, Esq., converted the grand opera of La Muette di Portici into the opera-comique Masaniello—that is to say, the recitatives were all spoken, this constituting the difference between grand and "comique" opera, according to which theory, therefore, Fidelio is a comic opera. The new version given on Monday night, faithfully adhering to the original text, satisfied us that the opera would have lost nothing by having the dialogue spoken. It might have been the fault of the translator—and indeed nothing more ineuphonious ever was written than the new book of Masaniello—but the recitatives sounded ungrateful and harsh. In the French and Italian, on the contrary, the recitatives are always smooth, natural, and effective.

It was our intention to have gone into the performance of Monday night at some length; but the unexpected closing of the Royal Opera on Tuesday has rendered criticism to a certain extent unnecessary. The directors in some respects are entitled to praise for the manner in which Masaniello was brought out and put upon the stage. Auber's score was rigidly adhered to, and the liberties taken with it at Her Majesty's Theatre and the Royal Italian Opera carefully avoided. The cast included Mr. Sims Reeves, Masaniello; Mr. Weiss, Pietro; Mr. Leffler, Borella; Madame Rudersdorf, Elvira; and Mdlle. Louise, Fenella. Mr. Mapleson, who came on as Alphonso, was so terror-stricken, as to be unable to do justice to himself. Mr. Mapleson is a young man, and has been studying for three years in Italy. The choruses went well, and only wanted a little additional strength in the sopranos. The band was zealous, but, from lack of power in the strings, ineffective. For Auber's full and rich instrumentation a strong force of "strings" is indispensable. The corps de ballet was less efficient than the band.

Mr. Sims Reeves's Masaniello was the feature of the evening; and no artist has sung the music more finely since Braham. The celebrated song to "Sleep" was given with a sweetness and pathos never surpassed, and the effect it produced was extraordinary. Mr. Sims Reeves was called upon unanimously to repeat the air, which he sang with even greater expression than before. The duet of Liberty in act second, between Masaniello and Pietro—which, by the way, did not follow the Covent Garden version, beginning in one key and ending in another—was finely delivered by Mr. Sims Reeves and Mr. Weiss, and loudly applauded. In the last scene, Mr. Sims Reeves's acting and singing were equally admirable. His management of the pianissimo was wonderfully effective; and the allusions to the familiar melodies of the first act were given with the finest possible taste. It is to be regretted that such a performance should have been immediately followed by the unexpected closing of the theatre.

Many causes conduced to the detriment of the Royal Opera at Drury Lane, the fortunes of which at one time looked so fair and promising. One great error consisted in keeping the theatre open every night. Had there been three performances in the week only, the public would not have grown wearied, and a large subscription might have been ensured. The rule at the Italian Opera is to open twice in the week—the Thursdays, excepting on certain occasions, being considered extra nights. When many more performances are given than those included in the subscription, subscribers grumble, and not unreasonably. A second mistake in the Drury Lane management, scarcely less serious, and quite as easy to avoid, was in not casting the operas with the whole strength of the company. The fact of giving performances nightly compelled the directors to this, since it was necessary to give the singers some repose. Another fault was in setting the Royal Opera in direct competition with Covent Garden, more especially in the grand spectacle operas.

The Royal Opera has accomplished good, and might have accomplished more. In a company comprising Mr. Sims Reeves, Herr Formes, Herr Reichardt, Mademoiselle Agnes Bury, Madame Caradori, and other useful and zealous artists, were all the elements of success. No doubt the unparalleled heat of the weather kept numbers from the theatre for the last eight or ten days; but it was not exactly the weather which broke the fortunes of the establishment. Whether the Royal Opera will open again we are not informed. We trust it may, and that the directors will have gathered experience from their first essay.

Chieti.—L'Elena di Toloso, of Petrella, has had the most favourable reception, interpreted by the prima donna, Possi-Montegazza, the tenore Ferrari, and the barytone Vitti. Much applause for the prima donna.

PROVINCIAL.

THERE is very little news this week. Just now, indeed, is the dead season among the provincial lovers of harmony, who only begin to stir with the great music-festivals. There will be two festivals this year—one of the three choirs of Gloucester, Hereford, and Worcester, to be held at Worcester; and one at Norwich.

A correspondent from Leeds writes as follows:—

"On Monday evening, the Leeds Choral Society held its annual meeting, when from fifty to sixty members sat down to an excellent dinner, provided by Mr. Riley, of the Griffin Inn. Mr. Shaw was appointed chairman. After the usual toasts, he rose to present a handsome ivory bâton, ornamented with silver mountings, to Mr. R. S. Burton, organist of the parish church, and conductor of the Leeds Choral Society. In doing so, he said, "That he knew no one better qualified to conduct a band of musicians than Mr. Burton, and it afforded him great pleasure to be the medium of presenting him a testimonial from the members, as a professor who had so freely given his time, talents, and money to encourage music in the town of Leeds." Mr. Burton, in returning thanks, said, "He was ready to abet and encourage the progress of music in Leeds, and, whatever might be said to the contrary, he would faithfully continue to do his utmost on all occasions, more especially to the Society which had afforded him such good proofs of the confidence they reposed in him. The testimonial was doubly welcome, since it had been given him by the performing members of the society." The bâton has been exhibited during the week in Mr. Butterworth's music-shop, and has attracted much attention. The centre plate bears the following inscription:—

"Presented to R. S. BURTON, Esq., by the Members of the West Riding Orchestral Union and the Leeds Choral Society, as a tribute of respect for his valuable services as their Conductor."

BRIGHTON.—We learn that Mr. Frank Bodda, with five of his pupils, Miss Lascelles, Miss Manning, Miss Clara Dethridge, Mr. Alfred Pierre, and Mr. Wesley, gave a soiré musicale on Friday week, at his private residence, Nottingham Terrace. Besides the solos, duets, etc., which are indispensable in concerts of this kind, several glees and madrigals were sung, of which we may name, as most effective, "Who shall win my lady fair," and "Down in a flowery vale." The concert was well attended.

We extract the following paragraph from a Plymouth paper:

"A fire broke out in the theatre here on Thursday night last during an amateur performance by the officers of the Militia. Mrs. Hudson Kirby having to come from an illuminated scene at the back of the stage, her dress caught fire, and in her terror she ran among the combustible materials at the wings. The flames, however, were speedily extinguished, no great amount of damage being done to property, but Mrs. Kirby was much burned on the arms, neck, and shoulders. Her face was luckily untouched. The performance came, of course, to a premature close."

At SANDGATE, the Misses Bennett and Mr. J. Angus Fairbairn, at present on a tour in Kent, gave one of their entertainments, entitled Songs of Scotland, on Friday evening, when the Assembly Room, called Milton Hall, was filled with a highly respectable audience.—Last week, Mr. George Russell gave his musical entertainment of Leaves from Life's Volume, in the same Hall. The audience was not numerous.

Our correspondent at Manchester thus rectifies an error of last week:—

"I learn from Mr. Knowles, proprietor of the Theatre Royal here, that in spite of the Concert Hall people, the Cruvelli party of Messrs. Beale has been engaged for six nights. A series of six operas will be given by the following eminent artistes and chorus from the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, London:—Madlles. Cruvelli, Marai, and Cotti; Signori Tamberlik, Luchesi, Polinini, Susini, and Tagliafico, with a chorus of thirty. The orchestra is to be under the direction of Signor Benedict. The repertoire of operas includes Norma, Ernani, La Sonnambula, Fidelio, Otello, Il Barbiere. The first of the six will be given on the evening of Saturday, August 26th."

If well supported, it is also Mr. Knowles's intention to engage the Drury Lane opera company for ten weeks, to begin in October next. C. Hallé and Loder joint conductors.

REDDITCH.—A Philharmonic Society has been established here, with Robert Clive, M.P., for its President; it now numbers nearly fifty members.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—A concert was given on Tuesday evening in the Music Hall, for the benefit of Mr. Aldridge, conductor and leader of the orchestra at the Theatre Royal during the late season. The concert was given by some amateur friends, and others, as a compliment to the musical talents of Mr. Aldridge, and his gentlemanly demeanour to all with whom he has come in contact.

MANCHESTER.—A number of reed bands from various towns in Lancashire and Yorkshire, competed at the Belle Vue Gardens for four prizes. Each band played two pieces of its own selection. The Burnley Mechanics' Institution band (twenty-four performers) obtained the first prize, which was a sum of £16, and a cocoa-wood clarionet presented by Mr. J. Higham, of Victoria-street, in this city. The second prize (£9) was won by the Worsley Temperance band; the third (£5) by the Ancient Shepherds' band, Stalybridge; the fourth (£3) by the Hartshead band, Ashton.

HULL.—The fifteenth public performance of the Kingston Sacred Musical Society took place under the management of Mr. R. W. Hall. The whole of the solos were by resident performers.

Our file of provincial papers offer nothing else for extract.

FOREIGN.

PARIS.—The re-opening of the Grand Opéra is definitively fixed for the 15th of August. The new direction of the Imperial Academy of Music will be solemnly inaugurated by a Cantata, the music of which is by Queen Hortense, and the poetry by M. L. Belmontet. The greatest efforts are being made to attain the highest degree of perfection possible, both in the musical and choreographic departments; rehearsals are held every day, and M. Roqueplan is doing his best to justify the high honour to which he has been raised—he is, moreover, warmly seconded by the Commission.—La Nonne Sanglante, by MM. Gounod and Scribe, is in full rehearsal, and will be the first novelty of the autumnal season. It will probably be brought out about the end of September. A new ballet, the music by M. Labarre, is spoken of, in which Mdlle. Rosati will play the principal part.—Verdi's new opera, in five acts, the poem by Scribe, will soon be put in rehearsal, the parts having already been distributed. Madame Cerito's engagement terminates on the 30th of October, but it will doubtless be renewed. M. Halévy's La Juive will be resumed for the début of Madame Donati.

At the Opéra-Comique, Gille Ravisseur, Grisar's best work, has been played with success.—La Fiancée du Diable, which was suspended in consequence of the indisposition of M. Couderc, has been resumed.—The new opera by MM. Foucher and Varney is in rehearsal, and will shortly be produced.—The new work by the Prince de la Moskowa has unfortunately been delayed by the illness of Mdlle. Rey.

The director of the Italian Opera (M. Raggani) is now busily employed in selecting his company for the forthcoming season. He is in treaty with M. and Mad. Ardavani, barytone and soprano, who have been singing in Spain and Holland with considerable success. M. Raggani has also secured the valuable services of Sig. Bettini.

The following is a complete list of the company engaged at the Vaudeville, which would seem to announce that the management have a leaning to genteel comedy:—Mesdames Fargueil, Luther, Saint-Marc, Chambéry, Armand, Bilhaut, Duplessy, Jarny, Mocker, Dupuis, Jallais, Clorinde, Millot, and Laure; and MM. Brindeau, Félix, Delannoy, Chambéry, Labe, Allié, Félicien, Lagrange, Chaumont, Léonce, Parade, and Galabert.

The new opera, by MM. Scribe and Adolphe Adam, is in active rehearsal. The principal part is confided to a new tenor, M. Sapin (premier prix of the Conservatoire), who has been lately engaged. There is some talk of a one-act opera, by M. Varney, formerly chef-d'orchestre at the Théâtre Historique, and author of the Air des Girondins. The principal part is said to be intended for Mdlle. Favel.—At the Théâtre Français, the new piece by MM. Lurine and Albéric Second, entitled La Comédie à Ferney, has proved completely successful. It was well played by Mdlle. Judith, MM. Geoffroy, Brindeau, Monrose, and Anselme. The part of the Prince de Ligne, confided to M. Brindeau, will be the last which that artist will "create" at this theatre, as he is engaged for the new troupe at the Vaudeville. The new drama of M. Liadières (first entitled Gustave Vasa, but at present christened La Suède), is in rehearsal. The committee have definitely received, as sociétaires, Mdlle. Delphine Fix and Mdlle. Favart.—At the Gymnase, a kind of counter-part to Les Filles de Marbre has been produced with success. It is entitled Les Cœurs d'Or, and is from the pens of MM. Léon Laya and Jules de Prémaray, the feuilletonist.—An elegant little comedy of M. Victor Mangan has been brought out at the Variétés, under the title of Les Réprisailles. Les Noces de Marluchet, with M. Lassagne in the principal part, continues as attractive as ever.—An amusing vaudeville, La Mort de Pompée, by M. Jules Cordier, is the last novelty at the Palais Royal.—A new three-act drama, entitled Harry-le-Diable, from the pens of MM. Fournier and Meyer, has been favourably received at the Ambigu.

MADRID.—Sig. Camillo Sivori has just left the capital, after having reaped the highest honours. He has played his Carnaval de Madrid twice before the Court. He next proceeded to Seville, where, in spite of the excessive heat, he gave four concerts in one week. After the second, the Society of St. Cecilia gave him a serenade by torchlight. At the last concert, which attracted an immense crowd, a rich amateur presented the celebrated violinist with a golden wreath, and the stage was covered with sonnets in his praise. Sig. Sivori intends next proceeding to Cadiz, Xeres, Malaga, Valencia, and Gibraltar. [All this is on the authority of the Spanish papers.—ED.]

VIENNA.—(From our own Correspondent.)—At the Imperial Opera house, Fidelio has been produced to a very crowded house. Fräulein La Grua was greatly applauded in the principal part, and was well seconded by Herr Ander as Florestan, and Fräulein Liebhardt as Marcelline. Herr Mayerhofer played the part of Rocco, but was certainly no improvement on Herr Staudigl. On the 14th inst., we had Donizetti's Lucia di Lammermoor, with Fräulein Wildauer as Lucia; and, on the 18th inst., Fräulein Pruckner, from the Mannheim Theatre, appeared as Henrietta, in Auber's opera of Der Maurer (Le Maçon.)

ISID.—The German opera season commenced with a French opera, La Dame Blanche. Next were produced: Les Huguenots, also French; Guillaume Tell, ditto; La Sonnambula and Linda di Chamouni; next Der Freischütz, Martha, and Don Juan. Robert le Diable, Fra Diavolo and Fernand Cortes are in rehearsal. M. Flotow has been engaged to write a new opera for this theatre.

BERLIN. — (From our own Correspondent.) — Herr August Lewald, régisseur of the opera at Stuttgart, has arrived here, charged with a commission from the King, to invite M. Meyerbeer to be present at the first representation of his opera of L'Etoile du Nord, on the 1st September next.—A short time since, Herr Deichmann, director of the theatre in the Friedrich-Wilhemstadt, generously offered his establishment for a free benefit for Lortzing's family. As, however, his troupe, is, at the present moment, incomplete, Herr Engel has volunteered the services of his operatic company, who will play, for the above charitable purpose, in Kroll's theatre. The violinist, Signor Bazzini, is engaged for a number of concerts to be given at the establishment just named. The young Portugese pianist, Arthur Napoléon, is also expected.

MUNICH.—On the 15th inst., at one o'clock, the Grand Industrial Exhition was opened with great pomp and ceremony by the king and all the notabilities of the town. The catalogue contains the names of six thousand five hundred and eighty-eight exhibitors from thirty-two German states, of which two thousand three hundred and fifty-six are Bavarian, one thousand four hundred and eighty-one Austrians, and seven hundred and sixty-eight Prussians. With regard to the musical department of the Exhibition, we find in the catalogue the names of seventy-three piano-manufacturers, of which eight are from Bavaria, one from Brunswick, one from Frankfort, two from Hamburgh, three from Hanover, four from the two Hesses, one from Nassau, twenty from Austria, nine from Prussia, five from Saxony, six from the collateral branches of the house of Saxony, one from Schwarzburg, twelve from Würtemburg. The makers of other instruments number eighty-six, three being from Baden, thirty-six from Bavaria, one from Frankfort, two from Hamburgh, one from Hanover, one from the Grand Duchy of Hesse, one from Nassau, twenty-three from Austria, three from Prussia, one from the younger branch of Reuss, nine from Saxony, one from Saxe-Weimar, and four from Würtemburg. Two organ-builders have sent in organs from Bavaria, two from Austria, two from Prussia, and four from Würtemburg. Berger (Bavaria) and Tempele (Austria) exhibit kettle-drums, and Wendel (Bavaria) and Röde (Hamburgh) ordinary drums. The grand organ built by Zimmermann was played on at the opening of the Exhibition by the Chorregent, Herr Pentenrieder. The Prüfungsconzerte (examination concerts), in the Royal Conservatory of Music, were brought to a close on the twelfth inst.; the progress made by the pupils both in vocal and instrumental music was very satisfactory, and did great credit to the various professors. The General Music-Director, Herr Lachner, is on leave of absence, the musical department of the theatre being temporarily confided to the newly engaged Orchesterdirector, Herr Friederich Meyer, from Stettin, who has given great satisfaction by the manner in which he has directed the performances of Flotow's opera of Martha.

BRESLAU.—After a lapse of eight years, Rossini's Tancred has again been produced at the Stadttheater to an overflowing house. Fräulein Johanna Wagner was very successful in the part of Tancred. Fräulein Geisthardt was, also, good as Amenaide.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.—The opera company, under the direction of Herr L'Arronge, can not be accused of idleness, having produced fifteen different works in the course of four weeks. Fräulein Johanna Wagner will appear at the end of the present month, and Herr Formes about the middle of August.

WEIMAR.—The season was brought to a close on the Grand Duke's birthday, when Franz Schubert's opera of Alfons und Estrella was given. In spite of all the exertions of Dr. Liszt and every one else engaged, the result was not satisfactory. Before the opera, a Fest-Ouverture, by Rubinstein, was played in honour of the occasion. The theatre re-opens on the 18th of September.

LEIPSIC.—Herr Theodore Formes has been successful as Gennaro, in Donizetti's Lucrezia Borgia.—Herr Julius Rietz has resigned his appointment as Capellmeister at the theatre, in order to devote his whole attention to the Gewandhaus concerts, of which he has been named director. Herr Witt, from Königsberg, succeeds him as Capellmeister.—Herr Ferdinand David has gone to Liefland to see his family. He will not return before the beginning of September.

STOCKHOLM.—The theatre closed on the last day of June. During the season, which commenced on the 1st November, Mozart's Zauberflöte, which was put upon the stage with great splendour, was played sixteen times, to crowded houses; Die Nürnberger Puppe, nineteen times; Weber's Preciosa, six times; Mozart's Figaro's Hochzeit, three times; Donizetti's Leonore, three times; and the same composer's Tochter des Regiments, seven times. In the last week of the season, Dalayrac's Schloss von Monteners was produced.

WARSAW.—Mad. De Lagrange achieved a triumph on the night of her benefit, when she played Norma. Although the prices were doubled, every place was taken at two o'clock in the afternoon.

LUBECK.—The Municipal authorities have voted Herr Engel, the manager of the theatre, an annual sum of 10,000 marks (4,000 thalers), on condition of his engaging an operatic company.

MANNHEIM.—M. Roger, the French tenor, has appeared with great success as George Brown, in La Dame Blanche. M. Roger is thoroughly master of the German language. He has resigned his engagement with the Grand Opéra, and will not return to Paris.

POSEN.—Herr Wallner, manager of the Stadt-theater, has announced that he shall not give operas next winter. Herr Springer, also, the manager of the theatre at Magdeburg, intends to renounce grand operas, and play only smaller and less expensive works.

BRUGES.—A concert, lately given by the Société Royale des Chœurs, was rendered highly interesting by the performance of MM. Leonard and Gregoir, who played an original duet for violin and piano with great effect. M. Leonard was also much applauded for the manner in which he executed his own fantaisie militaire.

BREMEN.—The Gesangfest of the united Liedertafelen of Bremen, Brunswick, Hanover, Oldenburg, etc., which took place on the 10th, 11th, and 12th of June, was but thinly attended, scarcely one hundred and fifty persons taking part in it, on account of the bad weather.

KÖNIGSBERG.—Herr Schumann's Paradies und Peri will shortly be put in rehearsal, and be produced in the course of the Autumn.

FLORENCE.—A new mass, by Signor Gamucci, was executed last week in the Church del Carmine. The music was well executed, both by the vocalists and instrumentalists. A new motet, for tenor voice, by the same composer, has also been performed. It is well spoken of. The words are those of the "Ave Maria." Although suffering from indisposition, Sig. Mori, who has a good tenor voice, sang the principal part extremely well.

MILAN.—A new opera, Ida di Danimarca, the music by Sig. Rieschi, is in rehearsal, and will shortly be produced at the Carcano.—Great expectations are excited on account of the posthumous opera of Donizetti, called Elisabetta, about to be brought out at the theatre of Santa-Radegonda.

FORLI.—A new opera entitled La Duchessa de la Vallière, by Sig. Petrocini, has been produced with success, the composer being recalled several times. Mdlle. Arrigotti and Sig. Coliva, who played the principal parts, were greatly applauded. Another new opera, Margherita di Borgogna, by the same composer, will shortly be given.

BARCELONA.—Verdi's Trovatore has been played here with success. Signora Amalia Cabari, the prima donna, is an immense favourite with the public. Mdlle. Angri also comes in for her share of applause; the other parts are played by Signori Irfré and Superchi; the last named, a barytone, will be remembered at Her Majesty's Theatre.

AMSTERDAM.—The director of the German Theatre here, with a view of putting an end to translations from the French, which he thinks destructive of native dramatic literature, has proposed to give prizes in money, in addition to the sum paid for copyright, for the best pieces annually produced at his theatre.

DRESDEN.—Fräulein Lagrua has brought her series of representations to a close for this year, as Rosina in the Barber of Seville. Masaniello and Der Prophète have been given and drawn full houses.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—That great friend and patron of opera and drama, Count Albert von Nostitz, president of the Conservatory and Intendant of the theatre at Prague, during Herr Hoffman's management, stopped in this city for three days, on his way to Ems. In compliance with his wish, Wagner's opera of Lohengrin was given. Besides this, Die Weisse Frau, with M. Roger, and Clavigo, with Herr Haase, were played during his sojourn here. After the Weisse Frau, the company, which contains a great many Austrian artists, gave the Count a serenade.

DUSSAU.—It is said that Herr Kalliwoda, the composer, is to be appointed Hof-Capellmeister, in place of the late Herr Schneider.

TRIESTE.—Bianca Cappello, an opera by Alberto Randegger, is performed every night with considerable applause.

PADUA.—The first representation of Don Sebastiano was given on the 7th inst. with the young prima donna Angela Orecchia, the tenor Landi, the baritones Guicciardi and Selva. The music of Donizetti has been deservedly appreciated, and increases in the favour of the public on every performance. Signora Orecchia has pleased greatly. She possesses one of the finest mezzo soprano voices, and made her debut in the above-named opera at the Carcano, in Milan, during the last carnival, when she had equal success. Her master was Signor Francesco Lamperti.

VIGEVANO.—A new mass composed by the Maestro di Cappella, Antonio Cagnoni, was executed in this cathedral on the occasion of the solemnity of San Pietro. The principal soli were sung by the tenor Prudenza. The music was admired.

BRESLAU.—M. Roger is expected here on the 20th inst.

STETTIN.—The theatre opens on the 15th September next. Herr Hein, the manager, has obtained a liberal subvention from the town funds.

WAR AND MUSIC.

[The following letter, communicated to the Editor of the Neue Wiener Musik Zeitung, may, perhaps, prove interesting to our own readers.]

"Kuschau, September, 1849.

"MY DEAR FRIEND,

"If these lines ever penetrate to you through the narrowly-watched Russian pallisades of our town, which is now elevated to the dignity of a wooden fortress, you will be not a little astonished at their contents, for they contain neither the latest intelligence concerning the important military movements going forward, nor engrossing descriptions of the varied camp life here, but simply a few details on a very pleasing musical adventure.

"You are aware how fond I always was of playing the organ. Well, one morning, at early mass, I had hardly finished the last note when an individual, who looked like a Russian general of high standing, addressed me very politely and requested: 'that I would repeat the last fugue by Bach in E minor.' 'I very much regret, your Excellency,' I said, in reply to his strange demand, 'that I can only fulfil your wish on condition of your honouring me with a visit at my own house.'—'I should have done so, without your friendly invitation,' he answered in a very courteous, though military tone. 'I am Adjutant-General Schilder, and am excessively fond of classical German music. During a year that I spent in the Caucasus, I have sadly missed the performances I used to hear every week in St. Petersburg. I stop one day in Kuschau—invite all the musicians of the place to meet me. Of course you are the organist?' On his learning that I was merely a dilettante, and son of the organist, he immediately got me to introduce him to my father. Bach was followed by Beethoven, Beethoven by Mozart, Mozart by Mendelssohn, and so on. Schilder revelled with delight in my father's fine musical library, and I could not make up my mind whether the General's taste or his memory was the more wonderful. He was perfectly well acquainted with the key and beginning of most classical quartets for stringed instruments. The plan proposed by him was soon executed. Six Cossacks carried a fine piano, by Seuffert in Vienna, with all necessary adjuncts, to Schilder's lodgings, whither we all proceeded in the evening. In obedience to his wish, we began with Haydn's quartet in G (with the variations on the Kaiserlied—"God save the Emperor"); this was followed by others of the same description, diversified occasionally by piano pieces and songs. Our good-natured host listened with a perfect air of devotion. During the pauses, however, he snatched up the real Italian viola, and extemporised on it in a sterling and excellent manner: he also played on the pianoforte very well. The conversation became much merrier and more unconstrained than you would fancy, over a capital bowl of punch. The General's suite was composed of highly-educated German officers, and I remarked that several of them had studied the Hungarian language with great success.

"Schilder is in the prime of manhood; tall, and strongly-knit. Since his wound, he supports himself on a stick. His whitened hair and thick moustache, however, form a contrast with his bearing and speech. His face is strongly marked and bony, while his quick eye and lofty forehead indicate as much intellect as energy. He speaks German quite as well as the officers of his suite. He was greatly pleased with the plaintive Hungarian national airs which I played him, and the stock of the music publishers here was immediately rifled and carried off to Russia. German and French papers of every shade were lying upon the table. The following day, Schilder paid us a visit, and thanked us heartily for the pleasure he had had the evening before. He could not tear himself away from the viola, but purchased it at a fair price."

THE ORGANIST FROHBERGER.

THE city of Halle, in Saxony, gave birth, in the course of one century, to three learned organists; to Samuel Scheidt in 1587, to John James Frohberger in 1637, and to Handel in 1684. But the glory of the last obscured, and, quasi, stifled the fame of the two former. Samuel Scheidt is quite forgotten; the name of Handel is European.

Frohberger seems to have been the harbinger of Handel. Like him he travelled through Germany, Italy, and England; indicating to him beforehand, as it were, the way he had to follow; like him also, in his early years, rapid progress and precocious talents gained him the support of devoted protectors. But the parallel between them goes no further. Frohberger was a profound organist, but his studies as well as his successes confined themselves to the key-board. Handel was a great composer. It must be stated nevertheless of Handel, that in his music the composer often betrays the organist. It is the organ with its powerful stops and its majestic sounds which formed the style of Handel. The organ requires serious studies; the organist should be conversant with all the contrivances of composition; he must be endowed with a rich, ready, and glowing imagination; his fingers, with a manly strength, ought to possess pliancy and rapidity. The artist struggling with the organ is like an athlète; let none imagine that the instrument yields freely its secret springs of harmony; one must wrestle them out from its bosom. But, when subdued, it repays abundantly the efforts put forth. It excites, it inebriates him who masters it; and, like a generous steed, it seems to inspire with a renewed ardour the intelligent hand by which it is subdued and ruled. Behold this silent organ, these motionless keys—the imprisoned air sleeps in the vast receptacle. But let a skilful hand press upon the keys, and open a way to the quickening breath—suddenly, harmony bursts and bounds through: a magnificent edifice arises; grave and profound voices sustain, upon their wide bases, the highest tones of the scale; while other sounds fill up the void, and connect these voices, separated by so immense a distance. The agile keys move rapidly; the air, docile and quick as thought, runs through all the tubes, and escapes with a song! Chords succeed each other, as tide succeeds tide; the church is filled with surging tones. As, in a clear night, the immense canopy of heaven is studded with countless stars, so, when hearing the organ, we fancy we see the sounds escape from every tube, and, mysteriously made visible, scintillate at the top of the vaults, and sparkle like a firmament of stars amid the arches! The multitude standing within the vast edifice are stirred as they are penetrated by these sounds; while the organist, moved by his own inspiration, himself thrills at the harmonies created by the pressure of his own fingers.

We are conversant with harmony now-a-days; but the composers who lived almost two centuries since were also familiar with it. Our organ builders are skilful, but theirs were not less qualified than ours: the organs were excellent and the performers learned men. Mere boys, well qualified in other respects, and born in a country wherein music is, so to speak, entailed with the blood, contemplating from early years these beautiful instruments, proved shortly profound harmonists; and the music which they created afterward was grave, serious, and vigorous. The organ, on the other hand, is itself a severe master; every fault in it becomes signal, and falls heavily upon the sinner; one false note is a chastisement! The old composers, consequently, were robust musicians. Their successors displayed more gracefulness, but less strength; more wit, but less energy; they were trained at the pianoforte.

John James Frohberger, born in Halle in 1637, was a disciple of that vigorous school. His father, a chanter in the church of St. Maurice, conducted his musical education, and taught him singing, the harpsichord, and organ. The Swedish ambassador in Vienna, passing through Halle, and chancing to hear the young artist, was struck with his beautiful voice, with his expressive singing, and his precocious skill on both instruments. He directly proposed to take him to Vienna with him, and to introduce him to the Emperor Ferdinand III. Both father and son acceded to the proposal joyfully. Arrived in Vienna, the ambassador, according to promise, introduced to the Emperor the Saxon youth, who was not yet fifteen years of age. The Emperor found him worthy of his protection, and desired that he should finish a training so auspiciously commenced.

There lived in Rome, at that time, a master of high repute, Geronimo Frescobaldi. This master, the most illustrious of that period, was attached to the most celebrated church in Christendom; he was the organist of St. Peter; and on the day when he entered upon his office, more than twenty thousand people had come from all parts of Italy, and thronged the immense church. Such was the illustrious master to whom Ferdinand III. entrusted his young protégé; who set out immediately for Rome, pensioned by the Emperor. After a three years' instruction and patient training, Frescobaldi had nothing more to teach his disciple. "Go," said he, "return to Vienna; bear back to your country the fruit of your studies." Frohberger left Rome in 1655, went through France, sojourned in Paris for some time, and afterwards in Dresden, and arrived in Vienna, rich with a genius now fully developed. His travels were not useless to him. At Dresden the Elector heard and applauded him. In Paris he had become acquainted with the musicians most in renown: he had even adapted to the harpsichord new ornaments which a celebrated lute performer, Denis Gautier, surnamed Denis the Old, had brought into fashion. What a glory for the lute, and for Denis the Old!

Paris at that time had no lyric theatre. The Italian singers that Mazarin had called to France in 1647, to perform Les Amours d'Hercule, by Cavalli, had not been very successful, and had departed long since. Lulli had not yet obtained from Louis XIV. the privilege of an opera. Nevertheless, music was much cultivated, and people played on the lute and the theorbo.

There existed at that period in France a certain most benign and innocent sovereignty: a sovereignty to which the King of France himself granted the privilege, and of which he had not to fear the encroachments: and yet its power was unlimited and uncontrolled. This sovereignty was solely and entirely musical: and the man assuming it was called the King of the Violins. This despotic king, whose sceptre was a bow, reigned, ruled, and played on the violin—poorly enough, in all probability. According to his letters patent, he had to travel through France for the purpose of establishing bodies of violin players in every province: and granted letters of violin mastership at the rate of ten pounds. Thus, for the sum of ten pounds, one was declared a licensed violinist. It appears that the number of violin amateurs was very large; and the louis pouring fast into the purse of the king of the violins, he realized a pretty good sum of money.

History has not transmitted to us all the deeds of these kings; but it saved some of them from oblivion. Amongst them Lulli stands first, although he did not bear the illustrious title. At the age of nineteen, having been commissioned to lead and train the small band of twenty-four violins of Louis XIV., he really became king of the violins. He exhibited the utmost attention, showing great diligence in the education of these young artists, whom he used to call his children. Yet he never hesitated to break a violin on the head of one of those beloved children, if he deemed it necessary to make an example of him. Under such a paternal training, the school could not fail to thrive. The art of violin playing was in some respects in its infancy. The high tones were, at that time, undiscovered musical regions, and long after that period, inspired the orchestra with a kind of terror. Old amateurs still remember when the performers were struck with fright at the discovery of a C on the E string. "Beware of the C!" said the frightened leader of the orchestra in a low whisper; and the inauspicious hint ran through the ranks of the band as an admonition to look for this monster. Our skilful artists now ascend like daring æronauts to an atmosphere of music to which they have accustomed themselves, and of which our ancestors had not even a thought.

Meantime, Frohberger, whom we left in Vienna, was now eighteen years of age, already celebrated, ranking among the first and beloved by the Emperor who treated him kindly, and had given him the office of court-organist.

F. HALEVY.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

SIGNOR GIULIO REGONDI has removed to 22, Manchester-street, Manchester-square.

TO THE MUSICAL WORLD.—A Gentleman with a beautiful tenor voice (Tenore Robusto) who has studied under the first Masters in Italy, is open to an engagement to sing at Private or Public Concerts. Address by letter, to Canto, 138, Oxford-street.

NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—In answer to many inquiries, Subscribers are respectfully informed that the Concerts for the Fourth Season will commence in March next. 201, Regent-street.

Digitized by Google

CONCERTS or ENTERTAINMENTS in the PROVINCES.—Mr. JOHN BLAGROVE (late Manager of Mr. John Parry's Entertainment) will be happy to undertake the arrangement and management of any musical tours in the ensuing Autumn and Winter. All applications to be addressed to Mr. John Blagrove, 71, Mortimer-street, Cavendish-square.

ORCHESTRINA FOR SALE.—A very fine Mahogany 6 octave Orchestrina, in excellent condition, comprising Pianoforte, Seraphin, Flageolet, Bells, Triangle and Drum. The instrument in size and appearance resembles a Cabinet Pianoforte, has been very little used, and will be sold a bargain. To be seen at Campbell, Ransford, and Co.'s, Music Warehouse, 53, New Bond-street.

THE ROYAL MAGNETIC PAGE-TURNER.—An extraordinary novelty for the musical world. These clever instruments turn over the leaves of music for the performer, preventing interruption. The public are invited to view them at the Royal Polytechnic Institution; the Royal Panopticon; and, at the Patentees, Druce and Co., 68, Baker-street. Price for Harps, 17s. 6d., Pianos, 21s., submitted to the Queen, see Court Circular, 17th July.

MILITARY MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—Militia Regiments or parties joining Bands, and in want of Instruments, Music, or a Band Master, are invited to apply to Messrs. BOOSEY AND SONS, 28, Holles-street, Military Instrument Manufacturers, and Music Publishers to her Majesty's Army and the Hon. E. I. C.'s Service. The high character of their Instruments and Journals for Reed and Brass Bands are acknowledged throughout the Army.—A Register kept of the most experienced Band Masters.

BOOSE'S NEW MODEL CORNET-À-PISTONS. Price Seven Guineas. In calling attention to a new and very beautiful model Cornet-a-Piston which Messrs. Boosey and Sons have lately completed, they would beg to observe that, with the assistance of the most able professors in London, they have succeeded in uniting in this instrument a perfect intonation with a clear, rich, and brilliant tone never before attained to such perfection in the cornet-à-piston. It can, further, be played without effort, even by one inexperienced in the use of brass instruments. BOOSEY and SONS, Holles-street, Military Instrument Manufacturers and Music Publishers to Her Majesty's Army, and the Honourable East India Company's Service, &c.

RUDALL, ROSE, CARTE, and CO., 100, NEW BOND STREET, LONDON, have the honour of announcing that they have been appointed the Sole Agents in Great Britain for the Sale of the SAX-CORNETS, SAXOPHONES, SAX-HORNS, and all other Brass Military Instruments invented and manufactured by M. Adolphe Sax, to whom was awarded the only Council Medal of the Great Exhibition for Military Instruments in Brass, a list of which, with the prices, may be had on application, post free. It will be seen from this list, that M. Sax's Instruments can now be supplied direct from his own Manufactory, at a price not higher than the numerous imitations of them.

THE SAXOPHONE.—RUDALL, ROSE, CARTE, and Co., 100, New Bond-street, sole agents in this country for M. Sax's military instruments, in addition to a large stock of Sax Horns, Sax Trombas, Sax Trumpets, and Cornets, have just received a great variety of soprano, alto, tenor, and bass, of Sax's new and beautiful-toned instruments, the Saxophone. "These new instruments (brass and played by a reed), possess a charm equal to the originality of their tone, and they carry to the highest degree of perfection, la voix expressive."—Report of Jurors, Great Exhibition.

REPAIRS of STRINGED, REED, and BRASS MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—Messrs. Boosey and Sons beg to announce to the musical profession and the public, that, to enable them to execute repairs in the best possible manner, they have recently engaged from Germany one of the most skilful European artisans to superintend this department, and who thoroughly understands the mechanism of Musical Instruments of every description and model. Parties, therefore, intrusting the most valuable instruments to Messrs. Boosey and Sons, may rely upon their being treated with a care and efficiency unequalled in London. Boosey and Sons, Musical Instrument Manufacturers, 28, Holles-street.

MILITARY BANDS—REED AND BRASS.

C. BOOSE'S MILITARY MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—Messrs. BOOSEY & SONS, in submitting to the Army and the Musical Public a few of the latest improvements in the above CELEBRATED MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, beg to return their sincere thanks for the patronage so liberally bestowed on their establishment; and to assure those who have not hitherto honoured them with their commands, that their undeviating principle of business is to manufacture instruments of the very best description only. By this means, Boosey and Sons trust to ensure the permanent patronage of their friends. A fair and moderate price is fixed on every Instrument. CLARIONETS.—Either of Cocoa-wood or Grenadille, with 13 German Silver Keys; of Box-wood, with 13 Brass ditto; or of German Silver, with 13 Keys of the same metal. The whole of these comprise every new improvement. FLUTES AND PICCOLOS.—In the usual keys, for Amateurs or Military purposes, either of Cocoa or Box-wood, with German Silver or Brass Keys, and every new improvement. FIFES (Boosé's Improved).—Either of Cocoa or Box-wood, with 4 German Silver or Brass Keys. BASSOONS.—The new French Model, of Maple-wood, with 16 Brass, or German Silver Keys. BOOSÉ'S UNRIVALLED CORNET-A-PISTONS.—The great success that has attended the introduction of Boosé's new patent Cornet, and the many flattering testimonials the beauty of the model and the exceeding richness of its tone have called forth, have induced the manufacturers to extend the improvements still further, and they have now the pleasure of announcing, that they have succeeded in adjusting to the same model, the Rotary Cylinder Action. By means of this beautiful and light action, the most rapid passages can be executed with marvellous quickness and dexterity. Price, with Valves, 7 Guineas, with the new Rotary Cylinder Action, 9 Guineas. Either instrument strongly Electro-plated (equal to Silver), 2 Guineas extra. CORNETTO SOPRANO, in D or E flat (for Brass Band); VALVE TRUMPETS, Althorns (Barytone), with Three Valves in B Flat, E Flat, or F. EUPHONIONS (Bass), in B Flat or C, with Four Valves. BOMBARDONS (Bass) in E Flat, or F, with Four Valves. All these Instruments can be had either with Valves or the new Rotary Cylinder Action. The Althorns are made on two models—either with Bell up or forward. The Euphonion is a new Valve Instrument, infinitely superior to, and rapidly superseding the Ophicleide. FRENCH HORNS either with Three Valves, or on an entirely new model, with the Rotary Cylinder Action. These Horns, Boosey & Sons can with confidence recommend as superior to any yet supplied to the Profession. Better cannot be made.—TROMBONES, Alto, Tenor, and Bass. In the usual Keys, either with Slides, Valves, or the new Rotary Cylinder Action. The Valve Trombone may be had either with the Bell up or forward.—THE NEW ROTARY CYLINDER ACTION. With this action, which is exceedingly light, the most rapid passage may be executed with marvellous dexterity and quickness. It is, further, more simple and much stronger than any patent actions that have hitherto been made.—VALVE, OR FIELD BUGLE, in B flat or C. By a simple contrivance, the valves of this instrument may be detached at pleasure, and placed in a small leather case, and the instrument remains an ordinary Field Bugle.—OPHICLEIDES, in B flat or C, with 10 or 11 Keys. Cavalry Trumpets, Turkish Crescents, Triangles, Military Tambourines, Drum Heads, Reeds, Music Stands, Music Paper, and every requisite for a Reed, Brass, or String Band.—DRUMS (BASS), Boosé's Improved, of Brass. The advantages in these over Wooden Drums, are, an infinitely superior tone and great durability, without any increase in weight. Boosey & Sons have received the most flattering testimonials from the many Regiments they have supplied with these Drums, both at home and abroad. Tenor and Side Drums, also of Brass.—BASS DRUM STICKS. Boosey & Sons have succeeded in manufacturing a Drum Stick of an entirely New Material, which requires no covering, and will last for TEN OR TWENTY YEARS, and thus a remedy is provided for the constant expense of re-covering Drum Sticks. The Regimental Facings, and other colours, being tastefully introduced, render this Drum Stick an exceedingly handsome appendage to the Drum.

BOOSEY & SONS, 28, Holles-street, Musical Instrument Manufacturers and Music Publishers to the Army.

NEW GALOP.—A magnificent Portrait of Sir Charles NAPIER, embellishes the title page of "The Baltic Galop," by Albert Wagner, price 2s. 6d. Published by Boosey and Sons, 28, Holles-street.

HOUSE OF LORDS—WRIT OF ERROR.

[Before the LORD CHANCELLOR, LORD BROUGHAM, LORD ST. LEONARDS, and other Peers.]

JEFFERYS v. BOOSEY.

THIS was a writ of error upon a unanimous judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, reversing the judgment of the Court of Exchequer. Mr. Boosey had commenced, in the latter-named court, an action in the case against Mr. Jefferys for an infringement of the copyright of one of the airs of the opera of La Sonnambula. The question that was raised was as to the right of an assignee of a foreign author to have a copyright in a work first published in this country by such assignee. The defendant Jefferys denied that any such right existed, and a further objection was raised by him in the court below, to the effect that in point of form there had been no valid assignment of the copyright to the plaintiff Boosey. The declaration stated that the plaintiff was the proprietor of the copyright of and in a certain book, to wit, a musical composition called "Come per me sereno—Recitativo e cavatina, nell' opera La Sonnambula del M. Bellini," which had been first printed and published in England within twenty-eight years then last past, and which copyright was subsisting at the time of the committing by the defendant of the grievances thereinafter mentioned. That the defendant, after the passing of the act of Parliament made and passed in the session of Parliament holden in the 5th and 6th years of the reign of her present Majesty, intituled, "An Act to amend the law of Copyright;" and within twelve calendar months next before the commencement of that suit, did unlawfully print, and cause to be printed for sale, divers copies of the said book, contrary to the form of the statute, &c., and did unlawfully publish and cause to be published divers other copies of the said book, and unlawfully had in his possession for sale and hire divers other copies of the said book, well knowing the said copies and each and every of them to have been unlawfully printed, contrary to the form of the said statute in such case made and provided. The defendant Jefferys (now the plaintiff in error) pleaded—first, that the plaintiff Boosey was not the proprietor of the said copyright in the declaration mentioned; and, further, that there was not at the time of the committing of the supposed grievance a subsisting copyright in the said book. Issue having been joined upon these pleas, the action came on to be tried before Lord Cranworth (then Mr. Baron Rolfe), at the sittings in Hilary Term, 1850. In proof of the above issues, evidence was given on the trial on behalf of Boosey, that the opera of La Sonnambula, of which the song mentioned in the declaration was a portion, was composed at Milan, in Lombardy, in February, 1831, by Signor Vincenzio Bellini, an alien, then domiciled and residing at Milan aforesaid; that Bellini was, by the law of Milan, entitled to copyright in the opera and all the parts thereof, and had lawful power and authority to assign the same; that on the 19th day of February, 1831, by an instrument in writing, signed and executed according to the law of Milan, and valid by the law there, Bellini assigned the copyright of the said opera to one Giovanni Ricordi, also an alien, and then domiciled and resident at Milan; and that such copyright, and the right of assigning the same, thereupon became, according to the law of Milan, vested in Ricordi. That Ricordi came to this country, and on the 9th of June, 1831, in England (but being then an alien, and domiciled and resident out of the British dominions), duly executed in the presence of two witnesses, who attested the same, an indenture between him and Boosey, whereby, and for a valuable consideration, Ricordi assigned to Boosey the copyright of the opera La Sonnambula for publication in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland only. That Boosey was a native-born British subject, resident in England, and that he published the opera of La Sonnambula in London, on the 10th of June, 1831. That there had been no prior publication of the said opera, or of any part thereof, either in the British dominions or in any other country. That on the 10th of June, 1831, Boosey made the usual entry at Stationers' Hall in respect of the said opera, and deposited copies of the work at the British Museum and other institutions, as by law required; and on the 13th day of May, 1844, he caused a further entry to be made at Stationers' Hall under the statute 5 and 6 Vic., c. 45. On this evidence the learned judge before whom the said action was tried, adopting, as he thought he was bound to do, the last decision of the Court of Exchequer on a subject of this kind, directed the jury that the evidence was not sufficient to entitle Boosey to a verdict on either of the issues, and that the jury ought to find a verdict on both issues for the then defendant, Jefferys. The jury accordingly found a verdict for Jefferys on both issues, on which verdict judgment was afterwards entered up. To this direction a bill of exceptions was tendered on behalf of Boosey, and a writ of error brought in the Exchequer Chamber. The case was argued before the Court at the sittings after Easter Term, 1851, when the Court held that the direction of the learned judge, founded on the decision of the Court of Exchequer, was erroneous, and ordered a venire de novo to issue. On this judgment of the Exchequer Chamber the present writ of error was brought into the House of Lords by Jefferys. The case was argued last February by Mr. Sergeant Byles and Mr. Quain for Jefferys, the plaintiff in error, and by Sir F. Kelly and Mr. Bovill (with whom was Mr. Raymond) for Boosey, the defendant in error, when certain questions were put to the judges, who requested time to consider them. Those questions in substance required the judges to state their opinions whether a foreign author at that time resident abroad could by an assignment to a British subject lawfully vest in him copyright in an unpublished work; and if so, whether the assignment made in this case by Ricordi (who was himself the assignee of Bellini) to Boosey conferred on Boosey the rights of an original publisher according to the law of England. The judges were further required to say whether on the evidence given at the trial Ricordi had become the lawful assignee of Bellini, so as to possess a copyright in this country (assuming a foreigner resident abroad to be capable of possessing such right), and to be capable of disposing thereof to a native born subject, and thereby to give the latter the privilege of copyright here. On the 29th of June the judges delivered their opinions. Mr. Justice Crompton, Mr. Justice Williams, Mr. Justice Erle, Mr. Justice Wightman, Mr. Justice Maule, and Mr. Justice Coleridge delivered opinions to the effect that copyright existed in a foreigner, that the assignment here was valid, and that Boosey was entitled to recover. Mr. Baron Alderson, Mr. Baron Parke, Lord Chief Baron Pollock, and Lord Chief Justice Jervis were of a different opinion, and held that Boosey had no lawful title to maintain the action. The case then stood over to this day.

The LORD CHANCELLOR now moved the judgment of the house. Having stated the nature of the case and the pleadings, the trial before himself when a baron of the Exchequer, the bill of exceptions against his ruling, and the judgment thereon, and then the argument before this House, and the judges' opinions, his lordship said this case had been very ably argued at the bar, and it was impossible to overrate the advantage which the house had derived from the assistance of the judges: their arguments had exhausted the subject, and the house had now only to decide between their conflicting opinions. He should have been glad to avoid expressing any opinion, but it was his duty not to shrink from that responsibility, and he now therefore gave his advice to their lordships as to the decision which they should adopt. He adhered to the opinion he had originally pronounced. The right now in question was not the right to publish, or to abstain from publishing a work not yet given to the world, but was the right to have the exclusive power of publishing such a work. Copyright thus defined was, if not the creature of the statute law, at least a right entirely regulated by it. The question here turned chiefly on the 8th Anne,

c. 19. The object of that statute, as expressed in the preamble, was to encourage learned men "in composing useful books." His opinion was that that statute was to be construed with reference to British authors only. Primâ facie the Legislature must be taken to legislate only for its own subjects, and the object thus declared to be in its view must be taken to be a merely national object. Of course, the foreigner who was not resident abroad, but was resident in this country, and was subject to its laws, was for the time he was so subject to them in the condition of a native-born subject; and if he came here and published his work here, though he came here only for the purpose of publishing it, he would be within the protection of the statute. But if he resided out of the kingdom at the time of such publication, the statute did not protect him. He (the Lord Chancellor) was aware of the argument which had been used against this rule, by representing an absurdity as flowing from it. Thus it was said that it was absurd to give the protection of the statute to a man who crossed over from Calais and published his book here, and to refuse it to one who stayed in Calais and got an agent in this country to publish it for him. But the answer to that argument was, that in all cases in which a rule was laid down there must be a line drawn somewhere, and that no line could be drawn in any case without some instances of its application appearing that would bear the semblance of hardship or absurdity. There was some distinction between copyright in books and patents for inventions. The Crown had, by the common law, a right to grant to a subject a monopoly in a certain manufacture, and all that the statute of James did was to confine the exercise of that within definite limits. His opinion was founded on the general doctrine that this British statute was passed for British subjects, properly so called, or for those who obtained that character for a time, by being resident in this country, and living under the allegiance to the Crown, and under the protection of the laws of England. He did not find any authority in the cases which impeached this doctrine, except in the present case and in those on which it proceeded, and which must therefore be considered to be now under review. His lordship here entered into a detailed examination of all the cases, remarked how, in this instance, the minds of the ablest men had differed on this subject, and concluded by expressing his opinion that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber must be reversed.

Lord BROUGHAM said that he must begin his observations by expressing his entire concurrence with his noble and learned friend as to the great ability with which this case had been argued at the bar of this house, and the great advantage which their lordships had derived from the opinions of the learned judges. It was not necessarily to be assumed that the much-vexed question of the common law right to literary property was disposed of in this case, though undoubtedly, in the opinions of some of the judges, useful light was thrown on that question. He himself could not avoid forming some opinion upon it. With relation to patents for inventions, Lord Coke, in commenting on the statute of James, had said that that statute was to be considered as a judgment in Parliament against the right of exclusive manufacture, except by grant from the Crown; and, indeed, by the 10th section of that statute, certain monopolies which then existed were expressly protected and declared to be saved from the operation of the act. For himself, he believed that literary property was like, or even more than, patented inventions, the mere creature of the legislature, and such, he thought, might be considered the principle on which a case argued by himself, in 1812, had proceeded. Then, if the right was created by the legislature, could it be said that the legislature had it in contemplation to vest the right of copyright in anybody but the subjects of the realm, and those who claimed under them? Legislatures in general only legislated for their own subjects. The statute of Anne was not an exception to that rule. It was a statute for the encouragement of learning, by giving to those who published useful books a monopoly in the publication of them. That was an encouragement given at the expense of the subjects of the realm, to whom it raised the price of those books; and being thus given at their expense, it must be considered to have been given exclusively with a view to their advantage. By the earlier statutes certain high functionaries were entrusted with the power to fix the price of books, another fact which showed that the legislature had entirely directed its attention to what was to occur within the kingdom. He entirely agreed with his noble and learned friend, that the apparent absurdity of giving the right of exclusive publication to a foreigner resident here, and refusing it to a foreigner not resident here, was answered by the fact, that no law could lay down any rule of distinction on any subject without incurring the risk of exhibiting instances in which the application of the rule might appear to produce absurd results. But instances of that kind did not show that the rule thus possibly capable of an absurd application did not exist. He now came to the point that by the law of Milan, Bellin had a copyright, and by the law of Milan Bellini transferred that copyright to Ricordi. Such was the statement in the bill of exceptions. But his answer was that that copyright, created by the law of Milan, existed nowhere but in the particular country the law of which created it. Being the creature of a positive law it could exist only by the force of that positive law, and consequently could not have existed in countries where that law had no force. Such was the principle on which, long ago, in Somerset's and Wedderburn's cases—for both England and Scotland had the unfading honour of deciding that the status of slavery could not be indelibly fixed on any man—it had been declared that slaves brought to this country became, by that fact alone, free men. The law of copyright was the law of each country—its forms must be observed in each, and in no other country could that law have any force. Applying these various principles of law to the present case, and finding nothing in any of the decided authorities to controvert but much to confirm them, he was of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, which held that copyright existed in this case, and was enforceable here, was erroneous, and must be reversed.

Lord ST. LEONARDS said that, after the elaborate arguments which their lordships had just heard, he should confine himself, in delivering his opinions, to making a few observations on the case. He cordially concurred with his noble and learned friends as to the advantage which the house had derived from the able arguments at the bar and the elaborate opinions of the judges. In consequence of these arguments and opinions their lordships had rather to select the opinion they would adopt than to form any original opinion. The simple question was, whether a foreigner could obtain in England a copyright by first publishing his book here, though he himself was resident abroad. This supposed right was put upon two grounds; first on common law, and then on the statute. As to the common law, he never entertained a doubt that no such right had ever existed. If a mechanic invented a machine, and disposed of a single copy of it, that copy might (except for the statute) be multiplied by the person who had properly obtained possession of it. It was the same with a description of a machine as with a machine itself. It appeared to him, therefore, perfectly clear that there was no common law right in one case or in the other. There was a distinction between the right of a man to his own manuscript, over which he had the most absolute power, as he had over any one of his personal chattels, and the right to multiply copies of that to the exclusion of other persons. The former was a common law right, the latter entirely depended on statute. But, even if the common law right existed, what common law right could a foreigner resident abroad possess? If he came here and owed an allegiance, a temporary allegiance, to the Crown, he might possess such a right, but he could not possess it while he remained abroad. Then, if the right was created by the statute, the same reasoning would apply. The operation of a statute could not be extended beyond the dominions of that State in which it was passed. Then, what was the meaning of this statute? In the year preceding that in which it was passed, the legislature, deeming that increase of population was increase of wealth and of strength, passed an act to encourage foreign Protestants to settle in this country—a fact which showed that the legislature did contemplate advantages to be derived from foreigners, but from foreigners resident here, and not resident abroad. Then, as to the cases. Everyone must admit that this case was wholly uninfluenced by authorities, no one of which would decide it. The house was, therefore, again required to look at the statute, and to decide what was the meaning of the legislature. That meaning seemed to him to be clear from doubt. The first publication was to take place in this country, and no protection was given to books printed abroad. The object of that was to advance the interests of the British people, as well as to increase the amount of their learning. Of course the statute did not require that the work must be composed here—such a matter was beyond the power of legislation—but it must be printed here; and that fact gave the key to the other provisions of the statute. The terms of the 12th Geo. II., c. 36, prohibiting the importation of books reprinted abroad, showed that the legislature assumed that the books to be protected under the statute of Anne must have been books printed in this country. To be protected by the statutes, the books must first have been published here and first printed here; and if so, that would go to show that the persons who printed and published them could not be foreigners who were resident abroad. These considerations rendered the constructions of the statute plain and easy. The Court of Queen's Bench, some years ago, said that "the statute of Anne not only gives protection to authors as to books thereafter to be published, but to books previously printed; but the British legislature must be supposed to have legislated with a view to British interests and the advancement of British learning." If, then, there was no common law right, and if the statute did not apply to foreigners as foreigners, then there must be a new right, and the foreigner must bring himself within the terms of the act, and must be able. It might be said that if residence here was necessary, it would be difficult to say what was sufficient residence; but no such question would arise. It would be sufficient that he had such a residence as imposed a temporary allegiance on him, and gave him that protection of the law to which every foreigner was entitled equally with the subjects of this realm while he remained in this country. None of these difficulties would arise in the United States, for there they had expressly enacted that the native citizen only, or such persons as had been resident there for a certain time and in a certain manner, should be entitled to copyright. The Americans, therefore, had taken care to enable themselves to import the works of foreign authors, to refuse altogether copyright to those authors, and to obtain advantages for which they paid to the authors whose works they used no consideration whatever. The literary men and others in the States had endeavoured to introduce another system of law, but they had not succeeded. That was some argument to show that in refusing here to give copyright to foreign authors, it was not necessary to put a strained construction on the existing law, though undoubtedly, had the law borne a different construction, that different construction must and would have been given to it without reference to the mode of dealing with these matters practised in other countries. Under these circumstances he was clearly of opinion that there was no common law right, but that, even if such a right did exist, a foreigner resident abroad had no claim under it. Then, as to another point; suppose the copyright to exist in Milan, it could have no effect in this country. Copyright was not like a personal chattel, which the owner could transfer at pleasure to another person. It was a right which existed only by force of the law of the country that created it. Again, the transfer, though good by the laws of Milan, was only good there, and was not a good transfer of this sort of right by the laws of this country. Bellini was assigning in this country that which did not exist in this country. The assignment was therefore valueless. Besides which, the assignment was only to a part of the British dominions. Now, the right was one and indivisible. If capable of being assigned, it must be assigned in its entirety; but here it was only partially assigned, and in that respect the assignment was incomplete. Then, again, the assignment was defective in form, according to the laws of this country; and being so, it could not be enforced here. The assignment was altogether the creature of statute, and was required to be in the form given by the statute; and if not in that form it was invalid. For all these reasons he was of opinion that the judgment of the Court below was erroneous, and must be reversed.

Judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber reversed.

Musical Taste in Italy.—We are happy to give publicity to the following, from an Italian paper, Il Pirata, relating to the coolness with which Rossini's Cenerentola was received at the theatre in Leghorn, being of the same opinion as the writer regarding the present taste of the Italians in musical matters:—

"We cannot withhold expressing our disgust at the reception given to this masterpiece of melody and composition. The fact is the ears of the public are accustomed to other things, and these ears which of late years have grown to such enormous length, cannot appreciate the beauties of an opera written when Italy could boast of having a really good school of singing, and composers who knew how to write for the voice. In our time shouting is called singing, spasmodic convulsion is mistaken for expression, and the public is in ecstacies, provided they have half-a-dozen murders; the happy author is then called for and crowned with laurel. Alas! Let us however hope that if our contemporaries do not relish Rossini's music, if we have got into the wrong path and forgotten all the traditions of the past, that our successors at least may evince more judgment, and a truer appreciation of the really beautiful in music."

To which we say "Amen!" with all sincerity and heartiness.

Hyssop won't do.—In a town in America, a certain doctor was choir-leader. One Sabbath, the hymn given out by the minister, commenced with the following line: "With hyssop purge thy servant, Lord." The doctor pitched the tone and led off, but broke down before finishing the line. He tried a second and third time with the same result, when a wag on the ground-floor rose in his pew, and, turning his face upward to the choir, exclaimed: "Try some other herb, doctor."

Yankee Punning.—The fellow who tried to get up a concert with the band of his hat is the same who, a few weeks since, played upon the affections of a lady.—New York Musical Review.

A FRENCH APPRECIATION OF HENRIETTA SONTAG.

(Translated from Le Moniteur.)

Henrietta Sontag was seventeen years old when she made her début at the Théâtre Italien, Paris, as Rosina in the Barbiere di Seviglia. Light complexioned, pretty, and distinguée, with beautiful blond hair, a clear voice, the agility of a bird, a vast amount of seductive grace, and little or no sentiment, she assumed a position, from the first, in the esteem of the amateurs of Louvois, a little above that allowed to Mad. Damoreau—then the Signoretta Cinti—and very near to that claimed by Mad. Mainvielle-Fodor, the Italianised French lady, whom Stendhal christened at the time a "Sublime Bird-organ" (serinette sublime.)

Like all exceptional organisations, destined to achieve a brilliant future, Henrietta Sontag had several successive styles. She entered the second phase of her talent at the time that Maria Malibran, two years her junior, made her débuts with the splendid success so well remembered by all of us, at the Opéra, in Semiramide, which was given for the benefit of Galli, and at the Italiens in La Gazza Ladra. From 1828 to 1830, there was a contest on alternate evenings between the two virtuose, whose respective admirers, according to invariable custom, insisted on regarding them as rivals. On the part of Sontag, the struggle rose to the height of emulation, but with Malibran it sometimes descended to jealousy, although everyone, including Sontag herself, did justice to her talent. Malibran knew that she was greater than her fellow-competitor for public favour, but felt and avowed that the latter had reached a provoking and incomparable perfection. In the midst of the boundless enthusiasm caused by the lightning inspiration of her own genius, Malibran would envy the starlike serenity which the pure art of Sontag attained without an effort. Often, after one of those marvellous performances of her rival in the Barbiere, poor Marie would exclaim, with tears in her eyes, "It is shocking that any one should sing so well." But this was nothing. One evening, Rosina took it into her head, without reflecting much upon the difficulty of the task, to undertake the part of Donna Anna in Don Juan, which no artist, even Giulia Grisi, could attempt to sing after Malibran. This caprice turned out more than a revelation,—it was a transfiguration. The "thrush"—as Sontag was then called—laid an egg in the nest of the eagle. Malibran never forgave her, and, on one occasion, when the two singers—one having to play Donna Anna, and the other Zerlina—were to dress in the same room, Marie, who had taken possession, shut herself in and locked the door, refusing not only to open it for her rival, but even to give her her costume, for which Henrietta was begging almost upon her knees. The consequence was, that Donna Anna kept the stage waiting, and was unable to sing the recitative of the first act, in which her expression, her voice, her look, her gestures, and, in fact, every thing she did, was "epic."

The Countess Merlin succeeded in effecting an apparent reconciliation between Malibran and Sontag, at a soirée, by means of a plan, which, with Machiavelian talent, she had prepared for the occasion. The guests, however, were in the secret. The rivals being unexpectedly called to the piano at the same moment, the accompanyist courageously began the ritornello of the duet in Tancredi. There was no avoiding the alternative, and Aménaïde and her knight sang the duet in such a manner as to electrify the whole assembly. Yielding to the enthusiasm they had excited, the two artists, under a spontaneous impulse, threw themselves into each other's arms, embraced, and separated—mortal enemies. The dénoûment of this comedy was artistic. The manager of the Théâtre Italien conceived the lucky idea of reviving Tancredi, and the success of the experiment occasioned so lively a sensation in Paris, that, for a moment, diverted public attention even from politics—and from what politics?—from the politics of that year which saw the premonitory warnings of the Ordinances of July! The old King, Charles X., absorbed by the cares of royalty and almost divorced from the world, was suddenly awoke, in the recesses of his palace, by the magic echoes of a duet marvellously executed, and his last visit to the theatres was to hear Malibran and Sontag, associated like sisters, in one and the same triumph.

The two came into contact, on another occasion, under more intimate circumstances than the life and triumphs of the stage. From a piece of indiscretion in the memoirs of the Countess Merlin—which has long since found its way from the book to the newspapers—we know that the celebrated violinist, De Beriot, was cured of a hopeless passion for Henrietta Sontag by his marriage with Garcia's illustrious daughter. Maria Malibran, at first the confidante of a despised lover, ended by lighting in her own heart that flame which she had endeavoured to extinguish in the heart of another.

A short time after this Mdlle. Sontag left the stage to marry an ambassador—Count Rossi. Like a skilful fisherman who knows how to angle in the waters of success, M. Scribe sought for inspiration in this unheard of good fortune of the singer, and, in conjunction with M. Auber, produced the Ambassadrice. The piece is charming, but, in writing it, the author was guilty of a want of tact which very much resembled a want of breeding. In giving the name of Henrietta to his heroine, he of course made it generally understood that the Countess di Rossi herself was intended. M. Scribe had not long to wait for the reproof he merited, and the crowned heads of Europe took upon themselves to administer it. At Berlin, Vienna, and St. Petersburgh, the great artist of the Théâtre Italien took her place, honoured and respected, at the tables of Kings and Emperors. There is no doubt that the silent respect paid to the woman of talent was slightly perceptible in the welcome accorded to the Ambassadress—a delicate distinction which seemed to say :—"You may forget the past; we shall remember it."

Up to this point, the artist had wanted the great consecration of talent in this world—misfortune. One day, however, the noble lady found herself as poor as the young artist had been on her first appearance. The despair of her family imposed a heavy task upon her. She did not hesitate. Abandoning the name of Rossi, which she had received as a boon, and adorned with all the modest virtues of domestic life, she courageously resumed that which, twenty years beforehand, she had left behind her on the road to fame. Since Mad. Sontag had retired from the stage, two generations of singers had shone and disappeared. Like another Sleeping Beauty, when she awoke from her dream of fortune, she saw a new public and a new style of art. Possessed herself of a pure style, a real taste, a quiet grace, and sober judgment, it was by violent exaggeration, glaring colouring, and material effects, that success was now to be achieved. Moreover, if we may venture to say it—there was another more terrible danger than all the rest combined. She had long passed that age twice celebrated, by Balzac and Charles de Bernard, the poets of twilight love; she was ceasing to be a woman to be undividedly the wife and mother. She did her duty, however, and trusted to Providence, and Providence, who had inspired her with courage, gave her once more youth, beauty, talent, and the success of former days.

Let us attempt, in a few words, to analyse her talent, which, if not the greatest, was assuredly one of the purest that ever enriched the Italian school. As singer and actress, we can, perhaps, compare Madame Sontag to no one better than to Mdlle. Mars. The two possessed the same perfection, confident in itself, the same experience of stage effects in which nothing was risked, and all so well regulated by taste, that the refinements of art were inseparable from the simplicity of nature. If Araminthe and Celimène could be touching and passionate in the Duchesse de Guise, Rosina reached the acme of pathos in the second act of the Sonnambula, and exhibited an equal superiority in Donna Anna, Zerlina, Norina, the Countess, Linda di Chamouni, and the Vivandière. But the best eulogium that can be pronounced upon Sontag is that she alone, after the death of Rubini, represented and adorned the great Italian school, and was the last model of a style that has for ever disappeared.*

But the following says far more in Madame Sontag's praise. To the last day of her life and of her triumphs, the respect of all who knew her persisted in restoring the emblazoned coronet to the artist who had voluntarily resigned it. Her comrades never called her anything but "Madame la Comtesse." Even amidst the loud applause with which the crowd greeted her reappearance on the stage, before and after justice had been rendered to the singer, it was easy to distinguish the respect which was entertained for the virtuous lady, the devoted wife, and mother. Combined with the most exuberant enthusiasm, there was always a something which seemed to say, "Will Madame la Comtesse permit us to applaud her?"

* Our contemporary seems to have forgotten the existence of Marietta Alboni.—ED. M. W.

MINNELIEDER.

(From Le Ménestrel).

We live in an age of discoveries and recoveries. Every day some remains of the past are exhumed either in France or Germany. The following is a letter we have received from Elsenach, bearing date the 20th July:—

"A short time since a magnificent manuscript on vellum, ornamented with miniatures, was discovered in the grand-ducal library at Jena. It contained a small collection of Minnelieder (songs of the Minnesänger, or troubadours of Germany) of the conclusion of the thirteenth and commencement of the fourteenth century, all unpublished, and all with the tunes noted down. After having ordered an exact copy to be made, the Grand Duke offered the original manuscript to the King of Prussia, who has always taken a great interest in these specimens of antique German poetry. His Royal Highness having expressed a wish to hear the Minnelieder, Professor Lilgenkren, of the University of Jena, carefully revised the text, which is in the Swabian language, and Herr Stade, music-director in the same University, wrote orchestral accompaniments, which in no way interfered with their original character. The Minnelieder were executed by a union of the Philharmonic Societies of Elsenach and the neighbourhood, at the foot of the mountain on which stands the celebrated castle of Wartbourg, where a poetical tournament took place in the year 1207, the most celebrated of the Minnesänger of the period being the competitors. The Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Saxe-Weimar-Elsenach, with the Duchess of Orleans, honoured the festival with their presence, and an immense concourse of spectators was attracted. Their Royal Highnesses expressed their entire satisfaction to Herr Stade, and to the performers, about four hundred in number."

The verses of the Minnesänger are, without dispute, the most curious monuments existing of ancient German literature. The largest collection of Minnelieder is that which was made in the fourteeth century, by Rudger von Menesse, a senator of Zurich. A splendid manuscript copy of this exists in the Bibliothèque Impériale at Paris. It contains about fifteen hundred Lieder, by one hundred and forty various authors.

MEYERBEER'S MOTHER.—We read in the Revue et Gazette Musicale, of Paris, that Amalia Beer, the mother of the illustrious composer of Robert le Diable and l'Etoile du Nord, died lately at Berlin, aged eighty-seven. All who were acquainted with that lady are agreed as to her superior mind and accomplishments, and unite in their tribute of grief to her virtues, her kindness, and her liberality. In the course of her long existence she enjoyed the happiness, so precious to a mother, of seeing all her sons distinguished either in science, letters, or art. This felicity was much increased by the repeated triumphs of Meyerbeer, who was with his mother in her last moments, and never left her until she had ceased to exist.

AUTOGRAPHS.—In an artist's album in Paris, Alboni wrote five bars of music, containing her lowest and her highest note, and underneath, "The compass of my voice.—MARIETTA ALBONI." An actress contributed the following:—"I make my début to-morrow night at the Comédie Française, and am very much afraid.—DELPHINE MARQUET." M. Fouché compared birth to a box-office, thus:—"If people paid on entering life, wouldn't everybody ask his money back on leaving it?"

CHURCH MUSIC.—Dwight's Journal of Music reports that an organist in one of the Connecticut-River Churches, gave out to his choir Jullien's Prima Donna Waltz adapted to the well-known hymn, "A charge to keep I have, a God to glorify," etc. A book of music for sabbath-schools has been published in Boston, containing this same Prima Donna Waltz, adapted (!) to the words, "He knows we are but dust," etc. The same book contains Strauss' Duke of Reichstadt's Waltz set to sacred words.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The last week but one of the season has arrived, and Madame Grisi's last performance on the stage in England (except at her benefit, which takes place on Monday) was given on Thursday. It is to be regretted that she did not, as was contemplated, bid farewell to the English stage as Ninetta in La Gazza Ladra, the character in which she first appeared at Her Majesty's Theatre, and with which her name was so intimately associated for many years. This, however, was impossible, in the absence of an efficient representative of Fernando Villabella. Sig. Ronconi, for reasons not very clear, declining to undertake the part and give up the Podestà to Sig. Lablache, Sig. Tamburini, we believe, was invited by the manager to undertake the part of the father for Mad. Grisi's last performance, but refused. Had he consented, the cast, with Madame Grisi as Ninetta, Signor Mario as Giannetto, Signor Lablache as the Podestà, and Sig. Tamburini as Fernando, would have recalled the best days of the Italian Opera in the Haymarket. Anna Bolena was announced as one of Madame Grisi's final performances, but was withdrawn, like the Gazza Ladra, for no reason assigned. Madame Grisi's recent performances have, therefore, been confined to Lucrezia Borgia, La Favorita, and Norma.

On Saturday L'Elisir d'Amore was substituted for La Favorita, postponed in consequence of Signor Mario's hoarseness, which prevented him from continuing his performance of Gennaro in Lucrezia Borgia on Thursday. Donizetti's charming lyric comedy went off with éclat, Madame Bosio singing delightfully, and Signor Ronconi keeping the audience in a state of incessant excitement by his whimsical extravaganzas. This is the first time that any other artist has performed the character of the mountebank, Dulcamara, with Signor Lablache in the same theatre. L'Elisir d'Amore was followed by the second and third acts of Masaniello. We have frequently objected to curtailments of great works like the Muette di Portici, which answers no purpose whatsoever, except that of ruining their standard attraction. Sig. Tamberlik sang the barcarole magnificently, and was ably supported by Sig. Tagliafico in the "Liberta" duet, which was loudly applauded, and, as usual, shamefully curtailed of one half, beginning in one key and ending in another. Norma was given on Monday, with the second act of Il Barbiere; and on Tuesday, Sig. Mario having recovered from his indisposition, La Favorita was performed for the last time, with Mad. Grisi as Leonora. On Thursday, the last performance of Lucrezia Borgia took place.

The theatre has been crowded on the farewell nights of Mad. Grisi, but the other nights have suffered in consequence. This was no more than what might have been expected. One great attraction, like the serpent-rod of the prophet, swallows up the rest.

One more performance, and Mad. Grisi bids adieu for ever to the English public.

On Monday, her benefit night, she takes her leave in the first act of Norma and the first three acts of the Huguenots. Mdlle. Robert, the well-known danseuse from the Grand Opéra at Paris, made her first appearance this season on Tuesday night, in the divertissement in La Favorita, and was very favourably received. She appeared for the second time on Thursday night. Her dancing is remarkable for elegance and agility.

To-night Otello will be repeated.

Mr. T. M. Mudie has arrived from Edinburgh, to pass the midsummer holidays in London.

DRAMATIC.

Opera-Lyrique.—St. James's Theatre.—On Wednesday last this company terminated their series of performances by Donizetti's comic opera La Fille du Régiment, in which Madame Marie Cabel played the principal part. The representation being for the benefit of the director, we do not feel called upon to do any more than notice the fact, so much the more that we have already called attention to the remarkable success obtained by Madame Cabel in this particular part. A few remarks on the doings of the company and on the operas produced may not be inopportune, as they may help to point out the difficulties to be surmounted, and serve as a guidance, by indicating past errors, to any future operations that may be contemplated. The operas produced under the present management have been Le Bijou Perdu, Le Roi des Halles, La Promise, La Sirène, La Fille du Régiment, Les Diamants de la Couronne, and Le Domino Noir, not to mention several small operettas in one act which were introduced to make up the programme of the evening's entertainment. We thus find seven operas given in about as many weeks, which alone would speak well for the energy displayed by the direction. We must deduct, however, from our list two operas—Le Domino Noir and Le Roi des Halles—in which Madame Cabel did not appear, and which must consequently be struck off. And here we may tender a word of advice. Let no future manager (let not M. Desgranges, if, as we hope, he returns) produce, in London, a work, however great its merit, unless it can be brought out in the best possible manner, so that it may not suffer from comparison with previous performances, as was more particularly the case with Le Domino Noir, which, at the St. James's Theatre, we have seen with Mad. Charton and M. Couderc. An opera should be done well or not at all. It would be more advisable to give artists a holiday, by which they as well as the public, would be the gainers—to say nothing of the critic.

The company of the Opéra-Lyrique in general, it must be confessed, did not come up to general expectation, with the sole exception of Madame Marie Cabel, who went far beyond it. Madame Cabel was a tower of strength, but it must be owned that even she was not always put forward under the most favourable auspices. The opera chosen for her début did not please the London audience, and attention was divided between the merits of Mad. Cabel and the demerits of M. Adolphe Adam. Exceptions were taken—criticism was on the alert—the music was condemned; and the lady could not fail, with all her genius and talent, to suffer in the conflict. No English manager would have made such a mistake, as to produce his trump card under such auspices, knowing, as he would know, that novelty does not necessarily imply superior attraction, and that it is always a fatiguing task to judge of the merits of a new opera and a new singer at one and the same time. It will be objected that, having played the Bijou Perdu a great number of nights in Paris, the company were not prepared with any other of the operas subsequently produced, and which form an indispensable portion of the répertoire of the Opéra-Comique. We merely answer, that it would have been better to defer the opening for a week or more, and then start with a much better chance of success. We have heard it objected that Madame Cabel did not wish to provoke a comparison with her predecessors. But the truth is, that Madame Cabel need not have feared any comparison with any predecessor. They had their particular talent, and she has hers, which is of the highest possible order.

Madame Cabel thus came before the London public under very serious disadvantages; and it was only after the production of La Fille du Régiment and La Sirène that she received the enthusiastic praise to which she was entitled. After the latter opera, her success no longer doubtful, she went on increasing in popularity, and was recognised for what she undoubtedly is—a gifted, original, and perfect artiste. In the Diamants de la Couronne she so confirmed the public opinion in her favour, that there can now be no further doubt about her novel and extraordinary talent. We have at different times given our opinion of Madame Cabel at length, and we feel persuaded that, should she revisit London on any future occasion, she will have every reason to be satisfied with her reception.

We may dismiss the remainder of the company in a few words. Mdlle. Girard is an intelligent and clever person, and ably seconded Madame Cabel. Madame and Mdlle. Vade were also very useful in their particular line of subordinate characters. The men, with the exception of MM. Sujol, Junca, Colson, and Pierre Laurent, were not at all up to the mark, and this department of the company must be considerably modified before the public can be satisfied. The management must now be convinced of one fact—that the composition of a theatrical audience is essentially different in Paris and in London. In Paris, each theatre has its special audience, which rarely goes elsewhere; in London, on the contrary, the same people who go to the St. James's frequent the Italian Opera, and the style of execution to which they are accustomed at the latter makes them very difficult to please wherever else they attend.

PROVINCIAL.

THERE is nothing but stagnation in the provinces at the present moment, and this is likely to be the case until the tours, the Italian and German Operas, and the festivals commence. A new organ has been opened at Blackburn. The following account of the ceremony is taken from the Manchester Examiner and Times:—

"On Thursday last, the new organ, built by Messrs. Gray and Davison, of London, for the Independent Chapel, Chapel-street, was opened with considerable éclât. The principal portion of the performance consisted of selections of music from Handel. The solo parts were sung by Miss Whitham, of Huddersfield, Miss S. Brindle, of Blackburn, and Messrs. Thomas Hinchcliffe, of Leeds, Henry Graham and Robert Sanderson, of Blackburn. The choruses were splendidly rendered by the members of the Blackburn Choral Society. At each service, the Rev. A. France, minister of the chapel, delivered an appropriate lecture. Mr. Henry Smart, of London, late of Blackburn, presided at the organ, and will do so again on Sunday morning and evening next."

We expect a detailed account of this new instrument from a correspondent.

FOREIGN.

PARIS.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The Grand Opéra re-opens on the 15th. The performance will be free to the public, and the opera Robert le Diable. Besides this, in honour of the Emperor's fête, a cantata will be executed, the music by Queen Hortense, and the words by M. Belmontet. It is said that Mad. Stolz will appear, on the 17th inst., in La Favorite. The Théâtre Français closed last week, ostensibly for repairs, and, like the Grand Opéra, re-opens on the 15th inst., the public being admitted gratis to the performances, in honour of the Emperor's fête. A few days before the end of the season, M. St. Germain, who had previously played at the Odéon, made a successful début in Le Dépit Amoureux and La Famille Poisson.—M. Perrin is neglecting no measures which can tend to ensure the success of his new enterprise at the Théâtre-Lyrique. Mad. Ugalde is engaged, and M. and Mad. Meillet-Meyer are retained. As far as possible, M. Perrin is carrying out the agreements entered into by M. Séveste, both with singers and composers. The new opera, written by M. Adolphe Adam for Mad. Marie Cabel, is in rehearsal, and M. Perrin has also sent for the opera of M. J. B. Wekerlin, which is already copied.

M. Boyer, the new manager of the Vaudeville, has engaged Madame Guillemin.—Les Cœurs d'Or continues attractive at the Gymnase. M. Couderc's rondo is encored every night.—A one-act trifle, entitled M. Bannelet, by MM. Gaston de Montheau and C. Nuitter, has been produced at the Variétés.—The old farce, of Le Dîner de Madelon, which dates from 1813, has been revived at the Palais Royal, for M. Prosper Gothi.—At the Ambigu, we have a new drama, in six acts, by MM. Brisebarre and Nus, entitled Suzanne. There is also here a troupe of Danish dancers. M. de Chassériaux, who has been appointed administrator at the Grand Opéra, entered upon his office a few days since.

M. Martin Norblin, formerly professor at the Imperial Conservatory, and first violoncello at the Grand Opéra, and the Société des Concerts, and who often shared in the successes of the well-known Baillot, has just died, at the age of seventy-two. M. Armand Dancla, one of his pupils, pronounced a short address over his grave.

MILAN, 28th July, 1854.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Elisabetta; or, the Exiles of Siberia, the posthumous opera of Donizetti, completed by the maestro U. Fontana, was produced for the first time in this city on the 23rd current at the Teatro Santa Radegonda. The parts were thus distributed:—Elisabetta, Signora A. Fumagalli; the Count (tenor), Signor Sarti; Michele (barytone), Signor Marra; Ivan (bass), Signor Vinals. The result has been unfortunate both as regards the music and the execution. Of the former, I shall not trouble you with a detailed account, as I perceive that you have already noticed it. The latter scarcely reached mediocrity. The inundation scene at the end of the second act was exceedingly well done. Its inventor, Signor Donghi, was called for and warmly applauded. Signor Sarti was also well received in a tenor air.

29th, 11·30 P.M.—I have just returned from the first representation of a new opera seria in four parts, Ida di Danimarca, the music by Signor Luigi Rieschi, the libretto by Signor Carlisto Bassi. Signor Rieschi is advanced in life, and has resided many years in Milan. This, I believe, his third opera, will add but little to his reputation as a composer. A short and unmeaning prelude of about a minute's duration constitutes the introduction; this, the following chorus, and the solo of the barytone, gave an unfavourable augury of what was to follow. Some of the soli of the prima donna, and the tenor, were better, and obtained several calls for the maestro, which, to be impartial, however, were chiefly the work of friends. A chorus in the third act was mere confusion. The accompaniments display little skill, and are noisy and common-place. In fact, as the phrase is here, "Canto spiegato non c' è!" The scene is laid in Denmark, at the beginning of the sixteenth century. The principal characters were thus cast:—Gustavo Jutland, Signor Vincenzo Prattico (barytone); Ida, Signora Eufrosina Marcolini; Olvardo, Sire di Nordenberg, Signor Atanasio Pozzolini (tenor). The general execution was indifferent.

BERLIN.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The King of Prussia has given M. Meyerbeer permission to wear the Bavarian order for Science and Art, which was awarded him by the King of Bavaria.

The concerts in the Park-Theater in the Wilhelm-Stadt are very well attended, as are, also, those of the various military bands, which were nearly becoming obsolete, but are now more in vogue than ever. One took place last week for the benefit of the Elizabeth-Kinder-Hospital, which must have realised a considerable sum for the institution.

Herr Thorné, manager of the theatre at Riga, is here, making engagements. Herr Leo, from Rostock, and Herr Hein, from Stettin, are also here for the same purpose.

MAYENCE.—A musical festival will be got up at the end of the present month by the Liedertafel, at which Schneider's Weltgericht is to be performed. The Gesangvereins of the neighbouring towns of Darmstadt, Frankfort, Mannheim, Offenbach, Wiesbaden, and Worms, have received invitations.

MANNHEIM.—Never, perhaps, has Mannheim been so rich in "stars" as at the present moment. No sooner has one gone than another appears. After Fräulein Wildauer and Herr Ander, who played in Die Regimentstochter, Figaro's Hochzeit, Robert der Teufel, Martha, Wilhelm Tell, and Lucia di Lammermoor, we had M. Roger, the Frenchman, who was received with flattering marks of approbation as George Brown in Die Weisse Frau (La Dame Blanche).

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.—The Royal Prussian Kammersängerin, Fräulein Pauline Marx, has been very successful as Norma, Antonina, and Indra. Among other celebrities we have here Fräulein Johanna Wagner, and Mad. von Strudiot-Mende, who made her début as Fidelio, and gave general satisfaction.

PINEROLA.—Verdi's Trovatore opened the season with success. The singers were Signore Adele Rebussini and Dalla Porta, and Signori Temistocle Miserocchi, Antonio Grandi and Maymò.

PADUA.—Donizetti's Don Sebastiano continues to be received with increasing favour.

COLOGNE.—The state of Herr Robert Schumann's health is such as to preclude all hopes of his recovery.

ELBERFELD.—The well-known organist, Herr J. A. van Eyken, pupil of Mendelssohn (poor Mendelssohn!) and J. Schneider, has been appointed to the situation at the Reformirte Kirche, vacant by the death of Herr Schornstein, who held it for forty years. On the 21st of April, Herr Van Eyken gave his farewell concert at Rotterdam, on which occasion he played several compositions by Bach, Schumann, and Mendelssohn, as well as some of his own, before an audience of more than a thousand persons.

GENOVA.—At the Teatro Apollo, I Due Foscari of Verdi, by Signora Louisa Luxoro Pretti, Signori Stecchi and Giannini, has given general satisfaction. The sisters Ferni have been playing with great success.

UDINE.—The theatre has been opened for the annual fair with Verdi's Trovatore, by Signore Piccolomini and Irene Secci-Corsi, Signori C. Baucardè, F. Cresci, and Pons.

TURIN.—Teatro Gerbino. Il Don Procopio has been produced with tolerable success, the artists being Signora Lipparini, Signori Banti, Bonofos and Frizzi.

LIVORNO.—The Teatro dei Floridi has opened with Cenerentola, by Signora Borghi-Mamo, and Signori Testa, Everardi, and Mattioli. The prima donna and the barytone Everardi are great favourites. Lucrezia Borgia was produced on the 23rd with success. Signore Basseggio and Borghi Namo, and the Signor C. Negrini, were the singers.

FORLI.—The new opera, Luisa de la Vallière, by Sig. Petrocini, (which was performed for the first time two years ago at Venice), has been produced with success. The artists were Signora Maria Arigotti, Signori Stefani and Coliva.

VICENZA.—The season of the fair has been inaugurated with Rigoletto:—Gilda, Signora Lotti; Maddalena, Signora Ghini; the Duca, Sig. Galvani; Rigoletto, Sig. Benceich. The execution gave great satisfaction.

SINIGALLIA.—Verdi's Trovatore opened the season of the fair, with success. Leonora, Signora Gariboldi Bassi; Azneena, Signora Borghi Vietti; and the Signori Carrion, De-Bassini, and Nicolo Benedetti.

TURIN.—A new sort of spectacle is announced for the coming spring, to take place at the Theatre d'Ancennes. It is styled an Opera Napolitana, and is a species of Marionette performance, the actors being, however, living personages. At Naples the adventures and tribulations of Puncinello have ever been an inexhaustible source of merriment and enjoyment, and it remains to be seen what success he will obtain in other parts of Italy. The operas produced will be—Elena Tolosa, Le Precauzioni, Le Miniere di Freimberg, Don Checco, Gli Zingari, and Il Ritorno di Puncinello.

ODESSA.—The success of Verdi's Il Trovatore has been very great. The execution on the first night was so good, that there were no fewer than twelve recalls during the performance.

GENOA.—A new opera buffa will be produced at the Carlo Felice during the ensuing carnival, by Sig. Chiaromonte, as soon as he has concluded his engagement at Milan.

FLORENCE.—The opera Il Columella, by Signor Fioravanti, has been produced at the Arena Goldoire, the principal singers being Sig. Stella Bermati, Signori Ferri, Cavalieri, and Bartolini. The execution was far from being perfect. At the Cocomero Donizetti's Lucrezia Borgia will shortly be produced with Sig. Bonaimi and Pierfederici and Signori Biundi, Corte and Mitrovitch.

LEGHORN.—Lucrezia Borgia has been played at the Theatre de' Floridi, by Signore Basseggio and Borghi-Mamo, Signori Negrini and Anconi. The tenor Negrini is described as having done wonders in the duet, and in the final air; but we can scarcely believe it. The enthusiasm of the Italian papers for such singing as Negrini, proves that they have forgotten what good singing is.

BRUNSWICK.—The sixth Liederfest of the Elmsängerbund was celebrated on the 15th and 16th of July, by twenty-eight Vereins, numbering about one thousand singers from the various towns. Three prizes were offered for the three best Vereins. Herren Carl Zöllner, from Leipsic; Jul. Otto, from Dresden; Tschirch, from Gera; Franz Abt, from Hanover; and Mählbrecht, Brunswick, were the judges. Twenty Vereins, or societies, entered the lists. The first prize was carried off by the Neue Liedertafel, from Hanover, for the execution of Herr Zöllner's quartet, "Halt." The prize consisted of a large silver vase. The second and third prizes were awarded respectively to Stendat and Offleben. A vocal and instrumental concert was given on the second day in the Ægidienkirche. The programme included Weber's Jubel-Ouverture, the overture to the Zauberflöte, the C major Kapelle of Kreutzer, Mozart's Bundeslied, Marschner's Liederfreiheit, Abt's Weihgesang, the 100th Psalm of Mühlbrecht, and a Hymn, after the 67th Psalm, by Herr Julius Otto.

DANTZIG.—Herr von Flotow's Indra is in active preparation.

SOOLBAD NAUHEIM.—A concert has been given in the Conversationshaus, at which M. Roger was the chief attraction. The other artists were Fräulein Sophie Förster and the young violinist Herr Mascheck.

HAMBURGH.—Verdi's Nabucodonosar has been repeated, with Mad. Schreiber-Kirchberger, instead of Mad. Hermann Czillag, as Abigail. She was very successful.

EISLEBEN.—Herr F. Kühmstedt's oratorio, Die Verklärung des Herrn, will be performed, at the end of the year, under the direction of Herr F. G. Klauer.

WERNIGERODE.—The Gesangverein für geistliche Musik, under the direction of Herr Trautmann, organist, have lately executed Händel's oratorio of Samson.

STUTTGART.—Herr von Lindpaintner has returned from the Festival at Rotterdam. On his first re-appearance in the orchestra, for the purpose of conducting the performance of Don Juan, he was received with the greatest applause.

SIENNA.—Verdi's I Lombardi has been played here to good houses, and with a fair amount of success. The tenor part is filled by Signor Massimiliani, who has made considerable progress since he was here last year. Signor Crivelli has an excellent barytone voice, and, in the part of Pagano, both sang and acted admirably, being re-called several times during the progress of the opera. The prima donna, Signora Prezzolini, is a débutante, and acquitted herself most creditably.

NEW YORK.—Our correspondence cannot be expected to be overabundant in news, since the city is now almost deserted, and no one goes to the theatres unless compelled. All the world has emigrated; and the Italian operatic company, under Mr. Maretzek's management, would do well to follow the example of its patrons. The present company is not at all calculated to draw, even were the city full, and you may easily imagine what must be its desolate appearance under the circumstances. The new tenor, Sig. Beraldi, has a tolerable voice, but is a very poor actor. The baritone, Sig. Graziani, is a better actor, and has a fine voice, which he uses to advantage. He is the favourite of the troupe. Signora Gomez, the prima donna, has little voice, and does not excel as a vocalist; while the contralto, Signora d'Ormy, has a certain degree of energy which makes up for her defect as a singer. Verdi's Luisa Miller is in rehearsal. At Niblo's, Madame Anne Thillon has been singing with her accustomed success, in English opera. Dibdin's operetta of The Waterman has also been performed, with Mr. Fraser in the part of Tom Tug.

At BOSTON, the Händel and Haydn Society has made a good move in the establishment of a solo school, to which members are to be admitted gratuitously—the only condition being they shall give their services when called upon. Non-members will be admitted on payment of three pounds quarterly. The class already numbers twenty-five, and will, no doubt, help to carry out the objects of the society. The credit of the whole scheme is due to Mr. J. L. Fairbanks, president of the society. This city has a decided leaning to music of a serious character. There are three choral societies here, all in a flourishing condition—namely, The Händel and Haydn, The Musical Education, and The Mendelssohn Choral. The new theatre and opera house is fast approaching completion. Rumour is already busy about the engagements: Miss Louisa Pyne is said to have been secured as prima donna; and there is a report of a treaty as possible with Mr. Sims Reeves. Some of our friends seem to know all about it, and look very wise and shake their heads. All we know, however, we have said, and there's an end of the matter. It is said that Miss Catharine Hayes has netted no less a sum than a million of dollars by her transatlantic tour. How far this may be true we have no means of knowing, but it may be regarded as certain that the Irish nightingale has made something very considerable. We have seen the Peruvian and Chilian papers, which are in raptures. The theatres, they tell us, are too small to hold the crowds which assemble at the doors, in the hope of gaining admission.

HEAVENLY HARMONY.—It is said that when Dr. Franklin invented the Harmonica, he concealed it from his wife until the instrument was fit to play, and then woke her with it one night, when she took it for the music of angels (!)

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, August 5th, 1854.

If the Philharmonic Societies, Old and New, have left the art, so far as their special influence is concerned, just where it stood this time last year, the Sacred Harmonic Society has done little better. We are quite aware that a new oratorio is not to be expected every year, and that a vast deal of time, pains, and expense, is necessarily involved in any attempt at bringing forward a work of such magnitude and importance. We are, also, ready to admit that every new oratorio is not necessarily good, and that such inspirations as Elijah appear, at the most, once or twice in a century. But we cannot discern the wisdom of that law, or rather rule of custom, which, up to the last year, in one particular department, has guided the policy of the Sacred Harmonic Society, and which altogether ignores the production of original compositions as a duty. Although a society of amateurs, this body arrogates to itself the position of the first musical institution in Europe; but how does it maintain its right to such a distinction? What has it effected, in the whole course of its career, for the high order of music it assumes to represent? Its deeds may be summed up briefly. The Sacred Harmonic Society has familiarised a certain class of the public with three or four of Handel's oratorios, with the Creation of Haydn, and with Mendelssohn's Elijah. These have been given very often, and often very well; and the frequent performance of such grand and true works has undoubtedly done much to elevate and purify the musical taste of the masses. But that said, all is said. Oratorios which, like the Messiah and Elijah, are the most directly profitable, have been the most perseveringly adhered to; while those which, like Israel in Egypt and St. Paul, are less certain to fill the exchequer, ad captandum, have been comparatively neglected—although, in the instances named, Israel is quite equal to the Messiah, and St. Paul very nearly equal to Elijah. It is, therefore, less a love of art, than a love of position—position to be won and maintained at a small risk—that has influenced the members of the Sacred Harmonic Society in the main. We are not blind to the fact that to some more spirited among them the public are indebted for Mendelssohn's Lobgesang, Mozart's Requiem, Beethoven's Mass in D, &c. But these are exceptions to the rule, and had not the Requiem, which proved unexpectedly attractive, been too short to form a concert of itself, while the Lobgesang was just long enough to fill up the vacant time, it is more than probable that the last would have been shelved in perpetuo. No one endowed with ears and some musical knowledge can fail to have remarked that the performance of the Lobgesang was on every occasion as unsatisfactory as that of the Requiem was the contrary; and why?—simply because the latter was the source whence the pounds and shillings were most likely to flow at once into the treasury, and Number One being the prime consideration with the Sacred Harmonic Society, the Requiem was better cared for than the Lobgesang. Yet the members are for the most part Church of England protestants, or protestant dissenters—in short, Exeter Hall people, pur sang.

The Sacred Harmonic Society has no faith in great works for themselves; it does not believe that what is absolutely good will inevitably make its way; and that the public, however at first apathetic, must eventually awaken to a true sense of the beautiful in things that are endowed with immortal beauty. The unanimous outcry has been that St. Paul and Israel in Egypt "do not pay," and that, whenever they are performed, a certain loss to the treasury ensues. Thus we have no end of repetitions of the Messiah, Elijah, and the Creation, which are presented so constantly that they run the chance of palling on the ear by too close and every-day familiarity, if not that of being evaded like the reiterated and unwelcome applications of a dun. It is all very well at the great provincial gatherings to give one or all of these masterpieces at every festival, since the majority of the audience assembled at such meetings only enjoy the advantage of hearing them executed on so grand a scale once in three years. But, in London, the system cannot possibly last, since not only at the Sacred Harmonic Society, but at the London Sacred Harmonic Society, at the Harmonic Union, and at Mr. Hullah's concerts in St. Martin's Hall, the same three oratorios, being stock pieces, are repeatedly performed in the course of the winter and spring. If the Sacred Harmonic Society would maintain its rank, it must legislate not merely for the present but the future. It exists on public support, and should be governed as a public society, not as a close borough; but as matters are conducted, it runs an excellent chance of degenerating into a private association, maintained for the sole advantage of a congregation of religious persons, who, caring very little for music abstractedly, and objecting to theatres and opera-houses, are not sorry to vary the monotony of their domiciles by attending a certain number of performances every year of a chosen lot of special oratorios. On the other hand, a great majority of the amateurs and members, who can neither play nor sing very well, and do not like to be forced to attend more rehearsals than necessary, would by no means object to this, their reason for belonging to the Society being less to "produce with the utmost care and splendour works of established excellence," than to display their own petty acquirements, for their own personal gratification in the band or chorus. Poor and vain egotism! Such influences and considerations are wholly inconsistent with the acknowledged purpose of the Sacred Harmonic Society, which aspires to a high place, if not the highest place, among our musical institutions, and must do something to establish its claims, or gradually sink into the insignificance of a half-musical, half-methodistical coterie.

In 1848, the Society awoke from a long lethargy, and threw off its allegiance to Mr. Surman, who, if we may believe certain of its members, had been to the Society, for a series of years, what the Old Man of the Sea was to Sindbad the Sailor. Mr. Costa was appointed in his place; and this bold step was hailed by more than half the members as the advent of a new era. Mr. Costa was to "conduct" them to the land of promise, and the true millennium was at hand. Some said, at the time, that King Log had been got rid of, only that King Stork might reign in his place; but their words were unheeded. Mr. Costa assumed absolute dominion. Every one came to rehearsal; the chorus and band were weeded of a few (not all, or nearly all) of those utterly incompetent amateurs who were only instrumental in damaging the general effect by their worse than useless co-operation. The performances began to improve; the sky brightened, and a great glory hung on the horizon, the harbinger of a splendid future for the Sacred Harmonic Society. So far well; but it did not last long.

That the influence of the Autocrat of all the Orchestras has been extremely beneficial, up to a certain point, to the Exeter Hall performances, is unquestionable. But, as at the Philharmonic Concerts, a great stride was made in a short time, and then—"halt" was the order of the day. We have heard almost as unsatisfactory performances, even of so familiar an oratorio as Elijah, under Mr. Costa's direction, as we ever heard under that of his predecessor, with whom, of course, we do not think of comparing him. Either Mr. Costa has not the power, or not the will, to go on progressing. If he has the first he has not the last, and, if the last, not the first. We admire his habits of discipline, but we should prefer to see them exerted with greater regularity and persistance. The ultima Thule of a conductor's aspirations is surely not to get rehearsals over as soon as possible, or to do without them altogether. These, however, are both parts of Mr. Costa's system, and hence his popularity with the gentlemen of the orchestra. It is notorious that the oratorio of Elijah is given, year after year, without a rehearsal. The first performance, therefore, serves as a rehearsal for the others, and is, consequently, for the most part slovenly and inefficient. This was painfully manifest in the course of the present season. As Mr. Costa has abolished the custom of issuing directors' tickets for the rehearsals of the Philharmonic Concerts, he should, to be consistent, allow no one except the Committee of the Sacred Harmonic Society to be present at the first performance of Elijah, which is now invariably neither more nor less than a public rehearsal. The suggestion seems to convey an anomaly; but, according to Mr. Costa's method of producing certain oratorios, it would not be inconsistent to act upon it.

The "fact" of the season just expired, was the praiseworthy attempt to execute Beethoven's impossible Mass in D. As, however, the Sacred Harmonic Society, even with Mr. Costa to back it, cannot do impossibilities, it is not to its discredit to say that the work was very imperfectly given, and that in some places the effect was simply chaotic. In this instance, nevertheless, the will may be fairly taken for the deed, although, at the same time, it must be admitted that the respectable proverb, "Where there is a will there is a way," was upset—since, while the will was manifest, the way was not found. Another "fact" was the production, at the fag-end of the season, of Mr. Griesbach's new oratorio—or rather old oratorio, Belshazzar's Feast, under the new name of Daniel. This was the first original work ever given by the Sacred Harmonic Society, and therefore marks an important epoch in the progress of the institution. Whether the mark will be recognised hereafter as a white mark, or as a black one, we leave others to decide. We may fairly question, however, the policy of the committee in selecting a composition of such indifferent merit, and its liberality in allowing the author to pay all expenses incurred by the performance. As an avowed entertainment for Mr. Griesbach's personal friends and admirers, the performance of Daniel would have been quite legitimate, and there would have been nothing to call for reprehension; but, since it was brought before the public under the name and sanction of the Sacred Harmonic Society, the directors of that Society are responsible for the consequences. What those may be time will shew. Meanwhile it is not too much to say that the confidence of the public in the judgment of those entrusted with the management has been shaken, if not annulled; and that a blow has been struck at the reputation of the Sacred Harmonic Society, from which it will take years of good deeds to recover. The "nearly 700," and the "16 double-basses," look all very well in the advertising columns of the newspapers; but some really first-rate performances, some spirit and diligence in the search for novelty, and a wiser policy in general, would be more likely to advance the interests of the Society. Until Israel in Egypt is performed as correctly as the Messiah, and St. Paul with as much vigour and decision as the Creation—until the scores of Handel and Mozart are more ceremoniously respected, and the band and chorus become strengthened by the absence of certain inefficient performers—until Exeter Hall points the way instead of following on the heels of Birmingham and Norwich, and the next new oratorio of a great composer is introduced by the metropolis to the provinces instead of vice versâ—until these and many other desirable, nay indispensable, changes (the improvement of the organ, among the rest) are accomplished, the Sacred Harmonic Society may continue to style itself "the greatest musical institution in Europe," but its right to that title will daily obtain less credit.

THE "glorious uncertainty of the law" was never made more manifest than by the foreign copyright case, which, now as "Boosey v. Jefferys," now as "Jefferys v. Boosey," now as an "action for infringement," now as a "writ of error," has so long occupied the courts and mystified the public. If—as some great diplomatist was said to have said—"Language is given to conceal our thoughts," with much greater show of truth may it be asserted, that law is given to hide the distinction between meum and tuum. Here we have a case in point. Boosey, a music-publisher, purchased of Ricordi, another music-publisher, as far back as 1831, the score of an opera by Bellini, a composer, which Bellini had previously sold to Ricordi. Bellini wrote the music; it was therefore clearly his own property, and, being his own property, he had a right to sell it. No one will dispute that fact. Bellini, having a right to sell it, did sell it to Ricordi, who paid the price of it with his own money. The opera then became Ricordi's, according to the laws and customs of barter which have obtained so far back as history has peered into the doings of men and the condition of the world. No one will deny that, having bought and paid for it, the opera was now Ricordi's. Being Ricordi's, then, Ricordi had the same right to sell it, which Bellini had when it was Bellini's. Ricordi, having a right to sell it, did sell it to Boosey, who paid the price of it with his own money. The opera, now, in equity and in logic, would seem to have been Boosey's, and so Boosey must have thought, until some time after another music-seller, Jefferys, who had not bought or paid for the opera, or any part of it, published a song from it. Boosey, who had bought and paid for the opera, denied the right of Jefferys to appropriate any part of it to his own uses. Jefferys replied that Boosey had no property in the opera, although Boosey had bought and paid for it with his own money of Ricordi, who had himself bought it of the composer under similar circumstances. The case being of such a complicated nature, recourse was had to law.

Now supposing that instead of being an opera the article purchased by Ricordi of Bellini, and then by Boosey of Ricordi, had been a snuff-box set in diamonds; in that case will any one assert that Jefferys had a right to take one of the diamonds to himself, or to take the snuff-box and diamonds to himself, or to hold a joint property with Boosey, who had bought it and paid for it with his own money, either in a part or the whole of it? Assuredly no one of sane mind and sound body.

But this is only a common-sense view of the subject—a natural, nay, a bucolic view, which, in the golden age, would have passed muster. The conclusion at which we have arrived is true in reason and in equity—but not in law and Chancery. Common sense is one thing, common law another; and the world is very different since law has been invented to upset a whole library of self-evident truths.

Examine the logic of the case. "Legislatures"—says the versatile Lord Brougham, who cannot sell his books in the United States—"in general only legislate for their own subjects." (Why "in general?") The law does not enact that a foreigner can have a monopoly in this country, and therefore an English-born subject may be deprived of his own by another English subject. This is neither more nor less than an absurdity; but we have the authority of the Lord Chancellor for the fact that no law can exist, from the application of which, under peculiar circumstances, an absurdity may not "flow;" and here we have a famous illustration of the inference of that learned functionary.

We have not time at present to discuss the subject in extenso; but we intend to do so in our next, so well as we are able. Meanwhile, beneath we append two out of many letters that have been forwarded to us, both of which present facts and arguments worthy consideration even from the Woolsack.

FOREIGN AUTHOR'S COPYRIGHT.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—The long-fought question, whether a foreign author is entitled to a copyright in England, is at last decided. The House of Lords has ordained that an alien who presents himself in England on the day of the publication will be protected; but if he forwards it by an agent to his publisher, he may be robbed of it. There can be no doubt that the law is thus construed for the purpose of forcing America to conclude an international treaty with this country. It may be for the advantage of our authors to compel the United States to take such a step in self-defence, but the injustice of the decision which deprives a large mass of persons of their property fairly acquired, under the sanction of the legislature, is so great that it deserves the fullest exposure.

The United States Government, however illiberal we may think it to our authors, is at all events equitable. The law in America is clearly defined. If an individual resides in the States for three years, he is entitled to hold property ever after. How totally different has been the administration of justice in this country! For twenty years it has been disputed whether a foreigner can hold a copyright here. The question has been before all the judges, and the decision, in every court but one, has been in favour of the foreigner's claim. Publishers of American books, and European music, have invested large sums in the purchase of copyrights, in consequence of the encouragement received from the exponents of the law, and now, after two or three generations of judges have sifted the point, and enormous sums have been spent in trying the question, the House of Lords, by an ad captandum opinion, destroys the property created by the decisions of the judges of the land, and only for the purpose of serving the Americans and hastening the conclusion of a treaty which is in negociation. Whichever reading of the law may be correct it is impossible to determine, and whichever policy it may be the fairer to pursue I do not pretend to discuss. But I do maintain that this mode of twisting the meaning of vague old Acts of Parliament for different purposes at different times, to the injury of individuals, is degrading to the country. The Act of Parliament lately under discussion was passed in the reign of Queen Anne. If this Act was not intended to include foreigners in its operation, why was it not so stated in the case of D'Almaine and Boosey, twenty years ago, when the very point in question was argued. Boosey lost his case then because the Judge decided that a foreigner was entitled to a copyright if he sent his composition over here to be published first; and now Boosey has lost his case again (and his property into the bargain) because the Lords have ruled that a foreigner cannot possess a copyright in a work unless he brings it to London himself! Unfortunate! Why did he confide in Judges, and buy operas and defend them in actions on the strength of ten or twelve of the highest judicial opinions? The decision of the House of Lords may possibly be again reversed some day, and I should, therefore, recommend music publishers not to purchase even a polka, for the future, unless they can obtain a special Act of Parliament for investing the copyright in their families.

Yours obediently,
A PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—The decision of the House of Lords in this case seems so opposed to the natural principles of equity, if I may use such an expression, and is likely to prove so mischievous in its results, that I crave a few moments of your time to state some of the reflections it has awakened in me.

It seems to me that music must be considered a sort of universal language, spoken and understood in all countries, but only comparatively by a few in each. Consequently, a composer does not address himself to his own countrymen alone, but to all who understand and practise musical art.

Now if the principle is to hold good that a musical author has no interest in the works of his own brain beyond the frontiers of his own country, Lombardy, Sicily, Parma, or wherever it may be, it is in practice very much like declaring that no English author of literary works should be able to derive anything from the copyright of them out of the county where he lives, and that Mr. Dickens, living in London, would have no remedy in the case of a reprint of his works at Manchester or Glasgow without his knowledge, consent, or having any interest therein.

The distinction between "alien foreigners" and English composers may be according to law, but it must be remembered in fact, that, although this country is the great seat of musical taste, and the place where music is most widely spread and pursued, musical compositions have for the most part come from abroad, and that the very foundation of music lies in the productions of Mozart, Beethoven, and a long list of "alien foreigners." Among other "alien foreigners," Mendelssohn composed and wrote principally with a view to publication in England; English encouragement was the stimulus which led to the composition of his greatest works, those which have exercised the greatest influence in elevating musical taste in this country; and the full carrying out of the doctrine of the House of Lords would drive foreign composers to gain their livelihood by teaching the piano at Cassel or Darmstadt, and deprive them of the very small return they, at this time, get for the delight and instruction they confer on the English public.

I do not mean to question the decision of the House of Lords on the law of the case; but I do mean to say that the law is inconsistent with our present enlightened views and general system of legislation; and I trust that some means will be taken by legislative enactment to remedy this state of things; and thus out of the evil of the present decision will be worked a permanent good.

Begging your pardon for the length of these remarks.

I remain, Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

London, August 4th, 1854. AN ENGLISH MUSICIAN.

I enclose my card for your private satisfaction.

JEFFERYS VERSUS BOOSEY.—A meeting of the principal music publishers took place on Thursday, at Messrs. Boosey and Sons, for the purpose of considering some points connected with the new position in which the decision of the House of Lords, in the case of Jefferys versus Boosey, has placed proprietors of copyrights.

M. BLUMENTHAL has left London for the continent.

HERR REICHARDT has gone to Boulogne for a few weeks, and will return to England in September for the Norwich festival.

LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—This Society held its annual meeting at Exeter Hall, on Monday evening, the chair being taken by one of the vice-presidents, the Rev. O. F. Owen. There was a numerous attendance of members. The chairman was supported by the Rev. J. Hatch and the other members of the committee, and the report was read by the honorary secretary, C. J. Waghorn, Esq. From this it appeared that six concerts had been given by the Society during the past season, and that, notwithstanding the numerous musical entertainments, sacred and secular, which had been given at Exeter Hall, its current expenses had been more than defrayed by subscriptions and sale of tickets. One of the fundamental rules of the society was the encouragement of native talent, and this had been carried out by the engagement of English singers for the principal parts in the various oratorios. A vote of thanks was moved by Mr. Williams, and carried by the members, to Mr. Surman, conductor of the society, who had for so many years directed the performance of oratorios at Exeter Hall. Mr. Williams alluded to the punctuality Mr. Surman had always displayed in his attendance both at rehearsals and public performances, and of the advantage accruing to the Society from that gentleman's position at the head of the musical arrangements. It is reported that the members intend to present Mr. Surman with a testimonial on the opening night of next season, and that £100 has already been subscribed for that purpose. The usual votes of thanks were passed to the president and other officers, and to the Rev. O. F. Owen, chairman.

REVIEWS.

"MINUETTO ESPRESSIVO," For the Pianoforte. Composed and dedicated to J. Turner Hopwood, Esq., by W. Sterndale Bennett. Leader and Cocks; Addison and Hollier.

MR. STERNDALE BENNETT writes so seldom now that he may almost be said to be lost to the arts as a composer; but he writes so well that the smallest contribution from his pen is a gain; and thus the balance on either side is equal. The little piece before us, entitled Minuetto Espressivo, is a gem of melody brightly set in harmony. The first theme, in E flat, is tranquil and lovely, and steals upon the ear in a manner unassuming and irresistible—as it were, a modest and retiring maiden, whose beauty is all the more winning from the chariness with which it is disclosed. The second theme, or trio, in C minor, is bold and energetic, and contrasts well with its more gentle sister. The return to the first subject is managed with great felicity; and the coda, though brief and unpretending, displays some charming points of harmony. We need not recommend this Minuetto Espressivo, which will make its way by the force of its own unaided eloquence.

"SECOND IMPROMPTU" for the pianoforte, composed and dedicated to Miss Kenyon. By Charles Edward Horsley. J. J. Ewer and Co.

IN spite of its strong Mendelssohnian colouring, the impromptu (a singular name to give to a carefully finished piece) will recommend itself to musicians and cultivated amateurs. It is energetically written, and very effective for the pianoforte. The first theme, in E flat, will suggest the opening of Beethoven's Circle of Songs (as it has been called) in the same key, although there is no plagiarism. In page 3 (line 2, bars 1-2) the ascent by the bass to A flat, accompanied by the harmony of the dominant of C minor, discloses a daring and somewhat harsh employment of the minor ninth, inverted—to which we should not object, but for the harmony which precedes it—the sixth on G, in the key of B flat, with A natural and G in the melody. There is also a harsh point in the last bar of the next line, which we cannot defend on any grounds; the shock between the C's natural, in the treble, and the C sharp, in the bass, being terrible and intolerable. Mr. Horsley must like it, however, since he repeats it thrice; and yet he would have done better, we think, to cut it out altogether. Nor do we relish the harmony in page 5 (line 2, bar the last) which, to say the best of it, is "cacophonous." Mr. Horsley will know what we mean. In page 6 (line 6, bars 2-3) the same grating (or "scrannel"*) inversion of the minor ninth occurs, in another key. With these objections, we have only praise to award to the Second Impromptu of Mr. Horsley.

"TEMPI FUTURI POLKA," as performed by Kalozdy's Hungarian Band. Composed by George Lichtenstein.

"THE FIDDLER'S WALTZ," for the Pianoforte, with cornet ad lib. Composed by J. Kalozdy.—Ewer and Co.

A LIVELY and well-written Polka in F, and not like some hundred others—which is saying a good deal more than we can say for nine polkas out of ten. We find, however, no purely musical point that calls for remark, either critical or laudatory.

The "Fiddler's Waltz" is a tuneful set of waltzes with introduction and coda, à la Strauss, and a separate part for the cornet-à-pistons. They are easy to play and effectively arranged.

"ELEGY ON THE TOMB OF FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY."—By Charles Evers. Graue and Co.

A VERY grave and very laboured, but, at the same time, extremely musician-like piece of music. It consists of an introduction à la fantasia, and an allegro moderato, both in A minor. The allegro, without presenting any strong marks of originality, is composed in the accepted classic form, and offers many points of interest to the connoisseur. Though by no means of so lofty a character as Dussek's "Elegy on Prince Ferdinand of Prussia," this composition of Mr. Evers is of a similar order, and bears evidence (without plagiarism) of having been suggested by that remarkable inspiration. It is in all respects entitled to attention.

"Thirteen Scenes of Childhood," for the Pianoforte. Composed by Robert Schumann.—Graue and Co.

As examples of the lighter styles of M. Schumann, these little pieces stand out favourably. There is a vein of poetry and a kind of mystic character in all of them; but they are too difficult and too recondite, both in harmony and figures of accompaniment for the use of very young performers, while their extreme brevity renders them unavailable for the purposes of those more advanced and expert. Nevertheless, some charming thoughts are scattered about the thirteen pages in which they are comprised, and although there are many "queer" and many more wholly indefensible points of harmony, there is enough of real musical feeling in these Scenes of Childhood to recommend them, if not to children, who would be incapable of understanding them, to adults, and especially professional adults.

Le Trille, Etude de Concert, pour le Pianoforte. Par Antoine Riedel.—Wessel and Co.

A common-place exercise in the Herz school, without either the grace or the fancy of its inventor.

"The Youth and the Maiden."—Twelve Lieder ohne Worte for the pianoforte.—Book 1, "The Youth;" Book 2, "The Maiden." Composed by Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy.—Wessel and Co.

Arrangements, for pianoforte solo, of twelve of Mendelssohn's most charming vocal songs, some of them rivalling in melodious beauty, true expression, rich and genuine harmony, the celebrated Lieder ohne Worte themselves. The character of every song, and the figures of the accompaniments, are strictly preserved in these arrangements, which are entitled to unqualified praise. None of the twelve pieces are difficult; most of them are effective, some are brilliant, and all are beautiful. No pianist, amateur or professional, who loves the music of Mendelssohn, should be without them.

Handel's Oratorios, "Jephtha and Deborah," in vocal score, with a separate accompaniment for the organ or pianoforte, arranged by Vincent Novello. J. Alfred Novello.

We have already so strongly recommended and said so much about the octavo editions of the oratorios edited by Mr. Vincent Novello, that we feel it necessary to say no more on the present occasion than call attention to the new issues—Jephtha and Deborah—in which the purchaser will find the same good qualities that were remarked in the works already noticed. When the series is finished, it will amount to more than twenty volumes. It will constitute a small sacred library in itself.

Madame Cabel leaves London this morning for Paris.

M. Vivier started yesterday for Baden-Baden, taking Paris in his way. We understand he will return in time for the Norwich Festival, where his performances are calculated to form an agreeable and attractive feature in the evening concerts, where there is ordinarily such a glut of vocal music.

Verdi's New Opera.—The new work of Sig. Verdi, to be produced at the Paris Grand Opera, in the autumn, is found ed, we hear, on the subject of King Lear. The marriage of Shakspere and Verdi is not new, since it has already been celebrated in Macbeth.

Herr Ernst and Madame Ernst have left for Paris. Thence they proceed to Baden-Baden; and thence to Aix, in Savoy, where they intend passing some weeks. They will return to London in the middle of October.

A Queer Professorship.—An American contempo rary says the government of Harvard College are said to be completely nonplussed by a recent bequest of 15,000 dollars, left by a certain sentimental Miss Caroline Plummer, for the endowment of a new professorship on the "Philosophy of the Heart." We wish the wise men of Harvard a happy issue from the perplexity into which Mrs. Plummer has involved them.

SKETCHES OF ENGLISH ARTISTS.

No. III.

JOHN BRAHAM.

More than four and twenty years ago, Mr. W. T. Parke, a celebrated oboe-player, in a work entitled "Musical Memoirs," thus alludes to the hero of our sketch:—

"Braham has husbanded his vocal power with exceeding care; for, though more than forty years have rolled over him since he first appeared on the stage of Covent Garden Theatre, in 1787, in the character of the Shepherd Joe in Poor Vulcan, for the benefit of his master, Leoni, he still maintains the pre-eminence he has long enjoyed, and is entitled to the compliment bestowed on the late celebrated comic actress, Mrs. Mattocks, by the head of the police to Lewis, the stage-manager, on the occasion of their Majesties' visit to the theatre—'That's a clever little woman; she has been on the stage more than forty years to my knowledge, and yet how well she acts! Sir, she's a perfect pro-gi-dy.'"

The truth is, that at fifty-four Braham might be said to have been in the zenith of his powers. The cause why singers lose their voices so soon arises either from a want of stamina in the constitution, or from a bad method of vocalizing. Braham's constitution is of iron, and has never been tampered with. Always moderate and careful, from temperament as well as prudential motives, he has never been led into excesses, and at this moment he presents one of the most remarkable instances of age joined to vigour of body and mind in existence. That Braham's method of singing belongs to the best school need, we think, scarcely be advanced; he has too long stood in public estimation as a model for English singers, to render it doubtful. But, independently of the excellence of his style and method, another cause still more important tended to the preservation of his vocal powers. His voice was naturally so strong and of such unusual compass, that he was not obliged to overstrain it to produce his greatest effects. How many singers have been prematurely lost by exerting themselves to do more than nature intended them! M. Duprez, the celebrated French tenor, while yet a young man, was put hors-de-combat for the stage through his forced and continual endeavours to sing the ut de poitrine in Guillaume Tell and other operas; and Signor Tamburini, the most accomplished barytone the Italian opera ever boasted of, lost the beauty and power of his voice at the age of forty-six, by striving to roar like Signor Lablache in the "Suoni la tromba" duet in I Puritani. Braham had, fortunately, no cause to do violence to nature in any music. The strength and physical conformation of his lungs gave him immense force and sustaining power, and scarcely any note written for the tenor voice was too high for him. In a ballad he introduced into one of his own operas at Drury Lane he has been known to sing to D natural in alt, in his chest voice. Braham's voice was truly magnificent. Sonorous and metallic in quality, having the fullness and power of a barytone, it was also of exceeding sweetness. He who remembers the tenderness and pathos infused into some of the Scotch and English ballads must acknowledge how little in the shape of simple singing can be compared to it in the present day. Yet Braham's singing was not always as unaffected and plain as might have been desired. On his first return from Italy he was infected in no small degree with the prevailing mania for florid vocalisation. Even the commonest ballads were overcharged by him with a superabundance of fioriture; and he was not yet content with that pure and unforced expression which, in a few years after, became one of the special characteristics of his style. Braham, however, may be forgiven for being seduced into that vitiated taste which only followed the exigencies of the age, and conformed itself to popular requirement. These were the times, it must be remembered, of Mrs. Billington, Madame Mara, Catalani, Tramezzani, David, Rubinelli, and others, all singers of the brilliant and extraordinary kind, who led the public by the nose, and induced composers to write exercises for the voice instead of simple tunes. The audiences of those days were not always pleased with the unadorned singing of Mrs. Crouch, Mrs. Dickons, or Mrs. Bland. They loved to be surprised rather than delighted, and were not satisfied if their hearts were touched, unless, at the same time, their ears were tickled and their understandings dazzled. Such, at that period, was the state of musical feeling in the popular mind, and to which Braham did not hesitate to subscribe when he came back from the continent. The singer had another motive which tempted him to adopt the prevailing style; his voice was extremely flexible, and no passage was too difficult for him to execute. Most of his early songs and duets indicate his leaning towards the florid school. In all probability at that time he hardly knew where his chief strength lay, and not until he had studied Handel's sacred music did he find out that the grand declamatory style was his forte. In recitative Braham has never been surpassed, and seldom equalled. His delivery of some of Handel's songs, such as "Jepththa's Rash Vow," "Comfort ye, my People," "Every Valley," "Waft her, Angels," "Sound the alarm," and others, was particularly grand, chaste, and impressive. It was the excellence of his vocal elocution in sacred singing which procured for him the designation of the Siddons of the Lyric Drama.

Our own earliest impression of Braham dates back as far as 1830, when we heard him for the first time in Masaniello. His whole performance struck us as being astonishingly grand and powerful. Braham seemed, indeed, scarcely to act at all, yet so earnest and abstracted did he appear when singing, that we felt no loss in the absence of any histrionic display. Such were our subsequent feelings when we saw Rubini in I Puritani. It seemed as if an exhibition of acting would have been but an intrusion, disturbing the intense feeling awakened by his singing. In Masaniello we were almost awed at the volume of tone and energy exhibited by Braham in the morceau in D flat minor, in the second act, "Uprouse ye, manly hearts," where the Neapolitan fisherman first incites his companions to revolt. Braham's voice sounded like the blast of a trumpet throughout the theatre. We heard the opera for thirteen successive nights with renewed delight, and with increased admiration for the singer.

So great an artist as Braham could hardly have been before the public for more than half a century without producing the most decided influence on his time, and, consequently, all those singers who have aimed at excellence in the declamatory style, have taken him for the model. But, however correct and safe an example Braham offered in his own person, it was by no means an easy task to follow him. The power and largeness of his voice, which rendered his delivery so grand and emphatic, could not be imitated; and without these qualities the singer is precluded from attaining the highest excellence in lyric declamation. Art may effect much to supply the deficiency of voice, but its want must be always seriously felt in vocal elocution. Braham produced a host of servile imitators, many of whom only caricatured his style and manner, but could not catch his beauties or his graces. There existed for many years a Braham-mania among the tenor singers in England. Those who had strong voices bellowed at the top of their lungs and imagined that this constituted them rivals of their great archetype in energy and power. Those, on the other hand, with weak voices copied his expression and feeling, and fancied by so close an imitation that they had made amends for their want of power. Still the model being good, imitation could hardly have failed to originate some beneficial consequences. Braham's fine elocution, his clear and distinct enunciation, his method of producing the notes, the blending the chest with the falsetto voice —one of his most striking merits—his correct judgment, and refined and classic taste, could not be entirely thrown away for so long a period upon the mass of vocalists; and there is no doubt that at the present time his influence prevails largely wherever oratorios and sacred works are performed.

In the year 1812 to so great a height had Braham's popularity risen, that he obtained almost unprecedented salaries at the two patent theatres, as well as at all the concerts and oratorios. He was also growing rich by means of his musical compositions, at which he laboured most assiduously. His music, generally speaking, displays a vein of homely yet graceful melody, well adapted to please an English audience, which it seems was the highest aim of his ambition. For the copyright of some of his operas he was paid more liberally than any composer who wrote before him, and more than many others who came after him. He received, in 1804, no less than one thousand guineas for the music of The English Fleet in 1342. (Many years afterwards he sold his ballad, "The King, God bless him!" for eight hundred pounds, a sum greater than that paid to Rossini for Il Barbiere di Siviglia.)

The operatic works composed by Braham, in whole, or in part, were as follows:—The Cabinet, The English Fleet in 1342, Out of Place, Thirty Thousand, Family Quarrels, The Paragraph, Kais; or, Love in the Deserts, Americans, The Devil's Bridge, False Alarms, Zuma, Navensky, etc. The most popular of these were The Cabinet, The English Fleet, and The Devil's Bridge, which, until modern taste—whether false or true we shall not discuss in this place—drove the ballad opera almost entirely from the stage, were held in special estimation for many years.

Perhaps no singer ever went through a more extraordinary career than John Braham. From 1806 to 1816 he was engaged nearly every year as primo tenore at the Italian Opera, and sang invariably at one of the patent English theatres in the winter. At the Italian Opera he sang with Mrs. Billington, Madame Grassini (aunt of Grisi), Madame Fodor, Signor Naldi, etc., etc. He was the original Sesto when Mozart's Clemensa di Tito was brought out at the King's Theatre. He was the original Max in Weber's Der Freischütz, when it was produced at the Lyceum; and Weber wrote the music of Sir Huon, in Oberon, expressly for him. It was at the suggestion of Braham that Weber wrote the grand scena, "Oh, 'tis a glorious sight to see," which, nevertheless, is far from being the gem of the opera, admired and hacknied as it is.

To follow the career of Braham from the period about which we are now writing—from 1806 to 1816—to the present day would occupy more room than we can afford to a hurried sketch in these papers. From the moment that he gained the loftiest position as a vocalist in this country until he quitted the stage, he retained his place and his reputation, unperilled through all changes and vicissitudes, through prejudice and pique, through good and indifferent report, through party spirit and favoritism, through love of novelty inherent in the play-going public, through even the weariness supposed naturally to result from too frequently seeing and hearing the same artist. Indeed, in the case of Braham, it would seem as though his audiences were never tired of calling Aristides the Just. Assuredly nothing but talents and accomplishments of the highest order could have conduced to such a result. Braham, in his earliest days, as a singer, had to contend against the popularity of Incledon, one of the most gifted and remarkable vocalists this country ever produced; but Braham's superior musical endowments, his greater art, and his knowledge and acquaintance with the Italian school, whereby he was enabled to master all varieties of singing, gave him many advantages over his great rival. While Incleden confined himself by necessity to English music—and even there his vocal powers were in a great measure restricted, Braham could roam discursive through every region of song, and adapt himself to each particular style. Incledon, nevertheless, was the only dangerous antagonist Braham ever encountered on the English stage. Sinclair, who enjoyed for years a considerable reputation, was a singer of a different class altogether, and had no pretension to be compared to him in any respect; and the other tenor singers of the day, however meritorious and excellent, individually and in their appropriate places, are entitled to little consideration when speaking of Braham.

In the year 1835, Braham built and opened the St. James's Theatre, at a cost, it is said, of thirty thousand pounds, and became the manager of an operatic company; and the same year he purchased the Colosseum at a large price, and provided a novel kind of entertainment in that splendid edifice. Both speculations, however, proved ruinous, and the fruits of many years labour were swallowed up in a short space of time. The St. James's Theatre and Colosseum were disposed of at an enormous loss, and Braham again appeared on the stage under another management besides his own. From this time, though occasionally joining the opera troupes at Drury Lane, and elsewhere, his exertions were principally confined to the concert rooms and oratorios. In 1839, he played William Tell, in Rossini's opera of that name, and created a powerful impression in the part. None who heard him can easily forget his profoundly pathetic singing in the air with violoncello accompaniment, which Tell addresses to his son previous to his shooting the apple from his head. The music of the part of Tell is written for a barytone—not a high one—but Braham's power in the middle register, and depth in the lower tones, always enabled him to undertake barytone parts with some trifling transposition. In this respect he resembled the renowned Donzelli, whom we have heard one night singing the high tenor music of the Count Almaviva in the Barbiere, and the next night the barytone music of Count Almaviva in the Nozze di Figaro. But both Donzelli's and Braham's voices were exceptional; and we have no singer on the modern stage to which either of them may be compared. About this time, too, Braham appeared as the Don in Don Giovanni, at Drury Lane, and sang the music with a peculiar charm. The last time Braham appeared before the public, was in March, 1852, at the London Wednesday Concerts, when he was induced to enter into an engagement to give a series of final performances at Exeter Hall. These performances, in consequence of bad management, were never concluded, and thousands were thereby prevented from hearing Braham. Of the singing of the great tenor on that occasion, we shall only say, that if it were not equal to his best efforts in his best days, some forty years ago, it showed astonishing vigour and energy, and produced an effect, literally impossible to describe.

In one of the essays of Elia, written some thirty years or more since, the quaint and humorous Charles Lamb, writing of Braham in his usual off-hand way, thus adds one to the many opinions so frequently expressed, that to his good sense he was mainly indebted for his high standing in his profession:—

"There is a fine scorn in Braham's face, which nature meant to be of ——. The Hebrew spirit is strong in him. He cannot conquer the Shibboleth. How it breaks out when he sings, "The Children of Israel passed through the Red Sea!" The auditors for the moment are Egyptians to him, and he rides over their necks in triumph. There is no mistaking him. Braham has a strong expression of sense in his countenance, and it is confirmed by his singing. The foundation of his vocal excellence is sense. He sings with understanding, as Kemble delivered dialogue. He would sing the Commandments, and give an appropriate character to each prohibition."

In 1816 Braham was married to Miss Bolton, of Ardwick, near Manchester. He has been for many years a widower, and has six children living—two daughters and four sons. One of his daughters, the Countess Dowager of Waldegrave, is now united to Mr. Harcourt, her third husband. Of Braham's four sons there are three in the profession—Charles and Augustus, tenors, and Hamilton, a bass.

It only remains to add that the renowned singer is now living in retirement, in the enjoyment of excellent health and spirits. Approaching close upon his eightieth year, he is still sound in mind and vigorous in body. That indomitable energy which exercised so powerful an influence over the fortunes of his art has not yet deserted him, and would not fail him in the hour of need. The sun has set on his glories for ever, but their memories will remain to illumine the history of his art long after less perishable things have passed away without a record or a name.

An American writer says, "Most of our countrymen have yet to learn what an orchestra is, and I fear it will be a long time before our cities will have them of their own. I know of but one attempt at orchestral music by our own people, and that is the amateur club in Boston."

New York.—M. Maretzek's troupe began the season with Lucia, the executants being Mdlle. Gomez and MM. Neri-Barraldi and Graziani, who were well received.

MUSIC IN THE MIDDLE AGES.

While the learned were so busy giving Greek names to the Church scales, they remarked, that the instrumentalists played in none of these scales. Whoever spoke of an instrumentalist at that time, meant to designate a fiddler and a sort of handicraftsman, that was not worthy to be reckoned among musicians. As these pariahs in music commonly played in C major, their plebeian scale was called modo lascivo (the licentious key). Modo lascivo, C major; the natural key par excellence. Is not the title infinitely queer! Never had Truth a sincerer eulogy bestowed on her, with the plain purpose of disgracing her. How pleasantly ears, dedicated from principle to the hardest crucifixions, must have been tickled by this key, which they had branded with the epithet unchaste! I shall be told, that the composers in the improved Lydian Mode had transposed this scale into the Fourth. Yes, but we have seen that they avoided with all their might the consequences of these normal scales, both as regarded the tune and modulation; the fiddlers, on the contrary, gladly and willingly accepted them. Herein lies the difference; they sinned without shame against the Greek Modes, without trying, through the mediation of Gaforius and other casuists, to reconcile themselves with the system. The ear found its account in it, and the highly disturbed theory shrieked anathema over such criminal enjoyment. Modo lascivo, it thundered out! Such was the spirit of the schools, and such, we may add, the spirit of the age. A sensual gratification, innocent as it was in itself, might lead into temptation, and arouse the evil one, who knows how to assume all forms, even that of the major scale.

We come back to our question, which, after what has been recalled to mind, resolves itself. What should, what could the musicians make, who first strove to fulfil their calling as artists? Melody? But Art, as it was, offered them none, and the principles which guided them made it long impossible. Harmonic sequences of any value? But scales, chords, modulations, all this was terra incognita for them. Could purely rhythmical effects be asked of them? Perhaps they might have found such, had they been composing for the drum; but they composed for the voice, and in all music which contains more than rhythm, that—I mean that which produces the effect—is inseparable from the Melody. Surely the composers of the fourteenth century possessed none of the elements, whose use would have allowed them to treat Music as one of the forms of Poetry. The esthetic part of Art, which is the Art itself, never entered their thought; and how, I ask, could it have entered? Since they were utterly destitute of every means of moving and of pleasing, how should they ever dream that pleasure and emotion are the true and only ends of music? That would have been as much as to condemn themselves to doing nothing, and yet they had to do something. The answer lies in their works.

Music by its compound nature exhibits two essentially distinct points of view, one of which happily never rose above the horizon of the Middle Age. Music is an Art, but it is also in the broadest sense of the word a Science, since it rests on calculation. To say nothing of the Canon, with which we rationally do not allow ourselves to be much perplexed at this day, there are melodic steps to be counted, rhythmical distances to be measured, harmonic intervals to be spanned, multiplied passages to be combined, all which is expressed by numbers. Considered under this point of view, all the problems of the ear resolve themselves into numerical formulas; and that was the side which the contrapuntists, who still were no musicians, could lay hold of, and of which they actually took possession. To them music fully seemed a branch of practical mathematics, and as such they treated it. The example of Machault has shown us to what their first calculations were limited: namely, to reckoning the intervals, to distinguishing the value of the notes, to multiplying signs upon the lines in the different parts by the mingling of parallel, oblique or counter movements. This was little. Soon the musicians comprehended that they must give the greatest possible expansion to the mathematical principle, the only one of value that could guide them; that they must invent some sort of generative rule involving an infinitude of calculation, which should be deep enough, or prepare difficulties enough, worthily to occupy the adepts of musical science.

Since the world began, there have been probably but two ways of singing in chorus. Either all began at once, or one intoned the tune as leader, and the others joined him after a longer or a shorter pause, either in unison or in harmony. Might there not be another way than this, and might not the same passages, both tune and words, commence one after another in succession; is the question that might have been raised, we know not where and when, by some of the men predestined to discoveries — and to oblivion. A very simple thought to be sure, but one out of which three centuries were to derive their wisdom, and one which bears a Palestrina, a Bach and a Mozart in the germ, to which three shining rings the whole future, the whole welfare of Music, and the chain of years are linked. Every one of my readers has already named the Canon.

The most immediate result of this thought was such an arrangement of the voices, that one seemed to flee before the other; for while the second repeats the words of the first, the first, without resting, has passed on to a new passage, which it leaves as soon as the voice, that is behind it, reaches the same place. If there be more than two voices, the third bears the same relation to the second, the fourth to the third, and so on. Since neither hastens its movement, neither lags behind, and all keep on in the same time, separated by uniform distances, there arises an emulous race towards one point of union, that is never reached; this is called an endless fugue, a canon. From literal repetition of the subject to proper imitation, was not far. Instead of treating the theme thus in unison or octave, they could treat it in the fourth, the fifth, and all the intervals; instead of reproducing the precise melodic form of the theme upon the other steps of the scale, they could invert the order of the notes, of which it was composed, reproduce it contrarywise and give it a retrograde motion; they could begin with the end, and end with the beginning; they could amplify it or abridge it, compose it anew with the notes of the longest or the shortest duration; they could do a thousand other things with it. I need not explain the rules of the Canon, with which I presume the reader to be already familiar; but the little I have said will give some idea, even to those who do not know it, of the countless multitude, the infinite variety, and the uncommon difficulties of the combinations that are implied in them.

During a period of some two hundred and fifty years the Canon erected itself more and more among musicians into a universal and supreme law; it was the exclusive thought of their investigations and their striving, the only measure of their talents and the condition sine quâ non of their celebrity; it swallowed up all, not only church music, but the little that there was of worldly music. The imprisoned thought conformed itself so well to this canonical slavery, that had become supreme law to it, that it fell into an absolute incapacity of producing anything else but Canons. Every melody that germinated in the head of a musician, was worked up into a Canon. Wholesome constraint, fortunate slavery for those who knew not how to make use of freedom! A little less restraint, and the musical thought of that time had been reduced to nothing.

As the Canon was the touchstone of the science of composers, so too it served to display the musical knowledge and acuteness of the singers. They seldom wrote the parts entirely out, but left the work in an enigmatical form, and commonly with a kind of device, containing the solution of the puzzle; for instance: Trinitatum in unitate veneremur; Nigra sum sed formosæ; Cancrisat (retrograde or crab-like imitation); Crescit et decrescit in duplo, triplo, etc. (Imitation by amplification, or by double or triple diminution); Descendegradatim (probably imitation a second below); Contraria contrariis curantur. I do not wholly understand the meaning of this last maxim, but I hold it to be not at all dangerous in music. The great Hahnemann himself would say that it could not operate fatally. In this way one had to be as good a mathematician to sing a Canon, as to compose one; and making music in the time of Charles V. and Frances I. was no trifle of brain-twisting labour. In this way the composers avenged themselves upon the singers of their time, and upon the later historians, for the incredible toil, which their trade as canonists occasioned them.

When we to-day look upon these master-works of patience and of ingenuity; these calculations, in which not the remotest account is made of Melody and Harmony; these problems, in whose solution we find nothing that resembles music; this toilsome labour, which smells so of the lamp, of octaves and of quints, we are tempted to ask: Canon what will thou of me? as a learned Frenchman asked of a Sonata. Not being acquainted with the latter, I cannot say what answer it made. But as it respects the Canon, this replies very clearly and intelligibly: "I will that you should recognize in me the product of a necessary striving, which alone could lead Art to the goal of its high destiny. I demand respect and gratitude of the friends of Music. Name to me anything great and enduring among the commonly so ephemeral productions of music, in which I have not participated largely. Rightly understood, I am the chief pillar of sublime church music, of the grand instrumental music and good chamber music; and those who would banish me entirely from theatrical music thereby doom themselves to die young. If, to be sure, I appear ludicrous and meagre in the fifteenth century, the reason lies in this, that I had neither the support of the Accord, which was scarcely known, nor of Melody, which was not known at all. Could I dispense with their aid, and become Music by myself alone? Just as little as the granite, the marble, the cement, and the iron could dispense with an architectural plan, and put themselves together into a palace or a temple. So, too, what were palace and temple, if there were no stones, no iron, and no lime? What would the great architects of harmony, Bach, Handel, Haydn, and Mozart have undertaken, had not dexterous and persevering labourers for two centuries long been breaking out the stone quarries, excavating the mines, and selecting, hewing, shaping, and matching the solid materials which I, the Canon, with my imitations, my repetitions, my inversions, my thematic analyses, and my double counterpoint present so faithfully? What would they have made? Pretty little summer houses of painted wood, whose cornices and friezes and embellishments would have consisted of roulades, fresh and shining for an hour, when fashion would blow over them and every vestige of them disappear."

Now, this answer of the Canon is in certain points correct, nay instructive, and it pains me that people who have thought so much about the Canon, and said so much about bad taste, Gothic style, Flemish barbarism, etc., have not better understood it. It would have shown them that musical art followed quite logically the course it was obliged to enter, in passing from canonical counterpoint to harmony, and from harmony to melody, instead of beginning with this latter. Did not the languages follow the same course, after they had once grown up to literature? In all languages, taken in their first stages of development, verses came before prose, and the form ruled before the thought. Everywhere tradition and authority exercised an indispensable necessary guardianship in the infancy of the practical science of reason and taste, which grow up and keep even pace together. The development of modern languages presents, in comparison with musical language, a series of correspondences which are not to be mistaken, whether we regard their multitude, their growing mutual relations, their historical and logical concatenation, or their perfect exactness within the proper bounds of their analogy. The primitive and artless chant corresponds perfectly to the primitive and artless poetry which served it for a text. Counterpoint in general is the written versification, of precisely the same age with itself, which was based upon combinations not less difficult, not less arbitrary and childish, and altogether identical with its own. Of this sort are the final rhymes, acrostics, Leonine verses, which rhymed in the middle and the end, the old ballad form, the King's song, the sonnet, the Sextine and the many other different kinds of measure, in which the poet had to overcome greater or lesser difficulties; in a word, all the poetry, whose only merit consisted in the surmounting of difficulties; a poetry for the eyes, just as the contemporary music was only a music for the eyes.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

SIGNOR GIULIO REGONDI has removed to 22, Manchester-street, Manchester-square.

RUDALL, ROSE, CARTE, and CO., 100, NEW BOND STREET, LONDON, have the honour of announcing that they have been appointed the Sole Agents in Great Britain for the Sale of the SAX-CORNETS, SAXOPHONES, SAX-HORNS, and all other Brass Military Instruments invented and manufactured by M. Adolphe Sax, to whom was awarded the only Council Medal of the Great Exhibition for Military Instruments in Brass, a list of which, with the prices, may be had on application, post free. It will be seen from this list, that M. Sax's Instruments can now be supplied direct from his own Manufactory, at a price not higher than the numerous imitations of them.

THE SAXOPHONE.—RUDALL, ROSE, CARTE, and Co., 100, New Bond-street, sole agents in this country for M. Sax's military instruments, in addition to a large stock of Sax Horns, Sax Trombas, Sax Trumpets, and Cornets, have just received a great variety of soprano, alto, tenor, and bass, of Sax's new and beautiful-toned instruments, the Saxophone. "These new instruments (brass and played by a reed), possess a charm equal to the originality of their tone, and they carry to the highest degree of perfection, la voix expressive."—Report of Jurors, Great Exhibition.

REPAIRS of STRINGED, REED, and BRASS MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—Messrs. Boosey and Sons beg to announce to the musical profession and the public, that, to enable them to execute repairs in the best possible manner, they have recently engaged from Germany one of the most skilful European artisans to superintend this department, and who thoroughly understands the mechanism of Musical Instruments of every description and model. Parties, therefore, intrusting the most valuable instruments to Messrs. Boosey and Sons, may rely upon their being treated with a care and efficiency unequalled in London. Boosey and Sons, Musical Instrument Manufacturers, 28, Holles-street.

THE ROYAL MAGNETIC PAGE-TURNER.—An extraordinary novelty for the musical world. These clever instruments turn over the leaves of music for the performer, preventing interruption. The public are invited to view them at the Royal Polytechnic Institution; the Royal Panopticon; and, at the Patentees, Druce and Co., 68, Baker-street. Price for Harps, 17s. 6d. Pianos, 21s. Submitted to the Queen, see Court Circular, 17th July.

GIULIA GRISI.

Giulietta, or Giulia Grisi, was born at Milan, in 1812. She was the younger sister of Giuditta Grisi, a mezzo soprano of considerable celebrity in Italy at that time, who is still remembered both in Paris and London, and for whom Bellini wrote the part of Romeo, in his opera of I Capuletti e Montecchi. The famous Josephine Grassini, contemporary of Marchesi, Crescentini, and other celebrated singers of the great Italian school, was Giulietta's aunt; so that she came from a good stock in so far as musical genius is concerned. She was born on the 22nd of May—the fête of St. Giulia. Hence the name under which she was baptised.

As a child, Giulietta gave evidence of a quick ear; but there was no promise of her ever possessing a voice. On the contrary, she seemed to be afflicted with a chronic hoarseness, unprecedented at so tender an age, and so obstinate that her parents began to fear she was likely to fall into a decline. She was, however, so well tended, and taken such excellent care of, that these premonitory symptoms vanished. Still there was no very early sign of musical predisposition in Giulietta; and her friends and relations entertained but little idea that there would ever be a second Giuditta in the Grisi family, much less a Giulia, who, in the course of time, should rival even Grassini herself, the pride and honour of the race. The talents of the eldest sister had early developed themselves; and at the age of sixteen Giuditta had already won considerable reputation as a concert-singer in Milan. In 1823, two years later, she made her début at Vienna, in Rossini's opera, Bianca e Faliero, on which occasion she had the honour of singing with the already-renowned Henriette Sontag, whose youth, accomplishments, and great personal attractions were the rage in the Austrian capital, and the "toast" in every distinguished circle. After quitting Vienna, Giuditta Grisi sang successively at the theatres of Milan, Parma, Florence, Genoa, and Venice. At the last-named city, Bellini, then very young, composed the opera already named, in which the part of Romeo was allotted to her—Giuditta's voice, like that of her more eminent aunt, Grassini, being a mezzo soprano, if not, indeed, a contralto.

Meanwhile, the father of Giulia (an officer of engineers in the service of Napoleon) sent her to a convent, at a small place called Gorizia, where, at eight years of age, she began to learn the pianoforte under the tutelage of one of the religieuses, who happened to take a great fancy to the child—even at that time a flower of beauty. At the convent, however, Giulietta did not learn much, or, at least, her musical education made very slight progress, and her father, dissatisfied, removed her. From this time, she used chiefly to live with her sister Giuditta—either at Milan, with the family, or in the various towns and cities to which the latter was called by her professional engagements. It was soon remarked, that, whenever Giuditta was at the piano, practising solfeggi, or learning the music of the parts she was about to sing, little Giulietta would be an anxious and attentive hearer. Her ear, as has been stated, was good, and her memory so quick and retentive that she could mimic her sister with ease, and, with extraordinary fluency and correctness, hum over the most difficult passages of vocalization, after hearing them only once. The extreme purity and freshness of her voice, its full and sweet quality in every tone, attracted equal attention. Such gifts were too precious to be thrown away—more especially in Italy, the land of song, where, although nearly all the women are warblers, music was the chief source of popular recreation, and a good voice is a safe key to fortune. Giuditta raved about the pretty voice and wonderfully accurate ear of her pretty sister, and was determined she should learn to sing without delay. Listening with eagerness to the voluble improvisations of her little self-taught minstrel—who, like the skylark addressed by the wondering poet Shelley, (unconscious that his own harmonious verse far surpassed the music of the bird), poured out her melody

"In profuse strains of unpremeditated art—"

Giuditta would incontinently clasp her in her arms, cover her with kisses, and exclaim—"Thou shalt be more than thy sister, my Giuliettina; thou shalt be more even than thy aunt! It is Giuditta tells thee so;—believe it."

When the sisters were at Bologna, Giuditta, who was very much occupied, placed Giulietta under a maestro of the name of Celli, from whom she took lessons—but only for a month. As these lessons, however, were on the rudiments of singing, they were extremely valuable to our youthful heroine, and served as a basis on which she could proceed with safety. She continued, therefore, to study alone, and with unremitting ardour, occasionally obtaining the advice and correction of her sister, during leisure hours. Thus she made rapid progress. Shortly afterwards Giulietta enjoyed the advantage of further instructions from Madame Boccabadati, a near relation of a singer of the same name who at the present time enjoys considerable reputation in Italy. From her she learned but little, and in a brief space was again thrown back upon her own resources. Time flew on swiftly, and having advanced far in her musical education, petted and encouraged by her sister, and urged on by a not uninfluential circle of friends, Giulietta began at last to dream of coming out upon the stage. Her sister, who was prima donna at the theatre in Bologna, being on very good terms with the impresario, matters were soon arranged to the satisfaction of all parties, and the evening of the début was appointed.

It was in an opera of Rossini that Giulietta Grisi made her first appearance. The "Swan of Pesaro," the gran maestro, the great genius, the glory of Italy, the man of many operas and as many triumphs, was at Bologna at the time. He—prophet as he is!—had taken no little notice of the young and charming aspirant, and personally interested himself in her début. Giulietta's voice was at that time a low mezzo soprano, and so it was agreed that she should make her appearance in the contralto part of Emma, in the serious opera of Zelmira. The evening came; the first essay was made;—trembling and anxious, Giulietta came forward, and was received with a flattering tribute of applause;—she opened her lips (then as now the prettiest and most provoking in the world); she sang, charmed, and triumphed! The step was taken, the wish accomplished, and a glorious and almost unparalleled career begun.

Giulietta Grisi was then seventeen—a bud of beauty just about to bloom, with the voice of a syren, a face like one of Correggio's angels, and a figure as symmetrical and chaste as any of the Madonnas of Raphael. She sang well too, fluently and without effort; while her acting gave signs of intelligence, and her movements and gestures were instinct with a sort of quiet grace—something, so to say, ineffable. How, then, with all these rich endowments, could she fail to please—nay, to delight? Youth is sure to please, a fine voice is sure to please, a well-proportioned form, a lovely face; each of these, separately, must exercise a potent charm; but Giulietta Grisi possessed them all in one. She more than pleased—she enchanted. Her sister, Giuditta, of a nature wholly affectionate, untainted by envy and altogether free from those jealous feelings which too often embitter and degrade the artistic character, was in ecstasies, and shed tears of joy—genuine and sisterly tears, flowing direct from the heart's fountain. Rossini was, in his own manner, quite as pleased, and prophesied a "futuro brillante" for his young and beautiful protégée. The knowing maestro, the sleek and prosperous "swan"—fin qu'il fut—foresaw more for himself; he foresaw a future Rosina, Elena, Semiramide, etc., for the glory and perpetuation of his own masterpieces.

With such endowments as Giulietta Grisi possessed, it was not likely she could long remain unnoticed, or be permitted to stay unmolested in a second-rank theatre, like the Opera at Bologna. Sig. Lanari, then impresario at Florence, a clever, industrious, scheming, and intelligent man, heard of the sensation she had created, and repaired at once to Bologna, to see the new Phœnix—the fame of whose beauty and accomplishments had spread far and wide—to judge of her merits for himself, and if possible, carry her off in triumph to "La bella Fiorenza," the queen of cities, the Athens of Italia, the centre of the arts and of (Tuscan) civilization. Lanari came, saw, and conquered. Bologna was robbed of its treasure, and Rossini and the Opera were left desolate. Cruel Lanari! And also cunning Lanari!—since, once having the prima donna in his power, he, with specious and wily eloquence, persuaded her to accept a very unprofitable engagement, by which she bound herself exclusively to him for six years, and at terms beneath mediocrity. The scrittura once signed, however, there was no alternative; and Giulietta, now for the first time initiated into the secrets of the life she had chosen, must do her utmost to make the best of it. Her father, unfortunately, was at Milan at the time; and Lanari was so pressing, quick, resolute, and peremptory in his proceedings, that she was allowed neither the time nor the means of consulting her most sagacious and natural adviser.

At Florence, Giulietta made her début as her namesake, Giulietta, in Bellini's Capulets and Montagues, Giuditta being the Romeo. The triumph of our heroine was even greater than at Bologna. She created a furore—a fever—in the Florence circles. The Cafés were thronged, day and night, with di lettanti, discussing her merits, apostrophising her beauty, and drinking to her health. There was one toast—"à Giulietta!—la bellissima Giulietta—à la squizitimentissima Giulietta!—la perlétta dei cantatrici!" And no one wonder the enthusiasm, almost frantic, which became epidemic in the city. Fancy Shakspere's dream of Juliet realised! Fancy the lady—whose —— "beauty hangs upon the cheek of night

Like a rich jewel in an Æthiop's ear," the creature of the poet's imagination, the vision of that very girl, the soul of love incarnate—she before whose beauty the attractions of the worshipped Rosaline vanished into air—fancy this brought palpably, visibly, livingly before an assembled crowd of excitable people, and we can readily understand the result. Such was the impression made in Florence by Giulietta Grisi, on the occasion of her début; such was the second important step in her career.

Lanari, delighted with his good luck, was resolved to derive all the profit from it, which, by good management and successful speculation, could be ensured. So, having "turned his penny" at Florence, he sold our Giulietta to Crivelli, impresario of the Scala, for a large consideration. At Milan Giulietta met Pasta, who had long been the object of her young idolatry, although she had never seen or heard her. Pasta was the prima donna assoluta for the Carnival season; and Bellini was at Milan, composing an opera expressly for the grand lyric tragedian. The name of the new work was to be Norma; and those friends of Bellini, who were admitted to his intimacy, declared that this would be his masterpiece.

AN ADMIRER OF PHILIDOR.

(From "Le Ménestrel.")

The opera of Ermelinde, words by Poinsinet, and music by Philidor, obtained a great success, in spite of the weakness of the libretto. A few days after the first representation, a comical incident occurred in the green room of the opera, and, for a long time afterwards, furnished matter for the conversation and raillery of the habitués.

The Marquis de Senterre, a man of taste, and a good musician, whose opinion was received as oracular in all matters appertaining to the art, was delighted with the new opera, and burned with a desire to compliment Philidor. But the Marquis being blind, he ordered his guide to inform him the first time he met the author of Ermelinde. Soon afterwards, Poinsinet happened to come across the old amateur. The guide, imagining him to be the person the Marquis intended, conducted him to the poet.

"My lord," said the guide, "here is the author of the opera." "My dear Maestro," exclaimed the Marquis, embracing Poinsinet, "what a delicious evening's entertainment you procured me! Allow me to compliment you; your opera is a chef-d'œuvre, and your merit in composing it was all the greater that no one ever heard fine music adapted to a worse libretto! to such a senseless rhapsody!"

The reader may imagine Poinsinet's rage, and the embarrassment of the Marquis, when the laughter of the bystanders exposed the mistake he had committed.

Harmonium Opening at Seacroft Church.—On Sunday last the Rev. H. J. Longsdon preached two sermons to large congregations who had assembled to hear the opening services of an harmonium, by Mr. Julian Adams. The choir sang the anthems, chants, responses, etc. The collection was about £7, which will be applied to the purchase of music books and other choir expenses. The harmonium was supplied by Mr. Butterworth, through the Misses Wilsons, of Seacroft Hall. Mr. Butterworth presided, and the choir was augmented by the assistance of Messrs. Skinner, Bamford, Harper, and other gentlemen from Leeds.—Leeds Paper.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Résumé of the Season.

The season just expired—the eighth—has been the shortest and most eventful since the Royal Italian Opera began its career in 1847. The theatre opened on the 1st of April (an ominous day)—nearly a month later than usual—and closes this day the 12th of August, considerably earlier than on most occasions.

But for the farewell performances of Madame Grisi, it is not easy to imagine how the Royal Italian Opera would have fared. A great number of the old subscribers were summoned by the war to the East and to the Baltic, and the absence of the Guards and Household Troops was severely felt. The interest occasioned, however, by the approaching departure of Madame Grisi more than counterbalanced the loss of the army and navy—staunch supporters as they are of the Opera—and as every one was naturally anxious to see the great artist once at least in each of her favourite parts, a succession of crowded houses was confidently reckoned on. Unfortunately, however, the Grisi nights were prejudicial to the others, and comparatively little attention was paid to any performance in which she did not appear; so that the season might with justice have been called the "Grisi season."

In the prospectus issued at the commencement of the season, we find the following operas promised:—La Vestale (Spontini); Le Domino Noir (Auber); Don Sebastien and Don Pasquale (Donizetti); Matilda di Shabran (Rossini); and Oberon (Weber). Three of these were positively to be produced. Only two, however, were given—Matilda di Shabran and Don Pasquale; but, in lieu of the third "positive," we had Rossini's Le Comte Ory, which was not promised at all. It is curious enough, that the Comte Ory should be announced for two successive years and not brought out; not announced the year following, and yet brought out. La Vestale was to have been given with Mademoiselle Sophie Cruvelli, who was engaged for the first time at the Royal Italian Opera; but the management thought better of it, and declined to hazard the reputation of Spontini, (or, perhaps, of Cruvelli) this year. Auber's Domino Noir was confidently expected, since, like the Comte Ory, it had been promised for two or three years. We question, nevertheless, whether the works from the répertoire of the Opéra Comique would succeed on the Italian stage. The dialogue would inevitably suffer by being converted into recitatives. Oberon, too, was generally anticipated; and Don Sebastien expected, though we confess we were somewhat surprised at mention being made of the latter in the programme. A burnt child dreads the fire. Mr. Gye had burnt his fingers with I Martiri, and would have no more to say to Donizetti's Grand French Operas, and Don Sebastien looking better on paper than on the stage; it was left upon paper. But then La Favorita has done the management good service, so that really we scarcely know what to think on this head. On the whole, judged by the prospectus, the directors must be allowed to have kept faith with the public. Three new operas were promised out of six. Three were given—not exactly the three promised, since one was not promised; but the one not promised was Rossini's Le Comte Ory, and that performance was as good as any promise.

The season commenced, as we have hinted, on Saturday, the first of April, with Guillaume Tell. (It is a coincidence worth noting that Guillaume Tell was also produced on the first night of the season in 1852, and on the first of April.) The cast differed in three or four instances from that of last season. Mad. Castellan was supplanted in Matilda by Mdlle. Marai, a young débutante (from Vienna and St. Petersburgh), who was at once acknowledged to be a great acquisition to the company. M. Zelger took the part of Walter, which last year was sustained by Herr Formes; and Mdlle. Nantier Didiée appeared as Jemmy, in place of Mdlle. Bellini. The general performance was open to objection. The first act was not satisfactory, but the second act was irreproachable. Sig. Tamberlik sang magnificently. The Tyrolienne was danced by Mdlles. Battalini and Esper, the first new to London, the second one of the most accomplished choregraphs from Her Majesty's Theatre. On the whole, this was one of the best "first nights" since the Royal Italian Opera was inaugurated.

Matilda di Shabran, the first novelty, was brought out on Tuesday, the 18th of April. It was put on the stage with great care, and scarcely anything was left undone to render it attractive. The cast comprised Madame Bosio, Mdlles. Marai and Albini, Signors Luchesi, Tagliafico, and Ronconi. Madame Bosio sang the music of Matilda with exceeding fluency, and Signor Ronconi was wonderfully droll as Isidore. The entire performance gave the greatest satisfaction. Nevertheless, Matilda di Shabran, although it contains some of Rossini's finest music, was only given twice. The patrons of the Opera were reserving themselves for the approaching "farewell of Madame Grisi."

On the following Tuesday we had L'Elisir d'Amore, which, though supported by Madame Bosio and Signor Ronconi, as Adina and Dulcamara, failed to attract.

Thursday night, the 27th of April, was memorable for the first appearance of Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli at the Royal Italian Opera. This young and admirable dramatic singer-artist, made her début as Desdemona in Rossini's Otello. The night was the most brilliant hitherto of the season. A crowded and fashionable audience assembled, among whom were Her Majesty the Queen and Prince Albert. Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli was received with the greatest favour, and made a deep impression. Signor Tamberlik was as fine as ever in Otello; and the grand duet in the second act, the second between him and Signor Ronconi, produced the usual excitement.

On Thursday, May the 4th, Fidelio was revived, Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli assuming her own part of Leonora. The Queen and Prince Albert were again present, and the theatre was again filled with numbers, rank, and fashion. The performance of Beethoven's chef-d'œuvre was magnificent as far as Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli and Signor Tamberlik were concerned, but imperfect in other respects. The chorus of prisoners went worse than badly.

Tuesday, May the 9th, was a great night for the Royal Italian Opera. The Barbiere introduced Signor Mario as Conte Almaviva, and Signor Lablache made his first appearance at the Royal Italian Opera, in Doctor Bartolo, one of his most renowned impersonations. Signor Ronconi was Figaro, and Mad. Bosio, Rosina. The opera was performed à merveille, and, in addition to the above-named, Signor Tagliafico made a decided hit in Basilio, to which part he gave a new and vigorous reading. The Queen and Prince Albert honoured the entertainment with their presence.

On Thursday, May 11, Don Giovanni was given with the following cast:—Donna Anna, Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli; Elvira, Mdlle. Marai; Zerlina, Madame Bosio; Don Ottavio, Sig. Tamberlik; Don Giovanni, Signor Ronconi; Leporello, Signor Lablache; and Il Commendatore, Signor Tagliafico. Donna Anna was thoroughly suited to Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli's passionate style and powerful voice, and her performance on this occasion was an epoch in her career. Madame Bosio sang the music of Zerlina charmingly. Signor Ronconi was as usual in the character of the profligate libertine; and Signor Lablache showed no diminution of his powers in Leporello. Signor Tamberlik's splendid singing of "Il mio tesoro" was the event of the evening.

I Puritani, on Thursday, the 18th, introduced Sig. Lablache in his great part of Georgio. Signor Mario was, of course, Arturo, and Signor Ronconi, Riccardo. Madame Bosio made an interesting Elvira, and sang the music in an irreproachable manner, but wanted passion for the mad scene. The extraordinary "fact" of the evening was, that the loud duet, "Suoni la Tromba," failed to elicit an encore. The theatre was full, and the Queen and Prince Albert were present.

Verdi's Rigoletto was performed for the first time this season, on Saturday, May 20. The cast was the same as last year, and the opera, which seems to gain on the subscribers, was received with much applause.

Madame Grisi made her rentrée on Thursday, June the 1st, in Norma. Her reception was tremendous, and her singing was extolled by the whole press. It was the first of the "farewell" performances, and the theatre was crowded with a brilliant and fashionable audience. Mdlle. Marai made a graceful and interesting Adalgisa. Signor Lablache appeared as Oroveso, and thus lent additional weight and importance to the cast. Signor Tamberlik was as good as ever in Pollio. Norma was followed by the second and third acts of Masaniello. It is to be lamented that the management should have been induced, by any consideration, to sacrifice Auber's great work, by allowing it to be mutilated in so disgraceful a manner. For the last two or three seasons, a show of respect was paid to the opera by presenting it at least once entire; but this year even that compliment was denied, and on no occasion have more than two acts been given, and these only as a makeshift to fill out the evening's entertainments when the first piece was not sufficiently long. We cannot be persuaded but that Masaniello, properly managed, and properly cast, would prove a sure attraction for one or two nights every season. But, of course, since the management has thought fit to cut it down into a divertissement, its vogue, as a complete work, is annihilated. Nothing can be more melancholy than to witness the performance of these two acts of Masaniello at the Royal Italian Opera. The principal singers coming on so late and so miscircumstanced, feel disheartened; the band is careless; the chorus worse; the conductor in a hurry; the audience apathetic and fatigued. The very name of Masaniello in the bills of the Royal Italian Opera is enough to keep a real lover of music from the theatre. But, there is now, we fear, no use in complaining; the chance is gone for ever of making Auber's masterpiece a lasting attraction in the répertoire.

The next event of the season was the first appearance, for three years, of Madame Pauline Viardot-Garcia, who was welcomed, on Thursday the 8th of June, with genuine warmth, in her popular part of Fides, in the Prophète. Madame Viardot seemed in better voice than when she last sang at the Royal Italian Opera, and her performance was remarkable for energy and power. Mdlle. Marai, who appeared as Bertha, in the place of Madame Castellan, acquitted herself in a highly satisfactory manner. This young artist is making way in the estimation of the operatic public. Since Mdlle. Corbari was at the Royal Italian Opera, no comprimaria has been in such favour with the subscribers and habitués.

On Friday, June 9th, the first performance for the season of Lucrezia Borgia took place. Need we say that this was a great night for the Opera; that the performance was transcendent—with Madame Grisi and Signors Mario and Ronconi as principal interpreters, not forgetting Mdlle. Nantier Didiée, who makes so engaging a Maffeo Orsini—and that the audience were beside themselves with delight? Several of the subscribers, nevertheless, grumbled at having the Fridays included in the subscription. They argued that they did not stipulate for more than two nights in the week, and that it was an infringement of their rights to have this extra privilege thrust upon them. "Too much of one thing is good for nothing," was suggested as an axiom pertinent to the occasion.

The first performance of the Huguenots, on Saturday, June 24, filled the theatre to overflowing. The Queen and Prince Albert attended. The cast differed somewhat from that of last year. M. Zelger sustained the part of Marcel instead of Herr Formes, who had seceded to the new Royal Opera at Drury Lane; and Mdlle. Marai was substituted for Mad. Castellan in Marguerite. M. Zelger, by the way, was the original Marcel in London, when the Huguenots was first brought out at Drury Lane, in 1846, by the Belgian Company. The most remarkable fact in the performance of Saturday, June 24, was Mario's singing. He had evidently been husbanding his strength during the earlier part of the season, and sang with amazing power, especially in the famous septet, which produced a furore. The opera was finely given in most respects, and was, on the whole, one of the best we have heard.

Don Pasquale was produced for the first time at the Royal Italian Opera, on Thursday, June 29. The cast all but recalled the most glorious days of Her Majesty's Theatre. It included Madame Grisi—Norina, Ernesto—Signor Mario, Doctor Malatesta—Signor Ronconi, and Don Pasquale—Signor Lablache. The opera was delightfully performed, and Madame Grisi, who for a long time had not had an opportunity of displaying her talents in the comic line, enchanted everybody with the spirit and naïveté, buoyancy, ease, and perfect grace of her acting. Signor Lablache was as unctuous and grandiloquent as ever in the Don, and Signor Ronconi made a piquant, lively, gentlemanly, and very original Doctor Malatesta. Signor Mario renewed the old enthusiasm in "Com' è gentil," and was, of course, encored.

The next novelty was Gnecco's opera buffa, La Prova d'un Opera Seria, which was produced for the first time at the Royal Italian Opera, on Monday, July 3, after Norma. The cast included Madame Viardot, Signori Stigelli, Ronconi, and Lablache. The performance provoked much laughter, but little real interest. Three or four seasons ago the well-known duet, "Oh! guardate, che figura"—the best morceau in the opera—used to be occasionally sung with much effect by Mad. Viardot and Signor Tamburini. The rest of the music is of little worth. Madame Viardot introduced the famous rondo finale from Balfe's Maid of Artois, which Alboni used to sing so brilliantly at Her Majesty's Theatre in Don Pasquale. Signor Ronconi was highly amusing as the starved poet.

On Saturday, July 8, Otello was repeated, with Mad. Viardot as Desdemona in place of Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli, and Signor Lablache as Elmiro instead of Signor Tagliafico. Mad. Viardot was no improvement on her predecessor; on the contrary, she has neither the voice nor appearance of Mdlle. Cruvelli, and in Desdemona these are important essentials. There were many fine points, nevertheless, in the performance of Mad. Viardot, which displayed the highest intelligence throughout.

La Favorita was given for the first time this season on Thursday, July 13. The performance was unexceptionable; Mad. Grisi and Signor Mario displaying all their former excellence in Leonora and Fernando. Signor Lablache, appeared as Baldassadare, and gave great weight to the opera by his impressive acting and fine singing. Signor Bartolini, who had previously performed the part of Riccardo in I Puritani, assumed that of King Alfonso XI. Signor Bartolini has a fine voice and with study may become an artist.

On Friday morning, July 21, a second Grand Morning Concert was announced—the first having taken place on Friday, July 14, for the benefit of Mr. Benedict—in which Madame Grisi was to make her last appearance at a concert in England. Madame Grisi was taken ill, however, and could not appear. The audience were disappointed, and were indifferently prepared to put up with some alterations necessitated in the programme by Signor Mario not having arrived at the theatre in time. Bref—there was a "row," the details of which it is not necessary to recapitulate. The malcontents were only appeased by an offer of the return of their money. At this concert, Mdlle. Clauss and M. Vivier both performed, and with eminent success. Mad. Bosio created an immense senation in the cavatina from Ernani, "Ernani, involami;" and Madame Viardot was loudly applauded in the rondo finale from La Cenerentola.

We have nothing new to record up to Tuesday, August the 8th, when Rossini's Le Comte Ory was produced for the first time at the Royal Italian Opera. The intermediate nights were devoted to Don Pasquale, the Huguenots, the Prophète, Lucrezia Borgia with La Prova d' un Opera Seria, La Favorita, L'Elisir d' Amore, with the second and third acts of Masaniello, and Norma, with the second act of Il Barbiere. Mdlle. Robert, the well-known and eminent danseuse, from the Grand Opera in Paris, made her rentrée, on Tuesday, August 1st, in the divertissement in La Favorita.

On Monday last—let the day and date be specified, August 7th, 1854—Madame Grisi took her last benefit, and bid farewell for ever, to the English public. She appeared in the first act of Norma, and the first three acts of the Huguenots. The night was the most memorable in the annals of the Royal Italian Opera, and can never be forgotten by those who had the good fortune to be present. As we have spoken of this event at length in its proper place, it is only necessary to say here, that the trebling the prices of admission gave much dissatisfaction, and did not answer expectation. The house was crowded certainly in the boxes, stalls, and amphitheatre, but not the pit and gallery. The performance both of Norma and the Huguenots was magnificent, and left an impression on the audience never to be effaced.

On Tuesday, August the 8th—two days previous to the closing of the theatre—Rossini's Comte Ory was produced for the first time at this establishment. The opera is one of Rossini's most charming and brilliant, but the libretto is queer. The music was exceedingly well executed by Mesdames Bosio, Marai, and Nantier-Didiée, Signors Luchesi, Tagliafico, and M. Zelger; and the performance was received with loud applause.

The eighth season has, we believe, been prosperous on the whole. The farewell nights of Madame Grisi have been very successful, and the three weeks previous the business was excellent. The off-nights, however, as they might be termed, suffered by the great attraction of Mad. Grisi's "farewell," which, though it benefited the theatre in one respect, may be said to have injured it in another. Yet there is little doubt but that for her the season of 1854 would have been equivocally profitable. Many of the subscribers had gone to the seat of war; the opera, as we have said, lost the support of the army and navy; the omnibus boxes presented a blank appearance; the stalls yawned for their old occupants; and, besides, people were naturally more interested in the bulletins of Omar Pasha than in the melodies of Rossini, and cared more for the guns of the Moslem warriors than for the canons of Beethoven. But, then, the last nights of Grisi! Nothing could rob them of their interest. The sensation her departure created was profound and universal, and it remains to be seen how the Royal Italian Opera will get on without her. All we hope is that the directors may have the luck to hit upon her legitimate successor.

We shall have a few more last words to say next week. Meanwhile, we should state that during the past season M. Desplaces retained his post of maître-de-ballet; that Mr. Harris continued to officiate as régisseur and director of the mise-en-scène; that Mr. W. Beverley was the scene-painter as before; and that Mr. Godfrey and his military band lent their assistance in giving effect to the French grand operas. Moreover, Signor Maggioni remained as poet to the theatre, and Signor Monterasi as prompter; Mr. Alfred Mellon preserved his station as leader of the ballet, and Mr. Costa was undisturbed in his triple post of Composer, Director of the Music, and Conductor.

Miss Arabella Goddard leaves London to-day on a tour on the Continent. She will first visit Paris, and thence proceed to Germany, where it is her intention to visit some of the principal watering-places and several of the most musical cities, such as Leipsic, etc. We have little doubt that she will have a hearty reception from the German dilettanti, who know better what fine pianoforte-playing is than most people.

An Unexpected Effect.—"When I was studying the character of Fidelio at Vienna," said Mad. Schroeder Devrient, "I could not attain that which appeared to me to be the desired and natural expression at the moment when Leonora, throwing herself before her husband, holds out a pistol to the Governor, with the words, 'Kill first his wife.' I studied and studied in vain, though I did all I could to place myself mentally in the situation of Leonora. I had pictured to myself the situation, but I felt that it was incomplete without knowing why or where. Well, the evening arrived; and God, but not the audience, knows with what feelings an artist, who enters seriously into the part, dresses for the representation. The nearer the moment approached, the greater was my alarm. When it did arrive, and as I ought to have sung the ominous words and pointed the pistol at the Governor, I fell into such utter tremor at the thought of not being perfect in my character, that my whole frame trembled and I thought I should have fallen. Now, only fancy how I felt when the whole house broke forth into enthusiastic shouts of applause, and what I thought when, after the curtain fell, I was told that this moment was the most effective and powerful of my whole representation. So that which I could not attain with every effort of mind and imagination, was produced at this decisive moment by my unaffected terror and anxiety. This result, and the effect it had upon the public, taught me how to seize and comprehend the incident, and so that which at the first representation I had hit upon unconsciously, I adopted in full consciousness ever afterwards in this part."

THE PANOPTICON ORGAN.

The mechanical arrangements of the Panopticon Organ having been discussed in our former article, we proceed to consider its musical features. A tabular list of its registers was inserted in the first short notice of the organ which appeared some time since in the Musical World; but as so distant a reference may be inconvenient, we re-print it:—

9 Composition Pedals.

With the exception of the second 8-feet trumpet, the composition of the Great Organ does not differ from that of several celebrated examples from the same manufactory. The recognizable features of Mr. Hill's practice—the metal double diapason, the metal quint, the wald flute, and the three-times-three ranks of mixture—are here in their usual force. But the general effect is grander than that of any Great Organ of equal size we know. To fully realise this superiority, however, the listener must make two or three experiments as to his whereabouts in the building. The Panopticon "Hall," handsome and attractive as it unquestionably is, is anything but assistant to the effect of the organ. Not, probably, that the circularly-formed space, or the glazed dome, or the quantity of material for embellishment and exhibition, has any specially repulsive or unsympathetic quality as regards musical tone. The fault seems to consist chiefly in the depth of the recess at the end of which the organ is placed. Be this as it may, the full Great Organ tone does not penetrate the building with the voluminous power which rightly belongs to it. As we have warned him, the hearer will have to practise placing himself; but, having found the favourable spot, he will not fail to be struck with the grand and noble quality, as well as quantity, of tone to which he listens. In fact, it would be difficult to speak too highly of the mixing of the full Great Organ, in its best and only proper sense. It is as near an approach as one can easily hear to that great, wide, all-extending sound, that tone having "length, breadth, and thickness," which is the professed desire of all organ-builders, and the certain despair of so many. Difficult to imitate as may be this fine effect, there is no secret about it. Chance-work or witchcraft has no part in it. It hangs to no wonderful discovery, no much-puffed patent, no hyper-lauded invention, no quack-medicine of any kind. It results wholly from practised skill, large experience, and a determined zealous care to lose no chance of doing the very best. As one of the contributive processes, let us notice the consideration evidently bestowed on the scaling, as well as on the voicing of the flue-work of this Great Organ. The metal double diapason, while not so small as to degenerate, either in power or quality, to a dulciana, is still just so small as, while retaining its diapason quality, to operate merely in breadthening the full combination, and without having the least disposition to stand out solo-fashion even when used only with the eight feet registers. The quint, which generally proves a "teazer" to young experimenters, is also beautifully managed in these respects, and the compound stops are perfect models in their class. There is a purpose about everything connected with these mixture stops, highly deserving of praise for the care it discloses. The harmonic arrangement of their intervals is skilfully planned, and their breaks are so contrived to balance each other, as to create no patchy stops of either thinness or redundance. Their scales increase enormously, as they ascend through the upper octaves of their compass, and this increase of size is variously distributed as this or that rank is intended to act conspicuously in the general chorus. These arrangements yield a vast increase of power by the addition of each three ranks, while the force of the united nine, great as it is, is still tone, genuine tone. The whole flue-work, nine ranks of mixture and all, is grand, strong, brilliant, musical. There is not a whistle or scream in it from first to last.

Before speaking of the reeds which play so important a part in this Great Organ, we think it useful here to recur, for a moment, to the compliment we paid the "mixing" of its full combination, with the accompanying qualification, "in its best and only proper sense." It may seem strange that there could be other than one sense in which the full combination of an organ can be said to mix. It is, nevertheless, true that there exists another interpretation of the term; and as this second, and, as we think, "non-natural" sense, has acted largely in the production of bad organs, a few lines on the subject, digressive though they be, may not be without value. Among organ-players, organ-schemers, amateurs, and builders—some of the latter, too, being men who have latterly risen into considerable reputation—there exist not a small proportion of this vicious opinion. Their theory is that the reeds of an organ should "mix" with its flue-work—not in the sense in which we understand this mixing, namely, that both should march on parallel lines of importance—volume for volume, force for force—but on the principle of absorbing the former into the latter, of taming down the reeds until their individuality is lost in the surrounding mass, and they cease to act otherwise than as thickeners, or muddlers perhaps is the better term, of the general roar. This doctrine may afford a very convenient shelter for such builders—and their number is, unhappily, too large—who have not arrived at the art of making a fine reed, but is, nevertheless, one of the most pernicious of the absurdities prevalent on the subject of organ-facture. In no point are reeds so contrasted with flue-works as in quality. They are to the diapasons, principals and mixtures, as is the brazen choir to the rest of the orchestra. They must be ready to lend force, and great force too, it is true; but their characteristic office is to impart brilliant, dashing, blazing colour. Their entrance must change the whole character of tone then issuing from the instrument, or they are worthless. Like the crash of trombones in the orchestra, their appearance must bring with it not only the climax of forte, but that particular class of forte which nothing else can give. All this should appear obvious enough, and the practice of the great builders all over the world has proved the correctness of the principle. And yet there are plenty of people who still live in horrible dread of a "predominant" trumpet; and the fruit of their theory has, unfortunately, too frequent illustration. Our readers need not travel far in quest of organs—and some of much bulk and pretension—in which it is difficult to recognise the presence of the reeds, save by the uncomfortable sensation of muddle they impart to that which might be passibly clear without them. To produce the class of reeds we advocate is, undoubtedly, not easy. They must combine three qualities—namely, power, liquidity of tone, and rapid articulation—which, though not necessarily antagonistic, are difficult to unite. The thing, however, has often been done, and can be done again by those who know how. And if those who don't would condescend to exchange a little conceit for the like amount of study, we might possibly have a greater number of good organs and fewer puffs concerning them.

The reeds of the Panopticon Great Organ abundantly prove Mr. Hill's recognition of the principle for which we have been contending, as well as his ability to carry it out. When used, there can be no doubt of their presence, nor of the splendid service they render to the general volume of tone. In power and quality they are alike admirable. They have sound-boards distinct from those of the flue-work allotted them, and are thus secured from the evils of overcrowded space and paucity of wind. The upper two octaves and a half of their compass are supplied with air at a higher pressure than that used for the bass and tenor parts of the scale; this being only the second instance in which Cavaillé's "increasing pressure" system has been adopted in this country.* It is to be regretted that this system, so philosophically true in theory, and so admirable in the results worked out from it in Cavaillé's large organs, has been applied only to the reeds of the Panopticon Great Organ. It is true that, by the unusually large scales selected for the upper part of the flue-work, a considerable amount of the weakness generally found in the organ-trebles has been avoided. But the evil is only mended, not cured. No one knows better than Mr. Hill that large scales, unaccompanied by equivalently high air-pressure, yield only half their due effect. The Panopticon Great Organ trebles are better than usual, without doubt; but they still have not the power of contending, in single passages, against sustained harmony in the bass, which, firstly, is essential, especially to a concert-organ; secondly, is found in the best French instruments; and, thirdly, would have been equally displayed at the Panopticon, had the French system, there partially adopted, been wholly carried out.

The Choir Organ is, we rejoice to find, treated in this arrangement with more respect, as to its contents, than is usual; and the result fully warrants the extra care bestowed. The number and selection of the stops is highly useful, and their quality—except the wood part of the clarionet, which we cannot like—is admirable. The Swell Organ possesses no features unusual in the larger examples of Mr. Hill's practice; and it may therefore be sufficient to say of it that it is fully equal to the best of its maker's work of the kind.

The Solo Organ we think a mistake. A fourth manual, to be really of service equivalent to its extra cost, should place effects under the performer's command which could not be in any other way attained. Such, for example, as extraordinary qualities of tone not to be produced by any combination of the other manuals; and solo-stops, flutes, and reeds of various kinds, on such an amount of air-pressure that their force should penetrate when required through anything short of the fortissimo of the rest of the instrument. Except in the case of the "Grand Tuba Mirabilis"—the effect of which is magnificent—nothing of the kind is attempted; and, therefore, except as to the "Tuba" aforesaid, we do not see the gain to the performer in this fourth manual. The peculiar qualities attempted—namely, the Harmonic Flute, the Vox-Angelica, and the Vox-Humana—are certainly failures. The Harmonic Flute is of too small a scale and does not speak truly. The two ranks of the Vox-Angelica

* The first was the organ built last year by Messrs. Gray and Davison for the Glasgow City Hall.

are turned too much out of unison, so that the effect is a rapid beat, instead of a slow and but just perceptible undulation, which is the proper characteristic of this stop. The Vox-Humana has been spoilt in attempting to make its tone too good, and it has not, consequently, that peculiar thin, wailing, quality, which forms its inexpressible charm when used by a player thoroughly conversant with its effect. Furthermore, the greatest possible mistake has been committed in not inclosing this stop in a swell-box. The effect of mystery imparted by distance, the power of crescendo, and the right use of the tremulant, is one half of the secret of its success. The three stops here complained of are not for a moment comparable to those of the same kind in the Glasgow organ of Gray and Davison.

A glance at the list of stops contained in the pedal organ, coupled with Mr. Hill's notorious success in this department, renders anything on our part, beyond recording its excellence, unnecessary. It is just what a pedal organ should be;—ample in power, magnificent in quality, and, in truth, a bass to the rest of the organ, asserting its prerogative without displaying the least ambition of performing a solo to the detriment of its neighbours.

We have thus run, somewhat hastily, through the musical part of the Panopticon Organ; but there still remain peculiarities in it for remark, lessons to gather by it, texts to preach from; and of these we shall, as time serves, avail ourselves, we trust with some benefit to our readers and the "cause" of organ-building.

PROVINCIAL.

The provincial towns are beginning to sound the notes of preparation for the autumnal campaign. We find the following in the Liverpool Mail, of Saturday, August 5th :—

"During the week commencing September 4, the operas of Norma, Somnambula, Otello, Fidelio, and Ernani, will be given at the Theatre-Royal. In addition to Mesdlles. Cruvelli, Marai, and Albini, and Sigs. Tamberlik, Tagliafico, Bartolini, and Luchesi, the chorus, from the Royal Italian Opera, will be numerous. Mr. A. Harris will be stage-manager, and Mr. Jules Benedict conductor."

We extract from the same paper the following :—

"On Tuesday, a meeting of the friends and admirers of Mr. Vandenhoff was held at the Clarendon Rooms, and the following resolutions relative to his proposed retirement from the stage, were unanimously adopted :—'That this meeting, entertaining a high estimate of the private worth of John Vandenhoff, Esq., and remembering with satisfaction his long connection with the Liverpool stage, cannot help viewing his announced retirement, while still in the full possession of his mental and physical powers, as a serious loss to the national stage, of which he has been so long a distinguished ornament.'—'That this meeting would respectfully impress upon Mr. Vandenhoff the propriety of reconsidering the determination at which he has arrived; and that a deputation be appointed to wait on Mr. Vandenhoff.' Thanks were passed to the chairman, Mr. James Aikin, and the meeting separated. On Thursday, the deputation, according to appointment, waited upon Mr. Vandenhoff, at the Waterloo Hotel, when Mr. James Aikin explained the object of their visit, and read the resolutions. Mr. Vandenhoff, who was visibly affected, replied at considerable length. He added, to his acceptance of their proposal, that, as he first tasted the triumphs of his art in this town, so here he would lay down his sceptre, his truncheon, and his sword. 'Hic cestus artemque reponam.'"

The Shilling Oratorios at the Philharmonic Hall have begun. Judas Maccabæus is to be given on the 15th. Miss Stott, Miss Santley, Mr. Haigh (of Dublin), and Mr. Armstrong, are to be the principal vocalists. Mr. George Hirst will preside at the organ, and Mr. William Sudlow conduct. The chorus will number 200.—After a long interregnum, the Philharmonic Society give a concert on the evening of Friday, the 25th, for which they have engaged Mdlle. Cruvelli, Signor Tamberlik, Mdlle. Marai, Mdlle. Cotti, and Signors Tagliafico, Luchesi, Polonini, and Susini, with Mr. Benedict at the pianoforte.—On Monday, Mr. B. Webster, Madame Celeste, Miss Woolgar, Mr. Paul Bedford, and Miss Mary Keeley, from the Adelphi Theatre, in London, commence an engagement at the Theatre Royal.

The following is from the Liverpool Times of Thursday:

"The engagement of Mr. Vandenhoff at the Royal Amphitheatre terminated on Friday night, when he played Richelieu for his benefit, to a crowded audience. At the conclusion of the play, he stated that, at the request of his friends, he had postponed his farewell benefit, which would positively take place in Liverpool, and perhaps next year. On Monday Mr. Barry Sullivan commenced a fortnight's engagement. On Monday evening a part of the company of the Adelphi Theatre, London, consisting of Mr. B. Webster, Madame Celeste, Miss Woolgar, Miss Mary Keeley, Mr. Paul Bedford, and Mr. Parselle, commenced an engagement at this establishment, when two of the most recent metropolitan novelties, Two Loves and a Life, and Hopes and Fears, were produced with success. Several other pieces have been played, and to-morrow night Mr. Webster will produce, for his benefit, an almost literal translation of Molière's Tartuffe, by Mr. John Oxenford."

The same paper asserts, on its own authority, that Mr. Webster's performance of Tartuffe was "pronounced by Rachel to be the best she ever witnessed."

The following is from the Manchester Courier of Saturday:—

"The company from the Royal Italian Opera, in London, including Cruvelli, Tamberlik, Tagliafico, and others, are to perform at the Theatre Royal during six nights, commencing with Saturday, the 26th inst."

The Manchester Examiner and Times states that Mr. Davenport and Miss F. Vining appeared on Monday evening in the play of St. Marc, in which they were successful on a previous visit to Manchester. Their acting and that of Mr. Mead is praised; but the performances are not attractive in a pecuniary sense.

REVIEWS.

"The Stranger Maiden," (Das Mædchen aus dem Fremde.) Translated from the German of Schiller by J. H. Merivale, Esq. The music composed by F. Weber. Cramer, Beale, and Co.

It is not, perhaps, easy to set such a poem as Schiller's Mädchen to music, without being fragmentary. Mr. Weber has made a scena of it, and there is some clever working in more than one of the movements, and a general evidence of sound musicianship throughout. On the whole, however, it produces the effect of lengthiness; and the fragmentary character at which we have hinted has not been altogether avoided, although both the design and the employment of keys with reference to the principal (G major) is perfectly plain and consistent. We very much admire the setting of the words "Sie war nicht in dem Thal geboren," (in G minor); and in page 5, the accompaniment is happily varied, at the reprise of the first subject. The words are translated into English with great ability.

"Une Nuit à Segovia." Serenade Espagnole, Morceau Elégant pour le Pianoforte. "Au Bord du Lac." Nocturne, No. 4. de l'Ecrin des Pianistes. Par Adolphe Fumagalli. Wessel and Co.

Two very favourable examples of the species of pianoforte music for the drawing-room now most in vogue. M. Fumagalli is a young Italian pianist of rising reputation, and his compositions are already sought for. The "Nuit à Segovia" is a brilliant movement, waltz measure, in the key of D. The "Bord du Lac" is a nocturne of the ordinary modern school, by no means ungraceful, but presenting no new points to call for observation. Both pieces, though essentially ladies' pieces, are somewhat difficult. On the other hand, they are showy and effective. But why such romantic titles? Why a waltz at Segovia, and a nocturne on the banks of a lake? Why?

"Thus ever the World Around," sung by Mr. Henry Phillips. Written and composed by J. W. Thirlwall. W. Blagrove.

An honest, straightforward, hearty, unpretending English song, in the good old style, the words telling a pleasing story well, and the music consisting of a genuine tune. In the refrain, which occurs after every verse, Mr. Thirlwall should fill up the harmonies. He would thus avoid the unsatisfactory effect of the chord of the 6-4, without its 6—or, in other words, of a tonic fifth on a dominant base—and make his ballad, as Shelley says, "refutation-tight." By the way, the refrain might advantageously be set in chorus. Mr. Henry Phillips is welcome to the hint.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, August 12th, 1854.

The London Sacred Harmonic Society has survived another year, and if it has done nothing for the art, it has at least not disappointed expectation. This society may be said to hang by the thread of Mr. Surman's professional existence. Were Mr. Surman to retire from the field of harmony, like Cincinnatus from that of war and politics, it is improbable, at any future time, that like Cincinnatus he would be recalled. Cincinnatus was an expert soldier and a wise statesman. He was, moreover, a patriot, a man of simple habits and few wants, not ambitious, and caring little who ruled the helm of State, provided that he to whose care it was confided guided it for the benefit of the country, which Cincinnatus loved, in spite of its ingratitude. Cincinnatus was of the people, and content to be generalissimo, common soldier, or peaceful herd, according to whichever way his duty called him. In war he could wield the sword, in peace he could use the sickle; he could cut down legions with the one, and corn with the other, just as he was required; but if the State and the country demanded his services, there he was, ready, willing, and anxious. Excellent Cincinnatus!

Now it would hardly do to draw any comparison between Mr. Surman and Cincinnatus. Mr. Surman, indeed, is, in some respects, the very opposite of Cincinnatus. Mr. Surman will be generalissimo or nothing. He cares for the post of conductor more than for the interests of art. He hated the ingratitude of the legions he had commanded, and, as he insinuates, enlisted, trained, and perfected—he detested their ingratitude; and when the majority of the voice popular elected a new generalissimo in his place, he did not, like Cincinnatus, retire into obscurity, but, like Coriolanus, marshalled a new army, and fought against his own. The time has yet to come, however, when Mr. Surman shall have reduced the "old Romans" of the chorus to extremity, and made them sue for peace. Mr. Costa has a stouter sword than the captain who opposed the renegade Consul, and his legions are fiercer than the captain's legions; although the legions of the new Coriolanus are "more than 800," while those of the Italian captain are "less than 700"*—including the "16 double-basses."

To descend from the forum, however, and enter Exeter Hall; every one is aware that when, in 1848, Mr. Costa was appointed conductor-in-chief and in perpetuo of the Sacred Harmonic Society, Mr. Surman, disdaining to cry "peccavi" to the Autocrat of all the Orchestras, set up the London Sacred Harmonic Society, and by this title endeavoured to make it appear that the other was only a provincial body. But after all, this was no ill compliment, since the "provincials" at Norwich and Birmingham, in their performances of oratorios, are notoriously better than their brethren of the Sacred Harmonic; and, in consonance with its assumed degree, the latter, not being the "London" Sacred Harmonic, has been as notoriously better than the Society which actually affixes the metropolitan sobriquet to its name and title. Seriously, it must not be supposed that any fair comparison can be made between the lax execution of the London Sacred Harmonic Society, and the occasionally vigorous and fine performances of the other. Whereas in the latter there are too many amateurs, both in band and chorus, in the former there are three times too many; whereas the latter does not bring forward a new oratorio by a first-rate composer for want of will, the other neglects to do so for want of power; whereas the Sacred Harmonic condescends to advertisement-puffs and self laudation, in order to forward its views and interests, the London Sacred Harmonic Society beats it hollow on both these points. Out of the advertised "800," there are not perhaps 200 who can really sing or play. So great a discrepancy, indeed, between promise and accomplishment is without parallel in the annals of musical announcements. Mr. Bunn and his "blaze of triumph," the "pious virtues" of the "Nightingale," the "real Adelphi hits," and "roars of laughter" at the two burlesques of Mad. de Girardin's La Joie fait Peur, between Charing Cross and Waterloo Bridge, are positively nothing to it. In this branch of the art of musical performance, Mr. Surman may be said to have outdone the greatest masters. Had the late Mr. George Robins been instructed to put up the London Sacred Harmonic Society and its conductor to auction, with all his genius for premonitory paragraph, he could have invented nothing more pithy, more telling, and more opposed to fact than the "800" which stands at the foot of the programmes and advertisements.

From the annual report—which was produced the other day, at a general meeting in Exeter Hall—it appears that the London Sacred Harmonic Society has given no fewer than six concerts during the season, and that the money derived from the subscriptions and sale of tickets has more than defrayed the expenses. This is consoling to the members, since it ensures them another year of existence, and to the public, since six more performances may be reckoned on.

* Nearly 700.

We have no quarrel whatever with the report in general, nor with the compliments to Mr. Surman, nor with the satisfaction expressed by "all parties," nor with the matter of course "testimonial," to which we shall willingly subscribe a guinea—and for this reason alone, viz.: that we love to see amateurs assemble together for the purpose of enjoying music, either by executing it themselves or by hearing it executed. The only paragraph in the report to which we can find objection is that referring to "one of the fundamental rules of the society." The "fundamental rule" in question, is the "encouragement of native talent," which has been "carried out by the engagement of English singers for the principal parts in the various oratorios." Now, with all deference, this is sheer talk—a "tinkling cymbal," as Lord Bacon says—nothing better. The "fundamental rule" should rather be called a "base convenience." The foreign singers demand higher terms than the "natives" (frown not, reader, we are not insinuating that they are better, or even as good, in sacred oratorios), and, therefore, "native talent" is "encouraged." But, as Mr. Surman cannot give his oratorios without singers, the engagement of singers is compulsory; and it is consequently mere puffing to brag of the "encouragement of native" or any other "singers," when matters may not possibly go on without them. Mr. Gye does not "encourage" Grisi and Mario, when he engages them to sing at the Italian Opera; nor does Mr. Surman "encourage" Miss Birch and Mr. Sims Reeves by employing their services at the concerts of the London Sacred Harmonic. This species of "gammon" should be carefully avoided by our great musical societies. People are sick of being told, by speculators, who speculate for their own ends, that they are sacrificing themselves on the altar of the public welfare, when it is well known they are trying to make money and position—to gain an honest livelihood, in short, just as a baker does by baking and selling bread. These shifts and subterfuges should be left to Messrs. Hyam and Moses.

There is a better view, however, to take of the London Sacred Harmonic Society, and one which should lead to some hope of its permanent establishment. When a man has many friends, who remain firm and constant under all circumstances, in foul weather as in fair, in adversity as in prosperity, he must perforce possess certain good qualities which entitle him to their esteem and support. That is the position of Mr. Surman. After conducting the performances of the Sacred Harmonic Society for many years, and from its earliest foundation, he finds himself suddenly ejected from office by a majority of the most influential members. Nothing daunted though defeated, rejected but not dishonoured, Mr. Surman makes an appeal, which is immediately responded to by a very large number of individuals, who, as a proof of the confidence they repose in him, place means at his disposal which enable him, in an incredibly short time, to institute another society with the same object and on the same scale as that which he had originally founded, and of the direction of which he had been mulcted. It is a fact—and facts are unanswerable—that Mr. Surman still possesses his corner in Exeter Hall, still wields his bâton at the concerts of an important body of amateurs, and has succeeded in carrying them on for no less than six years, in spite of the formidable proximity of the Sacred Harmonic Society and the Autocrat of all the Orchestras. Let him, then, try to make the performances good; let him consider quality rather than number; let him work with zeal night and day; let him do his duty to the society and to the public; and he will have yet a chance to prosper. In which case, like the Turks at Silistria, he may say with genuine disdain, "Analare eshek siksin!" to his enemies the peseŵangs.

COPYRIGHT does not exist in common law. Therefore a native has, by common law, no property in the offspring of his brain; and, if not a native, of course much less a foreigner. What a man makes with his hands, according to common law, is his own; but what he makes with his head is anybody's. He may sell the first for money and save something for old age when he shall no longer be robust and active; but he cannot sell the last, and lay by a pittance for a time when the intellect is dull and the fancy quenched. This being common law, Queen Anne, or her advisers, found it uncommon lax, and made a statute to amend it, by which statute a vigorous intellect was provided for as well as an iron frame, and heads were allowed the same advantages as arms. Common law has overlooked many important matters which statute law has taken into consideration; and this is one of them. The avowed object of the act of copyright was to encourage letters and induce men of genius to exert themselves for the good of the world. It was a just and healthy object, since it is well known that a successful merchant may amass a fortune in a few years, and live like a bishop; while a successful poet often finds it hard to make a bare income, and live like a curate. But, in the framing of the statute, there was, it would appear, so much obscurity of diction, that, although the spirit was accepted, the letter was not precisely understood.

That the encouragement of literature and art cannot be virtually enforced unless a hand is held out to foreigners, who have distinguished themselves so greatly in both, will hardly be denied. Yet, from the time of Queen Anne until now, although the majority has thought otherwise and acted upon that opinion, it would seem that no privilege whatever has really been accorded to the stranger, who, whatever his moral right to the laboured produce of his brain, may be pilfered here with impunity, and that all that has been "done and enacted" by our law-makers and law-givers on the subject of copyright, has conferred no benefit on them. The recent case of Jefferys v. Boosey has shewn that the laws of copyright have been misunderstood, not merely by the foreigner, not merely by the native-born subject of Great Britain, who has dealt with the foreigner in the full conviction that what he got from him in return for what he paid him would be entitled to the same protection as is accorded to every other species of British property, but even by the dispensers of the law—the judges of the land themselves. How can this possibly be explained? how can it be excused, if explained?

The late decision in the House of Lords affects so seriously the class whose interests we have the honour to represent, that we may be pardoned for once more adverting to it. The opinion of three learned Lords, being now the law of the land, must, of course, be respected. It would be needless to point out the apparent motives of such an interpretation of an old Act, as that which their Lordships adopted, or the inconsistency of over-ruling the declared opinions of ten learned and living judges, to say nothing of the decisions of twenty years in so many various courts.

The great hardship of the new law (for we must call the present reading a new law, since it is in opposition to all acknowledged precedents), is in making the remuneration for an author's labour dependant on his presence in England at the time of the publication of his work. What advantage this can bring to ourselves, to the government, or to the author, we are at a loss to divine. The Lord Chancellor asserts that a line must always be drawn somewhere in legislating, and that this line is of necessity met on either side with contradictory absurdities. We beg, however, to insist, that when this line is drawn for the purpose of dividing right from wrong, the results, although sometimes unexpected, can never appear ridiculous—since it is admitted that the line is indispensable and was indicated by the legislature with a direct view to the ends of justice and of truth. But when a line is drawn where there should be no line at all, the purport can only be vexation and injustice. The case of Boosey v. Jeffreys, involves an example of the absurdities to which the Lord Chancellor alludes. It is evident that the Lords did not wish to give the foreigner a copyright, although they were afraid to deprive him of it entirely. Thus they set about discovering in what manner he should be compelled to support his claim to the right of selling his book in this country, and ended by the magnanimous admission that his presence in England for one day should make him an Englishman in respect to the right of literary property. "He thus," says Lord St. Leonards, "will owe a temporary allegiance to our Sovereign." What allegiance he really owes, and what respect he absolutely pays to our legislature, by coming to London to sell his book, it is out of our power, and we think beyond the ingenuity of Lord St. Leonards, to explain. He comes himself to market—that is all—and upon this vulgar incident his ability to sell his copyright depends. Quite as reasonably might the capacity of a prime minister be tested by his ability to walk twenty miles before breakfast. It may very well answer the purpose of Mrs. Beecher Stowe, if she be well enough, to come to England and sell her book, since she is likely to receive an enormous sum for it! but is it not unjust to deprive the poor and ill-paid authoress of the reward of her labour and talents on which a large family may possibly depend, either because she can afford neither the time nor the money for the journey; or, on the other hand, be prevented from undertaking it by sickness. Rather take away a foreigner's copyright altogether, than let it rest on so miserable a contingency. If some restrictions be indispensable to sound policy, would it not be sufficient to provide that the book be published in England first. Surely this would be a fairer and a better dispensation than the other.

The new law affects musicians even more than authors. A composer who may write some dozen ballads in the course of a year would hardly be able to afford time and money to travel to London with each of them, even if he lived no further than Paris or Brussels. The cost of the journeys would exceed the price of the songs; so that let his works be ever so good, others may profit by them, while he is forbidden. Is this just legislation?—is it wise legislation?

If the decision had been suggested with a view to the protection of the commercial interests of this country we should say nothing about it. But when it is remembered that those for whom we are legislating are men of genius (and there are not too many such on record) whose talents are exclusively devoted to our instruction and entertainment, we must protest against it. To revive an old and musty act of Parliament and forcibly interpret it in a spirit adverse to that of the age in which we live, and thus to deprive the man of talent, perhaps of genius, of the means by which he exists—of his bread—is as absurd as it is intolerable. To base the arguments against the poor foreign musician upon the fact of there being no copyright by common-law, is at the best paltry and mean. Of what use is the distinction between common-law and statute-law in a case like this?

It is acknowledged by statute that an author may print his own work, and this having been accepted by society with unanimous approbation for centuries, what can be the object of ferreting out some ancient Acts of Parliament to discover whether copyrights existed before the statutes were enacted. It is evident that no such thing as copyright (in its present meaning) could have existed until printing was invented, and it is, therefore, not surprising that statutes should be made to supply the want when the advantages derived from printing were made available to authors.

From this the three "legislators" go on to say that, as a copyright cannot exist except by statute, and as our statutes were only made for ourselves, a foreigner cannot be protected in his supposed literary rights—which is neither more nor less than a piece of abstract reason for a party purpose. In reading such opinions, we are inclined to believe that, in the House of Lords, the atmosphere of law is so extremely rare, that justice cannot live in it. We tremble for the future race of suitors. This country pretends to set an example to others in its boasted liberal policy, more especially in matters connected with education and enlightenment of the people; but, in the petty and lamentable case of the first of August, common sense, which spoke in favour of the poor author, was utterly extinguished by the logic, or rather sophistry, of certain noble Lords, who entertain, or profess to entertain, views of their own which are utterly at variance with those of the world at large.

P.S. It is worthy notice, by the way, that a foreigner actually loses his copyright altogether—since it is understood that he cannot possess it by common law. Now, some time ago, H.R.H. Prince Albert prosecuted a man for copying some of his water colour sketches. According to Act of Parliament, it appears that the man had a right to do so, as the Prince had made a number of copies which he had distributed without publishing. But the Judge decided that common law gave the Prince a right to print the sketches, and so the man was punished.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

On Saturday Otello was performed with the same cast as before, followed by L'Etoile. The attendance was not numerous; but the opera went off with spirit, and was on the whole finely played.

The performance on Monday night was for the benefit of Madame Grisi, who, on that occasion, took her farewell of the English stage. The last appearance of the admirable artist attracted to the theatre the rank and fashion of the metropolis, and all her admirers into the bargain, who number more than the rank and fashion; but the theatre would have been still more crowded, had it not been for the rapacity of certain speculators, who purchased a number of pit tickets, and would not be satisfied with a double profit. As much as three guineas was asked and obtained for a seat in the pit, on the day of the performance. Every lover of Grisi, however, unfortunately could not afford to subscribe to such an exorbitant demand, and many seats in the pit were, in consequence, unoccupied during the evening. It must be borne in mind that the management had made an unusual departure from old custom, by converting the entire pit into stalls. At any other time the public, doubtless, would not have put up with this infringement on their vested rights. How the renters forbore from complaining, or to what part of the house they adjourned, we cannot guess.

The reception given to Grisi on her entrance as Norma may be imagined; it cannot be described. The approach of the coming storm was felt sensibly, when the first of the solemn chords, which herald the coming of the Druid priestess, were played. Before her appearance, however, the audience could not contain themselves, and began applauding; but the grand burst, which literally shook the walls of the theatre, did not come until Grisi's majestic form appeared in view. The great artist marched slowly and gracefully down to the foot-lights, saluted by a roar of voices that would have scared a forest of Numidian lions.

But if the reception was so enthusiastic, what was the leave-taking? Here the pen falls from our hands; and we shall not even attempt to describe it. The most affecting circumstance of the evening, which was full of interesting and affecting incidents, was the feeling which seemed to seize on the audience suddenly, when, in the grand duet in the Huguenots with Mario, Grisi utters a shriek and falls senseless, as Raoul, rushing from her, leaps out of the window. As if anticipating the general sensation, a young lady, when the curtain was falling, exclaimed aloud—"It is the last of Grisi!"—a sentence which went home to every heart like a funeral bell. It were easy to say that Grisi was called for again and again; that the stage was covered with bouquets and other votive offerings every time she appeared; that the audience cheered till they were hoarse, and the ladies waved their handkerchiefs till they were tired; but the real heart-feeling, the genuine sorrow, the interchange of regrets, expressed in such an unmistakeable manner on one side, and received with so much deep gratitude on the other, cannot be said, or, if said, could only be understood by those who were present and saw and appreciated what was passing. A grander or a more imposing sight was never witnessed in a theatre, than when, on Grisi coming on alone, at the end of the performance, after twice appearing with Mario, the whole house rose simultaneously as if by general command, and remained standing for several minutes, giving vent in various ways to their emotions. Even the ladies were not content with clapping and waving their handkerchiefs, but added their voices to those of the men, and would fain have been as vociferous. When at length the great artist had withdrawn behind the green curtain which shut her out for ever from the public gaze, and one final cheer was given to speed her to fortune in the new world, a grief profound as midnight fell upon the heart, to think that the eye had looked its last upon one who for twenty years had made so many hours of existence pleasurable, and that the joy of those hours would never come again. The excitement over, Sadness enveloped the audience as in a cloak, and Silence usurped the place of Clamour.

Every subsequent opera of Rossini's produced at the Royal Italian Opera, proves that the Swan of Pesaro, notwithstanding that the répertoire contains already fourteen of his works, has been unduly neglected. The two comic operas, brought out this year for the first time at Covent Garden—Matilda di Shabran and Il Conte Ory—are such admirable specimens of Rossini's style, and such chefs d'œuvre of comic writing, that the subscribers, if they know anything of good music, and the public, if they are not spoiled by the modern school, will render it imperative on the management to bring out more operas of the gran maestro. Every work of Rossini we shall believe is worth a hearing, until we hear one that is not. Meanwhile the directors of the Royal Italian Opera are to be thanked for the production of such rare and delightful works as Matilda di Shabran and Il Conte Ory, which, we think, if played oftener, with others from the same source, cannot fail to give the taste for good music a purer and healthier tone.

The first performance of Il Conte Ory took place on Tuesday evening at the Royal Italian Opera. This opera had been promised for three years, and was only given at the eleventh hour of the third. But, for the production of such a work at any time, more especially when executed in so admirable a manner as on Tuesday night, we are bound to offer our acknowledgments on the part of those who love music for itself. We accept the two performances of Il Conte Ory—that of Tuesday, which we have seen, and that of this evening, which we hope to see—as precursors to many performances next season.

The cast of Il Conte Ory might have been more attractive. It was, nevertheless, really efficient, and must not be found fault with. The three ladies—Mesdames Bosio, Marai, and Nantier-Didiée—could hardly be exchanged for better. They all acquitted themselves to admiration; and Madame Bosio sang with no less wonderful brilliancy, facility, and grace in the Contessa, than in Matilda. Signor Luchesi is heard to great advantage in Rossini's florid music, and that of the Count requires much powers of execution, so much so that we wonder how M. Duprez, for whom the part was written, could have sung it. The buffo part, that of the Preceptor, was powerfully sustained by M. Zelger, who was the original when the opera was brought out by the French company at the St. James's Theatre; and Signor Tagliafico was excellent in that of the barytone, Rambaldo, and gave the splendid aria buffa, "In quel deserto loco," in first-rate style, and with real comic gusto.

For various reasons we have refrained from detailing the story, or analysing the music of Il Conte Ory. Enough at present to say that the plot is feeble, and that the music is ingenious, original, exhilarating, melodious, most charming and perfectly Rossinian throughout; and that, except Il Barbiere, it may be compared with any comic work of the author; and, indeed, in some respects, with any of his operas. The performance on Tuesday night gave universal satisfaction, and we have little doubt but that Il Conte Ory, next season, after a few performances, will become a favourite with the subscribers and habitués of the Royal Italian Opera.

On Thursday La Prophète was given, and to-night the season comes to an end with Il Conte Ory.

Departure of Grisi and Mario for America.—Liverpool, August 9.—The United States' mail steam-ship Baltic, Comstock commander, took her departure for New York this morning, with a large cargo, the usual mail, and a fair complement of passengers, among whom were Madame Grisi and Signor Mario, and accompanied by Mr. Hackett, of New York, with whom a professional engagement has been made, several other artistes, and a physician. Prior to their going on board, Mr. Radleigh, of the Adelphi Hotel, where they remained during their brief stay in Liverpool, received from London a rich and valuable silver epergne for Madame Grisi, and a gold ring for Signor Mario, the presents of a lady in town, as a mark of the delight she had experienced by their performance on Monday night, at the Royal Italian Opera. Madame Grisi directed the epergne to be sent to her friends in London, but Signor Mario took the ring with him. Their engagement commences at New York on the 4th of September.

Ernst has not, as was asserted, left London. He has changed his intention, and will not go abroad at present. A treaty between the celebrated violinist and the committee of one of the forthcoming great provincial festivals has been reported. The name of such an artist would add greatly to the attractions of the evening concerts.

Mr. Ferdinand Praeger has returned to London from a tour on the Rhine. The talented composer and pianist was also present at the Rotterdam Festival.

M. Vivier has arrived at Baden-Baden, where he is engaged to play at a grand concert to be given on the 12th (to-day). Mdlles. Sophie and Marie Cruvelli, Mad. Alboni, and other celebrated artists are also at Baden.

Funeral of Meyerbeer's Mother.—On the first of July the funeral of Mad. Amalia Beer, mother of the composer Meyerbeer, took place at Berlin. After the religious service was over, the procession moved on slowly towards the cemetery. The funeral car was immediately followed by a company of Jewish orphans of both sexes, and a second company of Christian orphans also of both sexes—two institutions founded and endowed by Madame Beer; next came a crowd of persons of all classes, whose numbers must have exceeded thirty thousand, according to an eye-witness; next came the carriages of the king and prince of Prussia, followed by others belonging to the ministers and nobility. The municipality of Berlin assisted in a body, preceded by its two Burgomasters; as also the most distinguished men in the arts and sciences, among whom were the Baron Humboldt and the great Hellenist, Bäckh. The convoy proceeded to the Jewish cemetery, where the mortal remains of Madame Beer were consigned to the family vault.

DRAMATIC.

STRAND.—This theatre maintains its reputation in the production of extravaganzas. The new burlesque on Faust, is likely to be as successful as its predecessor on Sardanapalus, for it fills the house nightly. The melo-drama of The Miller's Maid exhibits the acting of Miss C. Wharton in a very favourable light.

SURREY THEATRE.—Meyerbeer's Prophète was produced here in an English uniform for the first time on Monday night. Miss Romer has expended both money and pains in getting it up. The scenery was well painted—the first scene really beautiful—the dresses were showy, and the decorations splendid. Two hundred auxiliaries, if we may credit the programme, were called in to give effect to the grand procession of the coronation scene. There were several suits of real armour, and the costume of Mr. Augustus Braham, who played John of Leyden, in the scene of the installation, would not have sat amiss on Feramorz—whose dress, by the way, must have been closely copied—when laying down his simple garb of poet, he appeared before Lalla Rookh in all his glory, as King of Cashmere. It was a pity that the costumier did not make a distinction between Munster in Germany, and

> "That delightful province of the sun,
> The first of Persian lands he shines upon."

Had he been a real Munster man, he could not have committed a more downright bull, than by selecting the coronation garments of the Prophet King from the traditions of Eastern mythology. Such costume as Mr. Augustus Braham wore on Monday night as John of Leyden have we seen Mr. Sapio or Mr. Wilson strut about in, in the ball scene of Cinderella—the English version, which adheres to the fairy business. Nevertheless, the audience were highly pleased with Mr. Augustus Braham's dress, and applauded it warmly. There was never a more easily-pleased audience than that of the Surrey Theatre. If the intention of the management be good, the allowance they make is unbounded. They never trouble themselves as to whether a thing is right or wrong; if they think the will to please them is present, they seem to be as much pleased as if they were really pleased. How satisfactory to the manager who has an indifferent company, band, and chorus. Let him but show a determination to gratify his visitors, and he need not care whether he succeeds. The fact of his not succeeding will prove, in this instance, a success. The performance of the Prophète by the Surrey Company on Monday night, was received with immense applause—a proof positive that the fair manageress did all she could to deserve it. The cast included Mr. Augustus Braham (John of Leyden); Messrs. St. Albyn, Borrani, and O. Somers (the three Anabaptists); Mr. H. Corri (Count Oberthal): Miss Romer (Fides); and Miss Rebecca Isaacs (Bertha). This does not look bright on paper; but the principals generally acquitted themselves well. Mr. Augustus Braham sang well, and will act better, we have no doubt, when he becomes more familiar with his part. Miss Romer looks well, makes up well, and would sing better as Fides, if the music suited her; but she wants the low notes. Miss Rebecca Isaacs is more energetic than interesting as Bertha, whom the poet, Scribe, meant to be more interesting than energetic. Nevertheless, she sings the music like an artist, and her acting displays intelligence. Of the three Anabaptists we cannot speak favourably. We make allowance, however, for Mr. St. Albyn, who is new to the stage, and who shows raw stuff in him, out of which something may be manufactured. The band and chorus could hardly have been more inefficient. The theatre was crowded in every part, and the performance received throughout with unbounded applause. No doubt the Prophète will have a long run at the Surrey Theatre, and repay the management for the expenses entailed in its production.

FOREIGN.

PARIS—(From our own Correspondent).—The new arrangement relating to the Théâtre-Lyrique is at present a fait accompli. The privilege granting the direction of that theatre to M. Perrin is signed and sealed. The following, concerning the manner in which the Opéra-Comique and Théâtre-Lyrique will in future be carried on, appeared in the Messager des Théâtres, from the pen of M. Achille Denis, who takes an opportunity to arraign the correctness of the Musical World:

"Each of the two establishments will have a separate company and special répertoire. The Théâtre-Lyrique will not be the vassal of its elder brother; on the contrary, every effort will be made to keep up a noble spirit of emulation between the two, which cannot fail to be profitable to the art. Matters have been so arranged that the company of the Théâtre-Lyrique cannot, in any case, be diverted from their special mission. With regard to Mad. Marie Cabel, who, last year, was the means of investing the Théâtre-Lyrique with a special importance, the plan adopted by the Minister possesses the advantage of retaining for the stage of the Boulevard du Temple the lady who is its most brilliant personification. M. Emile Perrin has made all the sacrifices necessary to restore Mad. Marie Cabel to the scene of her first triumphs. In this place, however, we must point out as incorrect certain eccentric particulars relative to the engagement of Mad. Cabel, which were published by the Musical World, and quoted by us, without reserve."*

It is understood that the fact of M. Perrin's obtaining the management of the Théâtre-Lyrique will not interfere with the establishment of the Place Favart, to which he is bound to devote all his energy and attention. As a proof of this, in a few days from the present moment an important revival—Hérold's Pré-aux-Clercs, with Mdlle. Caroline Duprez in the part of Marguerite—will take place at the Opéra-Comique. This work is worthy to follow the Etoile du Nord. Among the new operas in perspective, I may mention one entitled Miss Fauvette, the subject from the fable of Le Savetier et le Financier, the music by M. Victor Massé.

The new manager of the Vaudeville is making extensive alterations in his theatre.—An agreeable trifle, Les Antipodes, by MM. Jules Barbier and Michel Carré, has been successful at the Variétés.—Three novelties were given lately at the Palais-Royal, all on the same evening: Une Majesté de dix Ans, a one-act vaudeville by M. Lefebre; La Pile de Volta, by MM. Siraudin and Larounat; and Cerisette en Prison, by M. Victor Mangin.—Le Sanglier des Ardennes, a melo-drama of the old school, by M. Emile Vanderbuck, has been well received at the Gaîté.—The Académie des Beaux Arts has appointed M. Halévy perpetual secretary in the place of M. Raoul Rochette. There is consequently a place vacant, for which M. Hector Berlioz is the most formidable competitor.—M. Danicar Philidor, a near relation to Boïeldieu, has been appointed, by the Minister of State, sub-inspector of theatres.

The Comité de l'Association des Inventeurs et Artistes Industriels, which numbers among its members a great many pianoforte-makers and manufacturers of other musical instruments, held its general annual meeting at the Conservatoire Impérial des Arts et Métiers, Baron Taylor in the chair. The meeting was numerously attended. In the report of the useful labours of the institution, the following passages gave particular satisfaction, as denoting its prosperity:—

"At the present moment, the interest of the fund created by our President, for the benefit of literature, science, and art, amounts, for dramatic artists, to 30,000 francs; for musical artists, to 15,000 francs; for painters, to 15,000 francs; for us (inventors), to 12,000 francs; and for literary men, 3,800 francs, making in all an income of 65,000 francs, that is to say, a capital of more than a million-and-a-half of francs, exclusive of nearly a million distributed in charity and pensions."

Madame Stolz is expected this week.—Madame Cerito has gone to Baden for the purpose of recruiting her health. She remains until the opening of the Grand Opéra, which is fixed for the 15th instant.—L'Etoile du Nord being temporarily withdrawn, M. Bataille has taken his congé.

ITALY.—News is at the present moment scarce. The gleanings from the Italian papers are, indeed, hardly worth translating. True, they are full of paragraphs about such and such a distinguished tenor, prima donna di cartello, or prima basso assoluto being disponibile—which means, open to an offer; but our readers are indifferent to the self-praises of these forlorn singers, and must be content with the small amount of news we can find. The Neapolitan journals give a list of artists engaged for the theatre of Palermo, which is advertised to open on the first of September: prima donna, Signora Lotti; tenors, Signori Graziani and Ruggero; Signori Fiori and Vitti, baritones; and Signori Gargia and Scheggi, basses. The same journal also states that Signor Joseph Donizetti, brother of the celebrated composer, and director of the imperial military bands in Turkey, has received from the Sultan the decoration of the Order of the Fourth Class, Mugadié. The poet Guidi has been engaged to write a libretto, the words of which will be set by a joint-stock company of musicians, the names of a few of whom are Signors Cagnoni, Coccia, Fiori, Gambini, Mabellini, Mazzucato, Nini, Pacini, Picchi, Ricci, Rossi, and Sannelli. The wording of the above in the Italian paper is not so clear as we could wish; so that we cannot say whether each of the above will contribute a bit of the music, or if the poem will be set to music entirely by each composer. The former is the more probable. At any rate, public curiosity is on tiptoe, as well it may, and we must infer that poets are rare birds in Italy, or that composers are overplentiful in the market. We find in the Musical Gazette of Florence that the début of Madame Pierdeferei, contralto, in Lucrezia Borgia, at the Cocomero, was not considered satisfactory. Another lady, who has been "starring" as an amateur at public and private concerts, also made her first appearance in the same opera, with very doubtful success; and offered another illustration of the difference between singing a cavatina or duet in a concert-room, and sustaining the weight of a principal part in an opera. Among the names of those engaged for the forthcoming season at the Pergola, we find those of Madame Crippa, prima donna; Sig. Fraschini, tenor; Sig. Baraldi, barytone; and Sig. Bonazzi, basso profondo. In the musical journal Il Pirata, we are told the new opera, La Duchessa de la Valiéra by Sig. Petrocini, has been very successful at Forli; the composer was recalled several times. The prima donna, Signora Arrigotti, and the tenor, Colivi, highly distinguished themselves. At the Carcano, Milan, the new opera, Ida di Danimarca, by Sig. Rieschi, increases in public favour. Several of the cabalette in this opera are said to end in the fifth of the key instead of returning to the tonic. The Milan papers speak very highly of a Madame Marcolini, both as actress and singer. At Brescia, Verdi's Il Trovatore has been successful. This opera seems to be going the round of the Italian theatres. At Udine it has been well received, the principal parts being filled by Signore Corsi and Piccolomini, Signori Baucardé, Cresci and Pons.

VIENNA.—(From our own correspondent.)—At the Imperial Opera-house, Fräulein Tietjens has been successful as Rezia in Weber's Oberon. She was greatly applauded in the air, "Ocean, du Ungeheuer."—Herr Metzger lately gave a concert, in the garden and rooms of the Grosser Zeisig, half the net receipts being given to the poor of the Spitlberg suburbs.

BERLIN.—(From our own correspondent.)—There is a report here that the mother of Henriette Sontag, at present residing in Dresden, has not yet received, from Mexico, any letter announcing her daughter's decease. M. Meyerbeer has gone to Ischl, to take the waters for the benefit of his health. He will proceed thence to Vienna, to superintend the rehearsals of his opera, L'Etoile du Nord.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.—Mad. Stradiot-Mende has appeared as Romeo, in I Montecchi e Capuletti, and Agathe, in Der Freischütz, and sustained the good impression she had already produced in Fidelio. Herr von Flotow's Indra will shortly be produced with Fräulein Pauline Marx in the principal character. This young lady has proved an attraction. Fräulein Johanna Wagner has created a great sensation by her singing and acting as Fides in Der Prophet.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—Mad. de la Grange has commenced a short engagement as Rosine, in The Barber of Seville.

HAMBURGH.—The directors of the United Theatres have summoned the members by a circular, and proposed that they shall play until the first of May, 1855, under the present management, on the sharing principle, and, at the same time, assume the responsibility of the debts of the enterprise. In case the artists refuse to enter on this arrangement, the management announces the intention of declaring itself bankrupt. The present deficit is said to amount to 41,200 thalers. This unexpected state of things is said to have been considerably accelerated by the excessive heat during the last few weeks. The companies include altogether more than 300 persons.

MUNICH.—In obedience to the commands of his Majesty the King, the dramatic "stars," engaged on the occasion of the Great Exhibition here, the régisseurs, with some other of the superior employés of the theatre, and the representatives of the press, were invited on the 24th of last month to a grand dinner in the green-room of the Hoftheater. About six o'clock his Majesty unexpectedly made his appearance, and stopped about an hour. Before leaving, the artistic monarch drank "Prosperity to the Dramatic Art of Germany."—On the 22nd ult., a grand military concert, in honour of the opening of the Exhibition, took place at Neuberghausen. The following was the programme:—1. Kriegs-Priester march from Athalie, by Mendelssohn; 2. Finale of the first act of Santa-Chiara, by the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha; 3. The overture to Benvenuto Cellini, by Herr Franz Lachner; 4. Symphony in C major, by Mozart; 5. Overture to Santa-Chiara, by the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha; 6. Kriegerische Jubel-Fantaisie, by Lindpaintner; 7. Duet, "Fremd steh' ich in dem fremden Lande," Santa Chiara, by H. R. H. the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha; 8. Jagd-Sinfonie, by Méhul; 9. Overture to the Etoile du Nord, by M. Meyerber, and, to conclude, Lagerleben ("Camp-life"), a grand military pot-pourri, including the Schlacht bei Waterloo, by C. M. von Weber, and the Schlacht bei Vittoria, by L. von Beethoven. Among other musical notabilities present were Spohr, Lindpaintner, Moschelles, Taubert, Gade, and the brothers Wieniawski. There are one hundred and seven pianos in the exhibition, sent by the principal German makers.

MAD. CHÉRI, mother of Mad. Rose Chéri and Mad. Lesueur, died on Saturday, the 29th of July. She was buried on the following Monday, her funeral being attended by a great many artists from the Gymnase, which establishment was closed that evening, as a mark of respect for the deceased.

HANOVER.—The King has published a collection of original songs, written to words by Schiller, Heine, etc. It is dedicated by His Majesty to the Queen.

GRATZ.—Herr Theodor Formes has been successful as George Brown in Die Weisse Frau, and Eleazar in Die Jüdin.

BARCELONA.—Signora Angri has become the wife of Don Pedro Avella, director of the Philharmonic Society here.

MALAGA.—An Italian opera company, consisting of sixty-eight members, has arrived. They are engaged for two years at Bahia, in the Brazils, and will give a series of representations previous to embarking.

MADRID.—M. Sivori has left this city and proceeded to Seville, where, in spite of the heat, he gave four concerts in eight days. After the second, the Santa Cecilia Society serenaded him by torch-light. At his last, the enthusiasm of the audience was still greater. The fantasia on Lucia and the Carnaval de Madrid were encored. A rich amateur presented Sig. Sivori with a gold crown, and the room was inundated with copies of complimentary verses. M. Sivori intends to visit Cadiz, Xeres, Malaga, Valencia, and Gibraltar.—(Spanish Papers.—ED.)

LISBON.—A young Spanish singer, pupil of the Madrid Conservatory, Donna Amalia Anglis Fortuni, has produced a highly favourable impression here. (Mdlle. Fortuni was in London recently and sang at the concert of Mad. Puzzi.—ED.)

ANECDOTES OF ACTORS.—It is the opinion of some that theatrical performers should accustom themselves to assume a kind of dignity and decorum in private life, in order to render their conduct on the stage in the representation of great personages more easy and natural. Mossop carried this to a ridiculous extent, and adopted an inflated manner on the most trivial occasion. "Woman!" said he to an unfortunate actress, who in vain assailed him for her arrears of salary, "begone from my presence, and trouble us no longer!" One night, when he returned home to his lodgings, after performing Richard III., he flew into a violent passion with his servant, who appeared before him with a small candle, and exclaimed, "Fellow, is that wretched rushlight fit to light his majesty to bed?" A French audience at a theatre is much more apt to be subdued by the intensity of an actor than an English one. On one occasion, when Dumesnil, as Merope, was proceeding to order the death of Egiste, not knowing who he was, a voice from the pit, almost inarticulate with sobs, cried out, "Don't kill him, he is your own son!" During a performance of Britannicus, a grenadier posted on the stage, after the custom of the time, was so intent upon the action of the play, and so indignant at the treachery of Narcissus, that he presented his musket at the actor, and would have shot him dead, had he not been prevented. Preville was once going on as Larissole, in the Mercure Galant, when the sentry placed in the wing, taking him actually for a drunken soldier, stopped him, and exclaimed, "For heaven's sake, comrade, don't appear in that state, or I shall be sent to the black hole!"

THE FESTIVAL AT ROTTERDAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

THE concert of the second day was devoted to Haydn's Seasons, a work called again by the leader of the "School for the Future," "der überstandene Zeitpunkt"; which opinion, however, is not so unusual as it might seem, since we ourselves have at different time been astonished at hearing it expressed by one of the greatest English musicians, who does not except even the Creation from that—to our minds—inconceivably erroneous judgment. Mdlle. Ney and Messrs. Roger, Pischek, and Formes took the solo parts, the latter two gentlemen dividing the part of Simon; Pischek sang in the first part, and Formes in the second. We plead, on starting, our great veneration for the genius of Haydn, and, not having heard "the Seasons" for some time, were delighted at the freshness and charming simplicity of the ideas, and the mastery with which they were treated, the wonderfully varied scoring, containing so-called dramatic effects of the greatest novelty; and could not help exclaiming repeatedly, when we noticed that some of the most modern composers had been borrowing. To sum up—we were in a high state of enjoyment, at the truly German depth of feeling, the genuine, religious vein pervading the whole work, varied by all the homely emotions of country life; by the seriousness of the old Simon philosophizing about the nothingness of our present life, without the hope of a future, the playful love between Lucas and Hanndieu, the Chase &c., in fact by the whole work, which seemed to us as evergreen as eternal truth. The execution was much superior to that of Handel's oratorio, and Mdlle. Ney came out very advantageously, displaying much facility of execution and naïve interpretation suiting the part. We noticed, however, occasionally an inclination to straining the voice, which made her sing too high. How much the great fatigue of the every day rehearsals and performances might be pleaded in extenuation, I do not pretend to settle. M. Roger gave some of the music allotted to him with much sweetness, but we cannot say that he ever came up to what one might have expected from him, considering his reputation. Several morceaux were encored, and it was plainly perceivable that Haydn's Seasons spoke more directly to the audience than Handel's Israel on the previous day. Messrs. Pischek and Formes gave great satisfaction, and the chorus of the "Chase" was boisterously encored. After the concert there was a fête at the Officers' Society, in the park. Military music, illumination, and general merriment, finished the second day of the Rotterdam Festival.

MUSIC AT PADUA.

(Extract from a private Letter.)

PADUA, August 3rd.—"I read in your paper that you mention the fact of your countryman, Mr. Charles Braham, being at Padua, but, strange to say, the Musical World always goes round by Vercelli before we get it here. Mr. Charles Braham has been treated most shamefully. The following is a true account of the whole transaction. The manager not having paid the singers, two quarters were due to Mr. Braham and Signor Selva the basso. These gentlemen consequently signified their intention of not appearing again until they received their money. They were summoned to rehearsal, however, and, on their refusal to go, were called before the Commissary of Police. 'Will you sing or not?' exclaimed the official. 'Certainly not,' was the answer. 'Then you must consider yourselves both under arrest, and attend here again to-morrow at nine o'clock.'

"The next day, at the appointed hour, Mr. Charles Braham and Signor Selva repaired to the police-office, and were thus apostrophized by the mighty functionary:—'Your obstinacy is so great, that I look upon it as a political affair, and shall act in consequence.' He then pulled the bell violently and ordered Signor Selva into arrest. The unfortunate basso was immediately stripped of all his valuables, his watch, money, and trinkets, and marched off to the common jail. Mr. Charles Braham, however, was allowed to depart unmolested. An hour after his arrest, Signor Selva, getting tired of being in prison, consented to yield to the pressure from without. He repaired with Mr. Braham to the theatre, where they were informed that they must both appear in Robert le Diable on the following night—Mr. Braham in the part of Roberto, and Signor Selva in that of Bertram.

"Now the rehearsals had been suspended for three days, not one of the singers was perfect in his part, the music had never been tried by the orchestra, and the chorus was miserably deficient. On Sunday, the 31st of July, nevertheless, the opera was produced, and, as you may well imagine, never was 'confusion worse confounded.' In the first act, Mad. Alaïmo was hissed in her romanza; Mr. Charles Braham got some applause in the brindisi; but the public were so enraged at the horrible bungling in the machinery and decorations, and at the dreadful singing of the chorus, after the drinking song, that they would not be satisfied with anything. At last the curtain fell on a scene of most indescribable confusion. The next day, Mad. Alaïmo sent to Mr. C. Braham to inform him that he had better not play again in Roberto, as there was a party got up to hiss him. He, however, very properly paid no attention to this intimation, and went to the theatre as usual, where the lady had shrewdly sent to say that Mr. Braham was ill and could not play. His appearance, however, in good health, soon set matters right. The fact is, that Mad. Alaïmo was quite disgusted with the first night's performance, and wanted to play in Verdi's Il Trovatore; Roberto, however, was played the same evening, and Mr. C. Braham was not hissed, but the prima donna was; and, on the whole, the opera went better.

"On the following night, Mad. Alaïmo refused to play in Roberto, and Il Trovatore was substituted. She was again hissed in the first act, which infuriated her to such a degree that she sent for the President, Marquis Salvatico, and positively declared that she would not play again in Roberto. He insisted that she must; she called him 'an idiot,' 'an ass,' 'a thief;' to which he coolly replied that she was 'a woman of no education,' upon this, Mad. Alaïmo seized a candlestick, and the Marquis, to avoid a catastrophe, rushed out of the room. The second act of the Trovatore now went on, Mad. Alaïmo was again hissed, and rushed crying off the stage.

"It is evident that had Mr. C. Braham refused to sing on the second night of Roberto, he would have had all the blame thrown on his shoulders. If the opera did not succeed, it was certainly no fault of his; on the contrary, he did what he could to save it. Medea, which gains in public estimation, is to be repeated to-night, and I have no doubt Mr. C. Braham, who sings the tenor part, will be received as usual by the public—unless, indeed, a cabal be got up against him."

GIULIA GRISI.

Giulietta made her début at Milan in an opera called Il Corsaro, the music by the well-known composer Pacini, who enjoyed a greater reputation then than he does now. The part allotted to our heroine was that of Medora; and the libretto, as may be guessed, was founded on Lord Byron's poem of The Corsair. The book and the music, though both are stated to have been tolerably good, were not, however, the real sources of attraction. All expectation was concentred in the young and beautiful prima donna, about whom so much had been said that the public were too eager to see and hear her to waste a thought on anything else. Giulietta's first appearance at once established her triumph. She conquered the audience with a look; and it was more than a quarter of an hour before she could manage to utter a note—so long, loud, and obstinate was the applause. The beauty of her person and the graceful simplicity of her costume won every heart: nor was the illusion dispelled when she began to sing; on the contrary, it was made still stronger; the enthusiasm was redoubled, and the applause began again with even greater vehemence than before. It was many a year since such a scene of excitement had been witnessed at the Scala. Of the special merits of Pacini's opera no record has been left; nor can any further particulars be gathered about the performance of this eventful evening, which may be said to have constituted the first great step in Giulia Grisi's career. Something that passed behind the scenes, nevertheless, has been carefully preserved, and is not without interest.

Vincenzo Bellini, being, as we have stated, at Milan, and anxiously engaged in the composition of his new opera of Norma, went of course to hear the promising débutante. What he thought of Giulietta may be surmised from the fact of his paying her a visit in her dressing-room immediately after the first act of the opera. After congratulating her warmly on her success, and kissing her two hands and her forehead with true artistic rapture, he exclaimed in accents of genuine satisfaction, "Bellissima voce, bellissima donzella—ben-trovata!" Full of his own inspirations, nevertheless, Bellini soon left off complimenting the charming débutante, to talk of his yet unfinished opera. "I have a part for you—cara Giulietta!—and such a part! Young, beautiful, confiding, loving, passionate, unfortunate—all, all indeed, that you could desire. She sings only of love; and you—carissima Giulietta!—should sing of nothing else but love. As Dante says, divinamente—

'Perduto e tutto il tempo
Ch' in amar' non si spende!'

"You shall have Adalgisa—You shall be Adalgisa—my Adalgisa—my dream. It is the best part. Pasta will have the other. She is just fitted for the priestess, sublime though erring, who follows the dictates of her nature, in spite of the restrictions of the stony and bloodless, the bigoted, heartless, and superstitious Druids. A Roman soldier loves and wins her, although, as I tell you, she is a priestess—nay, the chief of the priestesses—the real daughter of the High Priest, Oroveso, which nobody knows except the poet. You also have a lover ——"

"What is he?—who is he?"—hurriedly asked Giulietta.

"The same—Pollio—he who loves Norma."

"How can that be?"

"I will tell you—picciola Giulietta—I will tell you. You must learn that Pollio betrays Norma. Pollio has a susceptible heart. He sees Adalgisa, the beautiful, the young—you, in short, carissima! He sees you! And—can you not excuse him?—he forgets Norma-Pasta, and falls in love with Adalgisa-Giulietta Is it not natural? Was it not inevitable! Well—you respond to his love"——

"But I won't!" said Giulietta eagerly. "I will have a lover to myself, or not at all."

"Pazienza! pazienza!" said Bellini. "Your conduct—that is Adalgisa's—is charming. She knows nothing about Norma's love for Pollio, and, of course, nothing about the children."—"What!" said Grisi—"she has got children, then—and a priestess! Fi donc!" "I will explain," answered Bellini, "These children are indispensable, as you shall see. I have written an agitato—such a melody! so imploring, so passionate! which is all about the children. If there were no children this would be lost. Think of that!" And Bellini began singing the beautiful phrase of the last act, where Norma, on her knees entreats Oroveso to take care of her little ones!

"And then," continued Bellini, "there is a duet for you and Norma, which will make a furore—and a grand scene in which Pasta is going to kill the children, but does not. You must know, also, that you are the friend and confidant of Norma; and that, in consequence of your confessing to her the secret of your attachment to Pollio, she finds out the treachery and falsehood of her seducer. But you shall hear all about it to-morrow, and—you must know, by the way, that Norma and Pollio are both burnt on the pile at the end, according to the barbarous laws of the Druids. I am only sorry I cannot have Oroveso burnt with them, but Romani won't. Addio, carissima!"

"I will not accept a false lover!" cried Grisi, as Bellini left the room, "and especially if he is burnt at the end, because then Norma will have it all her own way." "Then," said Bellini, "you and Oroveso shall be burnt with them!" And so he went away, laughing immoderately, and little dreaming—poor fellow!—that he was so soon to quit the world he loved so much.

Bellini was true to his word. The next day he was at Giulietta's lodgings; and the day after, and the day after that—and so on till the opera was entirely finished, and our heroine not only satisfied, but in love with her part. And Bellini—he, too, was in love, desperately in love—we need scarcely say with whom.

Donzelli was then the tenore primo at the Scala, and used to come every day to rehearsal with Giulietta and Bellini. Pollio, so despised and rejected of modern tenors—until Tamberlik, the Roman, showed how much could really be done with it, by reviving the memory of Donzelli himself—was considered a fine part. And so it is, and ought to be. Donzelli took great pains; and Bellini would jump up from his seat at the piano, after the duet—"Va crudele, e al Dio spietato—offri in dote il sangue mio"—and embrace both the tenor and soprano—Donzelli and Giulietta—but especially Giulietta; she was so lovely, and Bellini so grateful! Pasta never came to rehearsals except at the theatre; but at the last rehearsal on the stage of the Scala, the great lyric tragedian took much notice of Giulietta, and complimented her both on her voice and on her conception of the part of Adalgisa, frequently turning to Bellini and the orchestra, and exclaiming—"Benissima!—bene—très bien—pas mal, la piccola!"—beginning always with the superlative, and ending with the positive, (like the Major in Theodore Hook's novel of Maxwell), and mingling the French and Italian, as was her constant habit. This encouragement from "la Pasta," was milk and honey to our heroine, who went home after the rehearsal intoxicated with delight. Bellini was there before her, as usual. "La Pasta è contenta!" he exclaimed, with genial pleasure, as Giulietta laid her bonnet on the table—"Allons—allons—le duo—non, le premier recitatif—non, le duo!" and down he sat to the pianoforte, revelling in the beauty of his own imagined melodies. Though modest and retiring, and at times even bashful, Bellini, when with persons whom he liked and in whose friendship he had confidence, and especially with one, whom, like Giulietta Grisi, he found sympática, would give way to what some might regard as egotism and vanity—praising himself without stint. But it was not egotism; it was merely a love of the business in which he was engaged. His heart was full of music; but alas! he knew no other music than his own—or, with his genius, he might have been much more than Bellini, and Norma as imperishable as it is fascinating. "How," said Giulietta, the night before the first performance—"how I should love"—emphasising the word—"how I should love, love, love to play Norma." "Oibô!" retorted Bellini—"wait twenty years, and then we shall see. Do you know that it is the grandest—the very grandest part in lyric tragedy, and that it requires person, voice, experience, and genius—genius," repeating the word with a kind of scream. Giulietta burst into tears and left the room.

It was on the fête of Sto. Stefano, January 1st, 1832, that the opera of Norma was first performed. The Scala was crowded to overflowing, and presented an unusually brilliant appearance. The greatest anticipations had been raised about the music. Bellini was immensely popular, and this new work was to be his chef-d'œuvre. Then, there was "la sublima Pasta," whose Druidess would, it was said, eclipse her Medea—Donzelli, a universal favourite, with a cabaletta that was to bring the house down—and, last not least, the young and promising Giulietta, already an idol of the public. So that altogether it was to be a night of intense and unusual interest, a worthy celebration of the fête of Santo Stefano. But l'homme propose et Dieu dispose. The first performance of Norma was anything but a triumph; and in more than one instance it was nearly proving a failure. There was no applause either for the opening scene of the druids, or for the air of Pollio. The boasted cabaletta, indeed, was pronounced common-place; and Donzelli's stentorian lungs were stretched in vain to make a "hit" of it. Still, more strange to relate, the now celebrated address to the moon, the graceful "Casta Diva," made no impression; while the cabaletta (which, by the way, Pasta could never sing well), was found as ordinary as the previous one for the tenor. Poor Bellini, who was at the piano in the orchestra, looked as pale as a ghost, and trembled with nervousness. Still he had confidence in the beauty of his work, and in the ultimate appreciation of the audience; and kept saying to himself, or to one or two of the band who were near him—"A pocô—a pocô." The first applause was awarded to the recitative, "Sgombra è la sacra selva," which serves Adalgisa for intrata. Whether it was simply the merit of this really charming bit of melody, or the quietly expressive manner in which it was sung, or the peculiar tones of Giulietta's voice which seemed to fall upon the ear like some old memory of childhood awakening a new feeling of youth, or the extreme beauty of her appearance—and it was owned that she had never looked so beautiful—or one and all separate and combined, we are unable to say; but the audience, taken by surprise, were thoroughly captivated, and broke out into loud and long-continued applause. This, however, was the oasis in the desert, so far as the first act was concerned. The rest, even to the trio finale, where Norma confronts Pollio with his guilt, although Pasta acted superbly, and Donzelli displayed even more than his wonted energy, went off flatly; and the curtain fell without a hand of applause. A fiasco was regarded as certain, by Pasta and the others; and even the impresário, Merelli, was in despair. Still Bellini said, "A pocô—a pocô."

The second act went off much like the first until the duet between Norma and Adalgisa, the well-known "Deh! con te." The first movement of this pleased; and the "bravos" were many; but the cabaletta created a positive furore, and the house shook with the applause. When it had been sung twice through, with the same success, Pasta turned to Grisi, and, in a contemptuous tone, exclaimed, "Ecco i conoscitóri!" The sneer of the great lyric tragedian was quite justified, since the cabaletta of the duet in question is undoubtedly the weakest and most commonplace in the whole opera. It, however, decided the success of Norma. From that point to the end all was couleur de rose. Pasta's transcendant acting, Donzelli's vigorous singing, and Bellini's expressive music, were all appreciated, and at the conclusion the composer was called forward several times and cheered. Norma was performed forty times during the carnival, drew great crowds to the theatre, and was more and more liked on every occasion. Bellini's fame was sealed, and his satisfaction complete. Giulietta Grisi was equally content, for it was the acting of Pasta that inspired her with a determination to be a tragedian also. Not a look or a movement of the grand artist was lost upon her; and conscious of her own innate power and indomitable will, our heroine whispered to Bellini, one night behind the scenes, "I will play Norma, and in less than twenty years—in spite of you!" Bellini smiled incredulously, patted her on the head, and said, "A pocô—a pocô."

GIULIA GRISI.

SIR,—Having read the beginning of your interesting notice of Mad. Giulia Grisi, I beg to say that I am "the first maestro" therein mentioned of the name of Celli who gave her lessons at Bologna. I did so for about the space of three months; it was with much regret that I was obliged to discontinue my instructions to her, but I was obliged to go to Rome to compose the opera of the Amalia e Palmer.

In Mademoiselle Grisi's second season at Florence, she appeared as the prima donna in my opera of L'Esi, which music she sang so excessively well that I myself recommended her to Merelli, then director of La Scala at Milan, advising him to engage her, which in fact he did, and which Madame Grisi herself can testify to. At that period, and when I met her subsequently at Leghorn, I again gave her a few lessons.

I shall be most happy if these few remarks will be of any use to you, and remain, sir, your very obliged servant,

FILIPPO CELLI.

EPITOMÉ OF THE CONTROVERSY

CONCERNING THE AUTHENTICITY AND HISTORICAL ORIGIN OF MOZART'S "REQUIEM."

If, in publishing this letter, Herr Weber had merely desired to bring a forgotten but indisputable fact again into notice, and to add such a commentary as was to be expected from a learned professor of music and an author like himself, we should have had nothing to object to—or, rather, we should have thanked—him. No one could have advocated the rights of Mozart with more spirit, talent, information, and logic, than Herr Weber. But this was not his object. He pursued the same course as Jean Jacques Rousseau, in the case of the prize question proposed by the Academy of Dijon, and adopted the paradox. Süssmayer's letter excited in him suspicions of a very different nature from those it should have raised in the mind of an unprejudiced person. It served him as a text and starting-point whence to attack the Requiem itself, and to assign almost the whole of it to Süssmayer. I will quote Herr Weber's own words:—

"Of all the works of our great Mozart hardly one enjoys such general respect and adoration as the Requiem. The fact, however, is very singular, and indeed wonderful, since this very work, without a doubt, is his least perfect, least complete—in short, a work which can scarcely be called Mozart's at all."

When a clever man ventures to promulgate such ideas as these, he endeavours to support them by some kind of proof; since by these means alone can we distinguish a reasonable being from a madman. Herr Weber commences with an entirely arbitrary assumption, in direct contradiction to the contents of Süssmayer's letter, and immediately disproved by circumstantial evidence. He presumes that Süssmayer composed the whole work from fragments, sketches, and notes—from scraps of paper accidentally found among Mozart's manuscripts, after his death, and unconditionally abandoned by his widow to the caprice of the arranger. This was, in fact, to assail, at one blow, the authenticity of the Requiem in its integrity, and the story concerning its historical origin. An hypothesis founded on nothing would not have justified the audacity of the attack. Herr Weber felt this thoroughly, and, in the absence of material proof, pursued a course which, though in itself excellent, could only guide such persons to the truth as are prepared to seek it without prejudice. He subjected the various parts of the Requiem to a critical investigation. But how did the man to whom we owe so many good articles on music, so many luminous and profound essays on the theoretical and practical branches of the art, conduct his investigation? My readers shall judge for themselves; but I must beg those who are unacquainted with the writings of Herr Weber, not to estimate him by the specimens I am about to give, if they have no other means of obtaining a knowledge of his style and of his capacity as a critic. It would be just as easy to form a true idea of the light of the sun during a total eclipse. Herr Weber thus tests the "Kyrie:"—

"I should feel hurt, for instance, at being obliged to believe it was Mozart who could have burdened the vocal parts with such gurglings as the following." (Here comes a quotation from the counter-theme of the fugue). "Any singer and connoisseur would cry death and murder if he found such wild gorgheggi" (twitterings, chirpings) "in the 'Kyrie' of a composer whose name inspired less respect than Mozart's—Rossini, for instance."

Of the "Tuba mirum," he says:—

"Here again, after the trombone solo, I should give Süssmayer the credit of having emasculated the terrible picture of the judgment of the quick and the dead by means of such melodies as these." (He here quotes the instrumental music, beginning with the eighth bar of the 'Tuba mirum'). "And of having disfigured a painting so awful and severe in its outlines by harmonies so soft and enervating."

This censure is applied especially to the last nine bars, which are quoted by the critic.

"Good heavens! what would be said if any one but Mozart had composed this rubbish? Such, however, are the lovers of music, at the present day; they listen in a concert-room as in a church, and are lost in enchantment at graceful, melting tones, accompanying words of horror (which, however, we will for their sake suppose they do not understand). Mozart would gnash his teeth and turn in his grave, could he but know in what a manner his grand and deep conception has been developed, and that it should be ascribed to him."

We must always be just, especially to our opponents. I admit, therefore, that the conclusion—I mean the solo for soprano, and the vocal quartet of the "Tuba mirum," is the least sacred, and, indeed the weakest part of the Requiem, although the entire piece is by Mozart. Herr Weber now comes to the "Confutatis," of which he rejects both the text and the music.

"Just as little can I prevail upon myself to attribute to our Mozart the form and style in which this part of the text is treated, and in which the whole cheat is exposed con amore. First, there is the wild badgering unison of the mass of stringed instruments, as if to urge on the eternal judge to hurl those unhappy sinners into the lowest depths, in order afterwards to summon him, the singer, to a seat among the blessed ('Voca me cum benedictis'), which last phrase the flutes,* here employed, and which make so singular and honied a contrast, express but too truly, flatteringly, and cringingly."

I would ask whether imagination can conceive a stronger contrast than the eternal torments of the Damned to the eternal felicity of the Elect? In this place, Herr Weber reproaches Mozart—in a manner which every Christian reader will appreciate—with having reproduced the words of the "Confutatis," while, but a short time before, he had rated him for not reproducing the words of the "Tuba mirum." How was Mozart to act, in order to obtain the approbation of Herr Weber?

"In the same manner, I have great pleasure in giving Süssmayer the credit of having worked out the 'Quam olim' to a perfectly-developed fugue, as it is flatteringly called, and of employing it, not once, but twice. No one was less likely than Mozart to be unnecessarily prolix and diffuse, especially in the instance of subordinate ideas, or actually to forget the rule which tells us that it is only the principal features of the poem which can properly be worked into regular fugues."

Süssmayer wrote the "Quam olim!" We have only to give him the "Recordare," and we make of him a man who surpassed Händel, Bach, and, very nearly, Mozart himself. In addition to this, it appears very remarkable that Herr Weber should treat, as of merely secondary importance, the text—"Quam olim Abrahami et semini ejus promisisti"—the promises, in fact, which God made to Abraham, and which serve as the basis of the Old and New Testaments—promises with which even Islamism endeavours to connect its doctrines, and whence spring the three principal creeds that divide the world. Mozart had every right to develope the "Quam olim" as a fugue, as his predecessors had before him, in strict conformity to the very rule that Herr Weber says he had violated. He was also quite justified in introducing the same fugue twice, instead of once. No musician will ask why. Even the "Hostias" is not spared in the criticism of Herr Weber, who blames the frequent change from forte to piano, no less than the unmeaning melody, progressing by a series of irregular leaps from the upper to the lower, and from the lower to the upper notes. The blame falls, as a matter of course, and as it does in all the other instances, on the shoulders of the too fortunate Süssmayer. Here, again, he says: "Just as little can I prevail," etc.

I have not noticed all Herr Weber's objections, because they have been answered by another person who will shortly be mentioned, and who possessed far better sources of information than myself. I have confined myself to a few remarks, to which the individual of whom I speak made no allusion.

* There is not a flute introduced in the whole of the Requiem. This was pointed out to Herr Weber, who replied that his statement was a typographical error. We are inclined to think so.

It might have been supposed that, after attacking those pieces of the Requiem which no one had previously denied to be Mozart's, Herr Weber would redouble the force of his blows on arriving at those which Süssmayer claims as his own, and which, on the whole, are the weakest things in the work, if not in the principal ideas, at least in harmony and style. Far from doing this, however, Herr Weber actually finds nothing to object to in the "Sanctus," "Benedictus," and "Agnus;" in fact, he amuses himself by discovering flowers in these which never grew in Süssmayer's garden. On this subject he says:—

"I would only call attention to the beginning of the 'Sanctus,' which might almost be declared quite worthy of the Most High—to the introduction of the bass, with the C sharp which produces so indescribable an effect at the 'Pleni,' and then to the wonderfully beautiful, childishly innocent, and yet noble and elevated 'Benedictus.'"*

It is impossible to deny the ingenuity displayed by Herr Weber in his tactics. By praising those pieces of which a greater or lesser part indisputably belongs to Süssmayer, he assumes an appearance of impartiality, and thus renders the pieces he has previously censured, and which are entirely Mozart's, still more suspicious. Are we not given clearly to understand, by this blame on the one hand and praise on the other, that the first three pieces of the Requiem suffered far greater mutilations in the process of completion than the last three?

In the course of his critical investigation, Herr Weber incidentally touches upon the question of the historical origin of the Requiem, which strikes him as being enveloped in a sort of misty and romantic darkness. He ends by regretting that the original draughts or sketches of Mozart, as he terms them, should have been lost, and appeals to all the lovers of art who read his paper, to assist him in discovering them, offering, in case the search should be attended with success, the columns of the Cäcilia, in which he says he should be too happy to give a facsimile of any fragments in Mozart's hand-writing.

Such is a summary of Herr Weber's first article, from which I have only borrowed what was absolutely necessary for my purpose.

Immediately after the publication of the article, the author of it addressed circulars to various persons, who, by their former relations, their acquaintances, or their position at the time, were likely to be the best-informed on the questions he had raised in No. 11 of his paper. In this letter, he called upon them to forward him all the particulars which they either knew or might be able to learn concerning the subject.

Among others was the Abbé Stadler, who, of all Mozart's contemporaries, and especially of all individuals then living, was most capable of complying with the request contained in the circular. Stadler was eight years older than Mozart, whom he had known from childhood. Up to the period of Mozart's death, he had been one of his most intimate friends and passionate admirers, as well as the friend of Haydn and Albrechtsberger. The four, indeed, were united by a common bond derived from the noblest affection and talent, unparalleled in the world. Mozart's widow had requested him to arrange the posthumous musical papers of her husband, in consequence of which the Abbé had long kept the original manuscript of the Requiem in his possession. He had copied it out, note for note, and preserved the copy as a holy relic. He knew, too, at what period, and under what moral influence the Requiem was composed, while the name of the person who had ordered it was no secret for him. We must not forget, moreover, in addition to all this, that, after an earthly career of eighty-four years, the Abbé Stadler (who died on the 8th November, 1834) left behind him a reputation as pure and honourable as his life as professor,† artist, priest, and man, had been free from stain. These qualities lend weight to his testimony with regard to the controversy concerning the facts or historical part of the question. As for the critical or musical part, Herr Weber certainly found the right man in the Abbé, who was the Nestor of music in Vienna. Stadler was one of the best organists and pianists of his day, one of the most learned musicians in Europe, one of the great composers of the past and present century, and, in a word, a thoroughly and classically-educated man, who had attempted with success almost every kind of composition, and whose admirable oratorio: Die Befreiung Jerusalems, stands immediately next in merit to the oratorios of Haydn. A man like this had some right to pronounce an opinion on the Requiem of Mozart, whose bosom friend and most legitimate brother in art he had been.

In a letter, under the signature to which stood the words, "Inimicus causæ, amicus personæ,"* the Abbé excused himself for not having forwarded directly to Herr Weber the proofs that gentleman had demanded, stating that he had already published his answer to the article in the Cäcilia as a pamphlet, before Herr Weber's circular reached him.

I will now give an analysis of this little work, which consisted of only thirty pages, and was entitled: Vertheidigung der Echtheit des Requiems von Mozart. Wien, 1826. ("A Defence of the Genuineness of Mozart's Requiem. Vienna, 1826.")

Hardly was the article in the Cäcilia known in Vienna, before a number of Mozart's admirers—and who does not admire him at the present day—went to communicate it to Stadler, and, after receiving from him the requisite information, requested he would publish it in the papers. Without the slightest hesitation, the Abbé undertook the honourable task proposed to him.

The account given by Stadler of the state of the original manuscript tallies exactly with that of Süssmayer. The "Requiem," with the fugue of the "Kyrie," and the whole of the "Dies iræ," as far as the verse, "Judicandus homo reus," is so nearly completed, that Süssmayer had scarcely anything more to add than what any composer might leave to the copyists. The instrumentation of the "Domine" is less complete, but still indicated with sufficient clearness. After the "Hostias," Mozart wrote with his own hand: "Quam olim da capo," as if to say, "that he himself should soon enter upon that eternal life which God had promised to Abraham and his posterity." Here Mozart's manuscript concludes. Süssmayer's task really begins with the "Lacrymosa," and even in that Mozart noted down, in the first six bars, the principal orchestral figure, which is given to the first violin and sustained through the whole piece.†

Stadler leaves it undecided whether or not Süssmayer used any of Mozart's ideas in the composition of the "Sanctus," "Benedictus," and "Agnus." The widow, however, told him that, "after Mozart's death a few scraps of paper with notes upon them were found upon his desk, and that she had given them to Süssmayer, although she was unable to say what their contents were, or what use Süssmayer had made of them." We will endeavour to supply the omission occasioned by the Abbé's brevity on this head. There is another fact, also, to which we must particularly call the reader's attention, viz.: that the vocal parts were all written down in the original manuscript—a weighty argument against Herr Weber, as the reader will already have perceived.

Süssmayer, therefore, did not complete the Requiem from fragments and sketches, but had, on the contrary, a correct and regular score, upon numbered slips, and written upon fine Italian paper with twelve lines.

After correcting the fundamental error of Herr Weber, the Abbé proceeds to the conclusions which that gentleman thinks he is entitled to draw from his æsthetical investigation, and, with regard to the forgeries and mutilations, says:—

"Herr Weber has begun his criticisms at the 'Kyrie,' but he would probably have commenced with the 'Requiem æternam,' had he been aware that Mozart took the subject of it from a dirge of Händel, composed in the year 1737, on the occasion of the burial of Queen Caroline; the 'Kyrie,' too, is borrowed from Händel (both themes of the

† For a period of ten years, he filled the chairs of Morality, Ecclesiastical History, and Ecclesiastical Jurisprudence, in turns.

* An enemy of the cause, but a friend of the person.

† Whether from forgetfulness or absence of mind, I know not, but, in another passage, Stadler says that only the last verse of the "Lacrymosa:" "fluit ergo parce Deus," was Süssmayer's. If this was the case, Mozart's manuscript concluded not with the seventh, but with the fourteenth bar, so that all the pieces would almost exclusively be Mozart's, as the words at the commencement are repeated at the verse in question.

'Kyrie, are from the oratorio of Samson). The passages which Herr Weber is pleased to denominate gurglings, and which belong to Händel, can only be so called when performed in a coarse, vulgar, staccato style: if, however, executed as they are here" (in Vienna), "with taste and fulness of tone, the hearer is carried away in a whirlwind of harmony, which, soaring higher and higher, bears him, so to speak, to the throne of the Eternal."

Let all lovers of music who have been fortunate enough to hear the "Kyrie" properly executed, call memory to their aid, and say whether what the Abbé asserts, in words as true as they are becoming a Christian, is not founded on fact. The Abbé proceeds as follows:—

"According to Weber's views of the case, Mozart was guilty of a great mistake in interspersing the 'Tuba mirum' with pleasing strains. Each line in the picture must be terrible if we are to believe in it. He must, however, allow me to ask him a question. Who are those that are summonsed by the last trump? The living and the dead—that is, the righteous and the wicked; the good and the bad; the elect and the condemned. Does the trumpet produce the same sensation on all of them? Will it sound as awful to the righteous man, whose conscience does not accuse him, as to the unhappy sinner, aware of the very different lot which is in store for him? I think not. However fearful the day of judgment may prove for the condemned, it will be just as rich in hope to the Elect, and this is the point of view from which Mozart started in his work. It is, perhaps, almost unnecessary to recall to my reader's recollection, that the appearance of the Judge, who weighs thoughts, and before whose judgment-seat even the most virtuous cannot appear with a soul free from the stains of this earth, has already been embodied in the preceding number, the 'Dies iræ, dies illa,' in the terrible and majestic colours, which, although not exclusively, should predominate in the ensemble of a picture of this description, and predominate, moreover, with the gradations of shade and modifications required by the text, in the pieces of the 'Dies iræ,' which follow—namely, the 'Rex tremendæ majestatis,' 'Confutatis,' and 'Lacrymosa.' The colouring of the 'Recordare' alone is lighter, as the words imperatively require."

MR. BENEDICT AND THE HARMONIC UNION.

A MEETING of the members of the Harmonic Union took place on Wednesday, the 9th ult., at Blagrove's Rooms, Mortimer-street, for the purpose of presenting Mr. Benedict, the conductor, with a testimonial, consisting of a "salver," with tea and coffee service, beautifully executed in silver.

The chair was taken by Dr. Wylde, who addressed the meeting, and commenced by saying that he had been requested by the members of the society to preside on that interesting occasion, and that he had accepted the office with a full sense of the responsibility of the task which would devolve upon him; but, at the same time, with the greatest pleasure and satisfaction, for, though totally unconnected with the Harmonic Union, he was intimately acquainted with the sentiments which existed among its members; and whilst he was conscious that he should make but a very unworthy president on such an occasion, he was glad to avail himself of an opportunity of showing how highly he approved of and entered into the views entertained by the members of the society.

Dr. Wylde then explained the object of the meeting, which was to afford the members of the Harmonic Union the opportunity of publicly thanking their conductor for the services which he had rendered them, and of requesting his acceptance of a "testimonial" of their regard and esteem; adding, that he believed all the members were ready to acknowledge that Mr. Benedict had been their chief supporter, that he had lent them a name which had added a lustre to their proceedings, and that it was through him they had been able to achieve so many triumphs in a musical point of view. He (Dr. Wylde) believed he was justified in saying, that the acquaintance which they had formed with Mr. Benedict had ripened into a feeling of almost personal attachment to that gentleman; a feeling which he knew was reciprocal on his (Mr. Benedict's) part, and that the feeling was honourable alike to Mr. Benedict and to the members of the society. Dr. Wylde observed, that the power to appreciate what is excellent and amiable in itself is an evidence of good feeling, which all ought to be proud to possess, and which was capable of working immeasurable good.

Dr. Wylde then alluded to the duties and obligations which were attached to a conductor of a large society; saying, that the office was one of great responsibility, and of a most arduous nature; that the public looked to the conductor for the fulfilment of the promises made by the society, for the excellence of the performances; in order to obtain which the conductor must exercise an influence over a large body of artists of the highest ability, and that he must acquire the respect and confidence of all over whom he presided; that the conductor of the Harmonic Union had, by his talent and gentlemanly feeling, acquired that respect and confidence; and he (Dr. Wylde) thought that it reflected credit on the wisdom and judgment of the members of the society that they had placed their fullest trust in so admirable a musician, and so worthy a man, as his friend Mr. Benedict.

Dr. Wylde, in the course of his address, alluded to the unanimity which prevailed among the members of the society in desiring that the meeting should take place, and said, that if they agreed with what theorists say, that the most perfect concord is "unison," he hoped they would agree with him in calling that meeting a "most perfect concord;" for, he asked, was it not the result of "unison," of unity of feeling and unity of purpose?—was it not called for in "unison?"—was it not demanded, as it were, with one sound from many voices? Dr. Wylde concluded by adding that he felt sure there was not a feeling which he, as a personal friend and admirer of Mr. Benedict, entertained towards that gentleman, which was not participated in by all present; and everybody must feel delighted at having the opportunity of publicly avowing it.

On the conclusion of Dr. Wylde's speech, Mr. Lockyer, the Hon. Sec. of the meeting, read an address which it was proposed to present to Mr. Benedict, and which obtained unanimous approval. Dr. Wylde then rose, and turning to Mr. Benedict, spoke as follows:—

My dear Mr. Benedict—It has devolved upon me to be the spokesman of the Harmonic Union on this delightful occasion; and, though I will yield to no one in the sincerity of feeling with which I have undertaken that office, I will yield to any one, present or absent, in thorough unworthiness to do justice to the task which I have taken upon myself of expressing to you the esteem and respect which all present entertain for you. Moreover, my dear Mr. Benedict, I think I am more at home among the symbols of musical sounds than in tropes and figures of speech, and, had I been called upon to compose a musical ode in your praise, I am certain I should have done more justice to the subject by making use of sounds than words. I might, for example, have typified your talent in a crescendo, always widening out and making itself heard; your kindness of manner in a sostenuto—always sustained; and the admiration of your friends and brother artists by an accellerando, ever increasing. But I stand here pledged to dispense with these usual modes of expressing feeling, and to sing only to the tune of those kind hearts which surround you. Let me, then, endeavour to assure you, my dear Mr. Benedict, that nothing can exceed the amount of respect and esteem which all the members of this Society feel towards you, or the weight of the debt of gratitude which they feel they owe you for the invaluable services which you have rendered them. They feel, indeed, that you are—as the words of the address say—"Not only their master, but their friend."

Dr. Wylde, after again alluding in the most flattering manner to Mr. Benedict's abilities, said, he hoped the testimonial would tell its own tale, convince Mr. Benedict of the sincerity of the words which had been spoken, and atone for all those things which, in his (Dr. Wylde's) inharmonious phrases, had been left unsaid.

In presenting the testimonial, Dr. Wylde said, "Accept, my dear Mr. Benedict, from the hands of the members of the Harmonic Union, this testimonial, as a tribute of their respect and esteem, coupled with their best wishes for your welfare and prosperity, and with their hopes that you will enjoy a long life to reap the rewards of your talent and uprightness of character, and health to enjoy all those blessings and honours which you so richly deserve."

Mr. Benedict, in receiving the testimonial, thanked the members for their kind acknowledgment of his services, and for the flattering manner in which the testimonial had been presented to him by Dr. Wylde, and alluded to several objects for which the society was established, which he thought were worthy of support; and, though at present he considered the society in regard to its affairs was under a cloud, he hoped it would emerge from it, and live to be of advantage to the musical art.

Mr. Lockyer then presented the address, beautifully written and handsomely bound, and the business of the meeting concluded by a vote of thanks to Dr. Wylde for the ability and readiness with which he had discharged the duties of his office.

In the course of the evening, Madame Viardot Garcia and Signor Belletti delighted the members with some of their favourite songs, several glees were admirably executed by Messrs. Stroud, Hemming, Webb, and Pack, members of the society, and Mr. Benedict performed solos on the pianoforte with the greatest applause. The room was crowded, and the business of the evening passed off in a manner highly gratifying to all concerned.

The testimonial consisted of a full-size silver tea and coffee service, and a twenty-four-inch salver, very richly chased, bearing the following inscription:—"Presented, with the accompanying silver tea and coffee service, to Jules Benedict, Esq., as a token of their sincere regard and appreciation of his valuable services as their conductor at the rehearsals and concerts of the society."—August 11, 1854.

To this inscription, we think, should have been added, "by the members of the Harmonic Union."

THE ROTTERDAM FESTIVAL.

THIRD AND LAST DAY.

The last day of the Festival had arrived, and notwithstanding the anxious hopes expressed daily by all the good folk of Rotterdam that their royal master would graciously be pleased to quit that lovely sojourn, the Hague (also called "Little Paris" by the aspiring "Hagueuars"), and repair to the birth-place of Erasmus the Great, they were sadly doomed to disappointment. On dit, that another reason than an anti-musical one caused the absence of the king, as it seemed that at the last election the Rotterdamers voted against the side supported by majesty; and thus it came to pass, as the story goes, that the festival began and ended without royalty—always, however, excepting the Prince and Princess Hendrik and Prince Frederik with his daughter, whose honoured presence, nevertheless, on the last day, led to some disturbance, as the usual interval of time allowed between the acts was dispensed with. This gave rise to a little bustle and confusion on the part of the audience, who left the Salle de Concert to refresh themselves, and who, hearing the music recommence so suddenly, made as much haste back as Dutch "phlegma" would allow, to find their seats again, which, by the help of the numerous and obliging stewards, was very soon effected.

The 145th Psalm, by Herr Verhulst, began the concert, and Schiller's "Wie er sich räuspert und wie er spuckt—das habt ihr ihm glücklich abgeguckt," was never more happily exemplified. Herr Verhulst, when at Leipzic, studied under Mendelssohn, which has seemed to him sufficient reason to pillage his great master, which he has done with more avidity than judgment. It must be owned that one ought to be a student to write and score a work, even if it afterwards contains innumerable plagiarisms; but to put on the coat of a great man, his hat and wig, and assume his peculiar walk, is not sufficient to constitute a great man. After the Psalm, which was very creditably executed, and in which Mdme. Offermans, Miss Dolby, and Messrs. Roger and Pischek took part, the first-named lady was deputed to crown the conductor with a wreath of laurel, which he declined, having previously been literally pelted with bouquets. Several gentlemen then mounted and spoke, congratulating the society, and chiefly the founder, Herr Vermeulen, who was presented with a gold medal struck for the occasion.

The ninth Symphony of Beethoven then began with its first mysterious sounds, which, at one time, were thought to imitate the tuning of an orchestra, and that by no mean critic of the day. The execution of the marvellous work was, if not perfect, highly respectable; and, considering the difficulty of a first performance, served to disarm criticism.

A mixed programme of oddly joined morceaux followed, and can only be excused on the score of the mercantile part of the enterprise, as the less initiated part of the audience wanted to hear the vocalists in their favourite songs, which they, "of course," gave with much fervour, and which the others, "cela va sans dire," received with shouts of enthusiasm. The Kreutzer Sonata was played by Herren Lübeck and Coenen. The first-named gentleman performed the pianoforte part remarkably well, and with artistic feeling; but Herr Coenen gave the violin part with as much warmth as a patent refrigerator. A magnificent display of fireworks—the concert was a morning one—re-assembled all the visitors again in the evening at the Feestgebouw, and afterwards serenades were given con molto brio e con molto gioja, the serenaders being accompanied by horse-guards and hosts of people carrying lighted torches, the whole of which had a most brilliant and effective appearance. No one slept that night, and champagne, mirth, and enthusiasm turned darkness into day. The festival cost sixty thousand florins, and, as noticed before, was admirably conducted; and, to quote the remark made about it by Mr. Sterndale Bennett—(the only Englishman who had accepted the invitation)—"they do these things better abroad." Apropos of this, I must not forget to mention the general interest our celebrated countryman excited, as his instrumental works are household words in Holland. Every one was desirous of being introduced to him, to have an autograph from him, etc. Most of the celebrated critics of Germany were present, some from Paris, etc. Three more pleasant days altogether I do not recollect to have spent. Poor Mr. Van Baalen, who had been the mainspring of all the arrangements, deserved a vote of thanks from all the visitors for his untiring efforts for their comfort. His carriage was at the service of every one; and he himself seemed to possess ubiquity, like Sir Boyle Roach's swallow, as he was everywhere at once, and always in the place where he was most wanted.

A SECOND LETTER FROM ITALY.

Milan, 6th August, 1854.

Sir,—My former communication was devoted to observations on the self-sufficiency and illiberality of the Italians and their "press," in lauding to the skies their native talent, and indiscriminately abusing foreign musical artists, here and elsewhere. The "London Correspondent," to whom I more particularly alluded, has since been more rational, and, I hope, will continue so. Nous verrons!

"John Bull" himself is, however, generally considered by foreigners, as a somewhat "arrogant" person, and it is an old saying, and one of which I am about to verify the truth—that he considers it his "privilege" to abuse his own country, but will never allow others to do it.

But, before I proceed further in my remarks, permit me to observe (as I shall no doubt incur the animadversions of some good-natured people for interfering with that which, they may imagine, does not concern me, and they will of course say, I do not understand) that experience often shows us that a subject, though in apparently unskilful hands, frequently derives advantage from suggestions which may lead the better informed to think, and devote their energies and attainments to maturing the first "vague idea," until it "grows with its growth, and strengthens with its strength;" and, like the seed of a wild mountain flower, transplanted to a richer soil, nurtured and nourished, gradually springs up—expands—and blooms—surpassing in its new-found home its unpretending modest origin.

But to the subject. It must be a matter of serious regret to Englishmen who are lovers of art, that, in spite of the high position which England at present occupies, and the still higher situation she seems destined to attain, she is in too many branches of art, and more particularly in music, an admiring, patronising, paying, but not a producing nation.

Why is it, I would ask, that we have not in England a "School of Music" established upon the same extensive principle as the Conservatorios of Italy and France? It is true we have a Royal Academy of Music; but, so far as vocalists are concerned, I suppose it will be admitted to be a failure. The Earl of Westmoreland and the noble directors,

"Good easy men, may deem full sure our greatness is a-ripening;"

but it is a mistake! What singers of the first class has it produced in the dramatic school? Nothing above mediocrity! Of the male singers, several have come to Italy for instruction during the last ten or fifteen years, and nearly all have failed, Of the ladies, as Hamlet says—

"Break my heart, for I must hold my tongue," although there have been some honourable exceptions.

Now with respect to the Conservatorio of Milan. It is open to persons of the most humble means. Every inhabitant has the privilege of sending his children there for musical and other branches of Education. The terms are six svanzigers per month, equal to four shillings English money!

For this sum they are educated in the rudiments of music—and are taught reading, writing, and the ordinary branches of education. Such pupils as show capacity and talent for music—vocal or instrumental, are instructed more particularly with reference to that branch, and are eventually transferred to the upper masters for the cultivation of their voice or ability as the case may be. The expense of this Upper Class* is something about £10 per annum English money—which, in the event of their parents being unable to contribute, is paid for them out of a fund provided by the Government, who have in fact a superintending power over the whole establishment. The number of pupils varies from 200 to 300.

Here, then, we have an establishment where nature's gifts to her humblest children receive the cultivation of art. A school of music open to all classes, instead of our "Royal Academy of Music"—which, like our "London Tavern," or the "Clarendon," although open to all, is only approachable by such as can afford to pay.

Grisi received her musical education at this establishment, and also several other distinguished vocalists of the Italian school of the present day, and two female pupils—the Signoras "Ortolani" and "Orrechia," made their début at the last Carnival, whose parents, as I hear, were so humble that they were assisted in the payment of the small stipend I have alluded to by some benevolent persons. They are now pursuing a brilliant career, with a long list of engagements.

That we have English voices of rare and beautiful quality, none of the candid Italian or French masters deny—and the names of "Billington," "Salmon," "Dickens," "Mountain," and "Stephens," sufficiently attest—and yet two of them died in the most abject poverty, while we were paying foreign artists enormous salaries, by which they were enabled to purchase or erect splendid palaces on their return to their native countries.

Strain every nerve then I say to effect the establishment of an English "National School of Music." Let the Government be applied to for a grant—a yearly grant—they will at first refuse it, I know. It is a way they have! But persevere! Our legislators who combine perhaps a greater amount of intellect, education, and general knowledge than any similar number of men in any country in the world, will pass night after night debating upon the "grant to the Maynooth College," or the "remuneration to Catholic clergymen for their attendance on criminals in jails," but directly a grant of money is alluded to with reference to the "Fine Arts," the atmosphere of the House becomes immediately Hume-id!

"As well expect of Aberdeen what's right—
As Art encouragement from Hume or Bright!"

The question is either touched with a withering hand—met by the Manchester-school of politicians as a mere pounds, shillings, and pence question—or else the house is counted out (as it is likely enough to be on first bringing forward a grant of this nature), while the members rush to join their families at the "Italian Opera," to hear a lot of overpaid Italian singers, and where it would be considered as quite contrary to all taste and fashion, if they did not purchase a box each season, at an enormous price!

Let the subject be placed in the hands of a good man and true. There are many such I know and could name, honours to their country and to art. Let a committee, if possible, be obtained (the Manchester school of course being excluded), and then persevere, session after session, till the point is gained, and gained it eventually would be.

An English Conservatoire once obtained, and opening its doors to all those in whom the "elements" of musical talent exist, we shall then see what English voices can effect, and in the language of one of the celebrated men of our day—"While the manufacturers of England cultivate art in their productions; while their looms send out patterns to rival the rich stuffs of the old Italian weavers, and the more modern silks of Lyons; while her furnaces bring forth porcelains that will shame the Grecian pottery, and her foundries produce graceful metal-work equal to that of Nuremberg;" let her legislature, I say, lend a liberal and a willing hand to the cultivation of music and painting, and then commerce will have reason to be proud of being the pilot to Art, and Old England will be celebrated in after ages, not only as "a nation of shopkeepers," but as bearing within her hand, besides her wealth and splendour, the pacifying, civilizing, and refining influences of the arts.

A Lover of Fair Play.

MADAME SONTAG.

The following account of the funeral of Madame Sontag has appeared in the American papers:

"As early as four o'clock, the house of the deceased and the neighbourhood, in San. Francisco-street, were thronged with a quiet and well-conducted crowd. At half-past five, the procession set out for the San. Fernando Cemetery, The ceremony was under the direction of the German Club, thirty-two of whose members were entrusted with carrying the coffin, in turn. They were joined by MM. Bordas and Rocco. The pall was held by MM. H. Nagel, A. Barilli, E. Specchi, and Augustin Balderas. The following was the order of the procession:—The French Philharmonic Society of Sainte-Cécile; the German Club; the Funeral Car; the Coffin, borne on men's shoulders; the choristers of the Santa Anna Theatre at each side of the body, all the mourners, on foot, and a long string of carriages. The two orchestras of the theatres Santa Anna and the Oriente waited for the procession at the church. Every one who had a heart to beat within his breast, was present at the ceremony. The procession was more than a mile long. We counted as many as 147 carriages sent, as a sign of sympathy, by the principal families of the city. The procession directed its course slowly, from the house of the deceased, No. 13, in first San. Francisco-street, towards the church of San. Fernando, which it reached about half-past six. A funeral service, in which the orchestras of the two Italian Opera Houses took part, was celebrated in the midst of a feeling of universal respect, and the body then conveyed to the cemetery. During this time, the monks of San. Fernando sang Canticles, and the German Philharmonic Society a Prayer to the Virgin. When the corpse had been lowered into its last resting-place, Herr Leffmann, President of the German Club, recited in his mother tongue, which was also that of the illustrious defunct, a piece of poetry composed for the occasion; the German Philharmonic Society sang Herr Lindpaintner's chorus, "Do not forget me;" Herr W. Biedermann spoke a German oration; Senor Pantaleon Tovao recited some striking Spanish verses, and Herr Crasemann, a German "Paternoster." The remains of the celebrated vocalist were then walled up in her tomb, No. 194, in the San. Fernando Cemetery. It was nine o'clock in the evening when the procession dispersed."

Royston Mechanics' Institute.—On Wednesday evening, the 16th, Charles Steggall, Esq., Mus. Doc., Trin. Coll., Cam., delivered, for the benefit of the Institute, a lecture on the Chamber Music of England in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Dr. Steggall treated the subject historically, and concluded by thanking the members of the Royston Choral Society for having so creditably performed the vocal illustrations of his lecture, which included compositions by Byrd, Edwards, Morley, Wilbye, Dowland, Ford, Look, and Purcell.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

AN ENGLISH ADMIRER OF MDLLE. CRUVELLI'S GENIUS.—We are of the same opinion as our correspondent, but must decline to print his letter. The Morning Herald has as good a right to publish its independent views as the Morning Post, or the Musical World; and we have no doubt that MDLLE. CRUVELLI will endeavour to profit by all the advice she can get. It is in vain to attempt reconciling opinions. The Morning Herald is under the control of the clergy of the Church of England; and it is possible, that MDLLE. CRUVELLI may belong to the Catholic persuasion, or—born near Munster, in Westphalia—to the Anabaptist. In the latter case, it is not surprising that she should find little sympathy for her talent among the contributors to the Morning Herald. The question of her failing to please the "patrons" of the Royal Italian Opera, however, is one of fact, and has nothing to do with "æsthetic" notions of art and artists. The proof of the pudding is in the eating, and the results of a managerial speculation are best declared in figures. We could inform our contemporary—were he anxious, which he is not, to be enlightened—that some of the CRUVELLI nights were the most lucrative of the season. We are, nevertheless, obliged to the Morning Herald for its discovery (some time ago) that MDLLE. CRUVELLI'S voice is not a soprano, but a mezzo-soprano; and that, for this reason, her performance in Donna Anna was less successful than her performance in Leonora. The inference is curious, however, since the music of Fidelio is HIGHER, not lower, than that of MOZART'S heroine.

[illegible].—VINCENZO RIGHINI, the composer, was born at Bologna in 1756, and died there on the 19*th of August*, 1812. He was for some time director of music at the Royal Theatre, Berlin, where he brought out Tigranes, and other operas. He was very prolific, as well as a talented and learned musician.

T. M. R.—We are compelled to decline the verses, which have no connection with any musical subject, and are therefore unsuited to our pages.

FAIR PLAY.—We agree with our correspondent, who suggests that the name of OMAR PASHA should have appeared in the QUEEN'S speech, and that of MR. ROBSON in the farewell address of MR. WIGAN.

△ (who speaks, by the way, with the authority of the whole Greek alphabet on the subject of organs), is informed that it is not part of our plan to give articles on old and well known instruments, unless either they are extremely and deservedly celebrated, or have been considerably extended and improved. The large additions to the organ, of which our Correspondent writes, were completed long since, and were noticed at the time.

ERRATA.

In the list of stops given in our article on the Panopticon Organ last week, the word "wood" is appended to the Second Open Diapason of the Great Organ instead of the Stopped Diapason. On page 534, for "patchy stops" read "patchy spots;" and at the head of page 535, for "turned too much out of unison," read "tuned too much out of unison."

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 19TH, 1854.

WE cannot dismiss the "societies" without a word or two about Mr. Hullah, who, in his way, has been the means of doing a great deal of good. Mr. Hullah has attracted a new kind of public to his performances in St. Martin's Hall—a public wholly independent of that which congregates at the bidding of the Sacred Harmonic Society and the Exeter Hall-ites, and quite as capable, if not indeed more capable of appreciating the choral works, sacred and secular, of the great masters. Mr. Hullah has very well understood his position. He saw that it was impossible for him to contend on equal terms with his formidable neighbour in the Strand, and having built a house for himself, he could do what he pleased with it. After much consideration he came to the wise and liberal resolution of throwing open the doors of St. Martin's Hall to the masses, who for one shilling were allowed to hear a more than average performance of The Messiah, The Creation, Judas Maccabæus, and Elijah, by the members of the "Upper Singing Class," and a tolerable band, the whole under the direction of Mr. Hullah. The step was triumphantly successful, as it well deserved to be; and the "cheap oratorios" at St. Martin's Hall, if carried on with energy, stand a chance of becoming as much a public want as M. Jullien's concerts in November.

But now that Mr. Hullah has made the attempt and established his position, he must look about him for the best means of maintaining it on a sure and lasting basis. He must be in earnest if he desires to prosper. A small policy will not serve him; an undecided one will only perplex him. Whatever he does must be done well, and some particular end be set in view to the attainment of which his efforts should be chiefly, nay solely and undividedly directed. Up to the present time this has hardly been the case. Not only have the performances been unequal to what they ought to be, when the resources which Mr. Hullah has at command are taken into consideration; not only has the execution at times (instance the case of Mr. Leslie's Immanuel) been careless and slovenly, but—which is quite as much opposed to ultimate success—there has been no definite course of action. Some of the concerts—consisting of long and rambling selections from operas, serenatas, etc.—were as tiresome as they were opposed to all the principles which should guide the taste of one professing to teach while he entertains the public. There is nothing so utterly subversive of good consequences, as well to the art and its disciples as to the public, as this habit of presenting, at one and the same concert, a jumble of incongruous parts, from various works bearing no affinity to each other. By the initiated it is unanimously condemned; while the uninitiated are induced to yawn and gape, without knowing why. Ennui lays hold of them; and it is only a feeling of decency that prevents them from getting up and going away in the middle. Let not Mr. Hullah imitate the very worst feature in the management of the Italian theatres. The "Long Thursdays," as they were termed, were the real cause of the decline and fall of Her Majesty's Theatre—not the "Pas de Quatre," not the "Swedish Nightingale," bad as was the ultimate tendency of both. Mr. Lumley, it is true, gave a severe blow to his ballet by the Pas de Quatre, in which he brought together Marie Taglioni, Fanny Cerito, Lucile Grahn, and Carlotta Grisi, the four most eminent danseuse, then in the market; and he gave another to his opera by the artificial excitement he laboured with such ardour to create about Jenny Lind; but it was by the "Long Thursdays" that he inflicted the vital wound on both, and ultimately knocked his theatre off its legs. The "Star" system, and the "hot-pressure" system are equally vicious and equally prejudicial. Having killed his goose, Mr. Lumley could get no more eggs; while, had he been content with one a day, he might be going on prosperously now. The Royal Italian Opera, which set out so well, is beginning to adopt the same system, the deleterious effects of which the management, sooner or later, will find to its dismay. Mr. Hullah, if he is prudent, will sedulously avoid it. Depend upon it there is much more interest attached to the efficient performance of great works, unmutilated, than to all those chaotic and purposeless hashes, which, like the pot au feu, seem to be made up of the last day's leavings.

Mr. Hullah should also avoid clashing with the New Philharmonic Society, whose concerts take place, like his own, at St. Martin's Hall. The New Philharmonic orchestra, is numerous and strong; Mr. Hullah's is neither one nor the other; it is consequently unwise in him, by instituting an opposition, to publish his inferiority to the world. Let him stick to oratorios, or at least to choral works, "in their integrity"—as the phrase goes. There is a wide field open for him, a field, indeed, that has been comparatively almost unexplored. He can always fall back upon the Messiah and Elijah, in case that novelties or revivals should fail to be attractive. Mr. Hullah enjoys an invaluable privilege in the fact of the chorus being a class of his own, the elements of which he has developed and is developing. He has it thus at his immediate command all the year round; and with him a rehearsal may pass for a lesson. His performances ought, therefore, to be first-rate in this special department. If they are not first-rate the public will eventually be dissatisfied—which he will find to his cost. If Mr. Hullah is disposed to listen to honest counsel, he will, moreover, at once set about strengthening and re-organising his band—since, at present, although, we admit, there are some very excellent professors in its ranks, it is quite unworthy of his concerts. It is our firm conviction that with perseverance, energy, and zeal, Mr. Hullah's "cheap oratorios," and choral performances in general, have a better chance of enduring than any other contemporaneous musical entertainment of the kind. St. Martin's Hall is by far the best music-room in London; and as it is within arm's length of the Royal Italian Opera, it is absurd to object to the situation in which it stands. Thoroughly attractive programmes, and thoroughly good performances, will prove, not for the first time, that the position of a theatre or a concert-room has little to do with its permanent failure or success. The Olympic is an example of this theory. When Madame Vestris was manager it was the most fashionable theatre in town; and yet its situation is infinitely worse than that of St. Martin's Hall. At the present time the Olympic is as much in vogue as then; and why?—simply because there is a good actor there. The name of Mr. Robson acts as a spell upon the lovers of the drama, and would draw them, from far and wide, even to a dirtier neighbourhood and a less commodious theatre. If Mr. Hullah provides good concerts he will be rewarded by full audiences; if not he must be satisfied to contemplate empty benches. He has everything in his own hands; and as Louis XIV. said, 'L'etât c'est moi," Mr. Hullah, with equal truth, may exclaim, "I am the society." The season just over may be regarded as his coup d'essai, for the monthly concerts were merely experiments, and the concerts at Exeter Hall, before St. Martin's Hall was erected, had no definite plan, and led to nothing. Let him clearly understand that miscellaneous entertainments are not expected of him, but good performances of complete works. If he cannot succeed without resorting to the vulgar expedient of cramming all sorts of unconnected pieces into a single programme, he had better shut up shop, since there will be no public sympathy with his endeavours, nor will he have any right to expect any, seeing that his aim is vague and his means those of the common sort of speculators. He cannot cope with the New Philharmonic Society; therefore he should abandon overtures, symphonies, solos, and concertos. He would not, we hope, think of entering the lists against the Wednesday Concerts, and such like institutions; therefore, he must throw the olla podrida system overboard. His path is plain before him. Let him enter it with courage, follow it with sincerity and enthusiasm, and success must crown his efforts.

The Opera—the Italian Opera, that is to say—is over, and, therefore, the season. Parliament has been prorogued by Her Majesty the Queen, and the troupe of singers, players, and dancers dispersed by Mr. Gye, the manager. Where they will travel—M.P.'s and artists—is a matter of little consequence, so that they come back safe and sound next spring.

The question is now—what kind of an Italian Opera are we to expect next season? Shall there be two, or only one? Is the great temple in St. James's still to remain closed—like a mute giant, with his arms enfolded—or will Mr. Lumley emerge from his retreat, to begin a new and a luckier reign? If only one Opera, will Mr. Gye go to the Haymarket, or stop where he is? If two, where are the singers to come from?—seeing that Grisi and Mario are on the other side of the Atlantic, Jenny Lind has abandoned the stage, Alboni is going to Lisbon, Sophie Cruvelli's congé has been bought up for the "Exhibition," by the director of the Académie Impériale, and poor Madame Sontag is no more. It is easier to put than to resolve these questions. The universal editor of Notes and Queries would be at a loss to answer one of them. There may be, lurking in some remote German town, a new and unknown "Jenny;" there may be, singing in some obscure Italian theatre, a Giulia Grisi in embryo. The "tenor Carrion"—of whom we hear so much, in our correspondence from the land of song—is, perhaps, a future Mario; and the "barytone Mons" another Ronconi. But seeing and hearing are believing; and we shall believe when we see and hear—remaining sceptical till then. No matter what he be, however, Carrion must change his name. An "i" would make it Carrioni, which might pass; while Mons could be elongated into Monti. But, seriously, the tribe of first-class sopranos, contraltos, tenors, barytones, and even basses would seem to be expiring, if not extinct. Perhaps, however, the land of song, like the earth between two crops, is enjoying a repose, and that not long hence, the harvest of singers may be as abundant as it is now "lean." Let us hope for the best. It would, indeed, be sad if so fascinating an entertainment as that provided by the Italian Opera should die for want of voices. And yet such a catastrophe appears by no means unlikely—thanks to Signor Verdi, who has begun to compose in a less exacting manner for his singers when it is, perhaps, too late. Having rendered them speechless, he now writes softly for them. What a pity he did not set out with the principle that screaming is one thing, and singing another. He might then have done as much good to his art as he has really, without intending it, done harm. Although to write like Rossini, Donizetti, or even Bellini, was not in him, he might have creditably supported the interregnum between the last of one race of giants and the first of another. Even now, however, there is some hope of him. Rigoletto is a step in the right direction, and, if we are truly informed, Il Trovatore is another.

The Italian Opera, unhappily, is as ill off for want of composers as for want of singers—worse, indeed. Mercadante, dry and spiritless, though industrious, has failed to win popularity even at home; how, then, can it be expected for him abroad? Verdi, all the rage in Italy, has made his way in England, France, and Germany. But he commenced on a plan which, though new, was vicious, and destroyed or damaged nearly all the voices of his compatriots. The Germans are made of stronger stuff, and while they cannot sing like the Italians, their lungs and stamina are more capable of resistance. But even they have suffered. The French have had less of Verdi, and have therefore been less victimised; yet Jerusalem finished Duprez, who had survived the "Ut de Poitrine," and resisted Monsieur Halévy and the Juive. With Verdi, however, we must rest satisfied, until a new composer shall be found, with sufficient talent and originality to give the Italian Opera that fresh and vigorous impetus which is indispensable to its prolonged existence. The coming of such a Phœnix will be hailed with universal joy. If Rossini, who, by ceasing to compose for the Italian stage, gave the first blow to its prosperity, would, now that it is in its decline, write one opera to save it, his country would applaud, and his art forgive him. Rossini might pass very well for the expected "new composer;" he might be the Phœnix, to spring from the ashes of the past, and, "plumed in song," allay the thirst of the exhausted world, by giving it "the music which is divine," and for which, like the poet—whose ——"heart in its thirst is a dying flower"—

it pants. This would be a real triumph for the "Swan of Pesaro," who after his long sleep of more than twenty years, might arise from his slumbers, "like a giant refreshed." What a boast for one so (justly) proud, to be able to assume as a motto—"I created, I destroyed, and I resuscitated." For that would be the real interpretation of his career—of his brilliant Spring, his lazy Summer, and what might thus be made his golden and glorious Autumn. How honoured, then, would be his Winter! Instead of "following at the funeral of his own reputation"—as Lord Bacon says magnificently—his reputation, great and universal, bright and unsullied, would throw a halo round his bier.

But Rossini, like Achilles, sits moody and relentless in his tent, with no Patroclus to console him, and no Patroclus to revenge. Despising the admonition of Pythagoras—cor non edito—he devours his own heart; and though he would give worlds to be once more up and stirring, he persists, with sullen obstinacy, in tormenting himself, and robbing the world of its right. Heaven bestows genius on man, that he may elevate, refine, and delight his fellows; but Rossini, regardless of his holy mission, scorns the gift, and scatters his treasures to the winds. Alas!—that there should be no new syren, no Briseis of song, to minister to him and appease his wrath!—to induce him, in short, to compose another opera, or at least to give out that which report insists he has got locked up in an iron chest at Bologna.

Some will rejoin—"Have we not got the Stabat Mater?—and is not that as good as any opera?" We certainly have the Stabat Mater; but we do not think it as good as any opera. With all our respect for the genius of Rossini, for his extraordinary facility and prodigious invention, for his knowledge of the human voice and his command of the orchestra, for the wit, humour, and dramatic feeling displayed in his music, for his candid egotism, his ignorance of fugue, and his contempt of that and all else he has been unable to fathom—for those qualities, in short, one and all, separate and united, which have made him one of the most charming, original, brilliant, gifted, and provoking of musicians—we cannot admire his Stabat Mater. It is our honest conviction that the Stabat Mater, among the works of Rossini, is that which is the least worthy of him. It lacks elevation of character, and is, therefore, not religious—since, however, some may be inclined to argue that there is no absolute distinction of style between the sacred and profane compositions of masters who have written with a serious idea of the importance of their calling, and that Handel's oratorios and Handel's operas bear the same stamp, few, we think, can deny that the musical treatment of a sacred theme should be more grave, sober and guarded (leaving sublimity to those whom God has most highly endowed) than that of profane subjects, theatrical or otherwise. Nor is there in the Stabat any exemplification of that deep grief and burning passion, which, in the Catholic ritual, is inseparably associated with the Mater Dolorosa.

No—we must have an opera. An opera is the sine qua non. Thus, and thus only, can Rossini atone for a long neglect of his art, and of the moral obligations of an artist.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The season terminated, on Saturday, with the second performance of Il Conte Ory, and the two last acts of Otello. At the end of Otello the National Anthem was sung by the company, Mesdames Bosio, Viardot, and Marai taking the solos. Rossini's opera was hardly played so well as on Tuesday. The excuse must be that a second performance is never so good as a first. The music, however, pleased more than on the Tuesday, and would please, still more if oftener heard. Il Conte Ory should by right become one of the most attractive works of the répertoire.

The house was full, but not crowded, and all the favourites, Mesdames Bosio, Marai, Nantier Didiée and Viardot, with Signors Tamberlik, Tagliafico, Luchesi, Zelger, etc., were especially complimented during the evening. Only Signors Lablache and Ronconi did not stay to bid their friends adieu, and for them there was no last night.

And so farewell for more than half a year to the Opera and its fascinations.

Mr. A Harris, the talented director of the mise-en-scène, took a benefit on Thursday night. It assumed the form of a Grand Concert, and included all the artists in the theatre, and the band. It is only necessary to say that Mr. Harris had a full house, and that all the artists sang in their best manner, Mad. Bosio, Mdlle. Marai, and Signor Tamberlik coming in for the lion's share of the laurels. A pupil of Paganini's—a first appearance—executed two solos, but was found utterly unworthy the name of his master.

ROYAL OPERA, DRURY LANE.

The Royal Opera has commenced operations again at Drury Lane on Saturday, the performances during the week have been confined to the popular operas, Norma, Lucrezia Borgia, and Sonnambula. Mad. Caradori has appeared in the two former, Mdlle. Agnes Büry in the latter. Semiramide was announced for Mad. Caradori, but has been withdrawn for the present from the bills. The attendance has been generally good, and the execution of the music praiseworthy.

Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli arrived in London on Monday morning. She will start for the provinces, on the tour with Sig. Tamberlik and others on the 23rd or 24th, which has been already mentioned. She does not sing at either of the festivals, her engagements being almost exclusively to perform in operas.

Mdlle. E. St. Marc, the fair pianist, who is at present staying at the Hague, performed several morceaux lately before Prince Henry (brother to the King of the Netherlands) and the Princess, and at the conclusion was presented by the Prince with a handsome gold bracelet. Mdlle. St. Marc returns to London next week to resume her professional avocations.

DRAMATIC.

LYCEUM THEATRE.—Taking advantage of the recess, Mr. Allcroft engaged Mr. and Mrs. Sims Reeves for a series of three farewell performances in English opera previous to their departure for the provinces. These commenced on Wednesday with Balfe's Bohemian Girl, which not having been heard in London for a long time was almost as good as a novelty. Everybody knows by heart the melodies of the Bohemian Girl, the "Fair Land of Poland," "I dreamt that I dwelt in Marble Halls," "I'll remember thee," "The Heart bow'd down," etc., which are real household tunes, familiar and domestic. But these are not the best things in the opera. The second act is charming throughout, and contains some of the composer's most genial inspirations; the concerted pieces are skilfully written, flowing, and spontaneous. The Gipsy's chorus in the first act, which constitutes so prominent a feature in the opera, is very characteristic, and is used in various forms with admirable effect. The melodies speak for themselves, and may be termed world-renowned. The Bohemian Girl is not only popular in England, but has been received with favour in several theatres on the Continent, especially at Vienna, where it created a furor. We must acknowledge, despite our predilection for the music, that we are surprised at the unvarying success of the Bohemian Girl. Mr. Bunn's words are good, and have always a meaning that should be obvious, but the story involves some extraordinary demands upon credibility. The character of Thaddeus is not striking, but he has some very charming music to sing, which Mr. Sims Reeves turns to the best account, and invests with a new grace. His great effects on Wednesday night were, it may be guessed, in the popular airs, "Fair Land of Poland," and "I'll remember thee," the first of which was given with immense vigour, and the latter with exquisite feeling. Both were encored, and repeated with increased effect. But the best singing of Mr. Sims Reeves was in the duet with Arline in the second act, which, constructed after the recognised Italian form, gives the vocalist more scope for display than simple ballads. In this duet Mr. Sims Reeves sang not only with perfect taste and expression, but in the most finished and masterly manner. His success was triumphant.

Mrs. Sims Reeves was a very graceful Arline, and besides acting charmingly, sang the music like a true artist. She was encored in her first song, "I dream't that I dwelt in Marble Halls," and, in the duet above-named with Mr. Sims Reeves, added greatly to the effect.

Mr. Weiss was well suited in the part of Count Arnheim. He sang well, more especially the ballad, "The heart bow'd down," and was of real importance in the concerted music. Dramatically speaking, Mr. Weiss alone did not overlook the changes necessitated by a supposed lapse of time. In the second act, by altering his costume, and adorning his hair with a few "messengers of time," he contrived to look several years older, whereas Mr. Sims Reeves looked really younger in his Gipsy's undress than in his Polish uniform; and Mr. Manvers, as the light-headed Florestein, did not even condescend to change his collar. Besides Mr. and Mrs. Sims Reeves, Mr. Weiss, and Mr. Manvers, the cast included Miss Julia Harland as the Gipsy Queen, and Mr. Farquharson as Devilshoof. The opera was received with the greatest applause throughout, and was so successful that Mr. Allcroft announced it for repetition on Wednesday next.

At the end of each act Mr. Sims Reeves was called for from all parts of the theatre, and on his appearance with Mrs. Sims Reeves and Mr. Weiss, received with genuine enthusiasm.

The theatre was densely crowded in every part. We have rarely seen such an audience at the Lyceum. After the opera the ballet divertissement, Paysannes du Nord, was performed by a very respectable corps de ballet, including Mdlle. d'Antoine. Last night the Sonnambula was performed, with the same ballet. On Monday, Lucia di Lammermoor.

STRAND.—A successful adaptation of Mr. Dickens's last tale, Hard Times, was produced here on Monday. The adapter has been unusually early in the field, for we believe, the story itself is barely finished. The incidents are few and not very dramatic, but the leading points of the characters and dialogue have been combined with so much tact, that the piece, though nearly three hours long, went smoothly to the end. The company has received an important acquisition in Mr. Barrett. Miss Harriet Gordon played with her usual ease and liveliness, and delivered the sentimental portion of the dialogue with a delicacy which we hardly expected from her. The drama has been judiciously cast through all its parts, and put on the stage with equal care. It was announced for repetition amidst loud and general applause.

PROVINCIAL.

Now that our London season is over, the provinces begin to show signs of life and animation; the theatres are once more holding up their heads, and concerts are being announced in the principal towns of the kingdom. The following is from the Manchester Courier:—

"THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA IN MANCHESTER.—The extent to which subscriptions have been given in to the series of operas to be presented at the Theatre Royal, by the Royal Italian Opera Company of Covent Garden, including Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli, leads us to expect a difficulty in obtaining places; and it therefore becomes desirable that no delay be suffered in giving in their names by those who desire to be present. The same company have arranged to visit Liverpool, but we observe that the terms of subscription in Manchester to the six operas are two guineas, whilst in Liverpool for five they are two guineas and a half."

We read, in the Clifton Chronicle of the 12th, that—

"The theatre was well attended on Monday and yesterday evenings, when some of the principal members of Madame Vestris's Lyceum company made their appearance before a Bristol audience. The pieces selected were from the light comedies, musical interludes, and farces, for the production of which the Lyceum has been so famous under the present management. Another performance takes place this (Wednesday) evening, and to-morrow (Thursday) the engagement is brought to a close. On Friday, the Lyceum corps appears at Bath, when they will be joined by the commanders-in-chief, Mr. Charles Mathews and Madame Vestris."

The Berkshire Chronicle has the following in anticipation of the concert to be given at Reading by Mad. Clara Novello and Mr. Sims Reeves:—We have much pleasure in inviting the attention of our readers to the announcement of two grand concerts, which will take place in our Town Hall on the 16th of October next. Many years have elapsed since the youthful Clara Novello charmed all hearers in one of her earliest essays at a grand performance of sacred music, given at our Town Hall for the benefit of the county hospital, by the late Mr. Binfield. Her singing was then characterised by purity of tone, perfect intonation, and chaste simplicity of style. The high promise of the girl is richly fulfilled in the matured woman; her voice is of great compass and unrivalled power, as was evinced at the opening of the Crystal Palace, when her clear brilliant tones were distinctly heard over every part of the vast building. Every admirer of choral music will rejoice to find that the services of the "Glee and Madrigal Union," and those of the celebrated tenor, Sims Reeves, are secured for these concerts.

The Yorkshire Gazette has the following on Mr. H. Lawson's concert at Whitby:—

"Mr. Henry Lawson, a native of this town, but now residing at Liverpool, gave his annual concert in the Assembly Room, Royal Hotel, on Friday evening last. The room was crowded in every part. The solo performances on the violin by Mr. Lawson and those of Mr. Lewis on the piano were very successful. The vocalists were Mr. Ryall, of Liverpool, and the Misses Wemyss."

We find that a tour of Mr. J. A. Fairbairn and the Misses Bennett has been successful, if we may judge from the account in the South Eastern Gazette.

We abridge the following from the Buckinghamshire Advertiser:—

"On Thursday week, the 10th, the children of the Parochial School were regaled with a substantial dinner in Chesham Park, by William Lowndes, Esq. A spacious marquee was erected, besides several minor booths, in which every accommodation was provided for the visitors. The band of the 2nd Life Guards attended for the day. After the repast, rural games were introduced. At five o'clock, the gentry and public took tea in a spacious marquee erected for the occasion. Amongst those present were the Vicar of Chesham; William Lowndes, Esq., of the Bury; Benjamin Fuller, Esq., of Germain's House; John Stratton Fuller, Esq., Lieutenant of the Royal Bucks Militia; the Rev. Mr. Shepherd, the curate; J. Surman, Esq., of London, conductor of the Exeter Hall Oratorios; and numerous others of the élite of the town and vicinity. A concert was given, on the same evening, in aid of the funds of the Chesham Parochial Schools, consisting of Sacred music, being a selection from Elijah, the Creation, etc. Principal vocal performers (from the London Sacred Harmonic Society): Miss Clara Henderson, the Misses Wells, Mrs. Byers, Mr. Seymour, Mr. Farquharson Smith, and Mr. Marshall, with an efficient chorus. Instrumental performers: The Band of Her Majesty's Second Life Guards. Pianoforte: Mr. W. H. Birch, organist, of Amersham, and Mr. Pringle. Conductor: Mr. Surman, founder of the Exeter Hall Oratorios.

"We cannot close this report without giving our warmest thanks to Mr. Surman for bringing down to Buckinghamshire so effective a troop of artistes, and conducting the oratorio in person. It is evident that his position as conductor for 25 years at Exeter Hall, did not militate against his kindness or teach him to forget that he was a native of Chesham."

MANCHESTER.—Mr. Davenport and Miss Fanny Vining have been playing at the Theatre Royal this week. Their engagement will be brought to a close with the play of St. Marc, followed by Black-Eyed Susan. On Tuesday, Mr. and Miss Vandenhoff commence an eleven nights' engagement, with Love's Sacrifice.

The following extract is from the Manchester Examiner of the 16th instant:—

"THEATRE ROYAL.—MR. AND MISS VANDENHOFF.—There is no actor who appears before a Manchester audience, in the present day, whom Manchester should receive more graciously than the veteran Vandenhoff. Forty years ago, his artistic and social position brought around him a large circle of friends and admirers, and from that time to the present he has contrived to maintain the estimation then early acquired. He took for his model the classical delineations by which the dignity of the English stage had been so long upheld; and though far from a servile imitator of the Kembles, he appeared fully to appreciate the grandeur of their style, and earnestly to devote himself after their manner to the vocation he had chosen. Mr. and Miss Vandenhoff made their first appearance this season on Monday evening, in the play of Love's Sacrifice. Last evening, Shakspere's Merchant of Venice introduced Mr. Vandenhoff as Shylock, his daughter taking the part of Portia."

From a correspondent at Scarborough, dated August 15, we learn that

"Mr. John Bentinck Wilson's vocal and instrumental concerts at the Spa Saloon are attracting crowded and fashionable audiences. The favourites now are Miss Freeman, Miss Fanny Rowland, and Signor Guglierini."

The Liverpool Mail of August 12, thus alludes to the opening of St. George's Hall:—

"On the supposition that Her Majesty will not be able to be present, the Town Council have finally determined to open St. George's Hall on Tuesday, the 19th of September, with a grand musical performance, conducted by Dr. Wesley, and at which Madame Clara Novello, who sang so magnificently at the opening of the Crystal Palace, will be the principal vocalist—the chorus numbering 200. Handel's 'Hallelujah Chorus' and the 'Coronation Anthem' will be performed in the morning, and an oratorio, doubtless the 'Messiah,' given in the evening. With respect to the probabilities of the Queen being present, nothing is yet definitely known, but in the meantime the mayor and town-clerk are to wait upon the Earl of Sefton, the lord-lieutenant of the county, to ascertain through him whether it is the pleasure of our gracious Sovereign to visit Liverpool on the occasion of the opening of the finest hall in her extended dominions. What the result of the interview with Lord Sefton, or what the Queen's intention may be upon this point, of course it is impossible to conjecture; but unless Her Majesty's command to the contrary be issued, the inauguration of St. George's Hall will positively take place upon the date above stated.

"A decision has, however, been arrived at upon the terms of admission to the hall on the occasion of its opening, and, although this decision may be subject to some modification, its general principles will be carried out. First of all, it has been determined by the joint-committee that all parties are to pay for admission to the hall, the members of the council not excepted. On the affirmation of this principle, the next subject for consideration was the price of admission. A guinea was the sum first mentioned, but after some discussion the charge was fixed at half-a-guinea to all parts of the hall, it being utterly impracticable to effect any sub-division of the building. Each member of the council will be entitled to six tickets upon payment; and, to get rid of the difficulty of appropriating seats for those tickets, the seats are to be ballotted for before the distribution of tickets to the public generally, this being the only privilege accorded to the members of the council. The remaining tickets will be ballotted for by the burgesses, and no person will be allowed more than six tickets. Arrangements will be made in the hall for the accommodation of 2,300 persons. It is rumoured that the resolution as to the prices of admission does not meet with the approval of some of the members of the corporation, who are likely to oppose the recommendation of the committee in council. The proceeds of the opening are to be distributed amongst the various charities of the town. By the plan proposed only about £11,000 will be raised; and as the expense will be more than half of that sum, there will only be a small amount left for the charities. It is therefore contended by some that either the tickets should be sold at a lower rate, or the price fixed so as to yield more for the charitable institutions; whilst other gentlemen think that the corporation ought to issue tickets gratuitously to the burgesses on the occasion of the inauguration of a building which has been erected and will be maintained at the expense of the ratepayers.

BATLEY.—A musical festival took place lately here, of which we have received the following notice from our Leeds Correspondent:—

"Under the high sounding title of 'Grand Musical Festival, at Batley,' two concerts have been given this week on the occasion of opening a new Town Hall at Batley—a small, dirty, but thriving manufacturing town, about eight miles from Leeds. The Hall is a plain looking conventicle style of building, capable of seating, comfortably, about 500 persons, and has been chiefly built for holding public meetings, concerts, lectures, &c., &c. The committee connected with the undertaking determined to have a musical opening. It was settled that two concerts—morning and evening—sacred and secular—should be given with a full band and chorus. The morning selections included portions of The Creation, St. Paul, and Elijah; and the evening programme was made up of two overtures (Masaniello and William Tell), and the usual amount of songs and duets. The principal vocalists were Mr. and Mrs. Lockey, Mrs. Sunderland, Mr. Hinchliffe, and Mr. Delavanti. The band and chorus belonged chiefly to the Leeds Choral Society, Mr. Robert Burton, of Leeds, conducting. The morning performance passed off creditably—Mrs. Lockey in 'O rest in the Lord,' elicited the warmest applause; no less favour was shewn to Mrs. Sunderland for her singing of 'With verdure clad;' to Mr. Lockey for his graceful delivery of 'If with all your hearts,' and to Mr. Hinchcliffe for one of the Bass Solos.

"The band and chorus were limited as to numbers, but both did their best. The evening concert in a musical point of view was unsuccessful. Everything gave place to Mr. Delavanti, who was the grand favorite with the majority of the audience, and who was vociferously encored in all his comic songs. On the whole, however, the festival was successful. The morning attendance was but moderate, but in the evening the Hall was crowded in every part."

TALKING of Leeds, we may mention that Mr. Spark has been appointed professor of the pianoforte and vocal music at the New Ladies' School lately formed in connection with the Leeds' Literary Society and Mechanics' Institution. There were several candidates for the professorship, which, from the large number of pupils, is likely to prove lucrative.

SCRIBE A THIEF.—Some time since a partnership in the authorship, and in the profits accruing from Mon Etoile, by Scribe, was claimed by M. de Boigne—that gentleman declaring that M. Scribe had merely dramatized a feuilleton of his without leave or law. M. Scribe replied in a courteous rejoinder, which was read in court. M. Scribe's reply acquainted M. de Boigne that, ten years ago, before the feuilleton in question was published, he had been told, by M. Dupin, the anecdote on which both fale and comedy were based; that there and then M. Scribe had made a note of the subject and sketched the plan of his piece; though it was but last year that, at the instance of Madame Volnys, he finished Mon Etoile, to be played by her at St. Petersburgh. Not satisfied with M. Scribe's explanation—piqued, perhaps, at the gentle raillery of its tone—M. de Boigne brought the matter before the Courts of Justice. The result was, a verdict against him.

FOREIGN.

PARIS.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The revivals at the Opéra-Comique have been very numerous lately, and include Les Voitures Versées, Le Déserteur, Haydée and Les Porcherons. M. Delaunay-Riquier and Mdlle. Andréa Favel were greatly applauded in Le Déserteur. The following, according to M. Adolph Adam, are the conditions imposed upon M. Perrin, in the management of the Théâtre-Lyrique :—

"The annual vacation is reduced to two months, so that there will be performances during ten entire months each year. Every year, three acts, at least, by composers who have never appeared before the public, must be produced. Not more than six acts of composers who have had four works performed at the Opéra-Comique, can be produced in one season. Authors, however, will always have the right of transferring to the Théâtre-Lyrique works which have not appeared for two years at the Opéra-Comique. The Laureates of the Institute will have the privilege of producing a piece, in two acts, at least, in the year following their return to Paris. The libretto will be furnished by the management; and if any dispute should arise on this point, it will be decided by a special committee appointed by the Minister. The companies and répertoires of the two theatres will be entirely distinct. The Minister will authorise, under peculiar circumstances, the transfer of the répertoire of the Opéra-Comique to the Théâtre-Lyrique. but not vice versâ. The privilége is for the same time as that of the Opéra-Comique. Nevertheless, the Minister reserves the right of withdrawing the privilége of the Théâtre-Lyrique, at the expiration of three years, without any indemnification, if the experiment shall not, in his opinion, have proved satisfactory; but the manager cannot give up one without renouncing the other."

According to another authority, M. P. A. Fiorentino, the following are the principal works in perspective :—

"A piece in three acts, by MM. Dennery and Adolphe Adam, for Mad. Marie Cabel. Le Billet de Marguerite, the libretto by MM. De Leuven and Brunswick, and the music by M. Gevaërt. A work by MM. De Saint Georges and Halévy. A piece, by M. Jules Barbier, entitled Le Roman de la Rose. Another by MM. Wilbach and Ortolan. There is still a report that the theatre will re-open with La Promise, for the first re-appearance of Mad. Marie Cabel."

To this we must add an opera in three acts, by M. Wekerlin. At the Gymnase, a new piece in two acts, by MM. Wailly and Germain Delavigne, is announced under the title of Un Conte d'autrefois. There is, also, some talk of reviving Le Pressoir, for the re-appearance of Mad. Rose Chéri, and of producing a novelty, in one act, entitled Le Compagnon de Voyage by M. Ernest Serret.—The company at the Vaudeville are actively preparing for the ensuing campaign. The principal parts in the pièce-d'ouverture, by M. Mélesville, will be sustained by M. Brindeau and Mdlle. Luther. Two other vaudevilles (one by M. Labiche for M. Félix, the other by MM. Dumanoir and Clairville, for Mdlle. Marie Mocker), will accompany the piece by M. Mélesville. M. Brindeau's engagement, at the Théâtre-Français, was not to terminate before October, but he has obtained permission to leave a month sooner, and is thus enabled to take part in the performances of the first night at the Vaudeville.—A new piece, entitled, Si ma Femme le savait, by MM. Lubize and Lange, has been produced at the Variétés with success.—A new piece, Préparations au Baccalauréat, is in rehearsal at the Palais-Royal, where M. Ravel made his re-appearance at the gratuitous performance, on the 15th inst., the Emperor's fête.—The drama of Schamyl continues to attract crowded houses at the Porte-Saint-Martin. The same holds good of Suzanne, at the Ambigu and Le Sanglier d'Ardennes, at the Gaîté—thanks to the wild boar, M. Vanderburk the author of the piece, has been christened M. Van Amburgh by the wits of the Boulevard du Temple.—It is said that M. Camille Doucet, chief of the section of the theatres, lately undertook two journies, on account of the Minister of State, one being in connection with the reappearance of Madlle. Plessy, at the Théâtre-Français, the other in reference to a new work of Madame Georges Sand, for the same theatre. The Minister of State has already addressed a circular to all the prefects, in the various departments, for the purpose of obtaining exact information with regard to the state of the provincial theatres. This information will serve as the basis of a general reorganization, which the Minister feels to be imperiously necessary.

M. Meyerbeer has received an invitation to direct the mise-en-scène of the Etoile du Nord, at Vienna, which he has promised to accept after the first representation of the opera at Stuttgart. The following from Le Ménéstrel, is an account of the money taken at the various theatres, balls, concerts, etc., of Paris, during the month of July :—

ITALY.—The spread of the cholera in Italy has had the effect of closing many of the theatres, and if the contagion continue to spread, we shall soon have nothing at all to record about operatic doings in the land of song. Our correspondent informs us that the theatres of Genoa and the environs have all been closed by superior orders. We now find, on the authority of the Italian papers, that the same sanitary precautions have been adopted at Leghorn, and that Naples is expected to follow the example. We find, as we expected, in the Gazetta Musicale, of Milan, a version entirely different from that which we gave last week, in an extract from a private letter, as to the doings of the operatic company at Padua. The writer says that "The opera of Robert le Diable was coolly received; Firstly, because the tenor was not equal to the part of the Protagonista (the name of the tenor is Mr. Charles Braham); Secondly, because Sig. Selva did not answer public expectation; Thirdly, because the orchestra was unable to accompany some of the singers, etc., etc.; and Fourthly, because the singers, not being paid, did not attend rehearsals. Mad. Alaimo was praiseworthy in the part of Alice; the chorus did its best; and the orchestra, in spite of the difficulties with which it had to contend, got on pretty well." We refer our readers to our private letter of last week, and they will find that we agree with the Italian journal as regards the third and fourth articles, with the exception of the partial success attributed to Mad. Alaimo, who, as our correspondent informs us, was decidedly hissed. The first article is false. Mr. Charles Braham was the only efficient singer in the troop, and performed his part well, although swindled out of his money by the management. Why does not the writer lay the blame on the right person, the Marquis Selvatico? or, not daring to do that, remain silent, and not accuse an unoffending foreigner? We should not reproach him on account of his silence. We know the state of affairs at Milan, but are astonished at his servility. If the Italians cannot afford to pay their singers, they must do without opera, as we do in London. We really do not know which to admire most—the chief of the police, who orders into arrest a singer (Selva)—not daring to do the same to Mr. C. Braham, an Englishman—because the former refuses to sing without being paid; the Marquis Selvatico and the manager, who provoke the hostility of the police against the unpaid artists; or the journalist, who shifts the blame of the transaction from the shoulders of these worthies to those of two unoffending singers. Now we are on this subject, we may as well have it out with the above-named journal, whose correspondent in London is discharging his wrath on Madame and Signor Puzzi with such virulence; the excess of malevolence in his articles defeat their object. The one to which we allude is in the Gazetta Musicale of the 13th August. We shall begin with a few extracts, from which our readers will perhaps surmise that the "correspondent" in question never was in London. "It is true that the concert of Madame Puzzi was held in Willis's Rooms and not in the Beethoven Rooms, but we certainly did not write thus from malice, but through inadvertancy. Everybody knows that the Beethoven Rooms is the most ancient and illustrious (!) concert-room in London, and where the Philharmonic and Quartet Association do not disdain to give their concerts. All the most illustrious (!) concert-givers, with Madame Puzzi at their head, would be but too delighted to have the room half filled with paying people," &c. Now, to our London public any remarks on the above would be an insult; but to our Italian readers we must say that it is ridiculously false from beginning to end. The Beethoven Rooms are Modern, and by no means "illustrious," when compared with other concert-rooms in London; and the Philharmonic Society never gave a concert there. The rooms are not large; they hold under three hundred persons; whilst the Hanover Square, Willis's Rooms, and the Concert Room at Her Majesty's Theatre can accommodate a thousand. We may therefore conclude, that the London "Correspondent" of the Milanese Journal is a Myth. We shall but briefly allude to the abuse of Madame Puzzi and her husband, and must premise that the

"Myth" has confounded two concerts—the one given by Signor Puzzi at Drury Lane Theatre, and the other by Madame in a concert room. He says, that Madame Puzzi "not singing, because she cannot, not composing, because she cannot, not presiding at the pianoforte, because she cannot play, confines herself to beating the time with her head and hands behind the artists' back." That Madame Puzzi does not sing is true; but before she lost her voice many years ago, and when she was Mdlle. Tosi, she was a first-rate prima donna, and had been very successful in Italy before she came to London; since she lost her voice she has not, of course, attempted to sing. Whether she be a composer of music or not, or a good pianiste, we really do not know, neither is it all material. There is another accusation—that "Mad. Puzzi frequently takes a pleasure in beating four time when the artist is singing in three time, and vice-versâ; now the English, who blindly believe in La Puzzi, infer that the singer is a blockhead because he does not sing in time, so that the reputation of many an artist has thus been perilled by Madame Puzzi." Comment on this is unnecessary. The ignorance and malice of the writer are too apparent. We warn our Italian contemporary against the writer of Carteggi di Londra, whoever he may be. Such articles as this do more harm to those who publish them than to those who are attacked. We have not taken up this subject on account of the importance we attach to such criticism, since to those acquainted with the truth, it offers its own condemnation, but because unhappily it exercises some influence in Italy.

Milan, 12th August.—(From our own Correspondent).—At the Teatro Canobbiana, the rehearsals of the first ballet for the autumnal season, La Lampada Meravigliosa, of Signor Monticini, have commenced.—The Teatro Santa Radegonda has again been closed before the expiration of the season, with some loss to the principal artists, who worked the concern on their own account.—At the Teatro Carcano, the reproduction of I Puritani, with the prima donna Signora Marcolini, and the French tenor Signor G. Dufrêne, has been again postponed for a few days, in consequence of the indisposition of Signor Prattico. Ida di Danimarca has had but two representations, the second of which was given to an almost empty house. A great deficiency in the receipts has been sustained. Practical people will ask, what other result could have been anticipated—with such artists? The majority are scarcely equal to secondary parts. The fact is, that good artists are now at a discount even in Italy, the "mezzo di del mondo," and singing, threatens ere long to degenerate into something unworthy to be called an art.

Turin.—At the Teatro Gerbino, the Figlia del Reggimento, with Signora Lipparini, the tenor Banti, and the baritone Bonafos, has met with but little success. With the tenor Errani, however, it had a more favourable reception. Il Teatro Nazionale has been reopened with Le Prigioni d'Edimburgo, by Ricci: Giovanni, Signora Malpassuto; Ida, Signora Graziello; Tom, Signor Migliara; and tenor, Signor Caserini. The execution was proved satisfactory.

Brescia.—Verdi's Il Trovatore has pleased immensely, executed by the Signore Salvini-Donatelli and De-Gianni Vives, and Signori Bettini, Ferri, and Della-Costa. La Zingara of Balfe is in rehearsal for the prima donna, Mad. Pozzi, and the tenor Signor Remorini.—On the 5th instant, the Theatre Riccardi, at Bergamo, was opened with Rigoletto: Gilda, Signora Bendazzi; Maddalena, Signora Bodina; Il Duca, Signor Malvezzi; Rigoletto, Signor Corsi; Sparafucile, Signor Vialetti. The execution gave satisfaction, and the opera is a greater favourite than on its first performance, two years ago.

Genoa.—The theatres have all been closed, by order of the civil authorities, on account of the cholera. Among its victims are the prima donna, Signora Elisa Luxoro-Pretti, and the buffo, Lorenzo Manari.

Sinigallia.—Norma has been produced, with Signore Medori and Remorini, and Signori Carrion and Benedetti. The applause was enthusiastic. Don Pasquale was put into rehearsal on the 3rd instant, for the third appearance of Mad. Medori, assisted by Signori Stecchi-Bottardi, De-Bassini, and Scalese.

Trieste.—La Muta di Portici of Auber was given on the evening of the 5th instant—Signora Campagna-Cassali in the part of Elvira; Massaniello, Signor Ippolito Kubly; Pietro, Signor Nerini. The part of the dumb girl was sustained by Signora Virginia Deponte. The opera is well got up, and the execution praiseworthy.

New York.—Since our last, Verdi's opera, Luisa Miller, has been produced at the Italian Opera at Castle Garden five times, and each time with increased success. The New York Musical Review is in raptures both with the music and the execution, more especially with the singing of Sig. Beraldi, who is enthusiastically cheered every night in the scena "Ah! mi tradia." Signor Mario, in their opinion, had better look to his laurels. The part of Miller is well rendered by Sig. Graziani, although, as the above paper pithily states, "Graziani is great on rage, but seems to have no conception of anything approaching religious devotion." Mad. Gomez has a good style and seems to appreciate what should be done, but is unfortunately unable to do it. Mad. d'Ormy is an excellent contralto, with a good voice and a good method. Both the chorus and orchestra are highly spoken of, and M. Maretzek and his company are gaining ground in public favour. Auber's Masaniello has also been performed with Mad. Bertucca Maretzek in the part of Elvira. We have to record the melancholy intelligence of the death of Sig. Pozzolini, the young and promising tenor of the troupe of the late Mad. Sontag, who died at Mexico, June 25th, also of the cholera. The following is the composition of the troupe of English singers who are engaged to open the Broadway Theatre: Miss Louisa Pyne, Mrs. Pyne, Mr. Harrison, and Mr. Bassoni. The Californian papers state that Miss Catherine Hayes is about to start for Australia. Strakosch, the pianist, arrived at San Francisco, July 1st; he was compelled to leave Ole Bull, the violinist, on the Isthmus, awaiting the arrival of his violins, money, and valuables, which he had intrusted to the care of somebody to bring over.—In the New York Musical World and Times, we find that another death has occurred in the operatic company at Mexico:—"The last news from that city announces the death of Sig. Rossi, a gentleman well known to the New York public. He was a native of the Pontifical States, and was educated for the bar. Having taken a leading part in the political agitation of his country, he became an exile, and, having a fine voice and some knowledge of music, he accepted an engagement with Signors Sanquirico and Pati to sing at the Astor Place Opera House, where he was highly successful. He was only 38 years of age when he died."—We understand that our old friend Signor Marini is now labouring under an attack of the cholera. Hopes are held out of his recovery, and we sincerely trust that they will be verified. The following from the San Francisco Commercial Advertiser is an abstract of musical doings at the gold regions:—

"San Francisco, June 28.—The opera of Linda was repeated last night to a tolerably fair house, the rifle corps of Capt. Schaffer, the 'Marion Guards,' occupying prominent seats in the parquet. To attempt a lengthy criticism of the performances would be useless. Madame Anna Bishop is too well known to require a word of praise. The other prominent characters sustained their parts to the satisfaction of the audience. To-night the patrons of the theatre and the lovers of opera will have an opportunity of witnessing Madame Bishop in the character of Lucrezia—We have it, from high authority, that Miss Catherine Hayes will take her departure from this city for Australia on the 8th of July. While we regret our California favourite is so soon to leave us, we have the gratification of announcing that she will give a concert before her departure. We bespeak for her the most cordial welcome, and trust she may realize golden rewards in the far-off Southern islands of the Pacific. Last evening a crowded and fashionable audience attended to hear Felicien David's Ode Symphony, The Desert. The orchestra, containing some of the best performers in the State, was excellent. The chorus which was sung by the members of three of our most noted musical societies, was in all respects admirable, and the whole, under the direction of Mr. R. Herold, exceeded the most sanguine expectations. Mr. Beutler sang the tenor part, and Mr. S. W. Leach recited the 'introductory.' The audience retired delighted with the entertainment."

The following is taken from a Boston musical paper:—

"The Boston Theatre is progressing rapidly towards completion. A broad passage-way to Washington-street has been cut through the Melodeon, and is intended to serve as an entrance both to the Theatre and to the Melodeon, and the workmen are now occupied in putting up a front of brown freestone and iron, on Washington Street. The arrangements of the interior of the building are spacious, elegant and comfortable, beyond anything that we have ever had in this city."

We may close our article by stating that everybody is on the tip-toe of expectation about the arrival of Mad. Grisi and Sig. Mario, who are expected about the 21st of August.

The workmanship of this instrument is sound and effectual, and its tone is a good specimen of the maker's style in this particular. We recommend Mr. Walker, however, to make the next quint he has occasion for of metal. Wood stops of this description have, we know, the authority of some German organs for their use, but their quality has never been so agreeable as to make their reproduction advisable. There is a hooting quality more or less inseparable from stopped wood pipes which must infallibly give an unpleasant prominence to a grave harmonic interval, such as the fifth. The same experiment was tried in the Chester Cathedral organ by Gray and Davison, but the effect was found bad, and a metal quint has been always since used by those builders.

We rejoice to find the CC compass for the manuals at length in use by Mr. Walker. He was for a long period an unflinching advocate of that unsymmetrical, inconvenient, and, indeed, absurd arrangement in which the compass of the manuals is GG or FFF, and that of the pedals CCC. It is, however, never too late to mend, and Mr. Walker's conversion to that which is the true, and must become the universal, system, will not, doubtless, be without its influence in the proper direction.

On the completion of the instrument in the manufactory, Mr. Best gave one of his admirable performances on it, to the great delight of a very numerous audience.

Miss Arabella Goddard, the celebrated English pianist, was a short time in Paris, lately, en route for Baden-Baden, viâ Strasbourg.

Mario.—"Apropos of Mario," wrote a correspondent last autumn, "he has been in Florence, looking as much like a fine Titian as ever; his, indeed, being one of those classically beautiful countenances, partaking largely of that antique type perpetuated by the great masters. In Italy, Mario ceases to be a stage actor, and is restored to his proper sphere, being in rank a duke, son of a former governor of Nice, and, as such, is treated with the highest distinction. Florence has been rejoicing over him as the man she 'delighteth to honour,' particularly as he has flattered the vanity of the city by purchasing a splendid villa, formerly occupied by Mr. Vansittart, just out of the Porta San Gallo, under the shadow of the beautiful orange-terraced hill of Fiesole, crowned, as with a mural diadem, by the ancient Etruscan capitol. Although Mario's visits are generally brief, some splendid fêtes were given in his honour. I was present at one given at our great English banker's, Baron F——, so well known and esteemed as the Torlonia of Florence. The whole of the superb apartments of the Palazzi Corani were thrown open to the beau monde, who came in shoals, hoping and expecting to hear Mario sing, which, strange to say, he never has yet done in Italy. The great tenore was too much fatigued by a rapid journey to gratify the company; and although he looked blooming with health and in the highest spirits, and kept provokingly hovering about the piano, not one note did we hear of his honey-like voice. The Pope's Nuncio at the Tuscan Court, after being introduced to him, added his solicitations to the others, but was alike refused."

Music.—Channing says, "I am no musician, and want a good ear; and yet I am conscious of a power in music, which I want words to describe. It touches chords, reaches depths in the soul, which lie beyond all other influences, extends my consciousness, and has sometimes given me a pleasure which I may have found in nothing else. Nothing in my experience is more mysterious, more inexplicable. And instinct has always led men to transfer it to Heaven, and I suspect the Christian under its power, has often attained to a singular consciousness of his immortality. Facts of this nature make me feel what an infinite mystery our nature is, and how little our books of science reveal it to us."

GIULIA GRISI.

During the Carnival Season of 1832, Giulietta Grisi played other parts in the comprimaria line, the most successful of which was Jane Seymour in Donizetti's Anna Bolena—the unfortunate Queen of Henry VIII. being, of course, represented by Pasta. The youth and beauty of our heroine admirably fitted her for the character, and gave a colour and excuse for the passion of the amorous and inconstant monarch. It was on the first performance of Anna Bolena, at the end of the duet, "Tu mia rivale!" where the jealous and indignant Anna overwhelms Jane Seymour with her reproaches, that Pasta turned to Giulietta, and addressed to her, in a tone of emphasis and conviction almost prophetic, the following short and memorable sentences:—"Tu iras loin!"—"Tu prendras ma place!"—"Tu seras Pasta!" Such a prediction, from such a seer, could not fail to make an indelible impression on a nature so ardent, zealous, and enthusiastic as that of Giulietta; and never did she forget the words, which remained engraven on her heart as in characters of fire, urged on her ambition, and stimulated her to eager and ever-fresh exertion. On another occasion, when the same opera was represented, and, after the same scene, where the duet alluded to occurs, Pasta—darting at Giulietta one of those queen-like glances, with which she could sometimes startle and electrify a whole audience—exclaimed, half pettishly, half kindly—"Had I been Henry, I too should have preferred you!"

Very little more is known or remembered about Giulia Grisi's first and only season at Milan, which, as fate willed it, was her very last in her native country. The Carnival terminated on the 20th of March; and so prosperous had been the season that the impresario renewed Pasta's engagement for twenty nights, relying on the co-operation of the young comprimaria as a matter of certainty. He reckoned without his host, however—for, one fine night, Giulietta was missing, and no where to be found. Search was made for her in vain; inquiries were instituted in every direction, but to no purpose. Adalgisa had fled—and without Pollio.

We have said that the terms of her six years' contract with Lanari were very disadvantageous to Giulietta. The wily manager, in short, had—to use a vulgar phrase—"taken her in;" and she, on her side, was determined—to employ an equally familiar expression—to "serve him out." The father of our heroine, who, in the absence of her sister Giuditta—at that period in London—was her only counsellor, had made up his mind either to force Lanari into according his daughter better conditions, or to invent some means of breaking with him altogether. He expostulated, but to no purpose; the manager was not to be ousted of his right. Giulietta was, by legal contract, his exclusive property for five more years to come, and he was resolved to enforce his just claims. She had turned out a prize, it was true, and a rich one; but the issue might have been different, and in that case he would have been compelled to pay her, and to keep her, all the same. At last, however, the vexed and angry parent hit upon an expedient. He remonstrated with the manager that the engagement had been made and signed without his consent, and against his will; and that, as his daughter was a minor, the contract was worthless in the eye of the law. Unhappily, however, Lanari had a ready and conclusive answer to this argument. "If," said he, "the contract was signed without your consent and against your will, you will have to explain to the tribunal, before which I shall summons your daughter, Giulietta, in case of her refusing to fulfil any future engagement I may make for her—and you are aware it is stipulated that I have the power to 'farm her out,' where, how, and to whom I please—you will have to explain to this tribunal, how it is that you yourself have invariably received her salary at the treasury of the theatre." To this, the other had not a word in reply; and so far as he was concerned the matter ended there.

But, while her father had been foiled at all points, Giulietta was the more resolute in her determination to rid herself of Lanari, and to devote the flower of her youth to a more profitable end than that of serving a third-rate contracting manager and theatrical agent, as a hack, enriching him and doing no good to herself. "Since he is so mean, paltry, exacting, and unjust—so ungrateful and avaricious—" said our heroine, one day, to Bellini—"I will take the law into my own hands, and set him at defiance. Leave Milan I will—and that in a few hours. You shall go with me—you shall aid me." "I cannot go with you—and I cannot aid you"—was Bellini's reply. "I shall offend Merelli, and I shall offend Pasta—and then what will become of my Norma, without an Adalgisa, if you leave, and with an indignant prima donna? You know it will be played at least ten times more, questa stagione."

Giulietta made no answer. Unmoved and resolute as before, she thought of another means of carrying out her plan. There was at that time at Milan a musical composer of the name of Marliani. Although a musician of talent, and then much in vogue, he had not the celebrity of Bellini; but he was much less egotistical, and at the same time much more steadfast in his friendship for the beautiful Giulietta, of whose talent and personal gifts he was an ardent and unbounded admirer. To him our heroine made the same confession, and solicited his advice and assistance as she had solicited the advice and assistance of Bellini. What Bellini had refused, Marliani accorded with readiness; what Bellini had declined, Marliani accepted, at once and eagerly. He approved of Giulietta's resolution, consulted with her about the means of carrying it out, and agreed to see her safe across the frontiers, and to provide the means for her conveyance as speedily as possible, viâ Switzerland, to France and Paris. The plot was disclosed to the father of our heroine, who approved of it; and, on a Friday, taking advantage of the theatre being closed on that day of the week, Giulietta prepared everything, started late at night, and arrived, without accident or interruption, at a place called Bellinzona. Here, however, a most unfortunate discovery was made. They had forgotten their passports! Without passports it was difficult to go any further; and, at any rate, to get into France was out of the question.

What was to be done? Expedient after expedient was proposed, and rejected no sooner than proposed, as unfeasible. At length, it was proposed by Marliani that they should return to Milan, get the passports, and set out again without delay. "It will not yet have been remarked that we are gone," he said, "since on Friday there is no opera. Even should we be missed, it will merely be thought that we have been on a country excursion." "You can do as you please," replied Giulietta; "as for me, I shall not return to Milan on any account, and passport or no passport, am determined to make the best of my way into France. Once across Switzerland, I can write to Giuditta from Basle, and she will be able to get me to Paris, through the interest of the Minister of the Interior, whom she knows." Marliani answered her that it was impossible; but so inflexible was his fair companion, that he at last gave up the point and consented to leave her. "You have only one thing to do," he said—"your femme-de-chambre has a passport, which is good to pass the Swiss frontier. She is much of your height and of your complexion, nor is she much older than yourself. Take her passport. Cross the frontier. We will go back to Milan, and you can wait for us at the first town." Marliani's proposition was joyfully accepted. Although it was very late in the night, Giulietta refused to stay an instant longer at Bellinzona, hired a carriage and horses (the best that could be found by the innkeeper), and started immediately. She did well—for, less than half an hour after she had left, some Government gens-d'armes, who had been sent in quest of her, arrived at Bellinzona, in company with Lanari, at the very inn where she had been staying. They were just in time to be too late, however. Giulietta crossed the frontier before they could come up with her—although the landlord, terrified lest he should have been unwittingly aiding and abetting in the flight of some political offender, had given them precise details about the route she was taking.

Lanari, furious at being thus outwitted, abused and reviled Marliani, and threatened to prosecute the father of Grisi, who, with the utmost sang froid, persisted in asserting that he knew nothing whatever about his daughter's flight, nor of the direction in which she intended to travel.

But if Lanari was outdone, poor Marliani was still more unlucky. Hastening to obtain his own passport, and that of Giulietta, for the maid, he returned without a moment's delay to Bellinzona, where he remained more than a week at the inn to no purpose. Post after post arrived, but no letter from Giulietta! Thoughtful and sad, disappointed, désillusionné, in love and almost desperate, he left Bellinzona and returned to Milan alone, and on foot, without casting a thought upon the forlorn femme-de-chambre, or caring a straw what became of her. Fortunately for herself, the soubrette had relations in the neighbourhood of Bellinzona, to whom, as soon as Marliani was gone, she had immediate recourse.

Once on her journey, Giulietta was so nervous, anxious, and flurried, so eager to go on and so loth to linger on the road, so fearful of being pursued and arrested, carried back in triumph to Milan, and again in the power of the poor-spirited Lanari—who would be sure to have his revenge of her—that she forgot the letter, forgot her agreement to stay at the first Swiss town, where nevertheless she would have been quite safe, and, in fact, forgot Marliani altogether. The journey to Paris occupied her eleven days, night and day (there were no railroads then, we need scarcely say), through bad roads, over mountain-passes covered with snow, with sorry horses, and clumsy vehicles, ready to break down or overturn at every obstacle, and, what was more, for one so young and handsome, travelling all the way alone. Her courage and resolution, however, never failed her for one instant; and luckily she was young, strong, healthy, and able to endure all kinds of fatigue, and to pass night after night without sleep or repose. The wonder was, in the midst of such troubles, that, what with cold and wet, and want of rest, she did not lose her voice, and thus rob the musical art of one of its future brightest ornaments. But destiny was kinder to her. She arrived at Paris, safe and sound, though almost dead from long continued exertion, sleeplessness, anxiety, and toil.

At Paris Giulietta soon found out her sister Giuditta, who had just then returned from her London engagement, and was singing at the Théâtre-Italien. The meeting was most touching. Delighted, though astonished, to see her sister, Giuditta threw herself in her arms, and cried like a child. Then, asking her a thousand questions, about Milan, Merelli, Pasta, Bellini—about their father and Lanari—about Marliani, Bellinzona, and the flight, the passport, the maid, the gens-d'armes, the frontiers, and the journey, she at length exclaimed, with unfeigned pleasure—"Enfin, te voilà à Paris!—te voilà encore une fois avec ta petite Giuditta—Maintenant tu seras quelque-chose—Tu a bien fait—bien, bien fait—Embrasse-moi encore, Giuliettina—chère, chère Lietta." And she promised that very day to go to Rossini—who was then one of a triumvirate to whose management the Italian Opera was committed, the other two being Robert and Severini—to obtain for her an engagement, or at least the promise of a début on trial. Giuditta was as good as her word. Rossini, who remembered his young protégée at Bologna, at once consented, and pledged himself that she should have not only a début on trial, but a bonâ fide engagement—and, which was better still not as comprimaria but as prima donna, for which, he said, she was now quite old enough.

The Abbé Stadler's opinion of Herr Weber's conclusions with respect to the "Confutatis Maledictis" resembles so nearly that which I have myself expressed on the subject, and what, doubtless, every one thinks, that it is unnecessary for me to quote it. Nor shall I follow the author in his remarks on those pieces of the Requiem which Herr Weber has not dissected. It is true that the desire of praising the Requiem is a great temptation, but it is one which my present task commands me to resist. This is not the place. Mozart's defender replies as follows to the remarks on the fugue "Quam olim:"

"All Catholic composers have treated this text in the same way as Mozart, which is also that prescribed by the Church. In the Requiems of Vogler and Winter, the words 'Quam olim' are repeated much oftener. Mozart felt that they had a deep meaning. He knew that they expressed the Christian's unalterable confidence in the promises of God, and, for this reason, repeated the 'Quam olim' with far more edifying expression than his predecessors."

Stadler thought it was hardly worth the trouble to disprove the criticism on the "Hostias," which contains the most unimportant, if not the most fallacious, objection raised by Herr Weber. After victoriously adducing his circumstantial and critical proofs, the Abbé proceeds to attack his opponent with the argumentum ad hominem:

"You think," he says, "that the Requiem is the least perfect and most incomplete work of Mozart's? Well, then, I, Maximilian Stadler, assert, that in the first three parts, that is to say, in four-fifths of the whole, it is Mozart's most perfect and most admirable work. I can, also, cite Joseph and Michael Haydn, Winter, Beethoven, Cherubini, Eibler, Krommer, Gyrowetz, and even Salieri,* besides a thousand others who think and speak exactly as I do. Among these names there are, probably, some which sound as well as your own, Herr Gotfried Weber; and the opinion of the two Haydns, Cherubini, Beethoven, and Winter may, perhaps, weigh down the authority of all the musical papers in the world, even including the Cäcilia. Do not forget either that, in order to acknowledge the Requiem as the authentic, and, at the same time, finest work of Mozart, the above great judges did not wait for material proofs. They would have blushed at the idea of requiring the insertion of a fac-simile in a newspaper, or consulting professional caligraphers, before deciding whether the composition was that of a scholar, or the masterpiece of them all. No; they were incapable of seeking for proofs at such a source. For them, the proofs were contained in the entire inward structure—the invention, the execution, the deeply planned development of the ideas, and, in a word, the intrinsic value of the score."

Reasons, which will become only too apparent in the course of our statement, unfortunately induced Stadler to adopt a reserve greatly to be regretted with regard to the historical portion of the dispute. He was the first to name, in his private letter to Herr Weber, the person who ordered the Requiem—a certain Count von Wallsegg; but he does not name him in his pamphlet—an unnecessary piece of carefulness, since his letter was afterwards published in the Cäcilia. The following are the few particulars which the Abbé Stadler thought himself at liberty to give:—

Before delivering Süssmayer's manuscript, that is, the complete score of the Requiem, to the "Unknown" (the Count von Wallsegg), the Abbé had two copies of it taken. "One of them," he says, "was sent to a music publisher in Leipsic, to be printed, and the other remained in Vienna, where the work was shortly afterwards performed, for the benefit of the widow." The author has here separated one particular fact from another rather equivocal, as the reader will perceive, although there is very evidently a mutual relation between the two, which we shall prove further on. A short time after Mozart's death, the anonymous or unknown individual, whom we, however, at present know, heard that the work he had ordered, and liberally paid for, was not the production of the deceased alone.

"In consequence of this," (says the Abbé,) "he sent the manuscript to a very celebrated advocate in Vienna, with a request that the latter would obtain all the particulars connected with the subject. The widow was questioned, and requested Herr von Nissen and myself, as the persons best informed, to go to the advocate. We readily acquiesced. The score was laid before us, and I pointed out what belonged to Mozart and what to Süssmayer. With this, the affair ended, the manuscript being returned to its unknown possessor, who expressed himself satisfied."

Here begins a dark labyrinth, full of gaps and contradictions, which increase at every step, and through which the only guide, for a poor reporter like myself, is the slight thread of logic, which threatens to break every instant. Let the reader observe how much is passed over in silence in the few lines I have just quoted. An advocate, and, what is more, a celebrated advocate, is satisfied with the mere fact of the letters M and S, written upon a manuscript score, being pointed out to him. An obscure advocate might, perhaps, have let this pass, but even he would not have done so unless he had been a great musical connoisseur, in which case, I must confess, he must have proceeded with the greatest care and attention. The widow then despatches to this legal notability, the Abbé Stadler and Herr von Nissen, the two men best acquainted with the matter. In my poor opinion, there was another person much better informed than either of them. Süssmayer was still living, and it would not have been necessary to send far for him, as he resided in Vienna. It was he whom the widow should have sent to the lawyer, supposing that the latter was only commissioned to obtain information; but Süssmayer did not appear. Let the reader compare this fact with certain parts of the celebrated letter, in which the widow is mentioned, and he will feel convinced that the diversity or rather opposition of their interests in the whole affair had caused a disagreement between them after Mozart's decease. What, however, had become of the original manuscript of the Requiem—of Mozart's unfinished score—which Stadler had in his possession some thirty years before, and which he had copied out, word for word? the Abbé does not know: "Whether Mozart's manuscript of the Requiem, with the 'Kyrie' and 'Dies iræ' still exists, or where it is, although he entertains some well-founded suspicions on the point. As to the 'Lacrymosa' and 'Domine,' both these pieces have been preserved as Mozart wrote them."

The original score, then, had been divided into several portions, and had disappeared immediately after the death of the composer. How did this happen? With a little patience we shall see. We must, nevertheless, own that Stadler did not depart from the truth; he held a part of it back, as he could not do otherwise. And with this terminates our analysis of the pamphlet.

The worthy Abbé's reply was a crusher for Herr Weber. He found himself accused and convicted of slandering Mozart, and, what was worse, of having committed mistakes of which a professor of musical æsthetics ought never to have been guilty. The critical thunderbolts, hurled in far too hazardous a direction, fell, like a ton weight, upon the critic, instead of striking Süssmayer, who, like a convenient conductor, would have withstood their weak attack, without any great harm being done to any one. It was now as clear as day that Mozart, and Mozart alone, was responsible for all the condemned pieces and passages. It was he who in the "Kyrie" had assigned the "gurgling" roulades to the chorus; who had rendered the "Tuba mirum" repulsive and feeble, by interspersing it with "melting tones;" who, by "a wild badgering unison" excited the Supreme Judge against the condemned crowd of sinners, in order to secure his own salvation, miserable egotist that he was; who was foolish enough to write an elaborate fugue upon the "Quam olim," and was, besides, guilty of the absurdity of repeating it, since he wrote with his own hand "Quam olim da capo;" and, lastly, who allowed the "Hostias" to be mixed up with vocal music. Alas! yes—Mozart did all this, without troubling himself in the least about Herr Weber's "just as little can I prevail," etc.

I have said that the reply of the Abbé Stadler was a crushing one; but his opponent himself seemed to be even more humbled by it than he had any necessity to be. Herr Weber had two alternatives: either to recant, and honourably apologise for his criticisms, or to stand up for them and seize the opportunity of acknowledging an error which was actually based upon the very respect he professed for Mozart. Was it not perfectly natural that, according to Herr Weber's views, all that was defective or bungling in the Requiem should be ascribed to Süsmayer, so long as the real state of things was at all doubtful; but, when this was no longer the case, when the criticised passages were acknowledged to be really the work of Mozart, did they become, for that, any the better? Did Mozart alone among mortals enjoy the privilege of infallibility? Certainly not. For my own part, I am so far from entertaining such an opinion, that, in spite of the small value of my verdict in comparison with that of Herr Weber, I do not scruple to blame Mozart, and, in fact, never fail to do so, when he appears to me worthy of blame.* In this, I set out from the principle that, in matters of taste and art, an independent writer has no truth to offer his readers but his own personal conviction. What would become of criticism, if obliged to cringe only before the authority of names, and bend under the yoke of preconceived ideas? Like everyone else, Herr Weber had the right to an opinion of his own, and we are willing to believe that his opinion of the Requiem, however unintelligible it may seem, was genuine. But he adopted neither of the alternatives to which his choice appeared restricted; he resolved to pursue the contest on the previous ground; to fight, in short, against probability—a course in which the odds must always be unfavourable. Hence we see him, in his long reply to the Defence of the Genuineness of Mozart's Requiem, have recourse to desperate arguments, by which I mean such as were scarcely anything more than barely tenable, since they were capable of being turned against himself with a facility and success, as interesting as it was amusing to dialecticians. One thing in this reply struck me particularly: the Abbé's pamphlet is denominated, "A libel full of the coarsest calumnies, the most insulting personalities, and most horrible abuse of Herr Weber; an ephemeral production only written with the intention of exciting against him the rage of fools and fanatics." My readers, who, I presume, found nothing of this description in the analysis of the defence which I laid before them, will ask with astonishment which passages in the pamphlet merit, or even give a plea for, the use of such expressions. It is my duty to satisfy their curiosity.

From a piece of very silly mismanagement, the tenth number of the Cäcilia—the number preceding that in which the article on Mozart's Requiem appeared—contained an article in which Herr Weber, after giving a general outline of his views on the text and music of a mass for the dead, speaks of a requiem which he has himself written. From his very earliest youth, he tells us, he had felt an irresistible impulse to compose a requiem; but, as the text prescribed by the ritual of the Roman Catholic Church did not satisfy him, he had been obliged to write another, since without this, he would have been unable to set his mass for the dead to music. The parts which displeased him were replaced by German chorals, to which he subsequently added a Latin translation.† In this manner, whole strophes of the "Dies iræ" disappeared; among others, the "Confutatis," which, as we are already aware, Herr Weber looks upon as a thorough abomination, and a revolting instance of egotism. After telling us all this, Herr Weber goes through his work, very leisurely, and, perhaps, with a little too much self-complacency.

It is impossible to deny that the relationship between this article and the one immediately following was so apparent, that it must necessarily have struck the most short sighted—and these indeed, more than others. The majority of readers came to the conclusion that Herr Weber endeavoured to depreciate Mozart's Requiem in order to obtain a greater amount of consideration for his own; a conclusion, which, precisely because it is so directly manifest, is not too worthy of our confidence. How can we believe that a man, who, as a theorist, very justly enjoyed considerable reputation; but, on the other hand, a very subordinate position as a composer—a man of sound sense, such as Herr Weber always proves himself to be, could have entertained the absurd notion of overturning Mozart's statue, in order to use it as the basis of his own apotheosis? To suppose him capable of this, would be tantamount to declaring him a madman. But even had this partial derangement troubled his brain, had he not sufficient power of judgment left to carry out so insane a scheme at least with some slight evidence of skill? To publish, however, in immediate succession two articles, the one containing the praises of Herr Weber sung by himself, and the other a criticism on Mozart, and both for the purpose of proving that Herr Weber was superior to Mozart, would no longer be an instance of the partial madness to which I have alluded. On the contrary, it would constitute the most hopeless, extraordinary, and incurable case of insanity with which any of our erring species was ever afflicted.

* This will be proved in the ensuing volumes.

† Should we not almost be justified in believing that Herr Weber expected, in his character of a reformer on a small scale, that the Pope would express his thanks to him, and that his Holiness would, furthermore, instantly decree that the text Herr Weber had substituted for that prescribed by the ritual, should be generally adopted?

MUSIC AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

SIR,—May I be allowed to suggest that in a building devoted to the exhibition of English works of art, English music should have its proper place. The English are not generally considered a musical nation. Those who argue this point, do not sufficiently consider the difficulties in the way of an English composer. They who have published much, know the weight of a foreign name with the public. In these enlightened days it is time this childish nonsense should have an end. Let English music be heard and known as such, and we shall soon have a school of our own, and take our proper stand amongst the musical nations. The great difficulty in the way of a young composer, is to gain for his compositions a fair and impartial hearing. Publishers are shy of young authors, whose productions have often more intrinsic merit than those that bear a name known to the public, and purchased for this reason. Often, whilst compelled to acknowledge the worth of a composition, they profess themselves obliged to refuse it on account of the author having no name. Many have been disheartened by this. And how many of our English composers write under several names, some foreign, some English, that the English public (who in this matter, it appears, require to be conciliated) should not imagine they are always writing, writing themselves out in fact, and that their compositions must lose their value. Could Mendelssohn have written too much? Would any publisher refuse a work of his? I would suggest that the band in the Crystal Palace should devote half the time of its performance at least to English music only, and that there should be some competent artists appointed to receive compositions, and if of sufficient merit see that they are played by the band.

I would also suggest that Herr Schallehn, who, I believe, conducts the band at the Crystal Palace, would please English people better by following the usual custom of English bands, and performing our National Anthem at the close of each day's programme, than by allowing his musicians to march off, leaving the assembled people in amazement at the non-performance of our usual finale, and saying to one another, "They have not finished; they have not played 'God save the Queen.'" There is no good reason why this band, engaged by English people, or at least paid by them, should not give five minutes of their time to this. In such a place it certainly should not be omitted, and there is not an Englishman, musical or otherwise, whose heart does not respond to our National Anthem. It is not alone for the inspiring character of the music, but for the patriotic feelings aroused by the strain.

If, then, no other motive would ensure its performance at the Crystal Palace, regard to the wishes and feelings of English people in a place peculiarly set apart for their instruction and amusement, should have the proper weight.

I have to apologise for intruding myself on your notice, and beg to subscribe myself,

AN ENGLISH MUSICIAN.

"The grand source of the wind is from two immense bellows, each having three feeders, placed in the vaults below the floor of the hall. These are blown by a steam-engine, consisting of a pair of oscillating cylinders. There are, besides, twelve other bellows or reservoirs, each giving its own appropriate pressure of air to those stops or pipes which it supplies.

"The pneumatic lever is applied to each of the manuals distinctly, and also distinctly or separately to the manual couplers. To the pedal organ there is a double set of pneumatic levers, but the most elaborate use of this power is found in its application to the combination of stops; here we have it exhibited in a compound form to each organ individually, and to the whole collectively, where by one operation the player is enabled to produce a combination of stops upon the entire instrument at once. This movement appears in a series of six handsome gold-gilt knobs, placed immediately under each set of manuals, at about two keys' distance from each other, occupying a central position, always within reach of one or other of the performer's thumbs.

"The pneumatic lever is also applied to the opening and shutting of the swell louvres and some other less important purposes.

"The very extensive use Mr. Willis has made of this extraordinary power seems to have rendered any deviation from the ordinary valves, in immediate connection with the pipes, unnecessary, except in the pedal organ, where the large pipes have a very peculiar valve for their supply, which is quiet, sound, and free from the resistance resulting from the compressed air. Space, however, will not permit us to describe this curious mechanism.

"The pedal board is a most ingenious contrivance of Dr. Wesley's. The pedals radiate to a point some distance behind the player, when seated at the instrument; and are circular on plan, and conically segmental in elevation.

"The mode of drawing the stops is different from most organs that we have seen. Each knob, which is of solid ivory, presents itself at an angle of about 30 degrees: by this arrangement, with that of the pedals and the combination movement, the player has remarkable control over the instrument.

"The improvements in the mechanism of this noble organ are patent, and consist—1st. Of the cylindrical valve. 2nd. The exhausting valve to the pneumatic lever, which would, by engineers, be called an opposition surface valve, its object being to facilitate the exhaustion of the bellows, and thus to enhance the reiteration of the touch. 3rd. The throttle valve to the same, whereby the noise always perceptible in pneumatic levers, without this application, is entirely overcome. This is simply a valve placed over the aperture through which the wind must pass, to inflate the pneumatic lever, and although the machine contains all the impulsiveness necessary to insure punctuality, its impetus is gradually checked by the pneumatic bellows closing this valve, which is admirably contrived to have no connection with the movement. 4th. The combination movement, and the application of pneumatic levers, in a compound form, by which we understand one acting upon another. 5th. An improved method of centring or binging such improvements as leads from draw-stops to slides, etc. 6th (Not patent). A most valuable contrivance in the coupling of the pedals with the manuals, whereby the four couplers in reality become eight. This is effected by two pedals on the left of the performer; one pedal produces the connection in unison with the pedal organ, the other in octaves with the same. They can be used separately or together, and stand in such a position as to enable the performer by one operation to detach the whole coupling movement, though the stop be drawn. This is a mechanical contrivance so unique and of such importance and utility that we cannot help thus expatiating upon it.

"We may dismiss the subject of mechanism by remarking that means are in this instrument employed, for the first time, by which all the great, and, it was thought, insurmountable obstacles to the building of an immense organ are entirely overcome. The complete force of the organ will be as much under the command of the performer as that of a small chamber organ, of a single row of keys, while the powers of tone and the variety of effects will far exceed those of every instrument yet built. The quality of the stops (such as we have heard) is exceedingly rich and powerful, and such as, perhaps, has never been equalled, and removes all doubt as to the voicing of this superlatively grand instrument; and the tone, after all, is the grand feature of an organ, however necessary may be the utmost facilities afforded the performer by the mechanical invention.

"Some delay had been experienced in the final arrangement for the erection of this organ, but the result has justified the propriety of maturely considering the best plans before proceeding with the instrument. To the reciprocal and harmonious effects of Dr. Wesley and Mr. Willis, the town council and the inhabitants are indebted for such an unrivalled instrument; and while the opulence of the corporation has justified such an expenditure, the result is both satisfactory and creditable to the gentlemen who have conducted the erection."

The Liverpool organ, and all the wonderful things that have been affirmed, or rather, perhaps, mysteriously hinted about it during many months past, have excited so much general curiosity, that we do not pause for a moment to doubt the welcome our readers will give to the notice above quoted. Besides our ordinary sources of information, we have had "bills of particulars" volunteered without number in our service as to the "superlatively grand instrument" of the day. Long since we could have published lists of what the Liverpool organ did contain, together, perhaps, with a great deal which it did not. We were anxious, however, to avoid all risk of misleading our readers, and consequently determined to make no allusion to the subject, until some description professedly authoritative came to our hands. All doubt is now at an end. Here is a synopsis of this wonderful affair furnished by Dr. Wesley and Mr. Willis themselves, and our readers may feast on it in confidence and comfort. Before offering any remarks on the curious piece of English before us, we must state that we have not seen the Liverpool organ for some months, and have not heard a solitary pipe it contains. All we now have to say, therefore, has reference to the scheme as it appears on paper. At present we must leave it to time, the "edax rerum," to tell truly what is, or is to be, the worldly position of this "unrivalled instrument."

At the outset of the article quoted above from the Liverpool Mail, we are told that the then following description is furnished by "Dr. Wesley and Mr. Willis, the builder." This announcement, we confess, staggers us in no slight degree. Nevertheless, we cannot doubt its accuracy. We cannot believe that our respected Liverpool contemporary would put forth such a statement unless on wholly indisputable ground. Dr. Wesley and Mr. Willis, then, did furnish the description of their organ which we have quoted; and, so doing, they certainly are entitled to the credit of publishing the most unintelligible, unmechanical, and ungrammatical account of a work of art, we have ever had the evil fortune to peruse. It may be, and probably is, more Mr. Willis's vocation to use the chisel than the pen: he may, possibly, be better acquainted with the tone of an open diapason than with the just accents of his mother-tongue. But how Dr. Wesley, an artist and man of education, could lend his name to this insufferable hodge-podge of vulgar puff and bad English, surpasses our comprehension. That "Good wine needs no bush," is a saying as old as the greatest of men; and the constructors of the Liverpool Organ would have done wisely to consider it. To have announced the completion of their instrument, to have tabulated its contents, and to have described its originalities (if it happened to have any), was not only justifiable, but necessary. But they need not have offended the good sense of their readers by a display of all the peculiarities of the quack-doctor,—save only that very moderate amount of good English in which his advertisements usually appear. Unfortunately there can be but little room to doubt the ascribed authorship of this production. Firstly, the fact is stated in the columns of our Liverpool contemporary; and, secondly, the article itself does not, we are glad to say, read like newspaper-writing. True it is that, from the Times downwards, every journal occasionally lets loose some literary awkwardness, some piece of slip-slop diction, that haste, the pressure of matter, and hosts of circumstances, may account for, if not excuse. But no editor, whether principal or subordinate, of any reputed journal in this kingdom, ever penned such a verbal atrocity as we to-day quote. A man so placed knows better,—he has been taught otherwise. He may be wrong in his technicalities, but at least he will be right in his grammar. To Dr. Wesley and Mr. Willis, then, must belong the credit of this production; which we gladly leave to the amusement of those interested in Curiosities of Literature.

Reverting seriously, however, to the matter of this very curious article—we fall into ambuscades and surprises at every turn. Everything we come upon is "curious" or "ingenious" or "patent" or "unique;" so that were we merely to receive the written expressions without a considerable foregone knowledge of the subject, we should jump up from its perusal in a phrensy of wonder and delight. We should be convinced—as no doubt it is intended all the world should be convinced—that the Liverpool organ is a second "Century of Inventions"—that the Marquis of Worcester lives again in the conjoined persons of Mr. Willis and Dr. Wesley—and, in short, that, in addition to a ransacking of England and the Continent, inventive genius, mechanical science, and musical intelligence have been here banded together to produce an instrument of which the superiority in magnitude, originality, and completeness, over everything in existence, admits of neither dispute nor doubt.

Let our readers peruse our extract from the Liverpool Mail, and say if we overstate the case. But what are the novelties really produced in fulfilment of so much promise? Our answer will doubtless astonish our readers—our Liverpool readers especially—but we must give it;—namely, next to none. Take, for example, the list of registers. What does it exhibit beyond a mere magnification of the arrangement of any one out of a hundred smaller instruments? In the Great Organ, for instance, we have four open diapasons instead of two, three principals instead of one, two twelfths instead of one, two fifteenths again instead of one, twenty ranks of mixture in place of ten or fifteen, and six reeds instead of three; while we find omitted certain stops that always have place in great organs of first-class pretension, such as a second double-diapason (stopped, if the other be open, and the reverse), a second stopped diapason (metal, if the other be wood, and the reverse), a quint, a tenth, and an octave clarion, or two-feet reed. This great organ, as it now stands, is little better than a slightly improved edition of Dr. Camidge's notable failure at York Minster; and, we do not hesitate to predict, will be found inferior in effect to some known examples in this country, to say nothing of the master-works on the Continent. It is needless to further pursue this style of remark. None of our readers, being really conversant with organ structure, will fail to perceive that the Liverpool instrument is merely a large organ as to number of pipes. In all its manuals the same features are discoverable. Magnitude is attained, and effect, we presume, sought, by simple re-duplications of old and known qualities. There is no evidence of able design in its scheme, no bold attempt at original invention, no frank and resolute adoption of any of the real novelties which the best men in England, France, and Germany, have in late years turned to such capital account. Even that admirable invention of Cavaillé's, the harmonic system of flue-work—which in the energy and luscious richness of its tones is destined to work a vast but still unseen change in all organ-building—finds no representative in this instrument, which "has never been equalled," save a solitary harmonic flute of four feet pitch in the solo organ! The truth seems to be that it was thought necessary to assemble, first on paper and then on the sound-boards, a huge number of stops;—and here they are, to the number of one hundred and eight, accordingly. As to what may be the effect of this vast assemblage of pipes in the noble building wherein they now stand, we do not, of course, pretend to offer a decided judgment. We speak of it from the scheme now lying before us, and from the known qualities of its builder. It has been a long time in course of completion, has been most sedulously cared for throughout every department, and will cost, we are informed, upwards of £8,000. Time alone can show whether our present opinions will be confirmed by the result.

We have yet more to say with regard to the mechanism of this much-puffed scheme, but want of further space compels us to defer our conclusion until next week, when the subject will receive the attention it merits.

NAPOLEONIANA.

On the ninth of February, 1807, there was a grand concert at the court of Napoléon. Crescentini was to sing. At the appointed hour the Emperor is announced; he enters, takes his seat; the programme is presented to him. The concert commences; after the overture, he reads the programme, and while the first piece is executing, he calls Marshal Duroc in a loud tone, and says a few words in his ear. The Marshal crosses the hall, advances to Monsieur Gregoire, the musical secretary of the Emperor, whose duty it is to prepare the programme for the concerts, and says in a severe tone, "Monsieur Gregoire, the Emperor orders me to recommend to you to make no attempts at wit, in future, in your programmes." The poor secretary is stupified. He does not comprehend in the least what the Marshal means, yet does not raise his eyes. Between each piece all around him are asking, in a low voice, the cause of this affront, and the unfortunate Gregoire, more and more troubled, can only reply, "I know no more than you; I cannot understand it." He expects to lose his office on the morrow, and, already, is arming himself with fortitude to support a disgrace which appears inevitable, though he cannot divine the cause.

The concert is over, and the Emperor leaves, at his departure, the programme on his arm chair. Gregoire runs, seizes it, reads it over and over again, without discovering anything reprehensible. He gives it to his companions, but neither can they see anything but what is perfectly proper, and very innocent jests begin to pour upon the unfortunate secretary, when a sudden inspiration gives him the key to this enigma, and redoubles his terrors. The programme, which was manuscripe according to custom, commenced with these words:—

and instead of allowing a simple line beneath, as usual, a fancy had beized Gregoire to sketch a series of stars, increasing in size to the centre of the page, and decreasing to the other end. Could any one imagine that Napoleon, then at the summit of his glory, would see in this inoffensive ornament an allusion to his past, present, and future fortune!—an allusion disagreeable to himself, and insolent, on the part of a prophet of evil, who might have made it designedly; for the two almost imperceptible stars at the extremities of the line, and the extraordinary size of the one in the centre, would seem to intimate that the imperial luminary, so brilliant then, must successively decline, grow dim, and disappear in an inverse proportion to its progress hitherto. Time has but too well proved its truth; but could the genius of this great man have already unveiled what fate had in store for him; this singular susceptibility would seem to render it probable.

Here is a copy of the programme, which was near causing the ruin of the good secretary:—

MUSIC FOR THE EMPEROR.

GRAND CONCERT.
FRENCH AND ITALIAN.
MONDAY, 9th FEBRUARY, 1807.

Overture, &c., &c., &c., &c.,

It can be easily imagined, that Gregoire, after so narrow an escape copied exactly every stroke and line in his subsequent programmes. He hardly dared to dot his i's. The lesson was too strong, he was constantly afraid of being witty without knowing it.

On another occasion Napoleon evinced an acquaintance with music, which was not generally suspected. A concert had been arranged for an evening at the Tuilleries. There were six pieces in the programme, the third of which was from Païsiello. The person to whom this part was assigned, became ill, and could not take part in the concert. It was necessary to substitute for it another air by the same author, as the Emperor had always shown a marked preference for the music of Païsiello. As this was found to be difficult, Gregoire undertook to substitute for No. 3, an air from Generali, which he boldly placed in the programme under the name of Païsiello. It must be confessed, that Monsieur the secretary took a great liberty, in subjecting the Emperor to such a mystification. But perhaps this time he was audacious without knowing it. However that may be, the illustrious connoisseur, to the great surprise of the musicians, was not the dupe of the trick. No. 3 had hardly commenced, when the Emperor, making a sign with his hand, suspended the concert. "Monsieur Lesueur," said he, "this piece is not by Païsiello." "I beg your Majesty's pardon; it is his, is it not, Monsieur Gregoire?" "Yes, sire, certainly." "Gentlemen, there is some error here, but be so good as to recommence." After twenty measures, the Emperor interrupts a second time. "No, Monsieur Lesueur, no, it is impossible, Païsiello has more genius." "It is undoubtedly," suggests Gregoire, with an humble air, "a work of his youth, a first effort." "Gentlemen," replied Napoleon warmly, "the first efforts of a great master like Païsiello have always the stamp of genius, they are never below mediocrity, like the piece which I have just heard."

We have had, in France, many directors, administrators, and protectors of the fine arts, who have meddled with musical matters, to the torment of virtuosos and composers, but few have shown such purity of taste. On the contrary, many have given sufficient proof of their aptitude in taking Pucita or Gavaux for Mozart and Beethoven, and vice versâ.

HECTOR BERLIOZ.

PRINCE ALBERT, says an American paper, has presented a Dissenting congregation with two pieces of sacred music of his own composition. The circumstances were these: a committee were engaged in compiling a new tune-book; when in a collection of tunes obtained from the United States, they found one attributed to Prince Albert. The gentlemen in question were anxious not only to assign every tune to its right owner; but in every case in which it was practicable, to obtain the owner's permission for its use. An application was, therefore, made in the proper quarter, and the origin of the piece was placed beyond a doubt by the permission which its composer immediately granted for its use. That permission was accompanied by the additional offer, upon the part of His Royal Highness, of another of his musical compositions, which was, of course, readily accepted; and accordingly, Prince Albert's "Gotha," and a "Christmas Hymn," form a portion of the tune-book.

SINGING TO WALKING.—"I have often used," says Grétry, "a singular stratagem, to slacken or quicken the pace of a walking companion. To say you walk too fast, or too slow, is unpolite save to a friend; but to sing softly an air to the time of the walk of your companion, and then, by degrees, either to quicken the time or make it slower, is a stratagem as innocent as it is convenient."

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 26TH, 1854.

ONE word more, and we have done with the "Societies"—at least for a time.

If the question could be proposed to an Oracle, supposing the time of Oracles not passed by—"What is the Harmonic Union?"—the Oracle would be at a loss for an answer. It would puzzle even a Sphinx. Nevertheless the Harmonic Union has existed two seasons; and under the direction of no less eminent a conductor than Mr. Benedict, has given a great number of concerts at Exeter Hall. These concerts have exhibited considerable merit and much variety. Now a complete oratorio, as at the Sacred Harmonic Society—now a concert with symphony, concerto, and choral pieces, as at the New Philharmonic—now a miscellaneous performance, almost as miscellaneous, indeed, as at the "Wednesdays," when the "Wednesdays" turned "classical"—and now something else has been presented for the edification and delight of the subscribers. The pursuit of any defined object was apparently not in the plan of the Harmonic Union. With what idea, then, was it instituted? Was it in opposition to the other two societies at Exeter Hall? If so, the notion was not good—since those two make just one too many for the actual wants of the public, and for the consequent probabilities of success? Was it intended to rival the New Philharmonic Society? If so, the notion was still worse—since, with all its resources, and with a very cheap subscription, the new Philharmonic Society, during the three seasons of its existence, has had a hard struggle to keep upon its legs. Perhaps it was in opposition to Mr. Hullah that the Harmonic Union entered the field of action? This is, we think, the most probable motive of the three, but scarcely more felicitous than the rest! Mr. Hullah has spent years, and pains, and money—a fortune, indeed—to arrive at his present position. His schools were very lucrative; and, until he began to give concerts at Exeter Hall, he might be said to have been a prosperous man, one likely to retire upon "land and beeves." To build his house in St. Martin's, Mr. Hullah, though largely assisted by his pupils, sacrificed everything, and spent "the last halfpenny." Why not, then, leave him a chance of getting back his capital?

The Harmonic Union, like the Sacred Harmonic Society, was instituted by amateurs, in some degree composed, we believe, of seceders from Mr. Surman and the "London Sacred Harmonic." Hence it would appear that their object was to upset Mr. Surman, and not Mr. Hullah; and to this conclusion we should have arrived at the outset, but for the strong resemblance of the Harmonic Union programmes to those at one time adopted by Mr. Hullah himself. We have not before us the original prospectus, in which the intentions of the new society were set forth; but, if we remember rightly, the Harmonic Union was avowedly projected "for the practice and performance of sacred and secular music;" while in the programme of announcement there was much talk about important novelties, refinement of the public taste, and so forth. As is generally the case, the projectors of the Harmonic Union were to confer a vast amount of benefit on the community, and to get no profit for themselves. Like the majority of speculators, they were wholly disinterested, cared for nothing but the healthy progress of the art, and would not condescend to do as others had done before them. This, at least, was the gist or geist of their professions; and the public looked forward to something altogether out of the common way—something, in short, both musical and magnanimous.

The Harmonic Union commenced its first campaign (on the 17th of December, 1852) right well, with a new and hitherto unperformed oratorio, by an English composer. The composer was Mr. Charles Horsley, and the oratorio Joseph—his second work of this class. The performance, we recollect, was of more than average merit; the music was found worthy, and the inauguration passed off with great éclat. So far so well—with the proviso, be it understood, that, as the Harmonic Union did not engage Mr. Horsley to compose the oratorio of Joseph, and moreover, did not, we understand, find all the expenses of the performance, its members can claim no special merit to themselves, on these accounts, as encouragers of the art, or as protectors and promoters of our native musicians—which, by the way, however, they did, and very largely. But, unfortunately, the very next concert went right against the articles of faith to which the Committee of the Harmonic Union had virtually sworn. It was a kind of New Philharmonic and London Wednesday Concert jumbled together—long, rambling, and tedious (although most of the pieces were essentially what is termed "good music"), with a solo for the trombone, a Spanish melody for Mad. Fiorentini, and other such bagatelles. "Ha!" said the sceptics—"the Harmonic Union is not immaculate, after all. Joseph, we are afraid, did not pay." True—Joseph did not pay. But what then? The Harmonic Union was above such petty considerations. Instituted on the purest basis, money was no object to its founders; all they wanted was to refine the musical taste of the public, and advance the interests of the art. They were undaunted, at any rate, and produced, at a later concert, Mr. Macfarren's Leonore—a musical setting of Bürger's famous poem. This was immensely applauded; but still did not pay. Two new compositions, which, though very successful, brought no grist to the mill, made the refiners of the public taste, the abettors of the art's progress, pause for a moment. Had they made a "mull" of it? They had; but were not aware of the cause. They were unmindful that, to carry out a principle, it is necessary to believe in it, to have faith in it—faith unlimited, and not to be shaken. The members of the Harmonic Union possessed no such quality. They were not influenced in this manner; they had tried a "dodge," and missed their mark, and no sooner lost a penny than they buttoned up their pockets. Something must be done, however. To make public their dissatisfaction would be to commit suicide. "Keep up our professions"—said some. "Let us continue to refine the public taste."

The next event was the production of Mr. Peirson's oratorio, Jerusalem. Who now could say that the Harmonic Union, win or lose, would not, in the face of all difficulties, persist in bringing out new works and in encouraging "native talent." But alas! there was something going on behind the scenes to which we would rather not allude, were it not indispensable to our argument. The Harmonic Union so says report—"that great liar" may be retorted—got about £400 for performing Mr. Peirson's Jerusalem (by the usual sale of tickets, of course); and thus, while Mr. Horsley's Joseph and Mr. Macfarren's Leonore did not pay, Mr. Peirson's Jerusalem paid very well, although it has never been given since. Mr. Peirson went to Germany; and as there were no more composers in the market who had relations among the dignitaries of the church, there were no more chances of £400 (by the usual sale of tickets), and, therefore, no more English oratorios.

It was not very long after the commencement of the first season—of 1852-3—that the Harmonic Union fell back upon the Messiah, the Creation, and Elijah, to redeem its losses, and thus set itself in direct opposition to the sacred societies in Exeter Hall, increasing the chances of the whole of them becoming bankrupt—Mr. Hullah and all. Now, we must insist that this kind of proceeding is unfair. "Live and let live," is a good motto; and the Harmonic Union had as much right to speculate with the masterpieces of the oratorio composers as Mr. Hullah, or the Sacred Harmonic Society. But what it had no right to do was to come before the public with a set of professions which were never really intended to be carried out. Failing to succeed as they had anticipated, the members of the Harmonic Union immediately fell back upon the domain of other societies; and, instead of giving their bonâ fide subscribers what they had promised, they endeavoured to set up an opposition, both uncalled-for and unjust. Depend upon it, if we are to have so many societies performing the Messiah, etc., so many times a year, the end must be that they will all go to the wall, and eventually the public be deprived of such concerts altogether. The system is exceedingly injudicious, to say the least of it.

The only circumstance that distinguished the past (the second) season, was the production of an oratorio entitled Christ, the Messenger of Peace, by M. Emile Naumann, a young German composer. This oratorio was in all respects a failure, and as it possesses very little merit, the fact was not surprising. Why it was brought forward is best known to the Harmonic Union. As far as the merely executive department is concerned, the Harmonic Union has merited and obtained praise. Its chorus was very good, its band more than tolerable, and its Conductor one of the most experienced living. But the truth is, there is no room in London for another large society "for the practice and performance of sacred and secular music." We have two "Philharmonics," and two "Sacred Harmonics;" and not one of the four is in a very flourishing condition. The wisest course, then, to be pursued by the members of the Harmonic Union, under the circumstances—if, which is doubtful, they intend to go on—is to join the London Sacred Harmonic Society, and help Mr. Surman to make head against his formidable rival and the Autocrat of all the Orchestras; or, on the other hand, to persuade Dr. Wylde to incorporate them with the New Philharmonic Society. To persist alone—unless they can surpass the other four societies in the excellence of their performances, and what is still less easy, persuade the public to believe it—will be only to lose more money, and to little or no purpose.

Meanwhile the question suggests itself—have we not too many amateurs in the field?

The Musical Festivals, as they are called, do not promise much this year. Worcester and Norwich have issued their programmes, both of which may be perused without any unusual degree of excitement. The quiet jog-trot system generally pursued at the meetings of the Three Choirs will again be adopted at Worcester, although a President and three-and-twenty "Stewards" have put their heads and their purses together to do credit to the 131st anniversary. After all that was prophesied at the end of the last Festival, in 1851—after all, indeed, that was nearly as good as promised—we must confess ourselves sadly disappointed with the programme for 1854. Its contents are familiar and not well arranged. With the list of principal singers we see no reason to find fault. Here the sins are certainly not of omission. On the contrary; three first-ladies with the claims of Mesdames Novello, Castellan, and Viardot, are one too many; and the necessity of bringing each prominently forward will, as usual, spoil the evening concerts. In addition there are three tenors—Messrs. Sims Reeves, Lockey, and Gardoni; two basses—Messrs. Weiss and Formes; one contralto—Miss Dolby; and a fourth prima donna, Mrs. Weiss. These, in their appetite for solo songs, are cormorants, all of whom must be "accommodated," while most will "go in" for "encores!" Fancy, readers, what compounds of shreds and patches the evening concerts will be—and what a grateful repast they will provide for the worn-out London reporter, who has been up to his ears in music for the last six months.

It is small consolation to know that the olla podrida of vocal pieces will be relieved by the performances of Messrs. Sainton, Blagrove, R. S. Pratten, and R. Blagrove, on violins, flute, and concertina—by the old made-dishes from Oberon and A Midsummer Night's Dream—by a couple of symphonies (need we name the "Pastoral" and Mendelssohn's No. 3?)—and by that startling novelty, the overture to Guillaume Tell, the last, of course, "by desire." However, as the Festivals are for the assistance of an excellent charity, and as the stewards, being charitable, do not like to lose even as much as a Five-pound note each, we suppose we ought not to complain of the evening selections being constructed on the model of our London benefit-concerts, than which, notwithstanding, there is nothing more wearisome and uninviting. The object is to attract the families in the vicinity; and to do that effectually regular "crammers" must be offered, or they wont come. Moreover, what is stale and worn out to us in the metropolis may possibly be new to them; and, to conclude, the greater the number of names of well-known Opera-singers that are set before them the greater the chance of their being tempted to buy tickets. All this sounds plausible enough; and we have only one reply to make to it—which is, that the miscellaneous concerts have always been thus composed, in the memory of the oldest attendant at the meetings of the three choirs, and that, nevertheless, the first two are invariably failures. The "vicinity" reserves itself for the last, which is generally more lengthy and prolix than the others; and probably catches an indigestion, from excess of music, which endures until the next Festival. We do not presume to suggest that a change of system would be worth a trial. That is the business of the Cathedral organists, who act in the capacity of conductors, engage the band and singers, and make out the programmes.

If there is no promise of novelty in the evening there is quite as little in the morning performances of the approaching Festival at Worcester. On Tuesday (Sept. 5), the usual church service will be interspersed with a sermon, preached by the Rev. C. R. Somers Cocks, Master of Arts, Vicar of Wolverley and of Neen Savage. The musical part of the service embraces the stereotyped programme of more than half a century—as though no music had ever been composed for the glorification of our religion except a certain set of anthems by Händel and Purcell. If it be not profane to say so, we are heartily tired both of the Dettingen Te Deum and "My heart is inditing," which we are compelled to listen to at every meeting, whether in Worcester, Hereford, or Gloucester. Surely here was an opportunity of introducing something fresh. But no. Mr. Done, the conductor, has three years to prepare for the Festival; and at the end of those years we look at the programme, and find—the Dettingen Te Deum, with other pieces not a bit newer. Dettingen, we insist, has gone out of date, and we see no reason why we should annually be offering up thanks for a victory about which at the present time not a human soul cares a straw. Who, besides, can be interested any more in an event so little worthy of remembrance as the coronation of one of the feeblest and least magnanimous of kings? It was all very well for Händel, a courtier, to celebrate such events in music; but while the world is unanimous in admiration of Händel's genius, very little if any sympathy remains for his political biases or his political necessities. This eternal chanting in honour of events that no longer have any influence, is neither more nor less than absurd. If the music of Händel, and these anthems in particular, be a sine qua non, in Heaven's name preserve the music, but change the title and the words. The Waterloo Te Deum—or still better, if Sebastopol is ever razed, the Sebastopol Te Deum—and the Grand Coronation Anthem for Queen Victoria, would sound a hundred to one better than the others.

But, not to wander from the subject immediately in hand, we are glad to find that cathedral service will take place in the choir, on Wednesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays, at eight o'clock, a.m.,—the members of the three choirs and the organist assisting—for the benefit of the townspeople and the poorer sort of country folk who have not the means of attending the performances. On Wednesday, Elijah, and on Friday, the Messiah will be given in the Cathedral. On Thursday, Haydn's Creation and Spohr's Last Judgment are to be performed together, the third part of the former being abandoned. As it is, the congregation will have a surfeit—to say nothing of the very questionable practice of placing two oratorios in direct juxtaposition, and, which is worse, oratorios so violently opposed to each other in feeling, style, and execution. This is what they term "strengthening the second morning." So that "strengthening" the morning is synonymous with weakening the effect of the music. How much further may the spirit of Mammon be allowed to penetrate? By what other ways and means can the pockets of the stewards be saved, at the expense of the general effect of the Festival? The improvement of the band, both in numbers and efficiency, which we gather from the published names of the executants, is a more agreeable theme to dwell upon. This shows a tendency to reform, and a resolution on the part of Mr. Done not to yield to the cry which proclaims the presence and succour of the Autocrat of all the Orchestras indispensable to the future existence and prosperity of the Festivals—a cry, after all, the mere watch-word of a clique, and by no means in accordance with the general sentiment. The Chorus from London, Liverpool, Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester—will, we anticipate, be of the usual quality, and not the least serviceable part of the "orchestra of more than 300." The usual collections at the doors of the Cathedral, after the morning performances, are likely to be made with more than the usual assiduity, and less than the usual success. The excuse will naturally be the war, which is now the plea for everything, and often, as in the present instance, where the connection between assumed cause and effect is quite inscrutable.

So far as we can judge, the present Festival has as good a chance of answering the expectations of its promoters and patrons as any within the last quarter of a century. We wish it may prosper, if only for the sake of the widows and orphans of clergymen, for whose benefit it is to work in the end. But even suppose that it fails in a pecuniary sense. What need four-and twenty gentlemen of fortune—among whom are a bishop, two lords, a mayor, two baronets, and as many members of parliament—care about unclasping their pocket-books and making up the deficiency? What if they are called upon to pay each a "cool" hundred? Do not the Musical Festivals constitute the principal, nay the sole, reason why their counties are ever named or talked about; and can there be a more graceful method of displaying their love of music and of charity in combination? They are all as wealthy as they are benevolent; and we feel convinced that should the receipts be £1,000 minus the expenditure, any one of them, not to specialise the Lord Bishop of Worcester, would cheerfully contribute that sum from his own purse. The country gentlemen are no niggards, depend upon it. Give them a good Festival, and they will not mind the cost; good music, and they will pay the piper without a wink of the eye or a shrug of the shoulder. That, at least is our own idea of them.

Of the Norwich Festival next week.

REVIEWS.

"Mozart's Masses," arranged for pianoforte solo.—No. 15, "The Requiem"—by Josiah Pittman.—J. Alfred Novello.

So far as it is possible to arrange an elaborate choral work like the Requiem for a single instrument, Mr. Pittmann has effected his purpose. Where the instrumental accompaniment is elaborate, however, we need scarcely say that it is impossible to convey anything like the effect of the voices and orchestra combined; and, to give the mere harmony of the one, or the figures and progressions of the other, can, after all, be to offer but little interest to musicians. For those who do not possess the ability of playing from score, or of understanding, by reading it, this condensation of Mozart's last and greatest mass will be welcome; and as they form the great majority not only of amateurs but musicians, Mr. Pittmann, who has done his work with talent and judgment, may congratulate himself that his labour has by no means been in vain.

Quadrille—"Queen of the South" Composed by Robert Bell. Wood and Co, Edinburgh; T. A. Currie, Dumfries.

The last part of the last figure is pretty. Of the rest the less said the better.

"Daffodils."—Song, Words written by Herrick, Music composed by Alfred A. Pollock.—Robert W. Ollivier.

Few can have forgotten, who ever heard or saw it, Mr. Alfred Alfred Pollock's very charming little canzonet, "O swallow, swallow;" and few will be slow to welcome another of similar pretensions, and of equal beauty, from the same pen. Mr. Pollock has set Herrick quite as happily as he formerly set Tennyson; and both the dead and living poets are honourably associated with his music. "Daffodils" is a song which, in melody and harmony, has a smack of the rich and genuine flavour of the old English madrigal. Simple and unaffected, it is, at the same time, graceful and eminently musical. We have not for some time met with a song of its length and character that has so entirely pleased us. Mr. Pollock should write more since he writes so well. Otherwise we might address him as King Arthur the ghost, in the play—"If no more, why so much?"

"Life and Death"—a Four-part Song, the Poetry from the Household Words. The Music composed, and inscribed to Charles Dickens, by Mrs. Henry Ames. J. Alfred Novello.

There is both poetry and musical feeling in this piece, which is voiced well and shows a real taste for harmony. The only fault we can find, is a certain indecision about key. For example, at the commencement, it is impossible to know whether Mrs. Ames intends to be in E flat or in C minor, in the opening bar. We presume the latter is intended; but in that case we shall have to reproach the fair composer with beginning in one key and ending in another, which is not admissible, and, indeed, not effective. Still there is so much merit in this vocal quartet, and the sentiment of the very charming poetry to which it is set is caught with such purity and refinement, that we have no heart to protest further.

"Flowrets of Hope."—Written and composed by Alexis.—Addison and Hollier.

A very clever and well-written song, both words and music betraying a refined intelligence, and shewing a thorough command of materials. It is no small thing to be poet enough and musician enough to write such good verses and set them to such nice harmony. We should like the song still better if the practice of giving the melody simultaneously to the bass and voice part were indulged in less frequently. But this, after all, is purely a matter of taste. If "Alexis" be an amateur, we beg to compliment him.

"War" and "Peace"—two songs by Beethoven—edited by Joseph Pittmann, Esq. G. Scheurmann.

Mr. Pittmann has not been candid in attributing these songs to Beethoven, on the face of the title-page. It is true the subjects of both are his; and that, while nothing has been added, scarcely a note has been changed in either. But as Beethoven would never have condescended to illustrate what, to speak politely, may be termed clap-traps of the day, by his music, Mr. Pittmann should have stated whence he derived his materials. The themes for both of the songs are borrowed from the beautiful sonata in E, Op. 90. The first subject of the allegro, in E minor, is allied to the song called "War;" and that of the rondo, in the major key, to the one called "Peace." We may, therefore, dispense with criticising. At the same time we must protest against the system of employing the ideas of great composers, not living, and therefore unable to protect themselves, in a manner which they never could possibly have approved.

DRAMATIC.

Lyceum.—On Friday, Mr. and Mrs. Sims Reeves appeared in La Sonnambula, and on Monday in Lucia di Lammermoor. The Bohemian Girl was repeated on Wednesday; and, as a supplemental night, being for the benefit of Mr. Allcroft, the "Farewell Performances" will conclude this evening with La Sonnambula; after which will be given the Comedietta of Patter versus Clatter, in which Mr. Charles Mathews will appear; to conclude with the Waterman, Mr. Sims Reeves sustaining his popular part of Tom Tug. Each night the theatre has been densely crowded, and Mr. and Mrs. Sims Reeves have been received with the greatest enthusiasm. We never heard Mr. Sims Reeves sing more magnificently than at his last three performances. He seems to be in finer voice than ever.

The Sadler's Wells Theatre opens for the winter season on Monday next, with Mr. Lovell's favourite drama, The Provost of Bruges, and Mr. Planché's comedietta, The Jacobite. A new five-act piece is announced in the bills, and a play of Shakspere's, with new scenery, dresses, decorations, etc., etc.

Optics versus Music.—It is related in a biography of Lambert, the astronomer of Mulhausen, that on being asked he liked an opera at Berlin, to which he had been taken by some of his friends, he replied, that he had not seen it, as he had been occupied during the entire evening in calculating the refraction of light from the lustre!

PROVINCIAL.

The summary of musical and theatrical doings in the provinces does not present great interest this week. The Manchester Examiner and Times augurs a good season for the Italian Opera, as will be seen by the following:—

"The treasury prospects of the theatre, on the occasion of the forthcoming series of operas, promise to be of a character amply remunerative to the promoters of the undertaking. We learn that two-thirds of the subscription list is already filled up, so that with the casual attendants, a brilliant array of box occupants may be expected. That the performances may be satisfactory to the public, no pains, we are sure, will be spared on the part of the conductor. Mr. Benedict is a strict disciplinarian. The rehearsals are to commence to-day."—On Saturday last, we learn from the same journal, "the members of the City Glee and Choral Society held their first soirée, at the house and gardens of Mr. Jennison, at Belle Vue.—On Monday King Lear was represented at the Theatre Royal. Last evening, Miss Vandenhoff's Woman's Heart was played to an audience more select than numerous. On Friday next, Mr. Vandenhoff takes his benefit, concluding his engagement for the season—his last appearance in Manchester previous to a farewell engagement in the course of next year, when he finally takes leave of the stage."

The Manchester Courier of the 19th says:—

"The series of six operas commence on Saturday next with Norma, in which character Mdlle. Cruvelli appears. Signori Tamberlik, Polonini, and Tagliafico playing Pollio, Flavio, and Oroveso. The other operas are given on the five successive nights of the following week."

The following is from the Liverpool Standard:—

"The question of the opening of the St. George's Hall, at Liverpool, has been at last settled. A meeting of the committee was held on Saturday, the 19th, at which the Mayor announced that he had received notice to the effect that, consequent on the unsettled state of public affairs, and the intended visit of the Prince Consort to the French camp at St. Omer, it will not be consistent with the royal arrangements for Her Majesty to attend the inauguration of St. George's Hall. All reasons for deferring the intended arrangements, consequent on the expected royal visit, being thus removed, it was recommended that the hall should be opened on Monday, the 18th of September, and that, after the ceremony is gone through, the oratorio of the Messiah shall be performed, provided Sir Henry Bishop can succeed in engaging the services of a sufficient number of competent artists to do full justice to Händel's masterpiece (!). A miscellaneous concert will be given in the hall in the evening. On Tuesday Mendelssohn's Elijah is to be performed, and on Wednesday Haydn's Creation, each oratorio to be followed in the evening by a concert; the admission to that on Wednesday evening being fixed at two shillings and sixpence, in order that the general public may have an opportunity of being present. The prices of admission to the other performances have not been fixed. It is also proposed that the week after the meeting of the British Association, five or six evening musical performances shall be given in the hall, at the low price of one shilling, so that all the inhabitants may have the means of assisting at the inauguration."

The Courier informs us that—

"The musical arrangements for the opening of St. George's Hall are nearly completed. Sir Henry Bishop will conduct, Dr. Wesley will preside at the organ, and the services of Madame Clara Novello have been secured.—From a lengthy description of the new organ, extracted from Dr. Thomson's 'Guide through Liverpool,' written principally for the use of the members of the British Association, we learn that the instrument consists of four rows of keys, from G to A, i. e., GG to A in altissimo, 63 notes; and two octaves and a half of pedals, from C to F, i. e., CCC to F, 30 notes. There are 108 stops, and 8,000 pipes, varying in length from 32 feet to 3-8ths of an inch, 10 octaves apart. The bellows will be blown by a small steam engine."

The Liverpool Mail has the following:—

"The London Adelphi Company, at the Theatre-Royal, during the past week, have continued to prove attractive. On Monday evening, the melodrama of The Thirst for Gold was produced, Mr. Webster having brought down his own scenery, dresses, and properties. The afterpiece of Good night, Signor Pantalon has been played almost nightly, with Miss Woolgar, Miss Mary Keeley, and Mr. Paul Bedford. Tartuffe and Two Loves and a Life have also been repeated; and, last night, The Green Bushes was revived for Madame Celeste's benefit."

The Bath and Cheltenham Gazette is enthusiastic in praise of the Lyceum company. We extract the news:—

"There was an overflowing attendance at the theatre on Friday night, hundreds being turned away for want of room to witness the performance of a part of the Lyceum company. The first piece was The Bachelor of Arts. Mr. Charles Mathews and Mr. Frank Matthews received unmistakeable proofs of approval from one of the most brilliant audiences ever assembled in the Bath Theatre. Sunshine through the Clouds was generally voted somewhat 'slow.' Madame Vestris performed the part of Mrs. Cleaveland. The farce of Little Toddlekins concluded the evening's amusement, the chief characters by Mr. Charles Mathews and Mrs. Frank Matthews.—On Saturday evening next, twenty-seven members of Mr. Charles Kean's Royal Princess's company will appear. The play of the Honeymoon will be followed by a comic ballet and A Roland for an Oliver."

The Clifton Chronicle of the 23rd informs us that—

"The engagement of the Lyceum company having proved successful, the lessee has secured the services of Mr. Charles Kean's corps, and they made their appearance on Monday and yesterday evenings in some of the pieces which have been so attractive at the Princess's, Oxford-street. The performances are to be continued throughout the week, Saturday excepted."

"Miss Jackson and Mr. J. Rouse, late of the Bristol Theatre, assisted by Miss Eliza Ormonde and Mrs. Bishop, gave a dramatic and vocal entertainment, at the Broadmead Rooms, on Monday evening. Miss Jackson recited some fragments from Shakspere, Milton, Sheridan Knowles, Sheil, and others. The selections were interspersed with songs by Miss Ormonde and Mr. John Rouse."

We find from the South Eastern Gazette that Margate has made a move in musical matters:—

"Mr. Gardiner, of the Assembly Rooms, last week engaged Mdlle. Rita Favanti, of Her Majesty's Theatre, and Mr. George Perren, the tenor singer, at his concerts. Mr. Saville, at the Theatre, has introduced Miss H. P. Horton, the popular actress and vocalist, and Mr. Selby, with Mr. Gaston, of the Royal Standard, and Miss Glover."

Music is for the present in the ascendant in the North, as will be seen by the following extract from the Leeds Intelligencer, respecting military concerts to be given at St. George's Hall, Bradford:—

"The directors of the St. George's Hall Company announce three military concerts by the band of the Coldstream Guards, to take place on Wednesday evening, and Thursday morning and evening in next week. This is the second visit of this band to Bradford. The prices of admission are so moderate that we may anticipate large audiences."

The following is extracted from a Dublin paper:

"Stepping into the Queen's Royal Theatre on Wednesday, we were disappointed in one respect—there was no room for us; the whole building was crowded to the doors. Peals of laughter and shouts of merriment inside only tantalised us still more, and we had to be satisfied with distant and occasional glimpses of Mr. F. Robson's funny face, the motion of every single muscle of which appeared to be the source of a fresh supply of amusement to the audience. The piece performing was the burlesque on Shakspere's Merchant of Venice, and the play upon words and ideas seemed thoroughly understood and appreciated by the audience. Under the guidance which Mr. Robson's face afforded to his meaning, they could hardly go much astray, and their enjoyment of his fun shewed how readily they followed. In the subsequent piece we had Mr. Robson also, as rich as ever in humour.

We learn from our Leeds Correspondent, that—

"Three 'Grand Military Concerts' were given at St. George's Hall, Bradford, on Wednesday and Thursday morning and evening last, when the Band of the Coldstream Guards made their second appearance in Bradford. The attendance on the first night, though large, did not equal the Director's expectations;—on Thursday morning there was 'a beggarly account of empty benches,' but in the evening the 'masses' came to the rescue, and in goodly numbers enjoyed to their hearts' content the strains of the brass and tinkling cymbal. The selections included overtures, marches, operatic arrangements, waltzes, quadrilles, etc., and, on the whole, were all performed with spirit, precision, and effect. It must be admitted, however, that a military band, perfect though it be, is not, and cannot be, from the nature of the instruments, the most effectual medium of interpreting the 'best works of the great masters.' The overture to Oberon, and the Andante from Mozart's Fifth Symphony, on Wednesday evening, proved this unmistakeably. The delicate and rapid violin passages suffered considerably at the hands of the clarionets, and no brass bass instruments can replace the well defined tone of the violoncello and double bass. In marches and operatic selections, the Band are admirable. Their training reflects credit on the band master, Mr. Godfrey. The principal soloists—Messrs. Pollard (clarionet), Phillip (cornet-à-piston), Phasey (euphonium), and Hawkes (trombone), were loudly applauded. A little vocal music would have afforded a grateful relief. A Military Band for more than three hours in a room, is too much of a good thing; and too much of a good thing is good for ————."

A Birmingham correspondent lets us know, that—

"Mr. Harrison, the music-seller, is organising a concert on a grand scale, for Friday evening, Sept. 8th, next—at the Town Hall. The names of such artists as Madame Clara Novello, Mr. and Mrs. Sims Reeves, and Mr. and Mrs. Weiss, shew that Mr. Harrison has not departed from that liberality of spirit which has always characterised his efforts to amuse the public."

FOREIGN.

BERLIN.—(From our own Correspondent.)—According to report, the following operas, among others, will be revived in the course of the winter:—Gluck's Orpheus, Rossini's Tancredi, Gläser's Adlers Horst, and Weber's Oberon. Mdlle. Johanna Wagner will play in the first three. A new French opera, Raymond, by M. Ambroise Thomas, will be produced. The subject is from the story of the Man with the Iron Mask. The negociations for the performance of Herr R. Wagner's Tannhäuser have again been broken off, as Dr. Franz Liszt, who acts for Herr Wagner, required that the rehearsals and first two or three representations should take place under his direction, which the management did not feel justified in granting. The season began on the 16th, with the Feensee, followed on Friday, the 19th, by Lortzing's Czaar und Zimmermann. Mad. Fischer-Nimbs, from Breslau, will appear in September, when Mdlle. Johanna Wagner will also come.—Herr Kücken passed through this city on his return to Stuttgart, where he resumes his official duties by superintending the productions of Meyerbeer's Etoile du Nord.—I am happy to inform you that a great change for the better has taken place in the condition of poor Robert Schumann, so great, indeed, that his wife has left Berlin and returned to Düsseldorf. For some time past he has enjoyed intervals of lucidity, during which, in his long walks with his physician, he enquired affectionately after his family, to whom, during the height of his complaint, he never made the slightest allusion. At present, he is so far advanced as to lead to strong hopes of a speedy restoration to health. He is allowed to resume his musical labours, and is now setting to music the choruses in Schiller's Braut von Messina.

BADEN-BADEN.—(From a Correspondent.)—We have had quite a catalogue of celebrities lately in this queen of watering-places. With his accustomed enterprise and liberality, M. Benazet has provided the greatest and most varied attractions at the Kursaal. Among recent events, a concert, got up on a very expensive scale, brought all the fashion of Baden and its vicinities. Alboni (who has just left us) sang some of her favourite pieces in her most perfect manner. Mad. de Lagrange, whom you must remember at Her Majesty's Theatre, astonished even more than she pleased by the execution of a mazurka by Schuloff; and Gardoni, besides joining the ladies in duets, gave some Italian airs very prettily. The vocal music was agreeably relieved by M. Vivier, who, perhaps, never made his wonderful horn speak in more exquisite tones. His performance pleased as much as it astonished, and astonished as much as it pleased. The composition was his own, and excited quite as much admiration as his playing. Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli had been invited to sing, but, being compelled to go to England, was forced to decline. Mdlle. Arabella Goddard, the charming and accomplished English pianist, has arrived, and is already "the rage" here. Another concert is now organising, by M. Benazet, expressly for her. Vivier will also play, and M. Cossman, the well-known violoncellist; and M. Roger, who is shortly expected from Frankfort, and has never been heard at Baden, will sing: so that the concert will be attractive in every respect. The weather is delightful, the scenery enchanting, the Kursaal exciting and amusing, and M. Benazet, as usual, the life and soul of the public amusement and recreation. In his special sphere this gentleman really stands alone.

On Saturday evening, the 19th instant, Miss Arabella Goddard had the honour of playing at the Prussian Minister's, in presence of their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Prussia, the Grand Duchess of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz, and the élite of the rank and fashion at present at Baden-Baden. Both the Prince and Princess complimented the young English pianist, and expressed themselves highly pleased with her performance, the young Princess (who is a great connoisseur) stating that it was very rare to find in an artist so much expression, finish, and purity of tone combined, and that she had never heard a performer on the pianoforte with whom she was so much delighted. M. Vivier executed some of his solos on the horn with admirable talent, and was accompanied on the pianoforte by Miss Arabella Goddard. He, too, afforded unqualified pleasure.

STUTTGART.—The cast of Meyerbeer's Etoile du Nord, will include the following artists:—Mad. Marlow, Mdlle. Minna Zerr, sister of Mdlle. Anna Zerr, Herr Schüttky, Herr Pischeck, and Herren Täger and Sontheim.

LEIPSIC.—Dr. Franz Liszt has just completed a pamphlet about Hector Berlioz, which will appear in the autumn.

ITALY.—The closing of the Italian theatres is rapidly going on, owing to the cholera. From the Milanese papers we have nothing to record, excepting that a concert took place at the Theatre Santa-Radegonda for the benefit of the Infant Asylums, at which Mad. Merlo and Signor Sarti gave their gratuitous assistance, together with the violoncellist, Signor Nicola Bassi. The other singers were Signori Deacon, Disma, Sangalli, and Erba. The Theatre Carcano is again closed, and will not re-open during the prevailing epidemic.—At Bergamo, Verdi's Il Trovatore has been revived with great success, if we may judge from the applause which followed every piece, and, indeed, almost every phrase. It is said that Signor Malvezzi, the tenor, is much better than his predecessor, Signor Fraschini, who seems to be losing ground in public estimation. Madame Bendazzi has made a favourable impression in the character of Gilda. The part of Rigoletto is described as having been well played by Signor Corsi.—At Fermo, Rossini's Mose in Egitto has been received with acclamations, the principal parts by Mad. Barbieri-Nini and Sig. Agosti. We are happy to state, on the authority of the Gazetta Musicale of Milan, that no additional deaths from cholera have occurred in the company of the Italian Opera at Mexico since that of Sig. Pozzolino, mentioned in our American news of last week. Mad. Steffanone and Signori Marini, Salvi, Rovere, and Beneventano have all been attacked, but were in a fair way of recovery, according to the latest accounts. It is announced in the Mexican papers that, in consequence of the losses sustained by both the rival companies, they will join their remaining forces into one, under the same management.—At Sinigaglia, Norma has been played to crowded houses, Mad. Medori and Signor Carrion playing the principal parts. The next opera will be Don Pasquale, with Mad. Medori, Signori De Bassini and Scalese.—At Trieste, Nabucco has been revived; and at Vicenza, the new opera by Sig. Petrella, entitled Marco Visconti, gains in public favour. The opera is well got up as regards the scenery and accessories, and the singing of Mad. Lotti, Signori Galvani, Bencich, and Cornago is very good.—At Odessa, the Italian company have been playing the Italiana in Algeri, and are rehearsing Maria di Rohan.—At Rome, the Theatre Argentina has been taken, for the Carnival of 1854-5, by a company, for opera and drama on alternate nights.

BRAZIL.—Madame Charton has arrived, accompanied by Signor Bouché. The company may now be considered as complete. Madame Charton has chosen the Sonnambula for her début, and Signor Bouché, Don Silva, in Ernani. Both operas are being rehearsed every day. Signor Bouché has been engaged for next season. A meeting of the directors was held lately, and subscriptions set on foot, with the proceeds of which a gold snuff-box, adorned with brilliants, was presented to Signor Labocetta as a testimony of their approbation of his management of the Italian Opera. Madame Zecchini has left for Paris. Signor Ferranti is at loggerheads with the directors, and will not terminate his engagement, the latter have already written to Italy for another buffo to supply his place. The preparations for the ballet are on a large scale; the principal dancers will be Madame Genat and M. Paul.

CONSTANTINOPLE.—Sig. G. Donizetti, brother of the celebrated composer, and general Director of Music in the Sultan's army, has received the Megidie medal, fourth class.

BUCHAREST.—The new theatre is a fine building replete with every convenience. The performances are given alternately by a Wallachian dramatic company, and an Italian operatic troupe. Both the drama and opera are popular here.

STOCKHOLM.—(From an occasional Correspondent.)—During a short stay in this city, last May, I had an opportunity of hearing some musical performances. On the 23rd inst., Mdlle. Helda-Sandels gave a concert, which was well attended, in the Salle La Croix. The members of the Royal Chapel played Kuhlau's overture to Lube, and one of Beethoven's overtures to Fidelio. Mdlle. Sandels sang airs from the Creation and the Barber of Seville, and several national melodies of Sweden.—On the 21st., M. T. R. Sjöberg, musical director of the regiment of Life Guards, gave a concert in the riding school attached to the Zoological Gardens. Meyerbeer's overture to the Feldeager in Schlesien, Herr von Lindpaintner's to Göthe's Faust, and several pieces from Verdi's Ernani were included in the programme. The concert concluded with several patriotic songs, executed by a small chorus of 100 performers, accompanied by the orchestra. On the 27th Mdlle. A. Valeri gave a concert in the Royal Opera-house. The orchestra played Beethoven's overture to Fidelio, and Gade's symphony in A minor; the fair bénéficiaire sang an air from Le Nozze di Figaro, an air from the Sonnambula, and several Swedish national melodies; and M. D'Aubert executed, with his pupil, M. Devit, a fantasia, by Kalliwoda, for two violins. On the 30th, a concert was given by M. Oscar Cinna, in the Salle la Croix. The principal attractions were Mendelssohn's overture to the Hebrides, and Beethoven's to Coriolanus, and the performance by the concert-giver of Weber's Concert-Stück, the romance and finale from Hummel's concerto in E flat, Weber's sonata in D minor, Beethoven's sonata in A for piano and violin, with M. D'Aubert, and several original Hungarian Lieder.

HAMBURGH.—Madame Tedesco will commence her engagement as Fides in the Prophet. She can only give three representations, as she must be in St. Petersburgh by the 5th of September, where she receives 120,000 francs for the season.

DUKE OF BRAGANZA.

(Translated from the Revue et Gazette Musicale.)

[In 1790, Gluck produced his opera of Pâris et Hélène, dedicated, by permission, to the Duke of Braganza. Already, on the publication of his Alceste, Gluck had found himself exposed to the acrimonious attacks of the critics of the North of Germany, whose obstinate vanity would admit neither the success nor the ideas of the great composer. In the dedication we are about to lay before our readers, Gluck endeavours to prove that, while combating what they termed his system, his adversaries were in actual opposition to truth and reason.]

"In dedicating this work to your Highness, I do so less in the hope of meeting with a patron than a judge. A spirit armed against the prejudices of custom; a knowledge of the sublime precepts of the art; and a taste formed by the study of great models and the inimitable principles of the Beautiful and the True—such are the qualities I look for in my Mæcenas, and all of which I find combined in your Highness. It was only in the hope of having imitators, that I decided on printing the score of my Alceste, and I flattered myself with the idea that others would eagerly follow the path I had opened, with a hope to abolish the abuses which have crept into the Italian opera, and which have degraded and debased it. I am now convinced, however, that my hopes were illusory. The half-scholars, and the critics who lead the public—a class of men unfortunately very numerous, who in all times have been more hurtful to the progress of the art than persons altogether ignorant—violently attack a method which, if once established, would put an end to their empire.

"People have thought themselves capable of finally judging with the aid of incomplete rehearsals badly directed and worse executed; they have calculated, in a drawing-room, the effect which an opera might produce on the stage. Is not this the perspicacity of the inhabitants of a certain Greek city, who, in order to form a just appreciation of a statue destined to be placed on the top of a high column, examined the work on the ground? One of these eccentric friends of the art, whose sense of understanding is confined to his ear, will find that some of my airs are abrupt; some of the passages will strike him as crude, or introduced with too little care, never reflecting that, in the given situation, these airs and passages required exactly these characteristics, and thereby formed a happy contrast to the rest. A pedantic harmonist will point out, here and there, an intended instance of negligence, or a pretended false expression, and proclaim abroad that they are so many unpardonable faults against the laws of harmony; and then comes the crowd, unanimous in condemning the music as exaggerated, barbarous, and wild.

"In this particular, the other arts are not more fairly treated than music; they are judged with quite as little justice and knowledge: the reason of which your Highness will easily guess, for the more we aspire to perfection and truth the more are precision and exactness necessary qualities.

"The traits which distinguish Raphaël from other painters are frequently almost imperceptible. Slight alterations in the outlines do not, in the least, compromise the likeness of a head painted in the style of caricature, but they will completely change a graceful expression of countenance. As far as music is concerned, I will quote only one example of this—the air in the opera of Orphée, 'Che farò senza Euridice?' Introduce the slightest alteration either in the movement or the expression, and the air will only be fitted for a puppet-show. In a piece of this description, a note on which you rest too much or too little, a fault of intonation, an instance of negligence in the rhythm, etc., may entirely destroy the effect of a scene. Now, whenever a score is to be executed according to the principles I have laid down, the presence of the composer will be as necessary as the sun to animated nature. It is he who is the soul and life of it. Without him, there is nothing but confusion and disorder. But he must expect to meet with obstacles, just as we meet with men who, simply because they possess eyes and ears, without taking into account the imperfections of those organs, as far as they may be concerned, think themselves qualified to pass judgment on the fine arts; for the mania of wishing peremptorily to decide upon questions with which they are least acquainted, is a common defect in men. Arteaga, one of the greatest philosophers of the present age, has had the cool audacity to write upon music, and publish his ideas as so many oracles, with this epigraph: Sogni di ciecchi e fole di romanzi.

"Your Highness has, doubtless, read the drama of Pâris et Hélène, and may have remarked that it does not present to the imagination of the composer the strong passions, grand pictures, and tragic situations which, in Alceste, shake the soul of the spectator. In this case, the public will as little expect the like force and energy in the music, as they would require, in a picture painted with a full light, the chiaro-oscura and striking effects of contrast which the painter will employ for objects represented in one more subdued.

"In Alceste, we have a wife on the point of losing her husband; to save him, she has the courage, in a wood, the horrors of which are enhanced by the shades of night, to summons the infernal spirits, and, in her last moments, trembles for the fate of her children.

"In Pâris et Hélène we have a young lover bearing up against the rigour of a noble but haughty woman, but who eventually overcomes her dislike by employing all the means which passion suggests.

"For this reason, I endeavoured to employ different colourings, the motives of which I sought in the personal character of the Phrygians, gentle and tender, opposed to the savage and inflexible pride of the Spartans. I thought, therefore, that the vocal music—which in my opera merely replaces declamation—should, in the part of Helen, correspond to the roughness of her nationality, and that I should not be blamed if, in order to preserve al the individuality of the character in the music, I descended, for the moment, even to the trivial. If we desire to attain truth, in this manner, we must never forget—taking into consideration the object on which we are engaged—that the greatest beauties, melodic and harmonic, may become faults and imperfections if employed unseasonably.

"As for my endeavour to produce the desired change in the opinions of composers, I do not expect that I shall be more successful with Pâris et Hélène than I was with Alceste, but all obstacles, long foreseen, will be unable to prevent my making fresh attempts. Provided I obtain the suffrage of your Highness, I shall be able to say, with a contented mind, 'Sufficit mihi unus Plato pro uno populo.'

"I have the honour to be, etc.,
"GLUCK."

LEIGH HUNT ON MUSIC.

MR. LEIGH HUNT always writes prettily, and for an amateur, his notions of music are excellent. Hear what he says of music at Lord Byron's favourite Pisa:

"There seems to be a good deal of talent for music among the Pisans which does not know how to make its way. You never hear the poorest melody, but some body strikes in with what he can muster of a harmony. Boys go about of an evening, and parties sit at their doors, singing popular airs and hanging as long as possible on the last chord. It is not an uncommon thing for gentlemen to play their guitars as they go along to a party. I heard, one evening, a voice that would not have disgraced an opera, singing past a window; and I once walked behind a common post-boy, who, in default of having another to help him to a harmony, contrived to make a chord of all his tones, by rapidly sounding the second and the treble one after the other. The whole people are bitten with a new song, and hardly sing anything else till the next. There were two epidemic airs of this kind when I were there, which had been imported from Florence, and which the inhabitants sung from morning to night, though they were nothing remarkable. Yet Pisa is said to be the least fond of music of any city in Tuscany."

Of Genoa he talks with equal shrewdness, and the same good feeling:

"The Genoese are not a musical specimen of the Italians, though the national talent seems lurking wherever you go. The most beggarly minstrel gets another to make out a harmony with him, on some sort of an instrument, if only a gourd with a string or two. Such, at least, appears to be a strange wildfowl of a fiddle, which they use, or rather a gourd stuck upon a long fiddle of deal. They all sing out their words distinctly, some accompanying themselves all the while in the guitar style, others putting in a symphony now and then, even if it be nothing better than two notes always the same. There was one blind beggar who seemed an enthusiast for Rossini. Imagine a sturdy fellow in rags, laying his hot face upon the fiddle, rolling his blind eyeballs against the sun, and vociferating with all the true, open-mouthed syllabical particularity of the Italians, a part of one of the duets of that splendid master. His companion having his eyesight, and being not therefore so vivacious, sings his part with a sedater vigour; though even when the former is singing a solo, I have heard the associate throw in some unisons at intervals, as though his help had been of necessity wanting to the blind man, on vocal as well as corporal occasions."

This is, indeed, charming loquacity, and if only talk, is talking to a good end.

MR. ALBERT SMITH gave the 800th representation of his Mont Blanc entertainment, at the Egyptian-hall, on Tuesday week.

SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.—The last flower-show, but one, of the season took place on Tuesday. The weather was propitious, and the gardens crowded. The show, which was chiefly of hollyhocks, was of more than usual brilliancy. The principal exhibitors were Messrs. Paull, Chater, and Roake. The white specimens were, in general, the favourites. Of these, Chater's Mont Blanc, and Roake's White Globe, were among the finest and most attractive. Holmes's prize specimen, Lemonade, with a white petal, verging into lemon-colour in the cup, was, perhaps, the most beautiful in the collection, which gave so much satisfaction that there was a very general wish that the show should be continued for another day.

MUSIC IN 1645.

THE Messrs. Sax's improved brass instruments are but children's toys, veritable playthings, when compared with the instruments employed in the monster concerts given by our forefathers. It was with brewers' cauldrons, contrabassi, each of which was a load for eight mules, and windmills arranged harmoniously, that they made up their orchestras. Do not laugh; we have before us the proof of what we state; the report in full of a concert "in action" given at Dresden on the 13th July, 1845, by order of the Elector John George of Saxe. This concert was to represent the episode of Judith and Holofernes. The words were written by Matheseus Pfaumenker, and the music composed by Hilaire, the court-singer. The Elector, having heard the score, was so much pleased with the musician that he presented him with any quantity of beer, and entrusted him with the organization of the fête, without regard to expense. All the artists of Germany, Switzerland, the Vaud, Poland and Italy, were invited to unite with their pupils in the Dresden gigantic musical festival, where, by the 9th July, 1645, several thousand instrumental performers were assembled and an army of singers.

It must have been a strange spectacle—these men arriving from all points of the horizon in crowds, armed cap-à-pie with all the instruments known at the time, and a multitude of others which were unknown in Germany, and many of which had been manufactured for the occasion. A certain Rapotzki came from Warsaw with a waggon drawn by four mules; this equipage being solely to convey an engine of musical war, an enormous contrabasso, which measured seven German yards in height. The artist had ingeniously adapted to his instrument a small ladder, which allowed him to run up and down quickly from the bridge to the top of the instrument, and play with both hands his great bow over the three cables of his contrabasso. What does Bottesini think of that?

This was not all; a student from Wittemberg, named Kumpler, promised to sing the score of Holofernes, a feat in which he was materially assisted by swallowing an ocean of beer at the expense of the Elector. For fear the contrabosso of the Pole, Rapotzki, should not be powerful enough for the voices of the singers and the terrible noise of the orchestra, the singer Grandmaus bethought him of a windmill, between the wings of which he had stretched large cables. Four vigorous performers placed in the top and bottom angles, drew sounds from these cables by rubbing on them as with bows, strong pieces of wood, with serrated surfaces. On one side of the orchestra, which took up its position on a hill, was a gigantic organ which Father Serapion, a distinguished organist, beat with hands and feet. Next to the organ were the wind and metallic instruments, among which was the brewer's cauldron we have before alluded to, and an enormous bell, recently made and destined for a cathedral. In the centre was closely gathered the mass of the musicians, placed above the singers, who were arranged in good order under two hundred and fifty leaders. Delighted with this magnificent coup-d'œil, and wishing to add his part to the musical structure which he had seen created as if by enchantment, the Elector had a dozen bomb-mortars, well charged by the court artillery, placed in battery.

At the signal given by the discharge of these mortars, the concert began. One voice, immense and multiple, struck the air in all directions, and struck the sonorous vault of ether with millions of vibrations. A spectator could easily have imagined himself into a world of magical creation. But then what zeal did not the artists display on this occasion. The famous prima donna Rigozzi, from Milan, lost her life from her efforts to make more noise than the orchestra. The student Kumpler, accompanied by the contrabassist Rapotzki and by the windmill, sang an air that made the hills tremble. In order to give additional zest to the entertainment, and to please the Elector, the first violinist of the day, Giovanni Scioppio, from Cremona, played a solo, holding his instrument behind his back. At length a double fugue, sung by the Assyrians flying before the victorious Israelites, was sung with so much energy and so much expression, that the victors, overcome with enthusiasm and finding that the music expressed imperfectly the desire for revenge that animated them, fell upon the Assyrians, and deluged them with clods of earth. This made the Elector laugh heartily, and terminated joyously this truly monster concert.

The next day it was discovered that several partizans in the camp of the Israelites and the Assyrians had died during the great musical contest of the day previous.

MISS LOUISA PYNE, Mrs. Pyne, Mr. W. Harrison, and Signor Bassoni left Liverpool on Wednesday for New York, where they will make their first appearance in America, early in September. They are engaged for a series of English operas at the Broadway after which they will proceed on a tour through the States.

M. CHARLES HALLÉ had the honour last week of performing some of the pianoforte sonatas of Beethoven before Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the Royal Children, at Osborne. He selected two of the early ones, two of the middle ones, and finished with the great sonata in B flat, Op. 106. The Queen and the Prince Consort were much pleased with the early sonatas; but the Royal Children, it has been said, were most particularly gratified with the last.

MDLLE. SOPHIE CRUVELLI started on Tuesday, with Sig. Tamberlik and others, on the provincial tour of which we have already spoken. The first concert took place on Wednesday evening, at Shrewsbury, the second on Thursday evening, at Manchester. Last night the party were to sing at a concert at Liverpool; and to-night the first of the six operatic performances in Manchester will take place, with Norma.

FRENCH COMEDIANS.—It certainly materially adds to the dignity and respectability of the dramatic profession in France, that a large number of its members are men of refined taste and liberal education, quite capable, if they chose, of earning a living, and of even earning themselves a name, in other arts and pursuits than that they have chosen to follow. Among them are to be found elegant scholars, dramatists, poets, painters, sculptors, musicians—not mere dabblers, but proficients of approved merit.

THE article in No. 10 of the Cäcilia was as little pleasing to a Roman Catholic priest as that in No. 11 to a learned musician and an admirer of Mozart. In spite of this, however, the Abbé Stadler, who, in the introduction to his pamphlet, gives an extract from the first, adds no remarks of his own offensive to Herr Weber. He merely reproaches him with wishing to raise himself to the position of reformer of the Roman Catholic ritual, which was actually the case. "Here," he exclaims, "is a perfect edifice; words, music, criticism—and all by Herr Weber. Time will show whether it is built upon granite or sand." At the conclusion of his pamphlet the Abbé adds:—

"We must proceed as follows:—If we wish to raise a new edifice, we must first clear the site of everything which can possibly prove an obstacle to our building operations."

Is it necessary to inform my readers that the metaphor of the new edifice does not here apply to the music but to the text of Herr Weber's Requiem, since there were a hundred other requiems previously in existence, all differing from each other, as regards the music, although they had one and the same text. Lastly, the Abbé Stadler, after pointing out the passages which Mozart borrowed from Händel in the first number of his Requiem, observes that Herr Weber, also, had taken the theme of his "Agnus" from an air in an old opera—Der Dumme Anton, upon which air Mozart had composed some very beautiful variations. And herein is positively comprised all the "insult and calumny" of the defence. Thus it was Herr Weber himself who, in the heat of passion and on the spur of the moment, suggested a conclusion which his adversary had never attempted to draw from the comparison of the two articles. "What!" says Weber—"Am I accused of slandering Mozart? Am I thought mad enough to be jealous of him?" But Stadler, we repeat, had insinuated nothing of the kind; and, if others had either said or written so—if they had gone too far—it would have depended upon themselves to turn it to advantage, in so utterly false a position had Herr Weber placed himself. "Jealous of Mozart!" No—his opponents might have replied—that would be a species of insanity of which we should not suppose you or anyone else capable; but that is nothing to the point. For you, the Requiem is almost entirely the work of Süssmayer, very fine, it is true, in some of the leading ideas, but, through bungling additions, only worthy of a schoolboy, so altered, mangled, distorted, and jumbled together, as to be no longer recognisable.* Without doubt, you seriously believed this, since, in your paper, you give it as your own opinion. If so, then, there can be no great things to boast of in having gained a victory over Süssmayer, and composed a better requiem than that which he has so miserably spoilt.

As I have already remarked, Herr Weber resolved to prolong the contest on the ground of his last article, and behind the ramparts of his ancient doubts, which now were doubts no longer. But how to proceed? To attack probability—to deny material facts—to arraign the description of Mozart's manuscript as false, while one part of it was at hand, and another might be discovered—was impossible. Besides, the character of the Abbé Stadler stood in too honourable a light, and too implicit a confidence was placed in his testimony. Since, therefore, it was hopeless to take the bull by the horns, it was necessary to have recourse to another system of tactics, and to circumvent the enemy—in other words, defy probability. Herr Weber was resolved. Everything that lay in the back ground of his former line of argument may be summed up in the following sentence—the column which supports the whole logical fabric:—

"Directly it shall be proved that the pieces and passages, condemned by Herr Weber, are not Mozart's, it is proved, ipso facto, that they form no part of the work Mozart intended publishing as his own; and, moreover, that this music, which was unworthy of appearing under the name of the real composer, was quite good enough for the object for which it was written."

As, however, the last part of the sentence appears enigmatical, and I may be reproached with having made it capable of false interpretation, by the manner in which I have put it, I shall quote Herr Weber's own words. After alluding to a circumstance, which had hitherto been kept secret, though known to many in Vienna, and, as Herr Weber believes, to the Abbé Stadler in particular—a circumstance not destined to remain much longer a secret to the public, but to become generally known as soon as two eyes should have closed in death, Herr Weber goes on to say:—

"If it ever becomes known why and how far the incomplete work of Mozart was destined for a very different purpose than to be given to the world as a Requiem of his own composition—people will then, perhaps, discover a very natural explanation of all they have thought they were defending on such deeply æsthetical or elevated religious grounds. In a word, the story will cause them a great deal of laughter."

This sounds still more enigmatical. I cannot say for certain what this secret circumstance may be, and in what the laughable story may consist, but I believe, with some confidence, that I have guessed it.

Certain explanations, of a later date than the article we are now analysing, brought to light a few circumstances, proving little in themselves, but, when separated from other known facts, capable of leading to the supposition that Count von Wallsegg—who did not understand much of music, though he had the mania of passing for a great connoisseur and even for a great composer—had contemplated publishing the requiem which he ordered for the funeral of his wife, as a proof at the same time of his conjugal grief and his extraordinary musical genius. One of the conditions of the agreement between the Count and Mozart must, therefore, necessarily have included a solemn oath to preserve the strictest secresy with regard to the name of the composer. Herr Weber, who, no doubt, had received some such piece of information, without being allowed to publish it, must have felt great satisfaction in adopting an hypothesis which so well seconded his plan of defence, in the critical position into which his first campaign against the Requiem had led him. What might not be deduced from this fortunate idea?

That this is the laughable story to which Herr Weber alludes is certain, especially when, to the words above quoted, I add others which he uttered in close connection with them:—

* Herr Weber has employed expressions, phrases, comparisons, and metaphors, quite as strong as the terms used in the text, if not, indeed, stronger.

"We shall perceive for what reason, Mozart was able, without injuring his artistic reputation, to take great liberties, which he would not otherwise have taken, in the composition of the Requiem, and why he thought his youthful studies* good enough to use for the first and second numbers."

A few lines further on, Herr Weber adds:—

"Mozart, too, who united in one individual the characters of the god-like artist and the man of pleasure, had human wants; he knew how to employ and spend money, especially when he was paid in advance."

Let us afford Herr Weber one piece of satisfaction; it will cost us little. We will allow it to be possible, or even probable, that Mozart, as Herr Weber asserts, did not or could not intend publishing the Requiem in his own name. Let us even admit—what, however, is not true—that he authorised Count von Wallsegg to publish it as his. The necessary consequence would be, that in this case, for the first and only time in his life, Mozart acted in a dishonourable manner, and deceived the Count—since the promised secresy was far from being observed. Süssmayer knew that Mozart wrote the Requiem; Mad. Mozart also knew it; Mdlle. Sophie Weber knew it—can anything be called a secret when two women know it?—the Abbé Stadler knew it; Hofer, Schack, and Görl knew it—since they had sung the Requiem; all the members of the theatre knew it, consequently all the great city of Vienna; and, if Vienna knew it, the whole world would know it, on the occasion of the first performance. Poor Count von Wallsegg was, therefore, cheated out of the ducats he had paid in advance; but, at the same time, Mozart was made responsible for his work! There is one fact which Herr Weber, as a Protestant, appears to have overlooked altogether, but of which Catholics, Roman or Greek, acknowledge the full importance. For a man like Mozart, the composition of a mass was in no wise a simple matter of art or business, but of religion as well. Let us not forget—for this, without doubt, is the weightiest point in the argument—that, when composing his Requiem, Mozart felt death to be at hand; that he was still employed on it at a time when even the most ambitious begin not to trouble themselves much more about fame; and that he worked under the influence of the most elevated thoughts, the most solemn, and, at the same time, terrible impressions which can possess the heart of man, and shake his soul in its innermost recesses: God, Death, and Eternity! How fortunate is it for the biographer, that the two most momentous facts—I allude to the period at which the Requiem was written, and the dying state of him who wrote it—should, in consequence of a controversy, in other respects idle and useless, have obtained the certainty of historical truth, none of the elements of conviction necessary to give it force being wanting. Had there been any testimony capable of overturning or even rendering suspicious one or other of these facts, the whole foundation of my book would have been undermined, and I should have thrown into the fire as much of the manuscript as I had written. But, fortunately, Heaven be praised! this is not the case. All who lived upon a footing of intimacy with Mozart, and stood round his death-bed—his widow, Süssmayer, Sophie Weber, Stadler, Schack, and a number of other persons residing at Vienna, all unexceptionable witnesses, and, indeed, the only persons who can be looked upon as such—agree in answering the two great questions affirmatively. "Yes," they say, "during the last days of his life, Mozart was working at the Requiem;" while his widow, his sister-in-law, and Stadler add:—"and he believed he was composing it for himself." What becomes, after this, of the "laughable story," which Herr Weber keeps for us in petto?

The promise, one day or other, to disclose a "laughable" fact, was not sufficient to supply the place of historical arguments against the genuineness of the Requiem. As these, however, were altogether wanting, it was necessary to have recourse to fresh critical proofs to support the first, which had turned out so unfortunately for Herr Weber. On the present occasion his opponent himself gave him the weapons. Stadler admitted that the themes of the "Requiem" and "Kyrie" were taken from Händel. He admitted a fact with which Herr Weber was not acquainted; he admitted it without any circumlocution; without being in the slightest degree compelled, and, at least to all appearance, in direct opposition to the interest of his cause. Herr Weber immediately sent for those works of Händel, in which the aforesaid themes occur, and exhibited them, for the satisfaction of the curious, in the Cäcilia:

"There! look! compare! Are not the two works alike? A copy of Händel—an imitation of Händel—mere youthful exercises after Händel; the essays of a school-boy, which Mozart, the master, would never have incorporated in a work that he intended to publish as his own. Let the public now decide for themselves who has defamed the memory of our god-like master most; our adversaries, who accuse him of a barefaced plagiarism, or ourselves, who have exerted all the power, all the resources of our conviction to repel this insulting stigma?"

In the system of reasoning adopted by Herr Weber, there are two circumstances which must prove a source of astonishment to every one with the slightest pretensions to understand and reflect upon music. How can a professor of composition, and one who possesses some merit, of all people in the world, feign ignorance on this head? Then again, how was it possible that a polemical writer, better acquainted than any one else with the feints and niceties of a literary duel, could allow himself to be taken in so evident a trap as that set for him by the author of the Defence? Is it probable that an old practician, like Stadler, would voluntarily have provided him with weapons had they been calculated to thrust home? Herr Weber never thought of this, and paid dearly for his oversight.

When a person is once entangled in a paradox, he becomes warmer and warmer as he progresses in defence of his erroneous views; an inward voice, like his spiritual conscience, now and then whispers that he is wrong, but passion and self-love prevent the voice from exercising a proper influence. In all probability, this inward voice had made itself heard in the case of Herr Weber, who appears, at least, to have felt the insufficiency of his logical weapons, since, instead of hoarding up his most telling arguments for the end, like every good advocate, he concludes his defence with a prolix metaphor, in which, during six pages, he compares the Requiem to an unfinished picture of Raphael, which one of that painter's pupils might have completed. Herr Weber expected, no doubt, great results from the comparison, and bestowed remarkable care in its development. He tells us all the fine things a connoisseur of painting might have said on beholding the picture when it was spoilt; and goes on to relate how the fanatical but ignorant Raphaelists ran to the market-place, and excited the people to stone the connoisseur, who had proved that he understood and admired Raphael better than any one else. Not content with this exaggerated metaphor, Herr Weber institutes a comparison between the Requiem and the restored Torso of Apollo Belvedere, or the Laocoon, still—which we must not forget—with a view to convince us that the Requiem was a work which Mozart thought unworthy of appearing under his name! What a cry of triumph should I have uttered, on hearing these magnificent comparisons, had I been fighting under Stadler's banner! But what mischievous hobgoblin suggested these comparisons to Herr Weber, and what malicious spirit held back his pen, at the moment he was about to scratch out what he had written in an inexplicable fit of abstraction? An unfinished picture of Raphael! Does not this remind everyone instantly of Raphael's Transfiguration. The circumstances connected with the picture and the Requiem are, indeed, remarkably alike. Raphael died at the age of thirty-seven, before he could finish the Transfiguration; Mozart, too, died at the age of thirty-seven, before he could finish his Requiem. It was a pupil of Raphael's who completed the one, and it was a pupil of Mozart's who completed the other; the Transfiguration passes for the chef-d'œuvre of painting, the Requiem for the chef-d'œuvre of music. A more startling, or, rather, a more wonderful coincidence could not be cited. Again, the Apollo Belvedere and the Laocoon, in spite of certain restorations, are held to be the finest masterpieces of ancient and modern sculpture; they, too, may be likened to the completed score of the Requiem with an amount of analogical coincidence rarely to be met. Lastly, the Torso, an example of the most perfect execution that ever issued from the hands of a sculptor, and which has received no addition from modern art, may also represent, by no means badly, the incomplete manuscript of Mozart, with one difference, viz., that the statue is far more mutilated than the score. All this agrees singularly well. But what becomes of the learned remarks of Herr Weber's "connoisseur," and the observation of Herr Weber himself, that, of all Mozart's works, the Requiem "is his least perfect, least complete—in short, a work which can scarcely be called Mozart's at all!" I have seen the Transfiguration; I have, also, seen the Apollo Belvedere, the Laocoon, and the Torso; I have heard the Requiem several times, and I only say this, because I am very glad that I share the opinions of the whole world with regard to these lofty manifestations of artistic genius.

PROVINCIAL.

A CORRESPONDENT at Liverpool informs us that the special committee appointed to consider the arrangements for the opening of St. George's Hall have made a report, which confirms the intelligence we gave last week. The Hall will be opened on the 18th of September, when the Messiah will be performed. There will also be an oratorio on the two following mornings, with a miscellaneous concert on each of the three evenings. Sir Henry Bishop is recommended to the council by the committee, as conductor; and it is proposed that the prices of admission shall be on the lowest possible scale. We understand that, after the meetings of the British Association, arrangements will be made for opening the Hall to the public, with performances on the organ.

The musical season has fairly began in the North; not, however, without great disappointment at the illness which prevented Mademoiselle Sophie Cruvellie from appearing at the preliminary concert announced at the Concert Hall, Manchester, as well as that of the Philharmonic Society, which took place at Liverpool on Friday last, the 25th of August, and that at Shrewsbury on the Wednesday previous. The Manchester Courier has a long account of the performances at the Concert Hall on the 24th, from which we extract the following:—

"The programme was not the one originally fixed upon, but an amended one, which was given with the other, the following explanation being printed at the head:—'The directors exceedingly regret to announce that, in consequence of the severe indisposition of Mademoiselle Cruvelli, she will be unable to appear this evening. In order to avoid disappointment as far as possible, the programme will be arranged in the following manner:' and then follows the new programme. We think this course was a mistake; it increased rather than lessened the 'disappointment,' for it rendered the words on the programme nearly useless. In fact, the programmes were, excepting as regards the order of the pieces, nearly identical, and all that was required was the announcement that Mademoiselle Cruvelli could not appear—that Mademoiselle Marai would take her place in the concerted pieces—that in the first part Signor Tamberlik would, in addition to what was already put down for him, sing the 'Cujus animam,' from the Stabat Mater—and that Signor Li Calzi would play a solo on the pianoforte in the second part. However, in spite of the damp which seemed to be thrown upon the audience by the non-appearance of the star of the evening, for Mademoiselle Cruvelli being a stranger here, the attraction of the concert to a great degree centred in her, the concert was a good one. Signor Tamberlik gave an extra solo in the first part, selecting the favourite air from the Stabat Mater by Rossini, and as being a piece not originally contemplated, we cannot complain that it was accompanied by the pianoforte instead of the band. Mademoiselle Marai obtained an encore in the aria from Beatrice di Tenda, the only piece so honoured in the first part. The applause was somewhat less minute in the second part, Tamberlik receiving an encore which he richly deserved, and the Preghiera from Mose in Egitto being re-demanded. With the exception of one or two points scarcely necessary to enumerate, the performances of the band were highly meritorious. The 'Fest' overture by Beethoven will be a favourite. The room was crowded, and the heat oppressive."

The South Eastern Gazette has the following remarks on Church Music by the Dean of Norwich, on the occasion of the first trial of a new organ in the parish church of Great Chart:—

"This edifice has lately obtained a new organ, purchased by subscription for £100. The organ was used in public worship for the first time on Sunday week, when the Dean of Norwich, the rector of the parish, in his afternoon sermon, took occasion to expatiate on the devotional effect of music, citing instances from Scripture, where instrumental and vocal music were used to raise the song of triumph and gratitude for deliverance, the part it occupied in the devotional exercises of the Jews, and the choir organised by King David for the service of the Tabernacle, and continued by his son in the Temple; the reasons why music should form a part of Christian worship, and the way in which it must be used to be acceptable to the Supreme Object of worship, as explained in the text, Colossians iii., 16, 'Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom; teaching and admonishing one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord.' We regret to add that the builder of the organ, a gentleman from Norwich, being unable on Monday to leave Ashford by the early train, took a passage in the excursion train from Dover, and was one of the sufferers in the fearful collision which occurred at Croydon."

The Manchester and Salford Sacred Harmonic Society has been rehearsing weekly during the summer months, and intends commencing the approaching season with Haydn's Creation. The efforts of the society to supply the public with music of a high class, at such rates as will bring it within the reach of all classes, entitle it to support.

The Leeds Intelligencer says:—

"The time is now rapidly approaching when our musical friends expect some notice of the ensuing musical campaign. We are given to understand that the first concert of the season will be a complimentary one to Mr. J. L. Hatton, the composer. We are glad that such a tribute to Mr. Hatton is about to be given in the metropolis of the West Riding."

WEYMOUTH.—Mr. Ricardo Lesiter, the pianist and composer, gave, on Tuesday the 22nd instant, a concert here, under the patronage of Lady Lethbridge, Mrs. Steward, and the élite of the county of Dorset. The concert was in behalf of the new church at Weymouth, and was most successful. The principal attraction was Miss Hughes, of the Royal Academy, London, whose singing was so much admired, in both the Sacred and the Italian schools, that she was encored in several songs, and greatly applauded in all. Miss Hughes seems to have been carefully trained, and if her masters could have been present, on the present occasion, and witnessed the effect she produced on the audience, at the Royal Hotel Rooms, they would have felt really gratified.

BATH.—The attendance at the theatre on Saturday, to witness the performance of Mr. Chas. Kean's company, was tolerably full. The play was The Honeymoon. Miss Murray, Miss Carlotta Leclercq, and Miss Desborough, were Juliana, Volante, and Zamora; Mr. Cathcart the Duke Aranza; Rolando, Mr. G. Everett; and Mr. Addison the Mock Duke. The comic ballet introduced certain feats of Mr. Huline and had nothing else to recommend it. The comic drama of A Roland for an Oliver again, with Addison as Sir Mark Chase, Miss Carlotta Leclercq as Maria Darlington, and Mr. G. Everett as Alfred Highflyer, terminated the performances.

LUTHER ON MUSIC.—"Music," says Martin Luther, "has ever been my delight; it has always excited and moved me, so as to give me a greater desire to preach. I have always been fond of music. He who undertakes this art is the right sort of a man, and is fit for anything else. It is needful that music should be taught in schools. A schoolmaster must be able to sing, or I do not think much of him. Music cometh near to theology; I would not exchange my little knowledge of it for much money. The young should be constantly exercised in this art, for it refines and improves men. Singing is the best of arts and exercises; it is not of a worldly character, and it is an antidote for all contentions and quarrels. Singers are not gloomy, but joyful, and sing their cares away. There can be no doubt that in minds which are affected by music are the seeds of much that is good; and those who are not affected by it I regard as stocks and stones. Music effecteth what theology alone can effect besides; it giveth peace and a joyful mind. Therefore, the prophets have employed no art as they have music, inasmuch as they have put their theology not into geometry, arithmetic or astronomy, but into music. Hence it cometh, that by teaching the truth in psalms and hymns, they have joined theology and music in close union."

FOREIGN.

PARIS.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The opening of the Grand Opéra was announced for last Monday, on which occasion Mad. Stolz was to make her re-appearance in La Favorite. The opera of Santa-Chiara, music by his Royal Highness the reigning Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, and libretto by M. Gustave Oppelt, has been put in rehearsal. The principal parts are confided to Mesdemoiselles Sophie Cruvelli, Maria Dussy, MM. Gueymard, Obin, and Bonnehée. The divertissement will be supported by Mesdames Cerito and Rosati. According to report, the mise-en-scène will be very magnificent. M. Roger is expected shortly.

There is nothing new at the Opéra-Comique. The entertainments were interrupted last Sunday by an accident which befel Mdlle. Lemercier in the third act of the Fiancée du Diable. A pistol, which had to be discharged by Gilette at the devil, having missed fire, a supernumerary stationed at the wings for the purpose of remedying any accident of this description, fired too soon. The unexpected detonation surprised Mdlle. Lemercier, whose hand, slightly agitated, was hurt by the lock of her pistol, which, however, eventually went off. The fair artist fainted, from emotion rather than pain, and the performance was arrested—luckily but a little before the dénoûment. The accident has been attended with no serious results to Mdlle. Lemercier.

M. Perrin has engaged for the Théâtre-Lyrique, Mesdemoiselles Bourgeois and M. Achard, both lâureates at the last concours of the Conservatory. He has, also, increased the orchestra and choruses by one-third. Mad. Marie Cabel will open the season. The first novelty will be the new opera of M. Gévaert.

The Théâtre Français has been partially redecorated during the short recess. Madlle Rachel returned to Brussels after the representation on the 15th August. Nothing positive is known about the intentions of the great tragic actress, though M. Ernest Legouvé, author of Médée, has not renounced all hope of prevailing on Mdlle. Rachel to fulfil her promise of playing the principal part. I am able to give you more authentic particulars concerning the prospects of the Comic Muse. The re-appearance of Mdlle. Plessy is a certainty; but it is said that the charming actress will not appear before the Spring. M. Bressant, who has been giving a few performances at Caen, will appear in a week or two, and in a new piece.

At the Vaudeville, the three new pieces, with which the theatre will re-open, are being rehearsed every morning and evening. They are entitled: Le Fauconnier, Les Marquises de la Fourchette, and A qui mal veut, mal arrive.—M. Hoffman is engaged at the Palais Royal.—A new drama, entitled Les Rues de Paris is announced at the Ambigu.—M. Levasseur has gone to Switzerland, where he is engaged to sing at several concerts.

There has been an election for the place of organist of the grand organ in the church of Saint-Paul-Saint-Louis. Five members of the committee, out of six, voted for M. Minard, formerly organist at the church of Saint-Gervais.

BERLIN.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The Royal Opera House is once more open to the public, although the principal members of the company are still absent. Auber's Feensee was the piece selected for the first night. The house was very fully attended.—At Kroll's Theatre, a certain Mdlle. Schmidt, from the Stadttheater in Pesth, has appeared with success in the Liebestrank (L'Elisir d'Amore.) She will play several other parts in the course of her engagement.

An interesting lecture was given lately in the Theatre Royal, by Herr Sudre, to a numerous audience, including Prince Karl, a great number of officers and musicians, and several artistic and scientific notabilities. The lecture described an invention of Herr Sudre, called Télephonie, or Télégraphie acoustique, which is a system of employing music in the symbolical communication of messages, especially military. All the combinations of the diatonic scale (do, re, mi, fa, sol, la, si), simple rhythmical relations, (for signals with drums and trumpets), as well as the five fingers of the hand, which represent the five lines of the usual musical notation, are pressed into the service. For military purposes a much greater variety of signals is thus obtained. The audience were surprised and delighted at the experiments.

Professor Dehn, keeper of the musical portion of the Royal Library, will shortly proceed to the province of Prussia for the purpose of making researches in connection with the old and valuable musical works and manuscripts in the local library.

BADEN-BADEN.—(From a Correspondent.)—On Friday evening, the 25th, a concert was given at the Kursaal—in the Salon des Fleurs, as it is called—by Miss Arabella Goddard, who was assisted by M. Vivier (horn), Sig. Bazzini (violin), and Mdlle. C. Fischer (vocalist). A more brilliant and fashionable audience was never seen in the Maison de Conversation, which M. Benazet has rendered so attractive that all the "eaux" and "spas" of Germany, France, and Belgium (including Austria and the Tyrol), put together, sink into insignificance by the side of Baden-Baden. The whole of the first row of seats, near the pianoforte, was occupied by duchesses and dukes, princesses, princes, ambassadors, etc. Among these was the Princess Hohenlohe, who sometime since was on a visit to Queen Victoria in England, and the Grand Duke of Baden, who sets up for a connoisseur. The first thing in the programme was the Serenade e Rondo Giojoso of Mendelssohn, which Miss Arabella Goddard played to perfection, the orchestra accompanying her well. This fine and very difficult composition was probably unknown to everyone present, the members of the orchestra included; but it was very much admired and completely successful. Miss Goddard next played Weber's Invitation à la Valse with infinite grace and spirit; and lastly a bouquet, so to say, of three charming little pieces—a Lied ohne Worte of Mendelssohn, the A flat Impromptu of Chopin (No. 30 of his works), and Charles Mayer's Fontaine, all of which afforded the highest possible gratification. More elegant playing united to purer expression and more unerring execution than this young lady's has rarely been heard. The connoisseurs here were enchanted with her, and the pianists themselves no less so. One of the latter, M. Pixis, who was present, paid her many hearty compliments. The Prince and Princess of Prussia, both amateurs of distinction, were equally warm and genial in their felicitations; so that Miss Arabella Goddard has good reason to be pleased with her first reception in this beautiful, romantic, and musical country. What was much thought of was her determination not to give a concert without playing at least one piece with orchestral accompaniments. This showed that she was not merely a virtuosa, but a true and genuine artist. The accomplished M. Vivier, who is all the rage and fashion at Baden, here, there, and everywhere, the delight of every circle, only condescended to give us one piece at this concert—viz.: Schubert's plaintive romance, L'Eloge des Larmes, in which the tone he produced from the horn, and the sentiment he displayed, were beyond reproach. He was greatly applauded. M. Vivier was accompanied by Miss A. Goddard on the pianoforte. Mdlle. C. Fischer, a soprano singer of talent, produced a good effect in "Ernani involami," and Rode's air with variations; and Sig. Bazzini fairly astonished the audience by his very original and fantastic style of execution, which he exhibited to much advantage in three morceaux of his own—a fantasia on airs from La Sonnambula; an Elégie, so called; and La Ronde des Lutins, the last two following each other in immediate succession. Altogether, Miss Goddard's concert gave the utmost satisfaction, and no one grudged the ten francs which were paid for the tickets. On Tuesday she leaves for Wiesbaden, and goes thence to Frankfort. M. Vivier is also expected to leave on Tuesday. Mdlle. Marie Cruvelli is still here. The weather is magnificent, and Baden very full.

COLOGNE.—The Musical Society, the Liedertafel, and the members of several other associations, lately made an excursion on board the steamer "Der Prinz von Prussen," up the Rhine, as far as Schloss-Argenfels. The proprietor invited the singers into the castle. Among the notabilities present were Herren Ferdinand Hiller, H. Dorn, Rod. Benedix, and Alfred Meissner. Herren Marschner and Dorn had composed several new songs for the occasion, and a chorus, with solos, from Herr Dorn's new opera of Die Niebelungen was also performed.

One of the first novelties at the theatre will be the new opera, Der Advocat, music by Herr Ferdinand Hiller, and words by Herr Roderick Benedix. According to report, the next production will be a very successful quodlibet opera, founded on an old Cologne tradition, dramatised by a local amateur. The first representation will be given for the benefit of a charitable institution.

MUNICH.—M. Hector Berlioz, who was sent here as correspondent for the Journal des Débats, during the Exhibition, intends having some of his compositions performed in a series of concerts. The General Music-director, Herr Lachner, is on leave of absence. During the musical season, two grand concerts and one or two classical operas will be given every week. The concerts of the Hof-Capelle will shortly commence. Mad. Jenny-Lind-Goldschmidt and Herr Otto Goldschmidt have arrived.

BRESLAU.—M. Roger has appeared thirteen times. His last appearance was for the benefit of the members of the chorus.—Madlle. Schröder has appeared with success as Pamina in the Zauberflöte.

GÖRLITZ.—Madlle. Wollrabe, the prima donna, has suddenly disappeared in a most mysterious manner. She is supposed to have gone to Riga.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.—Madlle. Bochkolz-Falconi has been "starring" here.

COBLENZ.—Herr Kramer, manager of the theatre at Düsseldorf, has undertaken the management of the theatre here.

CASSEL.—Herr Hochheimer has made his début as Bertram, in Robert der Teufel. A new romantic opera, entitled Der Unbekannte, music by Capellmeister J. J. Bott, and libretto by Herr E. Biberhofer, will be produced on the birthday of His Royal Highness the Elector.

BRUNSWICK.—Mad. Leisinger has been well received in Fidelio.

DRESDEN.—The Theatre-Royal is closed for six weeks, in consequence of the death of the King of Saxony. The members of the establishment have unanimously refused all the offers by managers of other theatres to enter upon "starring" engagements during the above-mentioned period.

LEIPSIC.—Herr Wirsing has closed his theatre for three weeks, in consequence of the King's death. During this period, the members of the company receive half-salaries. Herr Wirsing, however, has promised to make up the other half, if the Government give him an indemnity for the loss he sustains.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—Mad. Von Marra-Volmer is "starring" with success.

WEIMAR.—The tenor, Herr Beck, from the Hof-theater in Dessau, is engaged.

HAMBURGH.—The next opera to be produced is Dr. Spohr's Jessonda, in which Madlle. Holm will make her first appearance before a Hamburgh public. Among other "stars," we have lately had Herr Albert de Jekelfalusi, from the theatre at Pesth, Herr Weiss, and Mdlle. Pollack, from Cassel.

PRAGUE.—Mad. B. Engst has made her début as Fides, in Der Prophet, but, from nervousness or fatigue, failed to produce the effect anticipated.

PESTH.—Herr Ellinger has become a favourite here. He has had offers of engagements both from the national and German theatres.

ST. PETERSBURGH.—The grand opera season will begin with Italian opera, for which the management has exerted itself to the utmost. Mad. Tedesco is among the artists engaged. Lablache, Tamberlik, Mdlle. Marai, Tagliafico, and others, have been re-engaged.

ITALY.—We have received the following from our correspondent at Milan, 26th August:—

"Beyond a few concerts and benefits at the theatres, at which a miscellaneous selection composed of acts of various operas is served up to the public, we have positively nothing to record. We must mention, however, the first appearance of a new English contralto, Miss Adelaide Phillips, who made her début at a concert, when she sang Arsace's cavatina, "Ah! quel giorno," from Semiramide, and created a furore. This young artist possesses a voice of good quality, powerful, and sympathetic. Her style is not yet finished, but she holds out promise for the future, and with proper training I have no doubt will take a high position. Miss Phillips repeated the cavatina at a second concert given for the manager's benefit, as also the duet with Assur, in both of which she was much applauded. Balfe has finished his new opera, entitled Il Duca ed il Pittore, the libretto by Piave, which is to be represented during the autumnal season at Trieste. He will then proceed to Turin to complete another opera, Lo Scudiero, which he is engaged to write for the Royal Theatre at Macerata. The season of the fair commenced with Verdi's Trovatore, the principal parts being sustained by Madame Boccabadati and Signori Coliva and Contedini. At Turin, the new opera by Sig. Cagnonio, Amori et Trappole, was given on the 19th instant, and warmly applauded. The artists were re-called on several occasions. A terzetto in the second act was enthusiastically encored. At Lucca, the theatre was opened on the 15th, with Il Trovatore, which, as usual, obtained complete success. Balfe's opera, The Bohemian Girl, is going the round of the Italian theatres. It is now being played at Brescia, and is already announced in several cities for the autumnal season."

At Fernio we find that Rossini's Mose has been played at the Nuovo with much success. Madame Barbieri-Nini created an immense sensation in her part, and both the tenor, Agreti, and the baritone, Steller, acquitted themselves creditably in theirs. The scenery was fine, and the decorator, Ricci, was recalled several times before the curtain during the performance. At Udine we find that I Puritani was coldly received on the first night, the choruses and orchestra being anything but perfect. On the second representation, however, Signor Beaucarde exerted himself to such purpose that the opera was listened to with much greater favour. Immense preparations are being made at Pesaro for the inauguration of the statues of Rossini and Particari.—The Florence papers state that the autumnal season will open at the Pergola with Madame Borghi-Mamo in the Barbiere. The second opera will be Verdi's Traviata, with Madame Cortesi and Signor Fraschini. Report also speaks of a new opera by Signor Capecelatro. At the Teatro-Pagliano two new operas will be produced, one by Signor Capecelatro, entitled David Riccio, which has already been performed at the Scala at Milan; and one by Signor Biagi, of Florence, entitled Gonsalvo di Cordova. The first new opera to be produced at the Argentina will be Donizetti's Don Sebastiano, the second, Meyerbeer's Roberto il Diavolo. The prima donna is Madame Monti. The composition of the troupe engaged for the Teatro-Pagliano at Florence is as follows:—Soprani, Mesdames Alaimo, Biava, and Abbadia; contralto, Madame Boccolini; tenors, Signori Landi and Arrigoni; baritones, Signori Amodio, Barili, and Morili; bass, Signor Domenechi, together with three second women, two second tenors, two second basses, and forty-eight chorus. The danseuses are Mesdames Berretta, Lavagi, and Santalicante-Prisco, Messrs. Mochi, Durant, Prisco, and Capozzi. The musical composers are Verdi, who will produce two operas, Il Viscardello and Il Trovatore, and Signor Battista who will bring out his Ermelinda.

AMERICA.—Our New York papers are all agreed on one point, that nothing good will be done until the arrival of Grisi and Mario. The Italian Opera is for the present in a most languishing state; people prefer crowding to Niblo's to witness the astonishing feats of the Ravel family. We give the following abridged extract from the New York Musical Review on the season of the Italian Opera at Castle Garden:—

"The season at Castle Garden has been very unsuccessful. Lucia, Maria de Rohan, Louisa Miller, Musaniello, have been played to thin houses; so thin that the only puzzle is how they have been able to continue so long. Many reasons have been assigned for their non-success by the press; indolence on the part of the lovers of Italian opera; backwardness in assisting and encouraging this new company; the warm weather; the prevailing epidemic; the bad selection of operas, etc., etc.; but none have struck at the true cause of failure, which lies in the want of knowledge and judgment in the young actors, and in the management; in the want of keeping and perfection in all those little details that go to make up the charm of an opera. The manager's only care seems to be that of announcing a new opera, and then having it performed—no matter how. Here lies the error: and the secret of the failure."

We are afraid that the "star" system is doing its worst with our American friends, as it has done before with us. Managers will find it difficult to return to a healthy state of things when once the public have been accustomed to an over-stimulating diet. We give our friends over the water the same advice we have ever tendered to our own countrymen—which is, to attend to perfection of ensemble, get together a good working company, select operas with judgment, and neglect no detail in bringing them out. This system has worked well in Paris, and in London, at the Royal Italian Opera, and would also work well in America if it were fairly tried. Jenny Lind was the ruin of Her Majesty's Theatre.

Convention commences its session in the Tremont Temple, on the 16th inst. The programme provides for a ten days' gathering, with concerts every evening. The daily papers say that there is to be an Italian company at the Howard Athenæum, for three weeks, commencing on the 22nd inst. We also find it announced in the New York Musical Review that Mrs. Clara Novello has just been engaged for the United States, by Mr. Ullman, late agent for Madame Sontag.

THE ITALIAN OPERA AT MANCHESTER.

Manchester, August 30th.

The announcement of Norma, with two such celebrated singers as Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli and Signor Tamberlik in the principal parts, attracted an elegant and crowded audience to the Theatre Royal on Saturday evening. A more successful commencement to the series of performances could not have been desired. The opera was received with enthusiasm throughout, and the artists were recalled several times during the evening. Of Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli's Norma it is not necessary to speak at length; your readers are sufficiently acquainted with its beauties, which are numerous and of the highest order. A more intense and poetical impersonation could not be witnessed, and these qualities are, perhaps, the distinguishing characteristics of Mdlle. Cruvelli's Norma. The gifted artist was in fine voice—and what a voice!—on Saturday night, and gave all the grand points with immense effect. The "Casta Diva" was exquisitely and perfectly sung, and, with your permission, I will venture to say, better than any one else could sing it. The passages in the famous trio, "Oh! di qual sei tu vittima," were terribly in earnest, and declaimed with prodigious force. In fine, Mdlle. Cruvelli achieved an almost unprecedented success, and has made for herself a name in Manchester which will not be soon forgotten. Pollio is an ungrateful part, and the music is by no means effective; but Signor Tamberlik is the best of Pollios; and, with his splendid voice and fine manly style of singing, invests the character with an interest not essentially its own. He was most telling in the duet in the last scene, "Qual cor tradisti," in which he has some exquisitely pathetic phrases to sing. Nothing could be more touching, and at the same time, more simple and natural. It was pure legitimate singing, without recourse to the slightest claptrap for the sake of what is termed "effect." Mdlle. Marai made an excellent Adalgisa, and Signor Tagliafico represented the part of the High Priest Oroveso with decided talent. The chorus and band, under the able direction of Mr. Benedict, went extremely well.

Verdi's Ernani was produced on Monday night, and Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli's Elvira appeared to delight the Manchester people even more than her Norma. The performance is certainly very grand, and is, in some respects, positively overpowering, from its force and reality. Her aria d'intrata, "Ernani, nvolami," was the perfection of dramatic bravura singing, and created a furore. Signor Tamberlik had more to do as Ernani than Pollio, and made a greater impression accordingly. Signor Tagliafico was an admirable Don Silva, and Signor Fortini was respectable as the King. The duet, "Ah! morir potessi adesso!" between Elvira and Ernani (Cruvelli and Tamberlik), was encored. In the last scene, the acting and singing both of Mdlle. Cruvelli and Signor Tamberlik were extremely powerful, passionate, natural, earnest, and impressive. La Sonnambula was performed last night with Mdlle. Marai as Amina, and Signor Luchesi as Elvino. Mdlle. Marai is exceedingly clever, and Signor Luchesi a skilful singer; La Sonnambula, nevertheless, did not create a furore. But why did not Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli play Amina, one of her acknowledged greatest assumptions, and the part in which, as well as in that of Fidelio, she has proved herself the successor of Malibran. Signor Polonini played the Count well, and sang his song capitally. He is a thorough artist.

Next week you shall have particulars of Otello, Fidelio, and Il Barbiere.

THE ORGAN FOR ST. GEORGE'S HALL, LIVERPOOL.

In resuming our notice of this organ—or, rather, of the description of it furnished by its constructors—we wish, first of all, to properly mark out and fence about our position with respect to it. We do not wish to be accused of partiality or prejudice. Having a choice, for instance, we prefer not being charged with taking measure of this work in the spirit of one of those short-hand analogical processes by which—so say disappointed authors, at least—the whole body, substance, and worth of a book can be divined by simple inspection of the title, writer's name, and publisher's place of abode. We strongly object to the chance of being told we have criticised that which we have not heard, and talked about that of which we knew nothing. Once for all, then, let us set ourselves right, and there can be no danger of future mistake. It is quite true that the complete merits and defects of an organ cannot be realized until the instrument be heard in the place appointed for it; yet much of positive certainty may be asserted from inspection of its scheme. In like manner, the drawings of a building, or piece of machinery, may not reveal all those accidental conditions of effect which depend on site or style of manufacture; yet they clearly permit the justest deductions as to every point referable to the principles of architecture or mechanism. In immediate illustration, we need not, surely, trouble ourselves or our readers with any elaborate proof that, while indifferent workmanship and voicing may do much to injure the effect of a well-planned instrument, no imaginable amount of operative skill will suffice to atone for the fallacies of an ill-advised specification. An organ so constructed may be admirable for what it is, and so far as it goes; but, in its very defects, it will always remind us of how much more an able designer would have placed in the hands of an able workman.

Proceeding, then, with our notice of the Liverpool scheme, the first very surprising thing we come upon is the stated compass of the manuals, which, we read, extends on all the key-boards, from "GG to A in altissimo, sixty-three notes." Wonders are tolerably common, to be sure, now-a-days, but we confess ourselves wholly unprepared for such an apparition as this in the year 1854. An uncomfortable sight, at any time, is one of those old GG organs which have outlived the playing of Marsh, Stanley, and Russell, and, under the impulse of abler heads and hands, have had a CC pedal-organ thrust upon them. The union, though not strictly within the forbidden degrees of affinity, works awkwardly at the best of times. Buxom eighteen and tottering shambling fourscore make scarcely a stranger mating. But what, between the old love and the new, is to be done in such a case? The organist of to-day wishes to play his instrument as common-sense, old Bach, and the orchestra have taught him. For this, the modern scale of pedal-work he must have, and so Gray and Davison, or Hill, all called on to supply his feet with what Father Smith and Byfield have denied to his hands. Nevertheless he respects his old organ. He will add as much new work as he can get, but will take nothing from the old. Perhaps his diapasons are uncommonly fine in the bass, or he has a marvellous trumpet, or something of the kind. Or, what is worse still for progress sake, perhaps the organ has a greater reputation than the organist. Woe to the man who, with an itching palm for the improvement of himself and his instrument, "presides" at a celebrated old organ, especially in a provincial town. The sacrilegious hand which, at his prompting, takes away one of those bass pipes that "rumble" so finely along the church, will infallibly stir up as much hubbub as the election of a borough member, or the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. So that, because he likes it, or because he cannot help it, we find him settled down to a G organ with C pedals. It is, according to our French neighbours, a pis-aller. It is an awkward jumble at the best; but, as a change, several degrees better than none. We may not like, but, for the reasons stated, can excuse such things. But what shall be said in the case of the great Liverpool organ, which no foregone circumstances can or ought to have influenced? In almost every paragraph of its description we are reminded that it is marvellous, unique, and unrivalled. We are bidden to think of it as something on which thought has been lavished even to exhaustion. If we understand the language and believe its statements, we are invited to conclude that no modern idea has been neglected, no vien of originality unquarried, no amount of experience unpurchased, which could contribute to its perfection. And yet we find its constructors, having a beginning to set out with, and out of sheer will and intention, adopting the antiquated, expensive, and absurd arrangement of compass they announce, and which we should have thought—save a few sexagenarian cathedral organists—would not have had a single abettor in this country! In ordinary cases, we should have despatched this question of compass in a single sentence of hearty condemnation; but the magnitude of the occasion forbids this summary, though not unworthy, mode of procedure. We have to deal not only with the great dimensions of the organ, but with the great name of its designer, Dr. Wesley, and must therefore direct a few sentences of argument against what we should otherwise simply condemn. To begin with, then—no organ-music, properly so called, requires a lower compass than CC on the keys. It is true there are many highly meritorious compositions extant by old Samuel Wesley and Thomas Adams, written for, and, perhaps, absolutely requiring the GG compass for their just execution. But this fact in no degree alters the question. We yield to no one in respect for the great performers we have named, and especially in reverence for the grand, and too little acknowledged musicianship of old Wesley. Still we must regard their organ compositions as simply written for the class of instruments on which they were accustomed to perform. We cannot admit the authority of their names, great as it may be, to out-balance the experience of the continent, or to dictate such a compass for a new organ as can be shown to be unnecessary and inconvenient. We, therefore, need not qualify our first assertion,—namely, that no organ-music, properly so called, demands anything beyond a CC compass on the manuals. To turn from this to the more popular use of the concert-organ, we make bold to assert that there is no orchestral work, symphony, or overture, capable of organ translation, which cannot be performed with perfect effect,—no vocal composition, oratorio or cantata, which cannot be accompanied to the utmost that organ-accompaniment can achieve, on the CC compass;—and this with a far closer approximation to the orchestral positions of the harmonies than under any other system. If, then, our statements be correct,—and it would puzzle any one's experience, we fancy, to prove them otherwise—what use can possibly be intended for the extra notes of the Liverpool manuals? In another point of view we find this compass equally objectionable. The manuals must be coupled to the pedals in one of two ways. Either the lowest C of the pedal clavier must command the CC of the manuals and the connection continue in regular order to the uppermost note of the pedal compass,—in which case the five lowest semitones of the manuals will remain untouched and useless;—or else, commencing as before, the pedal connection must turn back at G, and here begin to take down the GG of the keys and so on to the top—thus occasioning the far greater evil of a preposterous, unintelligible, and unmusician-like inversion of nine bass passages out of ten. Which end of this crooked stick will the constructors of the Liverpool organ prefer to appropriate? Or, as they seem so liberally disposed towards the inland revenue, will they "patent" either or both of these curious arrangements? There cannot be an instant's doubt that any organ-player, being a musician as well, seated at the keys of the Liverpool instrument and offered a choice, would unhesitatingly select the uniform system of pedal-coupling, from CC upwards, and thus, in this fact, demonstrate the utter uselessness of every manual note below that pitch.

Inutility, unfortunately, is not the only evil arising from this very objectionable arrangement. In an organ of such magnitude, it cannot be doubted that the extension of the compass of all the manuals to GG—when we consider the great additional work about the sound-boards and swell-box, and that the extra pipes are all of the largest size—has added, at a very moderate computation, between fifteen and twenty per cent. to the cost, in any case unavoidably great, of the instrument. And it is an equally unconsolatory reflection that this increase of expense has been incurred without any prospect of equivalent result; or, indeed, without any motive, except the gratification of a caprice, or because the designer has a contempt for the ordinary currency of ideas on the subject, or, perhaps, because for some years past he has been accustomed to perform on a similarly arranged instrument.

We must defer until next week the conclusion of our remarks.

A YOUNG LADY'S VIEW OF THE NEW LAW.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

Dear Sir,—I cannot tell you how delighted I am with the sudden cheapness of Music. I bought Mario's beautiful "Donna e Mobile" for one shilling only this morning—and there's a shop in Oxford Street where you can buy Mendelssohn's Music by the quire and sheet, just like note paper. I don't know what is the real meaning of the music-sellers being so very liberal, but from what every one says I suppose it has something to do with all the fuss in the House of Lords, and about which you have been writing such very long articles. I can't make head or tail of them, except this, that it is thought that musical men are very immoral, and Government says that they are not to be encouraged, and so nobody is to pay them for anything they compose. It is certainly rather hard on the poor foreigners, but I hope Government won't prevent them from giving us lessons too, because, if so, how are we to learn singing? and what will become of the poor men? I am sure the Italian gentleman who has given me lessons in singing for two years at school, is a most harmless, kind, and gentlemanly man. He smiles so sweetly—he wouldn't hurt a fly—much less a woman. He always gave me about twenty of his Romances every quarter, and now I mustn't pay him for them. Papa will be very pleased, because he used to say the bills were so heavy; but what will the poor Signor do, if his lessons are stopped, too? If one girl, twelve years old, runs away with her music-master, is that any reason why all the rest should suffer? But I know this is the reason why the House of Lords won't allow composers to be paid, so that they may keep away altogether. Now, dear Mr. Editor, I hope you will write a pretty article in defence of foreign composers and music-masters. Although I am very glad to buy music so cheap, and to have all D'Albert's beautiful waltzes at half-price, I am very sorry that the composers should become poor and shabby. It will be very unpleasant if Mr. Blumenthal should be obliged to come to our school and give his lessons in corduroys, because he is not allowed to sell his music. I am, dear Mr. Editor, Yours, very sincerely, Regent's Park, Aug. 28. Amelia Vining.

THE PNEUMATIC LEVER.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

Sir,—In your next article on the Liverpool Organ I hope you will remind Messrs. Wesley and Willis that when Mr. Barker invented the Pneumatic Lever, the means were then "employed, for the first time, by which all the great, and it was thought, insurmountable obstacles to the building of an immense organ were entirely overcome." The great organ at the Church of St. Eustache, Paris, lately constructed under the direction of Mr. Barker, contains a variety of new and useful movements, but I think that they are not sufficiently complicated and mysterious to warrant an English patent.

I am, Sir, yours obediently,

NOTICE.

The Memoir of GIULIA GRISI will be continued in our next.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 2ND, 1854.

WHATEVER the opinion entertained in this country of a certain part of the American press, we are convinced that the most prejudiced would not have given the lowest member of it credit for that which it is our painful task at present to communicate.

There is a weekly paper in New York, called The New York Musical World and Times. The readers of the Musical World may remember that, some time ago, we quoted from its pages an article, the purport of which was a grave and weighty insinuation against the journalists of the "Empire City," who, without exception, were covertly accused of accepting bribes in money, to write favourable critiques upon the performances of a certain celebrated artist. We shall not name the artist, lest we should aid in disseminating a poison for which we would much rather supply an efficient antidote. From the angry and unanimous protests of the other papers, those who believed (as we ourselves did not) in the corruptibility of the American press, adopted the conclusion that the New York Musical World and Times had published its article for no other reason than because the celebrated artist in question had not thought it of sufficient importance to propitiate, by offerings such as were lavished upon the editors of prints of more celebrity and wider circulation. Others, who entertained a better (and we believe a juster) opinion of the American press generally, laid it to the account of some personal pique on the part of the editor or one of his contributors, to whom the celebrated artist or some one nearly connected, might wittingly or unwittingly have given offence. On the whole, however, the matter is of small consequence, and of smaller interest, to us, except in what relates to the respectability of the universal press as an institution. If the American papers levy black-mail, we are sorry; if they do not (which we trust and believe) we are glad. But the question is neither here nor there.

The celebrated artist, at whose expense the "show-up" article was written, is no more—gone where none can go but through corruptibility, and yet where there is no longer any corruptibility, since spirit cannot be corrupted. Scarcely has the melancholy fact been published to the world—scarcely has the earth been thrown over the remains of one who had done enough to be for ever remembered among the brightest ornaments of the musical art, than calumny directs its shaft against a name which knew no contagion, against a reputation as pure and unspotted as the driven snow. In the very journal which had arraigned the New York press in a body, appeared, but recently, the following infamous (the word is not sufficiently strong)—the following infamous paragraph:—

"THE ——— RUMOUR.

"Nil de mortuis nisi bonum.

"Of course there can be nothing in it—but malice. Even granting that the ——— was jealous of ———, he would have been an empty-headed gentleman to take the bread out of his own mouth, and that of his children, and rob his own purse, while, at the same time, he committed the most diabolical of crimes. The rumour is doubtless of Italian origin. It sounds Italian—it is entirely un-American. One of the city Italian papers published, we believe, an announcement of ———'s death by cholera, and in parenthesis placed signs of exclamation. (!!) Hence perchance the report. A year ago, even, we heard the usual gossip which is circulated about professional persons of celebrity, applied in the case of the noble ——— to the name of ———. But what folly! A lady of ———'s mature age of 50—a mother who had sacrificed all her comfort for her children and husband, and yet to give cause of jealousy in connection with a young man like ———. Even changing the Latin sentiment quoted above—Nil de mortuis nisi VERUM—the world surely could utter nothing that would mitigate against the fair fame of ———."—Willis's Musical World.

We have expressly omitted the names. Now what an abyss of degradation must that press have reached, in which the publication of such an article as the above could by any means, or for any consideration, have been accomplished. What can be its aim?—what its purport? That the design of its author—or rather of him who invented the "rumour"—must have been to traduce a character without blemish, to blacken the memory of a poor young man cut off by a fatal pest in the dawn of his career, and to hold up an unhappy and inconsolable survivor to disgrace and infamy, it is difficult not to believe. Had even the rumour which forms the basis of the article really existed—had a paragraph to that extent been forwarded to the office of the editor—he, the editor, to prove himself worthy of his calling, should have spit upon it, torn it in pieces, and trampled it under foot. Any other line of conduct exposes him to the charge of being a malignant slanderer, or a pitiful ass. If the rage for penny-a-lining is carried to such an excess, that the virtuous dead may be lampooned and vilified with impunity, in trumpery and indecent paragraphs, it were better that no such thing as a press existed in the world. The benefits it confers would not by any means counterbalance the evils it is capable of inflicting.

Another American paper—The New York Musical Review and Choral Advocate—reproduces the paragraph from the columns of its contemporary, and appends the following remarks, which, though just and pertinent, do not express with half enough force the disgust and contempt that any honest man must feel in perusing such vile and wretched calumnies:—

"It is by publication that such miserable and wicked rumours as the above gain importance and do injury. Even though they be accompanied by such a denial of their truth, as in this instance, the harm is not prevented, and we deplore the heartlessness which could lead any editor to give it wings. Were it not that we have seen the substance of this copied into several papers of considerable circulation, and that, therefore, it will probably go the rounds of the press, we should not give it place in our columns, even for the purpose of expressing our detestation of its meanness.

"Imagine, if it be possible, the feelings of the husband of such a wife as ——— ———, (for her virtues as an artist were not greater than as a wife and mother,) when in the very bitterness of his irreparable loss! Imagine the torture of a charge so cruel as this! Those who have known the private life of ——— ——— and his lamented lady, know that there are few instances of more undeviating affection and more absolute confidence than at all times existed between them."

Our readers may, probably, guess whom it is meant to implicate in these filthy slanders, and will share the indignation and loathing with which we hold them up to the contempt and derision of the English public. If not, so much the better. The poison will only have done half its work. Although we feel almost contaminated by the mere allusion to the paragraph, although its appearance, modified as it is, in our columns, burns and stinks like a foul cancer on a bosom elsewhere white and healthy, it was impossible for us, in our capacity of protectors and friends of renowned artists, no less than judges and critics of their claims to distinction, to allow anything so utterly heartless and unprincipled to pass by unnoticed. For the New York Musical World and Times—as a contemporary, we have always respected—we are sorry. We are sorry that he should have been weak enough to be duped in so scandalous a manner, or rash and unthinking enough to afford the publicity of his columns to such a cruel and venomous aspersion of three innocent and unoffending persons. To the original author of the calumny we would say—"Come forth, and be convicted, before the face of the world, as a slanderer, a liar, and a coward!" But there is no danger—he will not come. Like the hyena, who prowls about at night and devours the dead and dying, he hides himself in the day, lest the light of the sun should display his hideous identity, and baulk his appetite for carrion.

We promised to say something about the Norwich Festival; but on looking over the programme we find ourselves at a loss for materials. The remarks, in our last, on the coming festival at Worcester, mutato nomine, might apply just as well to Norwich. The committee seem to be asleep this year.

At the last meeting there were two new oratorios—the late Dr. Bexfield's Israel Restored and Mr. Peirson's Jerusalem. At the forthcoming one there will be no new oratorio, and indeed—except a short psalm by Meyerbeer, which has been spoken of—nothing new at all of any importance. Tant pis. The Norwich Festival was once honourably distinguished for the enterprise displayed by its managers. Spohr's Calvary (Crucifixion) and Fall of Babylon were both produced at Norwich first. It is true that Professor Taylor was then conductor, and that Professor Taylor himself translated the books of Spohr's oratorios, and published them in England on his own account. And it is also true that Professor Taylor was the most intimate friend of Dr. Spohr in this country. But what did that signify to the committee of the Norwich Festival, who, through these accidents, were enabled to celebrate their meetings by the last great compositions of a great master?—or to the Norfolk public, nobility, gentry, and common people, who had the advantage of hearing them well executed, at St. Andrew's Hall, before the metropolis and the Sacred Harmonic Society (the "first musical institution in Europe") knew anything about them. It was quite enough for Norwich to be able to boast of having set an example in the case of Spohr, not only to Birmingham and the "Three Choirs," but to London and to Europe.

On the other hand, however, it must be admitted that Norwich was a great sinner. Spohr was its "Allah"—Professor Taylor its Mahomed; and the Prophet of Gresham took great care that no god except the tall Doctor of Hesse-Cassel should be worshipped. He, the Prophet of Gresham, was at infinite pains to keep out another god—one Felix Mendelssohn—whom he denounced, as Bel, to the true believers. In vain did Paulus knock at the gates of St. Andrew. The Professor would not admit Paulus on any account. The Professor would have preferred Mr. Griesbach, Mr. Perry, or Dr. Crotch. He would have preferred them—because they were less dangerous to his own god, to whom he had built an altar and made sacrifices. But public opinion is a wind that sweeps prejudices before it, as straws and leaves are swept onward by a torrent. And so this wind of public opinion swept away the Professor and his doctrines. It did not sweep away Dr. Spohr—since Dr. Spohr is a rock, against which waves may beat and winds may roar in vain; a rock impervious and impenetrable. But it swept away the parasite that stuck to it so closely, and was sheltered at its base.

Les débuts se suivent et ne se ressemblent pas. After the Professor, came Mr. Benedict; and with Mr. Benedict came Mendelssohn—or rather the spirit of Mendelssohn, which was in his music. Mendelssohn's début at Norwich was triumphant. And now at the present time the question may be fairly asked of the festival committee—"Why do you neglect your ancient deity?—what have you done with the tall Doctor of Hesse-Cassel?" Extremes meet. Formerly it was nothing but Spohr at Norwich; now it is anything at Norwich but Spohr. In both instances the Norfolk people were at fault. Toujours Spohr is almost as bad as toujours perdrix; but some degree of Spohr is indispensable. It was said of a literary lord that he was not only himself a wit, but the cause of wit in others. Of Spohr it may be predicted, with no less truth—that his music is not only in itself enjoyable, but makes you enjoy the music of others by the force of contrast. We never feel so thoroughly the beauty of Mozart, the grandeur of Beethoven, or the passion and imaginative force of Mendelssohn, as after hearing more or less of Spohr. Spohr's music is a sauce piquante that gives a relish to everything; a sauce that you may partake of sparingly by itself, but not too much, or you are in danger of a surfeit—a surfeit of sweets, of course. Consult the book called Modern German Music, Recollections and Criticisms, and you will find all this, which is true, laid down, and much more, which is not true.

But to return to the approaching Festival, the matter immediately in hand, about which we are puzzled what to say. What is the use of reiterating our observations of last week? What is the use of telling our readers that which they already know?—that the Norwich chorus is of the finest and fairest this country can produce?—that St. Andrew's Hall is a venerable and beautiful structure?—that the band at the Norwich Festival has always been good since Mr. Benedict was conductor, and will be as good this time?—that the best singers of the Worcester meeting (except Herr Formes and Mad. Viardot) will appear at Norwich, with Mad. Bosio, Sig. Lablache, and Sig. Belletti to boot?—that Elijah will be performed, and the Creation, and—the Messiah, and the———Stabat Mater!—that the evening concerts will, as usual, be composed of shreds and patches, too long, too rambling, too tedious, frivolous and monotonous?—that Mr. Benedict will take pains to make everything go well, and, not for the first time, establish the fact, to the satisfaction of all the world except the members of the Sacred Harmonic Society, that a grand Festival and an effective performance are possible in the absence of the Autocrat of all the Orchestras?—etc., etc., etc. Why insist upon what all our readers know, and none will deny, whose opinion is unshackled by prejudice, unblinded by affection, uncowed by the despotic stick, uninfluenced by the arrière-pensée?

With the fine weather that prevails, and the abundant harvest that is promised, and the favourable aspect which the war wears, and the musical zeal for which, not only Norwich, but Norfolk and the adjacent fens are proverbial, and the bustling enthusiasm of the acting committee, and the great company of singers, (a via lactea of vocal stars), and the splendid chorus, and the fine band, and the beautiful hall, and the spirited, untiring, and accomplished conductor, there is every chance of success for the Norwich Festival and of benefit to the commendable charities to which it contributes its mite—a mite that could easily be magnified if the aristocracy and gentry had some little share of that county-pride which should urge them to emulate the business-men of Birmingham. The Norwich Festival ranks as No. 2 among the great provincial music-meetings. With more energy, more enterprise, and a great deal more charity, it might be, if not precisely No. 1, at least the honourable rival of that gigantic triennial confluence at Birmingham.

The Norwich people are to be commended highly in one respect—their faith in their conductor. The last meeting should by rights have taken place in 1851; but as Mr. Benedict was absent, with Mdlle. Jenny Lind, in America, they unanimously adopted the resolution of postponing it till the following year—and this accounts for there having been only an interval of a season between the last meeting and the present. The Sacred Harmonic Society began to dream of a new conquest for the Autocrat; but they dreamed their dream in London, and there was no Daniel in Norwich to interpret it. At Gresham College there was a dream of Dr. Spohr and the Professor; but again, there was no Daniel for this dream, any more than for the other. Mr. Benedict openly proposed Mr. Sterndale Bennett; but whether the last-named gentleman declined, for reasons best known to himself, or whether the Norwich gentlemen thought it would be a still more graceful compliment, and a still greater mark of respect, to Mr. Benedict, to defer the meeting, we are unable to say. This, however, was the result of mature deliberation; and neither Dr. Bexfield nor Mr. Peirson, on the one hand, neither the Professor nor the Autocrat on the other, was invited to conduct. Mr. Benedict came back in 1851, too late to organise a Festival; but in 1852 he resumed the bâton—with what effect may be remembered.

There was a talk of Mr. Leslie's Immanuel—but that, we suppose, is for Birmingham; of a new oratorio of Meyerbeer—but that, we suppose, is for Birmingham; and of other novelties of more than ordinary interest—but those, we presume, are for Birmingham. Meanwhile our contemporary, the Athenæum, hints darkly and ominously about three new oratorios,—one by M. Gounod (composer of Sappho), one by M. Emile Naumann (composer of Christ the Messenger of Peace), and one by Mr. Costa (Conductor, Director of the Music, and Composer at the Royal Italian Opera). Why were none of these secured for the Norwich Festival, which—boldly and magnanimously, unswayed by personal influence or interested motives—gave us, in 1852, with what success is not forgotten, both Israel Restored and Jerusalem? Are they all for Birmingham? This Birmingham is a very cormorant. Not content with Mendelssohn's Lobgesang and Mendelssohn's Elijah, not content with the Chevalier Neukomm's David, it must also have the honour of being the first to present to the world the oratorio of M. Gounod! Such a universal swallow is without precedent. If the "Three Choirs" do not begin to look about them they will rue it, and Messrs. Done, Amott, and Townshend Smith be at a discount for their annual journies to London. Norwich, too, will be in a strait, and Liverpool have built St. George's Hall in vain. Birmingham, Bradford, and the Sacred Harmonic Society will carry all before them; and then—what becomes of the "charities."

What we have said is not in pleasantry, but in earnest. The provincial festivals must, by some means and some exertion, be greatly modified and greatly improved, or they will go to the wall. We should regret such a catastrophe—not merely because we feel a real interest in the "charities," but because we dislike and dread monopoly.

The career of the Royal Opera at Drury Lane furnishes another argument, added to the many which have been supplied before, of the inutility of half-measures and that unwise system of management which sets out with the principle that the public is not the best judge of what is set before it. Seldom did operatic undertaking start with fairer prospects. The list of artists was imposing; the promised operas were attractive; the prospectus looked well; the prices suited all classes. In the beginning the theatre was crowded nightly, and the subscription began to fill. A too rigid economy, however, from the outset, militated against success. Moreover, the public taste was not consulted. The gentleman who had the chief control of the establishment was too much inclined to measures of retrenchment. A native and resident of "Auld Reekie," however, he could hardly be supposed to be well acquainted with the tastes and prejudices of a London audience. His ruling policy was to save—a fatal policy, when carried to extremes, in theatrical administration. To support such artists as Mr. Sims Reeves, Herr Formes, Herr Reichardt, Mesdames Agnes Bury, Caradori, Sims Reeves, Sedlatzek, Rudersdorff, &c., he did not consider it indispensable to provide a first-rate band and chorus. This might have succeeded in Glasgow; but London is not Glasgow. We will say nothing of the scenery and dresses, although more could have been effected in those departments without much additional expense. Excessive economy, however, was one of the principal errors in the management, and acted against the welfare of the Royal Opera.

A second mistake was in not making use of the best talent in the cast of popular operas. With Mr. Sims Reeves and Herr Reichardt in the company, such parts as Gennaro and Pollio were assigned to Signor Pavesi; while Signor Bettini was entrusted with that of Elvino. A third and equally important error was the opposition so plainly directed against the Royal Italian Opera in Covent Garden. The announcement of Lucrezia Borgia or Norma, at the Italian house, was met by the announcement of the same operas on the same nights at Drury Lane. Madame Caradori was thus confronted with Grisi, and Signor Pavesi with Mario or Tamberlik. It was, doubtless, thought that the cheap prices would prevail, and that those who could not afford to go to the Royal Italian Opera would be induced on that account to visit Drury Lane. But, then, the disparity in the performances was by no means atoned for by the disparity in the charges of admission; and thus a blow was administered to the Royal Opera from which it was not easy to recover. If Mr. Sims Reeves could not be induced to appear as Gennaro, Elvino, or Pollio, his engagement only extending to operas in the English language—which, by the way, was a fourth oversight on the part of the management—Herr Reichardt, an excellent tenor and a great favourite of the public, might have filled any of those parts with credit to himself and to the establishment. We can hardly understand how such errors were committed, unless we endeavour to account for them by intrigues and cabals, which, time out of mind, have existed in theatrical communities, and have exercised so baneful and pernicious an influence.

The greatest mistakes, however, are yet to be named. Had the band and chorus been thoroughly efficient; had the cast of operas, as far as means allowed, been unexceptionable; had the direction been not merely liberal but munificent; had neither cabal nor intrigue existed; there would still have remained two causes to which the speculation must ultimately have succumbed. The first was the attempt to combine German, Italian and English opera, without adhering to any one language; the second—and the gravest—was in opening the theatre every night of the week. With regard to the first; the great objection is, that it would require three complete and distinct companies to carry it out. Had the Germans and English been incorporated together, they would have made an admirable working troupe, which, with the English language as a medium, might have laid the basis of that National Opera, so long desired, so much talked about, so often on the point of being accomplished, and so continually ending in disappointment. With Messrs. Sims Reeves and Weiss, Mrs. Sims Reeves, Miss Clara Novello and Miss Louisa Pyne, on the English side—Mesdames Caradori, Agnes Bury, Sedlatzek, Herr Formes, and Herr Reichardt on the German—the establishment of a National Opera might have been accepted as a certainty. As it was, no working company was formed, no absolute step was taken, and the Royal Opera, in trying to be three things at once, was eventually unable to be one—at least one that was solid and enduring.

The last fault—that of giving performances every night—has been noticed repeatedly; and we are convinced that no greater obstacle to success can possibly exist in a large establishment like that of Drury Lane. Even if there were three distinct operatic companies to relieve each other, each restricted to special operas, the public would grow weary, and the enterprise must inevitably fall to the ground. The subscription list in that case would be a dead letter, since no one would think of taking a box at the opera for six nights in the week.

After all these errors of policy, the wonder would have been if the Royal Opera at Drury Lane had been enabled to preserve its equilibrium. Future speculators should take a warning from the past, which may serve as a beacon-light against the rocks, shoals, and quicksands with which the management of an operatic theatre is surrounded. The example of the Royal Opera at Drury Lane will not have been without beneficial results, if, while what was good in its policy is imitated, what was fatal is avoided. Had there been only one manager—and that one Mr. Jarrett, the originator—we think the result might have been different. How often have we occasion to quote the proverb—"Too many cooks spoil the broth?"

REVIEWS.

"The Hare-bell"—Song; "It was the Early Winter"—Song; "Oh, Thou whose soft bewitching power"—Vocal duet; "The Minstrel to his Harp"—Vocal duet. Composed by Elizabeth Stirling. C. Jefferys and Co.

There is merit, and a certain degree of freshness in all these pieces, although the harmonies and accompaniments, while written with evident care, occasionally betray inexperience. The "Hare-bell," a melancholy ditty in A minor, is our favourite, since it is full of genuine feeling. The two duets, written on the ordinary plan, with an independent solo for each voice, will, however, find most admirers—since both are very pretty, and the principal themes are well defined. That in D, "Oh, thou whose soft bewitching power," is perhaps the best—although the melodies of the other (in E flat), "The Minstrel to his Harp," are the most immediately taking. The second solo in this, for contralto—"I sing to thee," etc. (in C minor)—is plaintive and charming. The song in E flat—"It was the early winter"—though it has a nice and flowing first theme, betrays more faults—or rather harshnesses—than the other; and the bass, which supports a rather laboured arpeggio accompaniment, moves with less ease and fluency. The composer should have named the author of the words, on the title-page. They are, without exception, sensible and good.

"Rondo," from Mozart's Quintet, No. 5.—Arranged as a Pianoforte Duet—By Joseph McMurdie, Mus. Bac. Oxon. Boosey and Sons.

The playful and sparkling rondo from Mozart's quintet in E flat, is extremely well arranged—easy for both performers, yet not too easy to be uninteresting. We think, nevertheless, that Mr. McMurdie would have done better to give the whole work, since the other three movements are quite as good as the finale, if not indeed, in many respects superior. The influence of such music, no matter in what form, cannot fail to be beneficial, whether taught in the study or played for amusement in the drawing room.

"Three Choral Songs."—No. 1, "To all you Ladies now on Land;" No. 2, "The Battle of the Baltic;" No. 3, "Cavalier's Song."—Music composed by Clara Angela Macirone. J. Alfred Novello.

Miss Macirone has set the above three well-known English lyrics with appropriate character. In the Earl of Dorset's "To all you ladies now on land," there is a tinge of the madrigalian style, which is in keeping; besides which the part song is good in itself, and voiced on the whole effectively. Campbell's animated battle song is described in the music with great felicity; the melody is broad and vigorous, and the harmony musicianly. The "Cavalier's song," by Sir Walter Scott, bold, and even savage in its melody, makes a capital bacchanalian chorus—full of spirit and energy. Some objections might be made to particular places in each of the three songs; but it would be hypercritical to pick out small blemishes where there is such decided excellence.

"Hungarian Fantasia." Dedicated to Madame Kossuth. Performed by Kalozdy's Hungarian Band. Composed by George Lichtenstein. Ewer and Co.

To those who sympathise with the Hungarian style of dance melody, this clever and unassuming little piece will afford entire satisfaction. We ourselves must confess to a decided predilection for Hungarian tunes, and times, and accents; and are glad to be able to compliment M. Lichtenstein on having caught so very happily the colour of his own national airs without appropriating to himself any of them in particular. Moreover, the fantasia is written well—with taste, correctness, and a good idea of pianoforte effect. M. Lichtenstein is known to be a pianist of talent; and his music proves him to be something else besides. We can recommend the Hungarian Fantasia, not only as a very pretty piece of itself, but as an available one for practice. It is moderately difficult.

"Chanson Erotique"—for the Piano. by Jules Egghard. Ewer and Co.

Why Chanson Erotique it would be difficult to explain. This is neither more nor less than a little song without words, in A, with a second theme in D—neither subject being at all new. It is after the smaller manner of Henselt and others. So pompous a title for so slight a matter sounds like affectation. "Op. 19" for such a trifle, too! Beethoven and Mozart called six grand quartets an opera.

"The Homesdale Galop." By Edward Thurnham. Robert Cocks and Co.

Though this galop would probably never have existed had not Auber lived and composed galops, the "Homesdale Galop" is not the less one of the liveliest, prettiest, most sparkling, and well-written things of its class that we have seen for a long time. There is not a fault to find with it. It is not only good for dancing, but good on its own account.

Mr. Albert Smith at Osborne.—On Saturday evening, the anniversary of Prince Albert's birth-day, Mr. Albert Smith had the honour to give selections from his "Mont Blanc," before the Queen, the Prince, and the Royal Family. The selections related chiefly to "The Travelling English," and their autumnal peculiarities. After the termination of the performance, the Queen and Prince expressed their gratification to Mr. Smith with that frank cordiality which is their well-known characteristic.

Mr. and Mrs. Reeves have been spending the week at Brighton. On Sunday, they will start for the Worcester Festival; thence to Norwich, and thence to Liverpool, for the opening of St. George's Hall.

Madame Anna Thillon has arrived from New York by the steam ship Africa, after an absence of three years. Her tour through the United States was one of continued success.

Brighton.—Among the musical visitors to this fashionable watering-place lately have been Mr. Sterndale Bennett, Mr. Henry Smart, Mr. and Mrs. F. B. Jewson, Mad. Angiolina Bosio, Signor Luigi Mei, Mr. Howard Glover, Mr. and Mrs. Sims Reeves, etc.

Death of M. Laurent.—This young artist, a member of the company of the Théâtre Lyrique, died last Wednesday week, in consequence of having taken a bath too soon after dinner. Our readers will, no doubt, recollect M. Laurent's performance in La Promise, etc., with Mad. Marie Cabel at the St. James's Theatre this season.

Signor Rossi.—Among those artists who accompanied the unfortunate Madame Sontag to Mexico, was Signor Rossi, a gentleman well known to the New York public, and an account of whose death we have just received by the American paper. Signor Rossi was a native of the Pontifical States, and was educated for the bar. The difficulties attendant on the eruption of the Young Italy party, of which he was a member, induced him to leave the land of his birth and seek his fortune elsewhere. Having naturally a fine bass voice and some cultivation, the musical profession presented many advantages to Rossi, and in 1847 he accepted an engagement under Sanquiico and Pati to appear at the Astor-place, Opera House, New York. During the first and second season he acquired considerable popularity, but when the Truffi and Benedetti émeute broke out, he sided with those artists against the Manager, Maretzek. The professional unpopularity of this step retarded Signor Rossi's progress, and, added to natural indolence, prevented his fulfilling the promise of his début. Signor Rossi was about 32 years of age.

Mrs. Stirling.—This popular actress, from a chronic disease of the eyes, brought on by a severe cold, has been compelled to leave the stage, to which, it is feared, she will never be enabled to return. Mrs. Stirling was an admirable and highly natural actress, and her loss cannot be readily supplied.

International Copyright.—The Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury have caused to be transmitted to the Commissioners of customs, for their information and guidance, copies of a new dry-book stamp, used in the Duchy of Saxe-Coburg Gotha, for stamping books imported into this country, under the copyright convention, and the commissioners have caused their lordships' communication, together with the patterns of the stamps, to be furnished to their officers in London, and transmitted to the collectors and comptrollers at the several ports throughout the kingdom for their information and government.

Apollonicon Organ Rooms.—On Wednesday evening, Mr. S. Noble played at the above rooms, on a new chamber-organ, built by Mr. Robson. The programme included a fugue of J. S. Bach, the canzonetta in G minor from Mendelssohn's quartet in E flat, Sterndale Bennett's overture to the Naïades, a "selection" from the Huguenots, the overture to Der Freischütz, and other pieces from Rossini, Handel, Kullak, and Mendelssohn. A little more real organ-music would have added to the interest of the performance. Our organists appear to be gradually overlooking the peculiar character of the noble instrument they profess. Perhaps the increased resources of modern mechanism offer a temptation not easy to resist, in which case they are to be excused, if not to be commended.

DRAMATIC.

Lyceum.—The farewell performances of Mr. and Mrs. Sims Reeves were brought to a termination on Saturday night, when the Sonnambula was given, followed by the favorite comedietta of Patter versus Clatter, in which Mr. Charles Mathews appeared, concluding with the Waterman—Tom Tug, Mr. Sims Reeves—the entertainments being for the benefit of Mr. Allcroft. The theatre was inconveniently crowded, and sundry émeutes took place in the gallery—although it had been enlarged to accommodate a thousand persons—which interrupted the progress of the opera, and was not very gratifying to those who wished to listen quietly. The police at last interfered and restored order. The performance was received throughout with the greatest enthusiasm. The vocal "hits" of the opera were the duets, "Take now this ring," by Mr. and Mrs. Sims Reeves: Mr. Sims Reeves in "All is lost now," which he sang with infinite tenderness and passion and the rondo finale, "Oh do not mingle," by Mrs. Sims Reeves. The first finale, well acted by both, produced a great effect.

Mr. Charles Mathews obtained a cordial reception. He is an immense favourite with the public, more especially with that part of it which patronizes the Lyceum theatre. His performance in Patter versus Clatter, is too well known to need description. If glibness and volubility of tongue alone would constitute a great actor, Mr. Charles Mathews might, without hesitation, step into the shoes of Macready. Signor Lablache himself could not pronounce a greater number of syllables in a given space of time. If Mr. Charles Mathews had a voice, and knew how to sing, he might even compete with Signor Ronconi in "Largo al factotum."

There can hardly be a greater treat to the lover of ballad singing than to hear Mr. Sims Reeves in the songs of Tom Tug. The two ballads, "Oh! have you not heard of a jolly young waterman," and "Farewell my trim-built wherry"—so different, but both so excellent—are specimens of pure English singing, which would be almost lost but for this gentleman, whose taste in this genial style could hardly be surpassed. The public were delighted; but the encores, though vociferous and unanimous, were not complied with. Sunday was close at hand, and Mr. Allcroft very properly refused to accede to the re-demands.

The "farewell performances" of Mr. and Mrs. Sims Reeves have proved highly remunerative to Mr. Allcroft, who, most probably, has made more money in a few nights, than other managers in as many weeks.

MUSIC AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

SIR,—It may appear ungenerous to criticise any of the arrangements of so noble an enterprise as the Sydenham Crystal Palace. It is, however, in no captious spirit I offer a few remarks as a rejoinder to the admirable letter of an English musician in your last number, on what ought to be a very important and prominent department of this admirable undertaking. I allude to the musical department, alias the brass band, or whatever nomenclature it may be called.

There is no use denying the fact, the organisation of this band has from the first day it performed in public been deemed a failure by the most competent judges—military band-masters and others who are capable of judging what it ought to be for such a public amusement have condemned it. Nor could it be otherwise. The materiel of the performers could not as far as each individual, with very few exceptions, is concerned, be equalled in any other country; but, as I said above, the organisation and mixture of the several instruments in the formation of the whole, displays an amount of inexperience and ignorance hardly to be expected in these days from the merest tyro in such an affair. You will ask naturally enough who were the professors consulted by the directors on the formation of the band of the Crystal Palace. I should certainly like to know—it is neither an orchestra, nor is it a military or brass band of the usual approved style, nor in use in any of the bands of the Foot Guards, the Corps de Guides in Paris, or the famous Austrian military bands, the delight of all visitors to Vienna, but a description of the bastard brass and military species, without a single redeeming point in its favour. For instance, there is a soli E flat squeaking against six or eight nasal saxophones, instruments of a very doubtful character, which must have been introduced as an experiment. They should be obliterated forthwith—nothing but ignorance could have dreamed of introducing them in such a band. They have not half the power, tone, or effect of the clarionet. Every object within this vast museum should appear in a condition best adapted to inculcate correct taste, and I am well aware that the combination of music with the other details in connection with the Crystal Palace is a subject of high interest to men of cultivated taste, rich and poor—it appears to me that the Crystal Palace is a vast educational establishment, not the place where such dilettante experiments ought to be tried, and then presented to the public as sanctioned by the presumed authority which will naturally attach to such very questionable musical proceedings. The only consolation I have is, that such an outrageous proceeding as the quackery of such a band, as far as the art is concerned, will so disgust the many, that the directors will be obliged to call in some competent parties who shall in that way arrest the spread of the evil. I would recommend a musical committee, who should choose and arrange what music should be performed, instead of the wretched attempt made at performing, daily, third and fourth-rate French and German compositions, unworthy of such a place—and who would see that the music was properly arranged for the respective instruments, and not have, as I have seen, Oboe parts attempted on Flügel horns, or Flute parts spluttered out on E flat soprano Sax Horns, and told then and there to be transposed a fourth or fifth lower, totally impossible to be executed by any artists, not being in the compass of the instrument—such incongruities would deserve a looking after if there was a capable person amongst the "powers that be," if not it will soon work its own cure. The admirers of music, and they are legion, who visit the Exhibition, do cry out against the inefficiency of the band, and I say with some show of justice. I enclose for your perusal a satire distributed and posted for the last few weeks in the neighbourhood of Sydenham. It was drawn up by one of the most eminent wits, at the instigation of a numerous and influential party, who were disgusted, to say the least of it, at the exhibition of music held forth by the Crystal Palace Band, a man decked out with gold lace beating time with his back to the performers, blowing as they liked a French overture not capable of being played by such an orchestra. It will speak for itself:—

"FIVE HUNDRED POUNDS REWARD.—Lost, on the road from the Crystal Palace, the entire recollection of what the tunes were played by the Brass Band. They are supposed to have been discovered in the ruins of Nineveh, and formed part of the famous symphony of which the old winged-bull died. Any clever old theoretical high-art musician who hates popular melodies and can recall their names, so that they may be hermetically sealed up for ever in one of the courts, will be cheerfully rewarded by The People, 'whose Palace it is.' Apply to Mr. William Jones, The Kilpack Door, (late Gliddon's, King Street, Covent Garden."

Trusting you will excuse the length of this communication, which I forward with the hope of exposing quackery in the musical art,

I remain, yours, &c.,

Sept. 1, 1854. A HATER OF HUMBUG.

NEW MUSIC.

From the Liverpool Mail, August 19.

The following works are published by Boosey and Sons, Holles-street, London:—

1. Partant pour la Syrie,—Quadrille, by H. Laurent.
2. Fantasia on themes from "Rigoletto," by Madame Oury.
3. The Bulgarian Polka, by G. Montague.
4. The Barcarole in "Rigoletto," by R. Nordmann.
5. Chanson à Boire, by A. Gollmick.

No. 1 is a very pretty set of quadrilles, founded on melodies composed by Queen Hortense, which were very popular during the reign of the First Napoleon, winding up with the now famous national air, "Partant pour la Syrie." These quadrilles, which are carefully arranged in easy keys, were played with great applause at the French ambassador's recent bal costumé, and will doubtless become popular in more democratic circles.

No. 2 is a brilliant fantasia, by Madame Oury (a fashionable teacher at Brighton), on themes from Verdi's popular opera of Rigoletto, consisting of an allegro in F, an andante in D flat, an allegretto in A flat, and a grand galop in F minor, arranged with musician-like taste, and forming a very pleasing exercise for young ladies and gentlemen with very supple fingers.

No. 3 is a lively polka, beautifully illustrated by Brandard, but in no respect different from the thousands of polkas which have preceded it, being neither better nor worse than the majority of them. It is tolerably easy to play, and the time is well marked—two essentials in drawing-room dance music.

No. 4. Taking the popular air in Rigoletto for his theme, viz.: Le Donna à Mobile, sung so charmingly by Mario, M. Nordmann has produced a florid and difficult arrangement for the pianoforte in B flat, which, when thoroughly mastered, will doubtless prove both showy and effective.

No. 5. Herr Gollmick is, we fancy, a very promising composer. His Chanson à Boire is lively and original, full of true Bacchanal spirit, yet free from coarseness and common-place, while he has not attempted to prove his theoretical knowledge of his art by making his Chanson almost impossible to be played except by a Liszt or a Thalberg. We shall look for further compositions from Herr Gollmick with interest.

BOOSEY and SONS, 28, Holles-street.

MUSIC, SIXPENCE PER SHEET.—EWER and Co. have resolved, in consequence of the continual complaints of the high price of music, and the calls for discount, or abatement therefrom, and in order, in a measure, to supersede the incorrect reprints of some of their Publications, to publish and sell all their music, both copyright and non-copyright, English or Foreign print, at Sixpence per Sheet; and they therefore beg to call the attention of the musical public to the fact, that henceforth all music from their establishment will only be charged at SIXPENCE PER SHEET, from which price no abatement will be made. At the same time they beg to state, that they will continue as heretofore to bring out their Publications in the best possible manner, as regards correctness, engraving, printing, and paper, and that there shall be no lack of exertion on their part to improve as they proceed.

London, 390, Oxford-street.

BOOSEY'S STANDARD PIANOFORTE OPERAS.—A new and perfect Edition of the best Operas for Pianoforte Solo, complete, correct, and cheap. Very superior engraving, printing, and paper, are employed in the production of these Operas, which, it must be observed, are now for the first time published in a perfect form.

Now ready,

W. Vincent Wallace's Edition of Standard Pianoforte Works,
NEWLY REVISED AND FINGERED.

NOTE.—In consequence of the eminent success of Mr. W. VINCENT WALLACE'S arrangements (characterized by the distinguished elegance and ease which have secured for him so high a reputation), the Publishers have induced him to revise and re-edit, with appropriate fingering, the following series of favourite Pianoforte Works. These Works have been, most of them, purchased by the Messrs. ROBERT COCKS and Co., of their several Authors; and their value will be much enhanced by the revision of so experienced a pianist as Mr. WALLACE.

"MUSIC FOR THE PIANOFORTE BY W. VINCENT WALLACE.—This eminent composer has just returned from New York, in the United States. Mr. WALLACE'S compositions have, from their distinguished and elegant character (aided by the enterprise of the great house of WILLIAM HALL and SON), attained a wondrous popularity, surpassing in their attractive qualities the works of all living composers for the Pianoforte. His adaptations of the Scotch and Irish melodies are beyond all praise; his mode of treating these beautiful airs is as striking and original, as it is sweet and charming. They are never heard without exciting fresh admiration; and we have no doubt every pianoforte-player will feel that the possession of the whole series of these gems is a matter of necessity. We are able to state that Messrs. CRAMER and Co. are to publish Mr. WALLACE'S future vocal works in this country, while the Messrs. ROBERT COCKS and Co. are appointed sole publishers of all his future Pianoforte Works for Great Britain and its dependencies. The before-mentioned house of WILLIAM HALL and SON, of New York, continue to be his sole publishers for the United States.

THE FESTIVALS OF THE THREE CHOIRS.

At the beginning of the last century, the members of the choirs of Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford, were accustomed to hold annual meetings in each of the three cities in rotation, for the purpose of executing the choral music of the church. In 1724, Dr. Thomas Bisse, Chancellor of Hereford, and brother of the Bishop, proposed that at these meetings a collection should be made at the church doors, to be devoted to charitable objects. The proposition was unanimously adopted; £31 10*s.* was obtained, and disposed of in favour of the orphans of the poor clergy of the dioceses of Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford, under the direction of six stewards, a clergyman, and a gentleman respectively belonging to each. The following year Dr. Bisse succeeded in promoting the same object at Worcester, when £48 18*s.* was collected and devoted in a similar manner; and in 1726 he was equally fortunate at Hereford, where he preached a sermon in aid of the charity, through means of which £49 were secured. The text of this sermon, from Ecclesiastes, chap. xi., verse 8, is characteristic—"I gat me men-singers and women-singers, and the delights of the sons of men, as musical instruments, and that of all sorts." In 1729, Dr. Bisse preached another sermon, at Hereford, contending that music was never so well employed as in the exaltation of religious worship, and rejoicing that, from so small a beginning, the gathering of the three choirs had risen to the highest importance. The contribution to the charity on this occasion, however—only £38—scarcely justified a tone of gratulation; while, in the year following, at Gloucester, it descended to a still lower figure, £28 3*s.* When the meeting was first established the members used to assemble on the first Tuesday in September, and on the two following days choral services were performed in the cathedrals; on the last day there was always a service and a collection. For many years past, however, the sermon has been preached on the first day, and money collected at the doors on every day of the festival. In 1758 the morning performances were increased from two to three. The original object of Dr. Bisse—that of confining the application of the charity to the apprenticing, education, or support of the orphans of clergymen—was soon extended to the relief of widows, Gloucester setting the example, and in this manner the money collected at the doors has ever since been distributed. In 1754 the number of stewards was reduced from six to two, at which number it was continued till 1798, when it was again augmented to four, and afterwards to the original number. During this period of 44 years, the prosperity of the festival was continually fluctuating, as may be gathered from the fact, that in 1774 the collection at Hereford amounted to 622*l.* 5*s.* 9*d.*, while in 1783, nine years onward, it had fallen to 348*l.* 12*s.* At Worcester, in 1794, it was as low as 266*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.*; but in 1809, at the same city, it rose to 810*l.*, which, even in the present time, would be regarded as a very good average. At Hereford, previous to the combination of the three choirs, the music meetings were held in the hall belonging to the vicars-choral. The members chiefly belonged to the college, and the performances were all gratis, except in favour of Mr. Woodcock, the leader, whose nightly pay was 5*s.* The members were refreshed with ale, cider, and tobacco. The names of those who attended, divided into performers and non-performers, were inserted in a book with those of visiting strangers. The absentees were fined 6*d.* At this period the Hereford meetings took place weekly. The Gloucester meetings were originally held in the Boot-hall. As the cultivation of sacred music was always the principal object of the association, there were from the first establishment of the triennial festival two morning performances at the collegiate churches of the respective cities. The "Te Deum" of Purcell, and that of Händel, composed for the peace of Utrecht, were given alternately for many years, until the latter was superseded by the well-known "Dettingen Te Deum." The tickets for the concert were originally 2*s.* 6*d.*, and the pay of the leader (Mr. Woodcock of Hereford) one guinea for the whole meeting. This gentleman was particularly famous for playing the 5th concerto of Vivaldi, a composer now well-nigh forgotten, although celebrated in his time, the only work of his at all familiar to the present generation being a piece called the "Cuckoo Concerto." A Gloucester paper (the Gloucester Journal), speaking of the festival of 1733, says that it was the best ever known; that the stewards had collected out of London the first performers, vocal and instrumental; that the band consisted of French horns, trumpets, hautboys, German flutes, and "a fine treble harp;" and that "the famous Mr. Powell," of Oxford, did the meeting the honour of singing in the cathedral on both days. Who Mr. Powell was it is difficult now to say, but what he was may be guessed from the following extravagant apostrophe to his memory, from the obituary of the Gentleman's Magazine for 1744:—

"Is Powell dead? Then all the earth
Prepare to meet its fate:
To sing the everlasting birth,
The choir of Heav'n's complete."

In 1737 Dr. Boyce, an English composer of celebrity, whose works are still heard, if not greatly admired by the judicious, was engaged to conduct the festival, so that the custom of placing the direction of the musical proceedings in eminent hands, which has since been abandoned, seems to have been of very early date. Dr. Boyce wrote an anthem for the occasion. The steward of the music meeting (a personage distinct from the six stewards of the charity) was always a musical man, or rather a clergyman or lay-clerk belonging to one of the choirs. He engaged the band, defrayed the expenses, and was responsible for losses. How the profit of the concerts were then applied, if, indeed, there were any to apply, does not stand recorded. In 1752, when Händel's oratorio Samson was performed, the admission to the concerts was raised to 30*s.* on the plea of extra expense, arising from the "larger demands of the London performers." Could the worthy stewards have taken a peep into futurity, and known the salaries now paid to eminent vocalists, they would have abandoned the festival as a bad speculation. Händel's Judas Maccabæus was first given at Gloucester in 1754. For several years a Mr. Isaac conducted the meetings at Worcester, and Mr. Waring succeeded Mr. Woodcock as leader of the band, among the principal of which were Caporale and Pasqualino (violoncellos), Valentine Snow and Abingdon (trumpets). Signora Galli and Gaetano Guadagni, both popular opera singers at the time, were among the chief vocalists. The former was a pupil of Händel, and took a benefit at Covent Garden Theatre in 1797, at the age of 74, when she sang two of her master's most celebrated airs. Signor Guadagni had a voice of peculiar sweetness, and Händel engaged him to sing some of the airs in Samson and the Messiah, originally intended for a contralto, which he did so well that they have seldom since been allotted to female voices. From this we may infer that the engagement of Italian singers and other foreign performers is by no means a recent innovation at our great festivals. The balls, which form an attractive and profitable point of the meetings, were instituted from the commencement, at first gratis, but subsequently (in 1752) at the charge of 2*s.* 6*d.* for admission. The balls at Worcester first took place in the Town-hall, but afterwards, in consequence of a dispute with the mayor, the College-hall was applied for, and granted, by the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral. For some years it was the custom to have the Gloucester races in the same week as the musical festival, in order to attract a larger number of visitors to the town, and thereby improve the prospects of the charity. The stewards also gave a ball, which was attended by all the nobility and gentry of the county; but this and the races have been discontinued since 1793. In 1755, at the Worcester meeting, the singers were Miss Turner, "a favourite singer at the castle and Swan concerts in the city," daughter of Dr. Turner, organist of Westminster Abbey; Mr. Beard; Mr. Wass, of the Chapel Royal; Mr. Baildon; and Mr. Denham. Little is now remembered of any of these, except Beard, who was celebrated in Händel's music. The band was led by Abraham Brown, who succeeded Festing as leader of the King's band, and was the immediate predecessor of the famous Giardini. The oratorios were Händel's Samson and Boyce's Solomon. The celebrated Italian singer, Giulia Frasi, and Signor Arrigoni, a performer on the lute, who afterwards set up an opposition to Händel, in Lincoln's-inn Fields, were among the performers at Hereford in 1756. Frasi, who earned nearly £1800 annually in England, was very extravagant, and ultimately died, at Calais, almost in want of bread. Her pronunciation of the English language was greatly admired. In 1757, the performances at Gloucester were extended to a third evening, when Händel's Messiah was given for the first time, and received with enthusiasm. The conductor was Dr. Hayes, and the band showed a material difference from that of 1733, "three trumpets, a pair of kettledrums, four hautboys, four bassoons, two double basses, with violins, violoncellos, and choruses in proportion," being on the list. It is curious that no mention should be made of altos or violas, since Händel always wrote for them. In 1758, the band was led by Pinto, an Englishman by birth, although his parents were Italian. Pinto was the father of one of the most precocious and extraordinary geniuses in the annals of the musical art, who died at the early age of twenty-one, after having composed several works for the violin, pianoforte, and voice, of singular beauty and originality, one of which, a sonata, was lately introduced by M. Alexandre Billet, the pianist, at one of his concerts in St. Martin's Hall. Young Pinto was equally a proficient on the violin and the piano. His untimely death was attributed to a life of profligacy and dissipation. Vincent, who, for thirty years, was first oboe at Covent Garden, appeared at this meeting, and the prices were raised to 5*s.* In 1759, at Hereford, we find the name of Storace, father of the well-known composer, and of the still more eminent singer, among the list of those who performed on the double bass. The meeting of 1760, at Gloucester, was devoted to the memory of Händel, who had died since the preceding anniversary, and whose first oratorio, Esther, was given. Dr. Hayes conducted. Up to 1764, Signora Frasi continued to be the principal vocalist, and Pinto the leader and violin soloist, at the meetings; but in 1765 Frasi was replaced by Miss Brent, the original Mandane in Arne's Artaxerxes who afterwards married Pinto. This lady died of want, at Vauxhall, in 1802. In 1769, at Gloucester, Fischer, the famous oboist, appeared, and continued for twenty years one of the principal attractions at the various meetings. In 1770, at Worcester, Miss Linley, considered the best of English singers until Mrs. Billington put all rivalry out of the question, and Tenducci, the Italian operatic singer, were the chief vocalists, and the band was led by Giardini. Miss Linley was afterwards married to Sheridan. She continued the star at the meetings until 1774, when she was succeeded by Miss Cecilia Davies, an Englishwoman, who had obtained great reputation in Italy, where she went by the name of "L'Inglesina." She was the first native musician of this country who ever had success among the Italians. At Gloucester, in 1775, Israel in Egypt was given for the first time, with Ruth, an oratorio composed by Giardini, now totally forgotten. Rauzzini, a famous Italian singer, the master of Braham, was one of the principal artists engaged. In 1777, at Hereford, the whole of an Italian opera, composed by Rauzzini, was given, the only time such a performance was ever introduced at the meetings, and the celebrated comic singer, Mademoiselle Storace (sister of the composer,) also a pupil of Rauzzini, made her first appearance. In 1780, at Hereford, Mr. Cramer, father of John Cramer, led the band. In 1784 the church services and anthems were for the first time confined to the morning meeting in the cathedral, and the music which had been performed the same year at Händel's Commemoration in Westminster Abbey was substituted for the ordinary services. For the usual gratis admission a charge of 5*s.* 6*d.* was imposed. Madame Mara, one of the most renowned singers of whom the history of the art makes mention, was the principal on this occasion, and Master Bartleman, afterwards so famous as a bass singer, made his first appearance in public in some pieces written for a soprano.

In 1788 the festival at Worcester was honoured by the presence of George III. and his Queen. In 1789, at Hereford, Mrs. Billington made her first appearance at these meetings. She was then in the vigour of her powers. In 1793, at Gloucester, Mr. Lindley, the legitimate successor of Crosdill and Cervetto, and the greatest violoncellist of his day, officiated as first violoncello. In 1796, at Gloucester, Mr. Braham was principal tenor for the first time. In 1798, the meeting was in danger of being abandoned, since no gentleman could be found to accept the responsibility of steward, in consequence of the invariable losses attendant upon that office. The difficulty was vanquished, however, principally through the exertions of the Duke of Norfolk, and the responsibility of the stewardship was divided among several persons, each bearing a part of the loss; a custom which remains up to the present time. Incledon first appeared among the singers at Worcester in 1803, and Madame Catalani at Gloucester in 1811, when Mr. Braham, who had just returned from Italy, again assumed the post of first tenor. The price of the tickets was again increased to 9*s.*, the excuses for which were the large sum paid to Madame Catalani and the great amount of the general expenses—upwards of £2,300.

It is unnecessary to follow any further in detail the progress of the triennial meeting of the three choirs, which, through the engagement of celebrated singers, the augumentation of the band and chorus, &c., in 1811, nearly forty years ago, had already begun to assume much the same aspect as musical festivals in the present day. My object has been simply to trace the gradual advance of the festival from a small gathering of amateurs and choirmen to a vast and difficult undertaking. Suffice it that, with many fluctuations, its prosperity has steadily increased up to the present moment, and that the 131st anniversary, which began on Tuesday at Worcester, of which we shall give a full account in our next, under very auspicious circumstances, is likely to prove one of the most successful, and the most advantageous to the charity, ever given.

FRENCH ACTORS.—Among the French actors there are to be found men of learning and literary accomplishments, profoundly versed in the history and practice of their art, to whose literature they have, in several instances, made valuable additions, and which many of them have studied not only in French, but in the masterpieces of foreign poets and dramatists. Samson and Regnier may be cited as brilliant examples of the class of stage players who thus at once illustrate and elevate their profession. At the Odéon, Henry Monnier is at once author, artist, and actor, and in all three lines he is full of originality. He performs in his own plays, and earns double applause. At the same theatre Tisserant is a musician, and has written vaudevilles and some pleasing poetry. In most of the other theatres, and in various degrees, similar instances might be cited. The Porte St. Martin has at this moment among its actors, sculptors, vaudevillists, and the eccentric Bonton, who composes chansonnettes, and is a professor of the guitar.

The new arguments employed by Herr Weber, and the insults which, under the protection of a wretched rhetorical fiction,* he allowed himself to use against the Abbé Stadler, obliged the latter to publish a second reply. This appeared in the year 1827, under the title, Appendix to the Defence of the Genuineness of Mozart's Requiem. The tone of this pamphlet, consisting of only eighteen pages, is less moderate than that of the first. The Abbé Stadler, who had, in fact, some small cause for anger, asks the readers of the "Defence" whether they had discovered in it a single instance of the calumnies and insults of which Herr Weber complains with so much indignation and bitterness. He also inquires what can have incited "Herr Weber to the salto mortale against the Requiem?"—a question, I confess, far more difficult to answer than that concerning the authenticity and origin of the work. Some of Stadler's friends attempted to supply him with an answer, but, as their statements lie beyond the confines of our subject, and are, besides, more or less insulting to Herr Weber, I think we may pass them over in silence. The Abbé, too, declares he has nothing at all to do with them. We, therefore, now come to the mere facts and arguments contained in the second pamphlet.

The original manuscript, which the Abbé Stadler had seen and copied out, from beginning to end, in the year 1790, was, immediately afterwards, divided into a great number of parts for the gratification of certain amateurs who purchased them; but, in 1827, they were all once more collected, with the exception of No. 1—"Requiem" and "Kyrie." All the other pieces, namely; the "Dies iræ" with the commencement of the "Lacrymosa," as well as the "Domine," "Hostias," and the fugue "Quam olim," were deposited in the hands of Stadler, as documentary evidence, so to speak, in the great action he was then carrying on. A kind of musical committee of investigation visited Stadler for the purpose of deciding what part of the original score of the Requiem was still in existence. This committee consisted of Beethoven, Capellmeisters Eybler and Gänsbacher; privy-councellors von Mosel and Kiesewetter; Herren Gyrowetz, Haslinger, Carl and Joseph Czerny; Baron Doppelhof Dier; Mozart's youngest son, and several other persons. "They all immediately recognised Mozart's writing; they all admired the precision of the" (material) "work, the neatness of the figures," etc., etc., and, after loudly expressing their satisfaction, unanimously vouched for the conscientious truth of the proofs given in the "Defence of the Genuineness of the Requiem."

After this really superfluous confirmation of a fact of which everyone was beforehand sufficiently convinced, the Abbé proceeds to estimate the value of the charge of plagiarism of which, according to Herr Weber, Mozart would have been guilty, had he published the Requiem as his own production. I shall alter nothing in the principal ideas of the chain of reasoning, but, at the same time, I shall take the liberty of placing them before my readers in other words, and add a few observations of my own, which will render the Abbé's reply more clear and intelligible to dilettanti. Profound musicians would understand Stadler at half a word.

Herr Weber places before his readers two themes of Händel and two from the Requiem, without, however, giving the development of any one of the four.

"It is very probable," he says, "that the first inspired Mozart with the idea of the second.* A manifest case of plagiarism!"

Herr Weber must excuse us, but we cannot avoid saying, with the Abbé Stadler, that this is throwing dust in people's eyes, or rather speculating upon their ignorance. What is the theme of a fugue without the fugue?—Nothing but a general thought, a kind of common-place, which any one may appropriate and treat in his own fashion. The fact of Mozart's adopting a notion of Händel, but, at the same time, working it out according to the laws of counterpoint, by which the marked difference between the genius and styles of the two masters was rendered evident, did not stamp Mozart as a plagiarist, or even an imitator; the fugue of the "Kyrie" is no youthful exercise or schoolboy production, but recognised as a classical work by all scholars; it was a trial of strength with Händel, exactly as it might have been between two great poets, to whom one and the same theme had been proposed. Such an act of borrowing has been allowable and customary in all times. The old Belgian contrapuntists who lived before Palestrina—Hobrecht, Ockenheim (Okegem), Mouton, and Josquin de Près—introduced into their sacred compositions not only motives employed before their time, but what, at the present day, would not be permitted, they amalgamated them with their national melodies, which they treated as canto fermo,† and furnished with a vocal and contrapuntal accompaniment of a sacred character. The celebrated song, "L'Homme armé," for instance, served as a theme for many of the compositions of the celebrated masters of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, as we are told in Dr. Burney's "History of Music." Exactly in the same manner did Bach and Händel act towards their predecessors, and Haydn and Mozart towards Bach and Händel, who preceded them. An Englishman, whom I believe to be possessed of the most profound musical knowledge, assured me most positively that the motive of the commencement of the choral, "The Heavens declare," the most beautiful one in the Creation, is Händel's; and, at the same time, we must not overlook the fact that this motive is no theme for a fugue, but a highly melodious song, possessing great intrinsic value. Mozart has allowed himself the same latitude in his Requiem and some of his other works. The theme of his offertorium, "Misericordias Dei," is borrowed from Eberlin, whom Stadler calls Mozart's teacher. Is this, then, a reason for placing such a masterpiece in the list of studies and exercises? To adduce a stronger instance, one of Mozart's most admirable pieces in Die Zauberflöte, namely, the choral with the fugue, that serves as an accompaniment, is an example of a double loan, which must, in the eyes of Herr Weber, constitute a double plagiarism. The choral belongs to Wolf Hainz, a composer of the sixteenth century, and, in the instrumental fugue, Mozart has used an idea of Bach, in preference to one of his own, to which he had first written an accompaniment, of which the Abbé Stadler possesses the manuscript in Mozart's own hand. This was a piece of information for Herr Weber, who does not appear to have previously troubled himself much about old music. If he had, he might with equal plausibility have taken it into his head to attack the genuineness of Die Zauberflöte, as to assert that that, also, was a work which Mozart never

* Herr Weber pretends to believe that the author of the Defence was, in consequence of his seventy-eight years, in a second state of childishness, and had confined himself to merely furnishing the materials for so unworthy a pamphlet, which, no doubt, was compiled by a few unskilful friends. He even insinuates that the Abbé Stadler had not so much as read the pamphlet through, before it was printed. If this was not the case, Herr Weber proceeds to say, "We should be compelled to look upon the Abbé as the most double-faced individual and knavish hypocrite that ever signed an honourable letter." This is an allusion to the letter signed "Inimicus Causæ, Amicus Personæ," containing nothing more than a few excuses and compliments for Herr Weber, signifying about as much as "Your very humble and obedient servant," at the bottom of a challenge. Herr Weber is very unfortunate in his pretended or real belief. What! was not an old Professor of Jurisprudence and History capable of writing so simple a production as the Defence? A man who was evidently in possession of his mental powers, since he was chosen to be Mozart's defender, not read what was printed in his name! This is rather too strong, even for a hyperbole; and, because the Abbé says, in a very short letter, that he regrets not being able to share Herr Weber's opinions, Herr Weber considers himself justified in accusing him of double-dealing and hypocrisy! It must be confessed that all this sounds much more like a libel than the two pamphlets of the Abbé Stadler.

* We shall see what truth there is in this, when we come to analyse the Requiem.

intended to appear under his name. Again: did not Herr Weber himself take the motive of his "Agnus" from an old opera: Der dumme Anton? Yet did this deter him from publishing his Requiem under the name of Herr Gottfried Weber? It is true that I cannot say with certainty whether this assertion is correct, as I never heard Der dumme Anton nor the Requiem in question. Inasmuch, however, as Herr Weber proved himself so little chary of musical quotations as to publish in the Cäcilia the themes of Händel and Mozart for the purpose of demonstrating that they formed but one and the same subject, he might likewise have given the melodies of his "Agnus" and those of the air, which his text mentioned in the Defence, in order to make it appear that the melodies were different. This would certainly have been more satisfactory and convincing, than for Herr Weber to abuse the Abbé Stadler and assert that his (Herr Weber's Requiem) had been classed in the list of trivial street-songs—an expression which the Abbé thought as little of employing as of pronouncing any opinion on this production of Herr Weber.

We have still one observation of Stadler's to adduce, an observation which he made with all the experience and personal authority of a learned contrapuntist, namely:—that borrowed themes are, beyond comparison, far more difficult to treat than those of a composer's own inventing. As Stadler's pamphlet was intended for musicians, he had no need of adding that it is allowable to adopt the thoughts of others only in works treated in the contrapuntal and fugued style, where the value of the ideas depends more especially on their development and connection with other motives. This, however, does not hold good with compositions belonging to the melodious class, where a single principal melody, which often constitutes their only charm and value, is predominant. In such instances borrowing is very properly called a theft.

In our opinion, the Abbé Stadler might have stopt here. The honours of the fight were on his side, without his having overstepped the boundaries of a seemly controversy, which scorns everything like personality. The question of authenticity, the only one which concerned him, was completely exhausted. After his second pamphlet, he should not have returned to the subject; but the good old man was human; he felt deeply the manner in which the great and immortal memory of his friend had been calumniated, and he himself most grossly insulted. How many motives have we not here suggested to us for viewing in a milder light, if not for excusing altogether, an action of which he was guilty. I allude to the publication, after the death of Beethoven, of a letter which the latter addressed to Stadler, and which contained nothing new concerning the long vexed question, but in which Herr Weber's Requiem is called a wretched piece of patchwork. This decision, which, by the way, rested on no proofs, possessed the less weight against Herr Weber because it bore the semblance of a counter-charge. Ten years previously, Herr Weber had critically considered and severely judged a symphony of Beethoven, The Battle of Victoria. I have not his article by me, and, at present, recollect nothing more than that it produced upon me the effect of an excellently written musical criticism. Herr Weber named the work a failure, which it really is, as far as rational conception and artistic development are concerned. The conception is a failure, because we must not attempt to render a foe, whom we have conquered on the field of battle, ludicrous and contemptible, as Beethoven has done. The Marlborough march, which represents in music the French army, and which, in the beginning, we hear full of noise and strength, is reproduced, at the end, mangled, wretched, altogether in tatters, scarcely able to drag itself along, and, if I may use the expression, giving up the ghost, so that the auditors are irresistibly impelled to laughter. Nor was the symphony less a failure with respect to its means of producing effect, because Beethoven had reinforced the orchestra with an acoustic apparatus, an immense machine, intended to imitate the thunder of the cannon. Herr Weber blamed this invention as unæsthetical, and never was blame more richly deserved. This was mixing up reality with artistic imitation, wrapping a statue in a cloak; putting enamel eyes in a painted head; or gilding the drapery in a picture. There would have been one method, perhaps, of reconciling Beethoven and Herr Gottfried Weber. Might they not have been told, for instance, that Herr Weber's mass, Pro Defunctis, had been composed expressly for the souls of those with whose corpses Beethoven's cannon, employed in the wrong place, had strewn the desks of the orchestra?

My readers are now acquainted with everything that was ever known, or, probably, ever will be known, concerning the question of the authenticity of the Requiem, as well as the principal facts relating to its origin. I must, however, observe that I have given explanations on both these heads of a later date than the period of the controversy which we have now reached. I have done this in order to render my account clearer and closer, to avoid repetitions, and, more especially, as far as lay in my power, to abridge a discussion which will be found already to have extended beyond reasonable bounds. My task might properly terminate here; but, as it forms part of my plan to give a complete sketch of this dispute, which created so great a sensation during three or four years, I must, with an amount of courage which, perhaps, my readers do not possess, carry out my purpose to the end; I must drain the cup to the dregs, and speak of the real discoveries which resulted from the article in the Cäcilia. These discoveries were very sad ones, but totally different from those which Herr Weber had hoped to make by his crusade against Mozart's Requiem.

The proofs he had demanded poured in upon him in shoals. Like a snowball, which becomes larger and larger as it rolls along, they went on increasing with every number of the Cäcilia, and soon formed a colossal heap of stories, suppositions, mysterious communications, misty revelations, reports and contradictory explanations, in which it was, at first, as impossible to see clearly as in chaos itself. It would be a piece of cruelty on my part to take my reader, step by step, through this darkness, over which the command: "Let there be light!" has so long been pronounced.

There is one circumstance to which I must particularly direct attention. Many of the persons to whom Herr Weber's circular was, or may have been, addressed, and who, of all others, were best informed on the subject, required, in their answers, either that their names, or a part, or even the whole, of their communications, should be kept secret. Some, in fact, stipulated that the public should not be even informed they had written to Herr Weber at all. This circumstance appears to have proved highly inconvenient to the author of the circular; but, at the present day, we can perfectly understand the reason of it. These individuals had either known Mozart, or been engaged in business transactions with a person who was bound to him by the closest ties. Their very natural reluctance to disclose anything which would have compromised the person in question pretty seriously, either closed their mouths altogether, or imbued their answers with that constraint and embarrassment, which we have already remarked in some of the communications of the Abbé Stadler himself. We, however, are not bound by such considerations, and, consequently, there is nothing to prevent us from making known the truth, however ungrateful the task may prove.

Among the better informed, who replied to the circular, we find some, who, bound by the considerations we have just mentioned, instead of being silent, or speaking the whole or only part of the truth, absolutely endeavoured to deceive the public, by communicating half-facts and putting forth hypotheses, which they, better than any one else, knew to have no foundation—thus rendering more complicated the questions they were called on to clear up. Among those who adopted this expedient, we must particularly mention Herr André, a music-publisher in Offenbach.

Herr André, who was at Vienna in the year 1791, bought up nearly all the manuscripts found among Mozart's papers after his decease. The widow proposed that he should purchase, also, the original manuscript of the Requiem, that was for a long time in his possession, and which he probably took with him to Offenbach. For reasons, however, with which we are unacquainted Herr André did not buy the manuscript, which was sold in separate pieces to amateurs or speculators in Vienna, and by them, without doubt, very frequently disposed of again, hawked about and haggled over, before becoming the property of its present possessors.

Very naturally, one of the circulars was sent to Herr André. His answer was remarkable. He said, or, at least, pretended, he believed, that the Requiem was a work commenced before the year 1784, and one which Mozart had not chosen to finish. Did Herr André desire to amuse himself at the expense of the public or of Herr Weber by this assertion? *

I will now give a summary of some other communications of a later date and of a totally different character from that furnished by the music publisher, but shall spare my readers and myself a mass of superfluous particulars and revolting contradictions, and say nothing but what can be understood, made to agree with other facts, or be guessed at with more or less certainty.

Herr André quitted Vienna, without, as it would appear, coming to any definite arrangement about the Requiem. Meanwhile, the Leipsic edition made its appearance, and, almost simultaneously, we find negotiations resumed by Herr André, who wanted to publish a pianoforte edition. In a letter of the 28th November, 1800, the widow proposes that he should purchase, not the original manuscript of the Requiem, but the complete work, which had already been twice sold,† and of which she possessed several copies. As the fact of the work having been previously diposed of to Breitkopf and Härtel must necessarily affect the price, Madame Mozart exerted herself to convince Herr André that the copy from which the Leipsic edition was printed absolutely swarmed with faults, but that she had got a more correct one, revised by a skilful artistic hand (?)‡ and that in this copy the middle parts were differently written, which induced her to believe that the continuer (Süssmayer) had composed them twice over. All this, as we see, is not very flattering for Herr Süssmayer or the Abbé Stadler. With regard, however, to the assertion that Süssmayer, who, to all appearance, was already on bad terms with Madame Mozart, had altered, in direct opposition to the purpose of the master, the middle parts of the copy in her possession, I shall not stop to examine it, as it is even in worse taste than it would otherwise have been, from the fact of its being advanced in the shape of a doubt. We should never come to an end were we to notice all the absurdities contained in every line of these melancholy revelations. There is one point, nevertheless, worth observation: I allude to the improvements said to have been made in the score of the Requiem by a skilful artistic hand, which was neither that of Süsmayer nor Stadler. That alterations were either made or contemplated is certain, because they were pointed out, and that in detail, to Herr André. The first thing a music publisher and good musician like Herr André would, in all probability, do under the circumstances, would be to convince himself of these alterations by comparing the new manuscript, which was forwarded to him two months after the period of which we have just spoken, with the Leipsic edition. In this manner, did Mad. Mozart render herself the accomplice of an act of profanation. Was not this skilful artistic hand—which kept itself concealed, like that of a thief, and which should have shrivelled up the moment it touched the pen—the author of the differences, which, after all, are very unimportant, to be found in the various copies and editions of the Requiem, and which Herr Weber includes among his proofs against the genuineness of the work?§ In her letter, Mad. Mozart recommended the strictest secrecy concerning the incomplete state of the Requiem, and the share another had had in it; and Herr André scrupulously followed the recommendation. For seven-and-twenty years, the secret resembled that in the comedy, as Herr Sievers expresses it, and the inscrutable publisher still held his finger on his lip.

While such was the form matters assumed on the one hand, Süssmayer sent his notorious communication of September, 1800, to Breitkopf and Härtel, who published it in the course of the following year. This was, indeed, a very unpleasant incident for the widow and Herr André. It strikes me that no great amount of penetration is requisite for the easy comprehension of the opposing principles which regulated the mode of conduct of these persons. Mad. Mozart causes faults which do not exist to be corrected in her manuscript by a skilful artistic hand, because she can claim a higher rate of payment from the publisher, the greater the reputation of the work for correctness; and Herr André is silent according to promise, because a work which is entirely the production of Mozart finds a readier sale than one that is half Mozart's and half Süssmayer's. Lastly, Süssmayer, a young composer, who has still his reputation to establish in the world, will not allow himself to be robbed of the fame so easily acquired by the completion of a wonderful chef-d'œuvre. The widow speculates on Herr André; Herr André speculates on the public; while Süssmayer, more fortunate than both together, succeeds in mystifying all Europe, by allowing it to learn almost the whole truth. Herren Breitkopf and Härtel are the only persons who conducted themselves in a straightforward manner. No apprehension of injuring their interests prevented them from publishing a communication of a description well calculated to render them uneasy for the sale and profits of a work of which they could justly consider themselves the first purchasers.

Six-and-twenty years later, namely, in 1826, negociations regarding the Requiem were again renewed between Herr André, in Offenbach, and Mad. Mozart, who, in the interval, had become Mad. von Nissen. Herr André received a letter, but this time not from the lady but from Herr von Nissen, which, the reader perhaps will think, amounts to the same thing. Not quite; for I understood something of the first letter, and endeavoured to render myself, in turn, intelligible to my readers. The second, however, completely passes my powers of comprehension. Herr von Nissen was a diplomatist; I myself have followed the same career, and think I understand something of the ambiguous phrases, the long circumlocutions, the omissions, and other nicetics of the profession, but, to my shame, I am compelled to confess my inability to find one thought, one argument, one fact, one admission, one request, or anything else in this letter of a colleague. It appears that the business was as ticklish as delicate in its nature, and that circumstances demanded the greatest degree of care. Herr von Nissen exerted all his skill. Although I cannot understand one word of the letter, I think I can trace in it a deep-laid diplomatic design, which was the cause of its being thus drawn up and not otherwise—and I shall always so, if only to satisfy my own offended amour propre. Herr André believed he had seen all the manuscripts that any one ever possessed of the Requiem. Who could say what he had seen? It was, therefore, necessary to convince Herr André that he had not seen everything, and that something was still kept in the background. For this reason, Herr von Nissen, as negociator, very artistically wraps the happy and natural obscurity of his style in one of still darker obscurity, and confounds the expressions "original" and "copy" so happily, that the two ideas, of themselves perfectly clear, become completely jumbled together in the reader's mind. Whole showers of "originals" fall from Herr von Nissen's pen. In the first place, the dismembered pages of the score are Mozart's original copy; then there is the original of the Anony-

* Herr André founds this absurd assertion on the fact of the Requiem's not being contained in the Thematic Catalogue, which commences with the year 1784. Herr Weber has adduced the same reason in support of his various hypotheses. Herr Weber was informed, in reply to this, that Mozart could not include in his catalogue any work not completed at the time of his death.

† First to Count von Wallsegg, and then to the music-publisher in Vienna.

‡ And yet the manuscript of Breitkopf and Härtel was copied from Süssmayer's original score, and the one carefully revised by the Abbé Stadler.

§ For instance, in Breitkopf and Härtel's new edition which I possess, the trombone-solo of the "Tuba mirum" extends only to the third bar, the bassoon-solo, censured by Herr Weber, commencing at the fifth. The Abbé Stadler affirms, however, most positively, that no bassoon is to be found in the passage either in Mozart's own manuscript, nor in the score completed by Süssmayer, but that, in both these copies, the trombones accompany the bass-voices to the end, that is, to the eighteenth bar of the Tuba mirum. Of all the differences in the Requiem this is the most considerable, but, perhaps, not wholly inexcusable. This solo of eighteen bars would, I think, be very difficult of performance on the trombone even at the present day, and must, therefore, have been much more so fifty years ago.

mous (Count von Wallsegg); an original which was used for the Leipsic edition; Herr André's original, marked with the letters M.S.; and, lastly, another original which is far more original than all these originals put together, the said original being only ten years old in 1826, and described in the following manner, that is more original still:

"That one which was looked through at home and in travellings and, who knows, perhaps lent out by the hour, or only from one room to the next (?) may have met with turns of fate, and certainly was subject to chances, the reality of which was not evident, or was not to be discovered at all by the proprietors of the former two and of the latter four hands" (proprietors with four hands!) "in which it remained, on account of their ignorance, or the mutilation which struck every one at the first glance."*

It might be supposed that we had arrived at the end of the "originals." Not so, however! We have still the united original score (Ur-Partitur), which, I imagine, was the real original, the bait at which Herr André was to bite. But what is meant by the united original score? Heaven and the contracting parties alone know.

THE SYDENHAM BRASS BAND.

SIR,—Your last week's correspondent, "A Hater of Humbug," in his railings against the Sydenham brass band, has only very properly called attention to what, if not a "crying" evil, is certainly a squeaking one in the "People's Palace." All people capable of judging are agreed that the Crystal Palace band is a complete failure. It is a failure in tone, it is a failure in execution and precision, and—greatest offence of all to the amateur public—it is a total failure in the music it plays, or, rather, attempts. It was unlucky even from the day of its birth. The only "mull" on the glorious day when, for the first time, the Queen met her loyal subjects in that fairy temple of iron and glass, was made by it. Who does not remember the music on that day?—the tower-of-Babel orchestra, the "nearly 800" from Exeter Hall, the "new effects" in the Hallelujah chorus, the strikingly original and portentously scientific version of "God save the Queen" (which is said to have extorted special marks of Royal approbation), Mr. Costa beating this way, Mr. Schallehn thumping that way, and the "Crystal Palace band" every now and then coming in where it shouldn't, and doing something or other that it oughtn't? Yes, sir, depend on it, this band is a failure in every way. Its combination of instruments is not far short of abominable. Just for a moment think of those detestable piccaninny trumpets, or cornets (whichever they may happen to be), squealing up to the higher regions of the orchestral scale! It fairly makes one's eyes water to hear the sputtering about among all manner of fiddle-passages which they can't do, and which, if they could, would be better left undone. But, over and above such trifles as these, the music is wretchedly arranged for the instruments, and four-fifths of the music itself is characterized by a nameless atrocity which nothing but consummate effrontery would venture to place before any audience, however ill-educated and uncritical. I, for one, am not sorry for this failure. It deals a stroke—would that that stroke were both hotter and heavier!—to that mischievous and idiotic sentiment so fashionable here,—namely, that if anything particularly good in music is wanted to be done, you must get a foreigner to do it. The Crystal Palace Directors have chosen this nonsensical idea for their guide, and into a very pretty pickle it has led them. Surely there was nothing so savagely novel and entirely unheard of, about forming a brass-band and providing music for it, that they must needs rummage over all the regiments of the line to find a German band-master for the business. Could not an Englishman—band-master or otherwise—have been dug up from somewhere with talent enough for this appointment? He might, perhaps, have done better than the present occupant. Any how, the risk was worth running, for, surely, he could not have done worse. How, supposing the directors, in an unusual and thick-headed fit of John-Bullism, had looked a little at home and accidentally discovered Mr. Tutton, for instance? To be sure, he is not a fashionable man; but you, Sir, and his brother professors, and, in short, every body whom the Sydenham Directors should have consulted in the business, know and would testify, that in technical knowledge of the orchestra, whether civil or military, he has no superior here or elsewhere, that the skill and taste of his arrangements have not been surpassed, that as a composer he has many eminently good qualities,—in short, that he is just the man who could have undertaken the office, I am making all this fuss about, sans peur et sans reproche. There are many others, I dare say, equally well qualified, but his is the first name that occurs to me and so I use it. And suppose Mr. Tutton had had this appointment, would not both the band and the music it plays have been infinitely better than they now are? And would it not have been more appropriate, just for the sake of the thing, and a more agreeable reflection to chew over, that in this English wonder of the world, built and maintained with English money, an Englishman should have been entrusted with duties which he could have discharged with so much credit to himself and gratification to the public?

I am heartily sick of the amount of quackery one is obliged to submit to about things of this sort. Wherever the foreigners are better than us, there let them beat us. We deserve it, and will take our thrashing as contentedly as we can. But it is rather too bad—to say the least of it—to find an important and highly salaried appointment bestowed on a gentleman (purely out of deference to his Teutonic nationality), whose merits would not stand comparison with those of at least a dozen Englishmen one could name in a breath.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

ANOTHER HATER OF HUMBUG.

THE MUSIC PUBLISHERS' SOCIETY.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—While your time is engrossed in attending festivals, and discussing the merits of new organs, and other weighty matters, allow me to draw the attention of your readers to an affair of no great importance, but yet of some indirect interest to composers, teachers, and purchasers of music.

The circular which follows was addressed to a friend of mine, a respectable music publisher of the metropolis:—

"London, Aug. 31st, 1854.

"SIR,—The undermentioned having agreed to form a society, intend to have a meeting on September 2nd, at two o'clock, at Mr. Jefferys', 21, Soho-square, to carry out the rules, the heads of which we submit for your inspection (see other page). If you approve of the society, we shall be glad to add you as a member.

"C. JEFFERYS. "H. TOLKIEN.
"B. WILLIAMS. "J. WILLIAMS.

"PROSPECTUS OF THE MUSIC PUBLISHERS' SOCIETY.

"To consist of music publishers only, each to pay £3 (or more, as may be agreed) per month, to form a fund for publishing non-copyright works; each member to print as many as he pleases of any work. Any member having already engraved the plates of a work which the Society decide on engraving, can have the option of selling it to the Society at the same price as it would cost the Society. Any member having legal proceedings commenced against him for selling any work or works published by the Society, is to be defended at the joint expense. It is suggested that by employing one printer and printing long numbers off, it will prevent the wear of plates, and the saving of expense in the printing and wear of the plates will ultimately more than repay each member for what he advances. All regulations to be decided by majority."

Considering the character of the gentlemen whose names are attached to the circular, you will not wonder that my friend did not view the invitation in the light of a compliment as it was intended; but feeling himself unworthy to join such a respectable body, he declined the honour with thanks. Having caught sight of the paper, I immediately thought of forwarding it to you with a few explanatory remarks, believing that, in this case, a little insight to the goings on behind the scenes would have a wholesome effect upon the future purchases of the many unsuspecting amateurs who read your journal.

A number of individuals, who hold that to take a man's property in the name of the law is the greatest virtue, on the 1st of August unexpectedly found themselves supported in their views by a judgment of the House of Lords, which confiscated the property of all foreign composers and publishers. The occasion which presented itself was so sudden, the gold field so extensive and dazzling, and the resources of a greater part of the fraternity at the time so meagre, that it was found impossible for any single-handed member to help himself largely to the spoil. It therefore occurred to one gentleman to call upon some others of the same persuasion as himself, and propose an union of their resources for their common good against their common enemy the proprietors. The idea was no sooner thought of than adopted, and a select number of individuals, whose spare capital amounted to about £3 a month each, have united together to invest their "little all" in the engraving and printing of the choicest works that have been acquired by respectable publishers with large sums of money during a course of many years' speculation. The only advantage which the proprietors possess over these adventurers is capital, and it is to meet this drawback, and the contingency of legal proceedings, that the association is formed which is described in the prospectus. The paragraph relating to legal proceedings is extremely mysterious and curious. It almost suggests that in case the undertaking should turn out very prosperous, the Society may think it worth while to publish copyrights and non-copyrights indiscriminately, and defend actions for the former "at the joint expense." There can be no other meaning to this proposition, for, if the Society publish non-copyrights only, I cannot understand why they should require a fund for legal proceedings, unless for the purpose of settling their internal squabbles, in which case I should think it a useful provision. However, without dwelling longer upon the prospectus, I will just state in what way this scheme of committing piracy by letters of marque will affect the public.

All the music published by the Society will be disposed of to the trade at almost fabulous low prices. It cannot be otherwise; for it is only by offering very low terms to the dealer that the "Society of Music Publishers" can be able to effect any business; and, having never paid for any of the articles they sell, it stands to reason they will be able to sell them cheaper than those who have. But no advantage whatever will be given to the public in the price of this music, which on account of the new law, falls in market-price like corn or any other commodity from which the duty is repealed. The public knows nothing whatever of the change, and enormous profits are pocketed by the retailer. It is the effect of these profits on the dealer—and I regret to add also on the professor—which will affect the public, and ultimately be injurious to the interests of British and all other composers who expect to be paid for their manuscripts. As the new version of the law renders a greater part of the continental music available to the "Society of Music Publishers," a quantity of this music will be indiscriminately reprinted, and forced upon the public by the professors and dealers. Whatever may be the merit of the works reprinted, it will be impossible to say, but at all events they will flood the counters of the musicseller, who in his greediness to swallow large profits (which should have been given up to the public long since); will exempt all other music from his stock. That this will be the effect of the system no one will deny who has any acquaintance with the character of provincial business.

I think I have proved that the judgment of the House of Lords cannot be a source of advantage to English composers, or indeed any other class of persons but unprincipled publishers. That these men should proceed in their speculation in such an open manner, and that they should find supporters in the country, are curious and ominous facts, which I leave to the consideration of our moralists and philosophers.

I am, Sir, your very obedient servant,

London, Sept., 1854. A London Publisher.

SINGING IN CHURCHES.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

Sir,—I wish to call your attention, and that of your readers, to the wretched way in which the musical part of the service is conducted in the majority of the churches in London and its suburbs. In many of the city churches, where the congregation consists of about twenty persons, besides the pew openers, it would perhaps be difficult to do much for its improvement; but in others, and in nearly all of those in the suburbs, which are well attended, a good deal might be done; if those who have the management would set about it in a proper way.

One great mistake, perhaps the greatest of all, is the custom which exists of considering the charity children as a substitute for a choir: and the consequence is that the congregation, instead of singing themselves, are content with listening, or at all events with humming the tune without opening their lips, and imagining the words.

I believe, that out of a whole congregation, it will be found that not more than one in fifty really sings out properly at church, though but few of them are unmusical at home.

Another great defect is the wretched instruments, unworthy of the name of organs, erected in most churches. Nine people out of ten have never heard a fine organ. Ninety-nine out of a hundred have no idea what one would cost.

The committee and subscribers for building a new church, will think themselves acting liberally if they spend a couple of hundred pounds upon the organ; while they will spend four or five times that sum upon a steeple, or a stained glass window, neither of which contributes much to the effective performance of the service. Now, to accompany and control a congregation, a large organ is absolutely necessary. Such a one cannot possibly be built for less than £500, and £1,000 or £1,500 might be spent in this way with advantage. Certain it is, that while people rest content with such things as they generally have at present, it will be useless to hope for any improvement.

Another great error, which has been committed in some few churches where the congregation have tried to take an active part in the service, has arisen from a mistaken notion that they ought to sing in parts. This is altogether wrong. To do it merely correctly, would require a greater amount of practice than could be bestowed upon it; and when done, it would be ineffective. The melody, instead of being distinctly heard, would be completely overpowered by the other parts. The proper way, and the only proper way, is for every one to sing the melody, leaving the harmonies to be supplied by the organist.

I would therefore urge upon all those who wish for the improvement of the musical part of our service, that they should, in the first place, exert themselves to obtain a proper organ; and, when this is done, let everyone join heartily in singing the melody—and mind, only the melody—no seconds, or other abominations of the sort. Of the effect to be produced by these means, those only who have heard the Hundredth Psalm sung by the School Children at St. Paul's can form any idea.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

G. F. F.

Mr. James Haskins, professor of music and organist, opened a new organ on Sunday last, at the chapel, Richmond-road, Hackney. The organ is built in the strict Grecian style; the colours, dead white, picked out with gold. It contains twenty-one stops, two octave pedals and pedal pipes, two rows of manuals, four composition pedals, etc. Mr. Haskins has just returned from the Continent, whither he went to recruit his health, which suffered from a severe attack of cold. He is now perfectly recovered, and able to resume his professional duties.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

W. S., Leeds.—We are perfectly satisfied with Correspondent's replications, and did not for a moment believe that he had outstept the bounds of fact in his strictures. It is, however, requisite we should be cautious, and do our utmost to please all parties—a very difficult task, it will be allowed. We shall be glad to receive the communications promised.

L. A., Warwick.—The lady should apply somewhere else. We can offer no advice under the circumstances, which are evidently very peculiar.

Studio.—Our Correspondent has made a mistake. Love for Love was produced at Drury Lane under Macready's management. The cast comprised the names of Miss Helen Faucit, Mrs. Nisbett, Mrs. Stirling, Mrs. Keeley, and Messrs. Anderson, Elton, Compton, Keeley, Lambert, &c. The Way of the World was subsequently brought out at the Haymarket, Mrs. Glover appearing as Lady Wishfort. We have no recollection of the last piece in which Mr. Elton played at Drury Lane. Rosse was his part in Macbeth.

A Fair Correspondent is informed that Malibran and Grisi never sang on the stage together at Her Majesty's Theatre. We have heard them sing a duet in the concert room of the theatre, in 1835, we think.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, September 9th, 1854.

In the commencement of the next Session, we trust that our leading authors and composers will see the expediency of combining to present a Memorial to Parliament praying for more sure and available means, than any which at present exist, of protecting the fruits of their brains by law.

It is true, there is an Act of Parliament which entitles an English author to copyright in his works; and it is also well known that treaties for mutual protection exist between this country and France, Prussia, and some other States; but the advantages which these acts and conventions are designed to bestow upon men of intellect, become almost negatived by the very irksome and expensive conditions attached to them. The cumbrous machinery required to secure a copyright in the first instance, and to protect it afterwards, is the real cause of so many disputes existing between publishers, and terminating always to their mutual cost and disadvantage. To show how difficult and oppressive it becomes for composers and publishers to comply fully with the requirements of the Acts of Parliament, we will quote from a few of the schedules:

1. To assign legally a ballad from an English composer to an English publisher, it is necessary that a deed should be drawn up on parchment by a lawyer, which in form and cost corresponds to a will. It must further have a 34s. stamp attached to it before it becomes a legal document.

2. If a foreign composer (who is a subject of a State with which we have no copyright treaty) desire to dispose of a symphony to an English publisher, he must make a journey expressly to London, and stay while his composition is in course of publication. The same expense must also be incurred in preparing a deed as in the first case.

3. The French or Prussian composer who is supposed to be so greatly blessed in having his works protected in this country by an international convention, is in reality in rather a worse position than the unprotected foreigner or native composer. In his unsuspecting simplicity, he sends through a friend a copy of his work, with a shilling, to Stationer's Hall, according to Act of Parliament. He confidently believes he is secure in his rights, and shortly afterwards offers his copyright to a London publisher, but what is his dismay at finding that his composition is already reprinted by a number of publishers, and that his copyright is worthless. His only remedy is to commence an action against every individual publisher, with this result: that if there is a flaw in any one case, he loses them all and is ruined.

Now, after what we have stated, we ask if it is not a mockery to tell a composer that his work is protected, while the means of gaining that protection are more expensive than the whole worth of his composition. The laws seem to be framed more in favour of lawyers than of unfortunate authors and composers.

It is true, that publishers like Mr. Murray and Mr. Bentley, may not find the tax so heavy, for the percentage must be less in dealing with such works as Layard's Nineveh, and Prescott's Mexico; and this is a good instance in favour of our views—that music should be made the subject of a separate Act of Parliament from books. But our present purpose is to advocate the constitution of a tribunal where all disputes relating to literary and musical copyrights should be disposed of speedily and inexpensively. Such a tribunal exists in France, but the suitors are not numerous; for it is one of its most beneficial effects that the existence of a court of the kind, with a prompt mode of operation, frightens away rogues who pillage while law is asleep.

We now appeal, therefore, to authors and publishers of every class to petition Parliament to accord them the protection of the same laws that are available to tradesmen. Literary and musical property increase in value day by day, and it is therefore the more necessary to lose no time in making known this simple request, which we feel assured will be promptly granted.

It is a mistaken idea to suppose that native vocal talent is a scarcity in London. Nothing can possibly be more erroneous. Although Miss Louisa Pyne, Mr. W. H. Harrison, and a popular barytone have gone to New York; although Mr. and Mrs. Sims Reeves and Miss Clara Novello are at Worcester for the Grand Festival, with Miss Dolby, Mr. and Mrs. Lockey, and other English singers; and, although the opera at the Surrey Theatre absorbs an entire company of artists—to say nothing of the occasional singers at the Haymarket, the Strand, and the minor theatres, each of which has its prima, or ultima donna—the advertisements in the morning papers inform us that a series of eighteen operatic performances with a complete company will commence on Monday next at Drury Lane. Is this a fact, and are there really other singers in London who are qualified to appear in English opera besides those already named? Stay—let us recall. Was there not an operatic company established—or rather, attempted to be established—at the St. James's Theatre last November, and were there not one or two successful débuts? Miss Susanna Lowe made a favourable impression in Messrs. Henri Drayton and F. Duggan's new operetta, and Mr. Elliot Galer and Mr. Henri Drayton also appeared and found admirers. Miss Susanna Lowe, and Messrs. Elliot Galer and Henri Drayton subsequently went to the Surrey, and afterwards to Drury Lane. The success they obtained at the St. James's, the Surrey, and Drury Lane, scarcely, we are inclined to think, warrants their specific engagement for a new set of performances of English opera. We may, however, be throwing shafts in the dark; and none will be more delighted than ourselves to hear, that some new talent has sprung up lately in the metropolis, calculated to set the town on fire.

Every possible difficulty, every obstruction seems to have been thrown in the way of establishing a national opera in England for the last few years. Either dissension, "foreign or domestic," is sure to creep in among a body of native vocalists when they have at length come to the conclusion of trying their own strength; or a manager bent on good intentions and deeds of enterprise is tampered with and frighted from his determination; or the singers change their minds, are suddenly dissatisfied, and refuse to come to terms; or the lessee demands more rent; or, worst and most fatal of all, performances are given which have the tendency only to throw everything connected with English opera into ridicule. This last, without the rest, would effect all the mischief. The public, accustomed to be imposed upon so often by disgraceful exhibitions, lose all faith, and have no belief in protestations of native talent; so that even when the reality comes, they cannot credit their senses, but fancy they are under the influence of the old deception. English opera has, indeed, now become a "snare, a mockery, and a delusion;" and the public has long since ceased to consider it in any other light than that of a bait to lure the unwary, and no longer beguile themselves with a hope that from its ruins one day it will rise again, to live, to grow, and to flourish.

No one will be bold enough to assert that there is not talent enough in the country to support an English opera. A few of our vocalists may be ranked among the most accomplished artists of the day, and the generality possess more than common ability. Of our native talent in the instrumental department, it is still less necessary to speak. As soloists, the foreigners certainly are far superior to the English; but as orchestral players, our artists yield the palm to no nation in the world.

Without seeking the real causes for the little or no progress English opera has made of late years—or rather, for its retrogression—it would be more to the purpose and more likely to effect some good to endeavour to point out where its hope lay, and in what direction it might be looked for. A manager who would undertake the establishment of a National Opera would find a company ready formed to his hands, without the trouble and annoyance of selection. The singers, therefore, present no difficulty. They attend only on a manager's will. The theatre is the next consideration. We have heard it argued over and over again that Drury Lane is too large, and that the Lyceum is too small. We can see no difficulty presented by either house. By proportionate management, Drury Lane or the Lyceum might be made to answer equally well with a good working company. If an opera constituted like the Opéra-Comique of Paris were contemplated, then, we fancy, the Lyceum would be the more suitable theatre. If, on the other hand, grand operas, translated from the French or Italian, were intended to be produced, Drury Lane would be required. The success which attended the recent performances of opera at the Lyceum would seem to point to that theatre as best adapted for musical speculation. But these performances, it must be remembered, were exceptional, being given as the farewell nights of Mr. Sims Reeves, whose name in the bills is always a tower of strength.

Half measures and the star system have been the principal "rock a-head" to all who have lately attempted to provide operatic entertainment for the public. A feeble orchestra—an inefficient chorus—incompetent singers except in the leading characters—made-up dresses—a miserable mise-en-scène—such have been the elements with which speculation has tried to court success. But such means could never hope to succeed, and now less than ever. The public has been taught to know and understand wherein lies the difference between a good and a bad performance. M. Jullien at Drury Lane first taught them the difference. Exeter Hall and St. Martin's Hall have followed M. Jullien as being instrumental in conducing to this end. Cheap prices have proved the battering-rams which have knocked down the walls of monopoly, and admitted the people into the innermost shrine of art. Before, they were amused—now, they are instructed. Not long ago a symphony to them was a "bugbear"—a "bore"—it is now listened to with attention and its merits scanned. It is no longer easy to hoodwink an audience in respect of a band, chorus, or individual singers. They will know as surely as the manager whether they be good, bad, or indifferent. The time is past by, when "humbug" was practicable. It is much easier now to deceive in dramatic than in operatic matters. The taste and discrimination of the public seem to have been transferred from the drama to music. By audacious puffing, and clacquism, and pictures outside the walls, the public may be led, for a while, to believe that Mr. Gustavus Vasa Brooke is an actor of as high pretensions as Edmund Kean or Macready; but by no amount of managerial trickery or impudence could Mr. Rafter or Mr. Elliot Galer be lifted up to the eminence of Mr. Sims Reeves. Let, therefore, the future manager of our National Opera be assured that the public is not to be fooled to the top of his bent in matters relating to opera; and that that performance only has the best chance of succeeding which comprises the greatest excellence in every department.

THE ITALIAN OPERA IN MANCHESTER.

(Extract from a Private Letter.)

You will have seen by the papers with what success the "Royal Italians" have met since the three concerts at Shrewsbury, Manchester, and Liverpool, at none of which Cruvelli was able to appear. We began here on Saturday, the 26th, with Norma. The ultimate success of the speculation was then at once made evident by the enthusiastic way in which the opera was received. It went, indeed, admirably. The band was efficient, and there was a chorus of thirty from the Royal Italian Opera, so that with such artistes as Cruvelli, Marai, and Tamberlik, you can imagine that it was by far a more perfect representation than is usually given in the provinces. For Monday Fidelio was announced; but Marai, the Marcellina, pleaded illness; and the opera was obliged to be changed to Ernani. I suspect a little amour propre linked behind the excuse, inasmuch as the young lady was to sing in La Sonnambula on the following night, and did not wish to appear a second time as seconda donna before singing a first part. Perhaps she was right. Ernani was well received; the encores were frequent, and the recalls enthusiastic. Tuesday, La Sonnambula, with Luchesi and Marai, who both pleased. It was almost as good a house as first night, owing to the great popularity of the opera. Wednesday, Otello, which created an immense sensation. Finer acting and singing than that of Cruvelli and Tamberlik in the last act I have never seen. They were both in splendid voice, and electrified the audience by the energy of their passion. "Je suis contente pour la première fois de ma vie," said the fair Desdemona to me, after the performance; and well she might be satisfied, for she had just exhibited greater dramatic talent than is possessed by any of her contemporaries. This evening, we have had Fidelio, and, with the exception of an unhappy oboe, with whom Benedict could not come to terms, the opera has gone off capitally—indeed, wonderfully. Considering that they have had but one rehearsal, it seems incredible that such an opera as Fidelio should have gone so well, with a provincial orchestra of little practice in such music. The finale was encored; and the recalls for Cruvelli frequent. To-night is the Barbiere, and to-morrow the last representation—an act of Norma and two acts of Fidelio. It is a capital company. The artists work well together, and appear to enjoy their provincial tour. Polonini is as good as ever. He played Iago on Wednesday, at a few hours' notice (Tagliafico being ill); and although in a dreadful state of stage fright, acquitted himself capitally. You would have been amused had you seen him the other day when he mistook a bottle of acetic acid for Eau de Cologne, and used the same for removing some stains from his pantaloons. Before he was aware of it, the colour of the superfine cloth was changed from a jet black to that of a brilliant red—the "Great Basso" was horror-stricken, and invoked the malediction of all the saints upon the perfidious concoction.

Last night, as Cruvelli was at supper, the members of a Liedertafel assembled in the hall of the hotel, and sang her a ständchen. It was an impromptu affair. They had assisted at the performance of Fidelio, and could not resist coming to wish their gifted countrywoman a "Gute Nacht und Süsse Ruh." How is it, my dear ——, that we English are never guilty of paying such graceful compliments to artists of ability? Are we less sensible to "the beautiful" than those thickly-bearded Germans? Is it that we lack sentiment, and are incapable of evincing an appreciation of genius and talent by any other means than those of making costly presents, giving enormous "feeds," or jumping into the Thames? But you will be tired of reading. Pray come to Dublin, and believe me, etc.

ITALIAN OPERAS AT LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

It has long been a matter of surprise to foreigners, that, in the large and rich provincial towns of Great Britain, we have never been able to establish a regular Italian operatic season, fully equal in attractions to those of Hamburg, Barcelona, Trieste, and other second-rate continental cities. We hope, however, that, after this week's performances at our Theatre Royal, Mr. Copeland and Mr. Beale, to whom we are indebted for the most effective representations of Italian operas ever given in Liverpool, will be satisfied that, when the public are treated liberally, the best Italian singers will be as well appreciated here as on the Continent. If, after this opportunity, we fail to have an annual operatic season, the fault will rest with those who, with the largest professions of love for music, fail in supporting managers who cater for their amusement. The company who have this week appeared at our Theatre Royal in Norma, Ernani, and La Sonnambula, and who have yet to be heard in Fidelio and Otello, could hardly be surpassed by any other in the world. Grisi may now be considered as dead to the Italian operatic stage in England, and it is doubtful if Signor Mario will ever sing again here, so that Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli may undoubtedly take rank as the first of living female singers; while Sig. Tamberlik, in characters which require energy and passion, is, and has long been, the greatest of tenors. Next to Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli, we must mention Mdlle. Marai, one of the most unassuming and yet most pleasing of vocalists. She has a clear, bell-like soprano voice, a good face and figure, a lady-like deportment, and considerable dramatic expression—all promising qualifications. As a seconda donna, she may rank with the interesting Mdlle. Corbari. Then, again, we have Signor Tagliafico, a careful and correct vocalist, and a judicious actor, who pleases the most critical, though he may not often rouse their enthusiasm.

Signor Luchesi, too, though his voice is somewhat hard, sings the sentimental strains of Bellini and Donizetti with admirable taste, and the florid music of Rossini with extraordinary fluency; while, with regard to the secondary characters, Polinini, Bartolini, Santi, etc., have all had experience both at Covent Garden and elsewhere. We have ever found that a few great singers will not give satisfactory representations of the chefs-d'œuvre of Rossini, Beethoven, and other composers, without an efficient band and chorus, desiderata which, till the present time, have always been wanting. On this occasion, Mr. Copeland engaged the band of the Philharmonic Society, led by Signor Nadaud, leader of the ballet of Her Majesty's Theatre, and conducted by Mr. Benedict and Mr. Alfred Mellon, while the chorus has been selected from Covent Garden, so that they were well up in the music and "business" of the operas given. The dresses and properties, too, were brought from Covent Garden, the ensemble of the performances being made as perfect as possible by the exertions and experience of Mr. A. Harris, the stage-manager.

Under these encouraging circumstances the operas played this week have been produced; and though we regret to observe some parts of the house only moderately attended, we trust that the enterprise will result in no pecuniary loss to the lessee. The operas have been admirably performed, and have given the most entire satisfaction to the audiences, large numbers of whom have never before witnessed the production of some of the finest works composed for the Italian stage, with such completeness, precision, and effect.

The series commenced on Monday with Norma, the principal parts cast as follows:—Norma, Mademoiselle Sophie Cruvelli; Adalgisa, Mademoiselle Marai; Pollione, Signor Tamberlik; Oroveso, Signor Tagliafico.

Public curiosity was strongly excited on behalf of Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli, who made her début on this occasion before a Liverpool audience; and we think we may safely affirm that the public expectation was more than realized. Mdlle. Cruvelli has a voice of remarkable compass—powerful, fresh, and sympathetic—never, under the most trying circumstances, betraying the slightest indication of harshness, and particularly fine about the lower register. Her face is intelligent, and, when excited, beautiful; while her action and poses are graceful, and at times dignified. Her execution of the "Casta Diva," and the duets with Adalgisa, were calculated to satisfy the most fastidious. But Mdlle. Cruvelli is not a mere vocalist; she is a dramatic singer of the highest excellence. Her Norma is not a virago, and, though not at all deficient in energy, is completely feminine throughout. Her greatest points are in the finale to the first act, the scene with the children, and the latter portion of the second act. In the former there was no insane raving; but what could be more terrible than the delivery of the passage, "Trema per te fellone, per figli tuoi, per me?" The audience evidently felt its power, for the trio was encored vociferously. Again, in the duet with Pollione, in the second act, when she is goaded almost to the extreme of madness, the struggle between the desire for vengeance and the softer feelings of her nature was grandly depicted: for instance, in the passages commencing "Si sovr' essi alzai la punta," and a little further on, "Preghi alfine," again, in the concerted piece, "Qual cor tradisti," and, lastly, in the prayer to Oroveso, "Ah, padre," so intensely delivered. All these points prove the existence of dramatic genius of the very highest order. The general impression produced by Mdlle. Cruvelli, on this her first performance before a Liverpool audience, was that, for an intellectual personation, her Norma is inferior to none.

Mademoiselle Marai was a very agreeable Adalgisa, singing the music tastefully and with expression. Her only opportunities for display were in the duets with Norma, which she made the most of; while her unassuming manner seemed to make her a general favourite.

The part of Pollione is most ungrateful, added to which the music is not adapted for a high tenor voice, and any singer who can sustain the character respectably does all that can be expected; but Signor Tamberlik has done more—he has shown that out of an indifferent part a great artist can produce fine effects; for instance, in the duet with Norma in the last scene, at the words "Ah! crudele," &c., his singing was magnificent, as well as in the concerted piece "Qual cor tradisti," and in the duet with Adalgisa.

Oroveso found an efficient representative in Signor Tagliafico, who sang and acted throughout with his usual skill and good taste.

The parts of Clotilda and Flavio were respectably filled by Mademoiselle Albini and Signor Santi.

The chorus were well up in their parts, and sang the war song, "Guerra, guerra," in a very spirited manner. The trebles also produced a beautiful effect in the short piano chorus to the "Casta Diva." The band, with some few exceptions, went well. The stringed and wind instruments were very good, but the brass was overwhelming, and the ophicleide was hardly endurable. The opera was well mounted, and I was pleased to observe that the absurdity of introducing a full military band of modern instruments among an assemblage of ancient Gauls, was in this instance not committed.

The principals were called for between the acts, and also at the close of the opera, to receive the plaudits of the audience, which were enthusiastically bestowed.

On Tuesday, Verdi's Ernani was performed with the following cast:—Elvira, Mdlle. Cruvelli; Ernani, Signor Tamberlik; Ruy Gomez de Silva, Signor Tagliafico; Don Carlos, Signor Fortini. This opera, played for the first time in Liverpool, is a fair specimen of Verdi's style, and is considered by many as his best work. Verdi has some original ideas, and in many instances writes dramatically, but his orchestration is noisy, and he is too fond of unisons.

The powerful organ, fine execution, and dramatic feeling of Cruvelli, are well adapted to the arduous part of Elvira, while Signor Tamberlik's magnificent chest voice and indomitable energy rendered his Ernani a wonderful achievement. Signor Tagliafico, too, had a wider field for exertion than on the previous evening; he acted, sang, and looked the Spanish Grandee to perfection; his make-up was complete.

Signor Fortini, who made his first appearance in the character of Don Carlos, did not create any great sensation. Much more might have been made of the part. Signor Ronconi made more of it at the Royal Italian Opera.

The points most worthy of observation were the scene, "Sorta è la notte," with its finale, "Vola o tempo," brilliantly sung by Mademoiselle Cruvelli; Signor Tamberlik's air at the close of the first scene, "Dell' esilio nel dolore;" several of the concerted pieces; the trio in the first act, between Elvira, Ernani, and Carlos; the finale of the act, by Ruy Gomez, the minor characters, and chorus; the duet for Elvira and Ernani, "Ah, morir," and the finale of the second act; the chorus of conspirators in the Catacombs, the finale of the third act, and the dramatic trio with which the opera terminates. In the concerted music, Signor Tamberlik's thrilling notes told wonderfully, and some of Mademoiselle Cruvelli's declamatory passages, uttered in her lower register, produced a powerful effect.

The minor parts were very well sustained by Madame Albini and Signors Polonini and Santi. The chorus sang with precision and energy, and the band was all that could be desired, with the exception of the brass instruments, which were, as before, noisy and harsh. The audience appeared highly delighted, and testified their approbation by repeated and vociferous rounds of applause.

The opera on Wednesday evening was Bellini's La Sonnambula, selected for the purpose of introducing Mademoiselle Marai as prima donna. The music of Amina was sung with sweetness and effect, and the acting, if not powerful, was careful and judicious. Luchesi was a better Elvino than we expected, and Polonini was respectable as the Count. The choruses were well sung, and the band steady. This opera, always a favourite with the public, was very well received, and the principals warmly applauded. Mr. Alfred Mellon conducted most satisfactorily, having succeeded Mr. Benedict, whose engagement at Norwich obliged him to leave Liverpool yesterday.

GRISI AND MARIO.

(From the New York Daily Tribune.)

On Monday evening, (the 21st ult.) a congratulatory musical entertainment, was given to Grisi and Mario, by the American Fund Society, at the St. Nicholas Hotel. At about half-past eight, the south dining-room was brilliantly illuminated, and thrown open for the reception of a select company of gentlemen and ladies. The company was received by a special committee of the American Musical Fund Society; composed of Messrs. U. C. Hill, Louis Ernst, and W. M. Brough. A programme of instrumental music was performed by Dodworth's band and soloists, Messrs Allan and Harvey Dodworth. The performance commenced at nine; and between the first and second pieces, Mad. Grisi, leaning upon the arm of Mr. John S. Kyle, entered the salon, followed by Sig. Mario. They were received with hearty applause. After the second piece, Mr. Louis Ernst, second vice president of the Musical Fund Society, presented Mad. Grisi and Sig. Mario with diplomas, as honorary members of the association. Mr. Ernst, in making the presentation, said:—

"It is with pleasure that I would (?) on this occasion discharge the agreeable duty devolving on me, of presenting, in the name of the American Musical Fund Society, the expression of our joy, at the safe arrival on these shores, of such distinguished artists as yourself and Sig. Mario. I am also directed to inform you, that the Society, anxious to draw close the bands which admiration has entwined around your illustrious (Qy—what?)—and our musical world, have elected you unanimously honorary members of this body, in token of which I would here tender you the appropriate papers."

During the performance of the third piece, a number of persons were introduced to Mad. Grisi, with whom she conversed in an affable manner. The fourth piece, ("Casta Diva") elicited the attention of both, and Grisi remarked, that she never in her life heard a better solo cornet than Mr. Allan Dodworth, to whom she asked to be presented, and complimented him highly. Mad. Grisi made a very neat but rich appearance. Her hair was plainly dressed, presenting no ornaments whatever. She was attired in a light straw-colored silk, with three heavily embroidered flowers of green, &c. The boddice was trimmed with embroidered frills, matching the flounces. Dress—low neck, trimmed round the edge with lace. Over her shoulders hung a lace scarf. With the exception of four elegant bracelets she wore no other jewellery.

BAL MASQUÉ AT DRURY LANE.

As a morning contemporary very properly observes, "In matters relating to Masked Balls, the public puts faith only in M. Jullien"—simply, because M. Jullien alone possesses the art of providing such an entertainment in such a manner as to render it in the highest degree attractive and pleasing. In the first place, M. Jullien, naturally munificent, spares no expense in getting up his Bal Masqué—a great matter—and lets everybody know that he spares no expense—a great art. In the second place, M. Jullien is shrewd, and well acquainted with the weaknesses of humanity, of which he takes advantage—to his own good and that of humanity generally. In his announcements, the Bal Masqué is treated with as much seriousness as if it were the opening of some Grand Industrial Exhibition of All Nations. M. Jullien addresses the public from his advertisements and his posters—his pulpit and rostrum—as if his mission were to instruct and not to amuse. And who dare say it is not? May not a Bal Masqué prove as useful a vehicle for indoctrination as a sermon, and a solo on the cornet-à-piston by Herr Kœnig become as salutary a homily as a matin prayer—if only the mind be in a proper mood to receive it. The man who, from the glare, the noise, the glitter, and brilliancy of a masked or fancy ball, does not sometimes extract thoughts conducive to seriousness, is but imperfectly constituted. He is little better than a machine, and can only serve one purpose at a time. Let him serve it. There is no poetry in him. He is your true arithmetician. Marry him to a spinster and put him behind the counter—there let him serve his one purpose.

But a Bal Masqué, to awaken any sensations beyond surprise and hilarity, must be a Bal Masqué at all points. It must have lights that dazzle and bewilder by their brightness; decorations which in taste and splendour contrast with and outvie the displays in oriental palaces; the senses must faint beneath the perfume of flowers; the ear drink in intoxicating draughts of melody till the heart, lapt in elysium, almost dies of excess, and from joy modulates to pain. Of such elements are the masked balls of M. Jullien made up; the poetic mind is apparent in their construction; they are ideal no less than real, and appeal to the imagination through the senses. The Bal Masqué at Drury Lane on Wednesday night—got up for the benefit of the Italian Brothers, who would not be allowed to hang themselves from the Vauxhall balloon with their heads downwards—was simply a burlesque on M. Jullien's entertainments, and is entirely beneath criticism. The Italian Brothers, we are sorry to say, were compelled to hang their heads lower than ever, for their benefit was a sorry one, and although every one sympathized with their distress, and considered it a sin and a shame for Lord Palmerston to snatch the bread out of their mouths to save their lives—as well break their necks as starve—yet nobody went to the benefit, and the theatre was all but empty. A more lamentable benefit and a more wretched exhibition were never witnessed. The Italian Brothers must get up a benefit somewhere else, and must provide an entertainment which will possess more attractions for the public than a Bal Masqué in the dog-days at Drury-lane, not under the direction of M. Jullien.

DRAMATIC.

SADLER'S WELLS.—This theatre commenced its season on the 26th ultimo with Lovell's play, The Provost of Bruges, one of the oldest pieces of the répertoire. Mr. Phelps was, as usual, greeted with a clamorous welcome. The house was crammed. There was no début of any importance. Mr. Planché's Jacobite followed. Much Ado About Nothing was produced on the 31st ult., and on Monday last Cymbeline was revived. Shakspere's Pericles is in rehearsal, as also a new five-act play.

SURREY THEATRE.—Mr. Planché's burlesque, The Golden Branch, has been revived at this theatre. Although not altogether one of his best efforts, it possesses much of his usual terseness and point; and were it even indifferent, there is Miss St. George, whose singing and acting would compensate for numberless faults and defects, and who looks as well and gets encored as often as ever.

CROSBY HALL.—The Choral Union gave their first concert for the season on Tuesday, when Judas Maccabæus was performed. The soloists were Mrs. Rae and Mrs. Dixon, the Misses Rhemmeiagh and Hinckes. Mr. Gadsby was the conductor. The solo singing, especially that of Mrs. Rae and Mrs. Dixon, was very satisfactory. The choral part of the business was, on the whole, innocent of offence; and the orchestra "most tolerable and not to be endured." The quaint old hall, famous for its reminiscences of crook-backed Dick, was, as usual, quite full.

SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.—Another festival week. A flower show—morris dancing—a balloon—an ascent on the tight rope, and a "boat-race" in washing-tubs. Mr. Tyler is resolved to conclude his management with éclat. The flower show (dahlias) was as interesting as the last. We did not learn the name of the fair aspirant on the tight-rope, but she displayed the full amount of confidence and courage that her hazardous exploit demanded. Mr. Leffler has been added to the vocalists, and obtains, with Mr. Manvers, an encore for the comic duet from L'Elisir d'Amore. Then there is Miss Poole, as popular as ever, and la belle Ransford, who gets two encores nightly—one for her voice, and the other for her face; and the fireworks are as gorgeous as ever, and the gardens as gay and as full as the month of September could lead us to expect.

PROVINCIAL.

THE Musical Season has now fairly begun in the North; we find that the Royal Opera Company are about to give a series of performances at Manchester. We take the following from the Manchester Examiner and Times of September the 6th:—

"In a brief reference made to the forthcoming opera season at the Theatre Royal, in our publication of Saturday, we named Mr. C. Hallé as the orchestral conductor on the occasion, by which we committed something like an injustice—very unintentionally—to Mr. E. J. Loder, a gentleman whose musical talent we have ever held in the highest estimation. An arrangement, we are glad to learn, is intended to be made between Mr. Loder and Mr. C. Hallé, for a division of the duties between Mr. Loder and Mr. Hallé, necessitated by the extent of the répertoire about to be produced and the number of the company, which includes capabilities for the production of English, German, and Italian operas; and thereby affording opportunity to the management to take occasional trips in Liverpool and other localities within reach for a portion of the vocalists, for which the services of a conductor will, of course, be required. The dramatic experience of Mr. Loder should not be overlooked in an undertaking of the present character. The production of an original opera by this gentleman, which has been promised, will be an interesting feature. The répertoire will consist of the following operas, three of which have never been given in Manchester:—Fidelio (Beethoven), Der Freischütz (Weber), Zauberflöte, Il Seraglio (Mozart), La Dame Blanche (Boïeldieu), Les Huguenots, Robert le Diable (Meyerbeer), Acis and Galatea (Handel), Il Barbiere di Siviglia (Rossini), Norma, Puritani, La Sonnambula (Bellini), Ernani, (Verdi), Lucrezia Borgia, La Figlia del Reggimento, La Favorita, and Linda di Chamouni (Donizetti). To these will be added the new work of Mr. Loder founded upon the old romance of Raymond and Agnes. The vocalists engaged are:—Madame Caradori, Madlle. Agnes Büry (her first appearance in Manchester), Madame Rudersdorff, Madlle. Sedlatzek, Herr Reichardt, Herr Zapf, Signor Santi, Signor Octave Benedetti (his first appearance in England), Herr Hubert Formes (his first appearance in Manchester), Signor Piereni, Signor Fortini, Monsieur Zelger (his first appearance in Manchester), Signor Gregorio, Signor Ferara, and Herr Formes. Hubert Formes is the brother of the great basso, and report speaks well of his qualifications. We have seen a list of the band, and do not hesitate to say that on no previous occasion has the Theatre Royal given such promise in that direction. Altogether we consider the speculation on the part of Mr. Knowles an exceedingly bold one; sufficient to fairly test the fact, sometimes disputed, whether Manchester worthily can maintain the musical character bestowed upon it by strangers."

The same paper also gives a detailed account of the doings at Belle-Vue, which consisted of a balloon ascent by Lieut. Chambers, R.N., which took place on Saturday, and of a grand musical contest of brass bands on the Monday following.

THE Nottinghamshire Guardian of the 31st of August, supplies a full description of the Large Organ at the Mechanics' Hall at Nottingham. We are happy to find that church music has begun to occupy public attention; and trust that the example thus set will be generally followed throughout the country:—

"THE LARGE ORGAN AT NOTTINGHAM MECHANICS' HALL.—An opportunity, afforded us last week by Messrs. Greves and Shelmerdine, the builder and organist of the Mechanics' Institution, enables us to prepare the public for a great surprise in regard to the results attained in the reconstruction of the great organ at an expense, according to contract, of £400, by the revoicing of the pipes, numbering upwards of 3,000, the addition of many new ones, especially of pedal pipes of vast diameter and the removal of the choir and swell organs from the case to independent ante-rooms underneath the orchestra. The effect of these improvements, added to the style in which Mr. Groves has finished and adapted his work, becomes apparent beneath the touch of the organist, Mr. Shelmerdine. The full volume of sound when the organs are coupled together, fills the hall with a body of harmony. The total number of pipes is 3,621, a number not very far short of the colossal organ at the Town Hall, Birmingham. The new organ now comprises a great organ and swell, and choir and pedal organs. The great organ consists of the following stops—trumpet, posaune, octave trumpet, fifteenth, mixture (3 ranks), sesquialtera (3 ranks), wald flute, decima, twelfth, claribel, quint, principal, open diapason, hohl flute, stop diapason, and open diapason (large scale). The swell, of—open diapason, double diapason (8 feet), open diapason (large scale), octave, quint, stop diapason, fifteenth, furniture (5 ranks), wald flute, trombone (16 feet), piccolo, octave fifteenth, clarion, hautboy, and cornopean. Choir, of—bassoon, clarionet, principal, flageolet, keraulophon, viol da gamba, dulciana, clarabel, flute, double diapason (16 feet stopped), open diapason, and stop diapason bass. The pedal, of—fifteenth (4 feet), metal open diapason (16 feet), wood diapason (16 feet), diapason (8 feet), and possauna. The couplers, are—forzando, pedal organ CC to E, pedal solo, grand chœur, swell to choir, swell to great, swell to pedals. There are ten composition pedals, two of which are for the pedal organs. The additional stops, mentioned in the foregoing list, are, in the great organ, the open diapason, pedal (16 feet), metal diapason, and fifteenth; in the swell, the open diapason and hautboy; and in the choir, the open diapason, principal, and keraulophon. The additions and alterations have been executed with skill and judgment, and were essentially necessary for the completeness of an instrument of this magnitude. One stop alone, the new metal diapason, consists of 29 notes, weighing 1 ton 6 cwt. By a simple yet ingenious contrivance the great and swell organs are connected with each other, so that the greatest power of the organ is instantaneously reduced to the most subdued pianissimo, and vice versa, without the necessity of removing the fingers from the keys. The manuals have been removed from their former position in the orchestra, and placed upon the platform. The case, too, has been lowered about two feet, so that the large beam extending across the front of the orchestra does not prevent its upper portions being seen from any part of the room. The feature, however, in the new arrangements is the removal of the swell and choir organs from the case to convenient anterooms beneath the orchestra, the former being placed on the left, and the latter on the right hand side of the organist.

"The stops in the choir organ are now capable of being applied to many uses, by the addition of a swell and an open diapason. The pedal board is divided into two parts, the upper part of which is reserved for solos, by being coupled with the great organ. The couplers, with the exception of the forzando, pedal CC to E, grand chœur, and pedal solo, are arranged in a perpendicular position, with springs attached, so that three may, together, be instantaneously drawn or inserted, with the removal of one hand only from the keys. The organ is arranged on the direct action principal, and the keys and all the apparatus connected with it are re-adjusted with the utmost exactness. The public opening of the instrument will, we believe, take place on or about the 21st of September."

From our own Leeds correspondent we have received a long and interesting letter in reference to the Commemoration Services which took place at the Leeds parish church, on Tuesday last, which we shall print in toto:

"The thirteenth anniversary of the consecration of our parish church was commemorated on Tuesday last, by special morning and evening services.

"The Lord Bishop of the Diocese took part in the morning services by reading the communion service, and assisting at the celebration of the Lord's Supper. The lessons were read by the Vicar, and the prayers intoned by the Rev. Mr. Smith, one of the curates. The Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of New Zealand (Dr. Selwyn), preached two eloquent and impressive sermons, taking his text from the morning discourse from Psalm cl., 1; and the evening from Ephesians, iv., 5.

"Collections were made after each service in aid of the funds for defraying the expenses of the choir, and though—like the attendance—not equal to last year, the sum realized amounted to upwards of eighty pounds.

"Among the congregation in the morning we noticed the Countess of Harewood, and in the evening the Earl of Carlisle, besides many of our leading families in the town and neighbourhood, and a goodly number of clergy, some of whom had come a considerable distance.

"The following is the programme of the music on the occasion:—

"Morning.—Te Deum and Jubilate, Ouseley in E; anthem, 'Let God arise,' Psalm lxviii. 1, Leslie; Holy Communion; Introit, 'Cast thy burden,' Mendelssohn; Kyrie and Credo, S. S. Wesley; Anthem during Collection, 'O give thanks.' Psalm cvi. 1, Purcell; Ter-Sanctus—Gloria in Excelsis, S. S. Wesley.

"Evening.—Magnificat and Nunc Dimitis, Purcell in B flat; Anthem, 'Come let us sing,' Psalm xcv. 1, Mendelssohn; Anthem before sermon, 'We worship God'—'But who may abide,' Hallelujah Chorus, Handel; Psalm during collection—The Old Hundredth.

"The choir numbered about fifty-five voices, of whom thirty were men singers—altos, tenors, and basses—the rest boys, all being arrayed in white surplices. This number falls short of last year. Notwithstanding this deficiency in numbers, the quality of the assembled choirs was effectively displayed in those portions of the music ordinarily sung at the parish church in the Sunday services, such as the confession, versicles, preces, the daily psalms, etc.

"The performances of the choir alone in the anthem-wise Canticles, usually called Services, and in most of the anthems, were decidedly less successful than usual; and the selection was certainly not a happy one. With the experience which the directors of the choir must now possess of the power and efficiency of the singers in music of a simple diatonic character, and of the inexhaustible mine of really ecclesiastical music, composed expressly for our services by members of our own communion, it is surprising that so elaborate a composition as the 95th Psalm, by Mendelssohn—a truly magnificent work, performed, as intended, by a large orchestra and chorus—should have been selected for this occasion; especially as so many works by this great author—such as the eight-part anthems composed for the Royal chapel at Berlin—have been written expressly for use in Divine service. The same objections apply, though with less force, to Leslie's anthem, 'Let God arise,' which was curtailed, or rather mutilated, to bring its performance into moderate bounds as to time, the last choruses being replaced by the concluding fugue in Mendelssohn's oratorio Elijah, the words of which were not in the hands of the congregation. The introduction of Handel's chorus (another fugue) from Judas Maccabæus, 'We worship God alone,' was not judicious, and the imperfect rendering it received from the choir was calculated to tarnish their good fame, no two voices being either in tune or time from beginning to end.

"So far from feeling at a loss whence to gather examples in that school of English church music which Dr. Crotch characterizes as the 'true sublime,' the directors of a choir may easily feel embarrassed at the riches which lie at their feet. Of the earlier masters there are many works by Tye, Tallis, Byrd, Farrant, etc., etc.; further on we have those of Gibbons, Purcell, Weldon, Boyce, Croft, and Greene; still later the anthems of Battishill, Cooke, Attwood, and the elder Wesley; and, in the present day, much that is really good in a school founded on a union of Purcell, Bach, and Beethoven, not to mention the numerous works of Dr. Elvey, Goss, the Walmisleys, Hatton, and many other living composers.

"In conclusion, I may observe that if the annual commemoration service at the parish church is to be regarded solely as a religious service—a day of thanksgiving for the inestimable benefits conferred on our townspeople by the birth of the new church; or if, as it is affirmed, the occasion be considered a musical performance for the avowed purpose of raising funds to pay the choir, in either case, a modification of the style of music seems desirable. If it be a religious service in which the people are to join, the music must be of such a simple character as to be easily comprehended and participated in by all. If as a choral performance, I would suggest the assembling together of all the musical societies in the town—a full orchestra—and works performed in a grand style, as at the festivals—acknowledged as such—held annually in the cathedral churches of Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford."

FOREIGN.

Paris.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Mad. Stolz was most warmly received on her re-appearance in La Favorita. The Emperor, accompanied by Prince Jerome, honoured the performance with his presence.—M. Ragani, the manager of the Théâtre-Italien, has addressed the following circular to the dilettanti and patrons of music in Paris:—

"I have the honour to inform you that the season of the Théâtre Impérial Italien will commence on the 3rd of October next.

"My first care, in order to ensure the success of my new campaign, was to pay particular attention to the selection of my artists, and I can confidently affirm that it is long since so remarkable an ensemble has been offered to the public. It will be sufficient for me to cite a few names in order to convince you of the truth of this statement. In the first place, I may mention Madame Frezzolini, who succeeded last year in placing herself among the ranks of our first lyric artists; Madame Bosio, whose success at the operas of London and Paris renders all praise on my part superfluous; Madame Borghi, whose magnificent contralto voice has delighted all Italy; and, as tenor, M. Baucardè, whose immense reputation abroad only wanted the stamp of a Parisian public. The list, however, which you will find in another place, will furnish you with the exact account of this assemblage of eminent artists.

"Being tied down by engagements which I was obliged to conclude in the greatest haste, it was impossible for me, last season, to produce several new works, as I had intended; but, this year, I have arranged measures so as to offer the public at least three operas never yet performed in Paris.

"I trust, therefore, that I may number you, as before, among my subscribers, and beg to assure you that no efforts shall be wanting on my part to cause the Théâtre Italien to continue to progress in that path of regeneration which I exerted myself to open for it, at the most enormous sacrifices. Receive the assurance, etc.,

"C. RAGANI,

"Director of the Théâtre Impérial Italien."

Marco Spada has been revived at the Opéra-Comique with great splendour. Mdlle. Caroline Duprez sustained the part of Angela, and was well supported by MM. Faure, Couderc, Bussine, Jourdan, Carvalho, and Mdlle Andréa Favel. L' Etoile du Nord and Le Pré-aux-Clercs will very shortly re-appear in the bills.

In consequence of a misunderstanding between M. Perrin and the committee of the Dramatic Authors' Society, the former gentleman has sent in his resignation as manager of the Théâtre-Lyrique. M. Fiorentino, of the Constitutionel, furnishes us with the following particulars respecting the claims advanced by the society:—

"1. The right of the author of the evening to be fixed at 15 per cent., whatever the number of pieces.

"2. The author to have the same number of tickets as at the Opéra-Comique, besides the difference in the prices at the two establishments." (This, by the way, raises the author's rights to rather more than 16 per cent).

"3. Regarding the composition of the performances, as the Théâtre-Lyrique is to be dedicated to young authors, the Committee require that two pieces at least shall be played every night of performance.

"4. All translations and reproductions of foreign composers to be ABSOLUTELY prohibited, as the Théâtre-Lyrique is intended exclusively for national composers.

"5. ABSOLUTE separation of the répertoires of the two theatres" (Théâtre-Lyrique and Opéra-Comique).

"6. The rights of the pieces which can be proved to have been accepted by M. Perrin's predecessor in the management to be maintained."

According to report, the Committee has already made certain concessions in their demands, so that M. Perrin may, perhaps, not persist in his resolution.

The Vaudeville has opened with éclat. The three new pieces, the names of which I gave you in my last, were completely successful, and the principal performers greatly applauded. Les Mousquetaires, by MM. A. Dumas and Maquet, originally produced at the Ambigu, has been successfully revived at the Gaîté.—The new melodrama, entitled Les Rues de Paris, has proved a "hit" at the Ambigu.—M. Clapisson has been elected member of the Section of Music of the Société des Beaux Arts, in the place of M. Halévy, appointed perpetual secretary. The other candidates were MM. Berlioz, Leborne, and Elwart.—MM. Roger, Lablache, Mad. Tedesco, and Mdlle. Alboni, have returned to Paris.

VIENNA.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The Imperial Opera House is again open, after having been closed some time for internal reparations. The opera on the first night was Fra Diavolo. The performance was not very brilliant on the part of the singers, but the orchestra, under the direction of Herr Proch, gave satisfaction. Herr Draxler has appeared in Figaro, in Mozart's Hochzeit des Figaro, and was well received. Spontini's Ferdinand Cortes is announced for the 9th inst., with mostly new scenery and decorations.—M. Thalberg has arrived from London.—Mad. Herrenburg-Tuczeck has left for Berlin.—Signor M. Garcia is at present here.

BERLIN.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Since I last wrote to you, Auber's Le Maçon, and Flotow's Stradella, have been given at the Royal Opera-house, but the season, properly so called, may be said to have commenced, last week, with the performance of the Prophet. Mademoiselle Nimbs played the part of Fides successfully, and was rewarded by hearty applause. At Kroll's Theatre, Mademoiselle Schmidt, from Pesth—to whom I alluded in my last—has appeared as Amina in La Sonnambula, and made another "hit." The same character has also been played by Madame Von Marra; this lady, too, gave general satisfaction.

BRUNSWICK.—Mad. Schmidt-Kellberg, from the Stadttheater at Cologne, has been engaged as prima donna, after appearing as Fides, Donna Anna, and Valentine, with great success. Herr Schmidt, also, is engaged for bass parts, and Mademoiselle Pollak, from Cassel, for opera soubrettes.—Abt's Singacademie is rehearsing F. Schneider's Pharao. The proceeds of the performance will be handed over to the family of the deceased.

THE CONSERVATIVE LAND SOCIETY.—The eighth quarterly and second anniversary meeting of the Conservative Land Society was held on Thursday, the 7th instant, at Exeter Hall. The chairman read the report, which congratulated the members on the success of the Society, which had exceeded the most sanguine anticipations of its founders. The cash receipts for the present quarter down to the 31st August, were £15,667 9*s.* 5*d.*, showing an increase on the corresponding period of last year of £1747 17*s.* 3*d.* The total cash receipts for shares to Aug. 31, were £131,833 7*s.* 9*d.* The total shares issued is 10,199, of which 9,018 were uncompleted, and 1,181 completed. Of those 3,337 had been placed in the order of rights; 1,476 had been exercised on estates, leaving 1,861 on the register. The report then adverted to the question of the franchise: "The allottees who are entitled to the freehold franchise by the selection of lots on the various estates bought for the Society, will receive, free of any expense, legal support of their claims at the approaching registration. The wholesale way in which objections have been made to the claims of the members, makes it evident that this proceeding has been taken not only without any discrimination or regard to the substantial rights of the claimants, but chiefly to annoy them, and trusting to the chances of the day in striking off the claims. Under these circumstances, and as the committee will be able to adduce the most satisfactory evidence in support of the value of the lots taken as affording a right to vote, the committee urge upon every member objected to, the great importance of attending in person at the revising barrister's courts, whenever practicable, on the day appointed for the consideration of the claims, of which he will receive due notice from the solicitors." The report next adverted to the question of advances for building on estates. The sum of £40,000 will be offered to the members on loan, and the committee, in deference to the wishes of the shareholders, had increased the right to advance to £100 instead of £50 per right; applications for advances to be made on or before the 15th inst. It was announced that land of the value of £3,411 had been sold during the quarter to Aug. 31. After an address from the noble chairman, the report was unanimously adopted, and auditors were elected in terms of the rules. A drawing then took place for rights of choice, when 100 shares were drawn, and 50 added by seniority.

THE WORCESTER FESTIVAL.

(From our own Reporter.)

The short history of the "Festivals of the Three Choirs," which appeared in the Musical World of last week, spares us the necessity of a prologue to our present notice. Our readers are, by this time, quite aware of the zeal and unanimity with which Worcester, Gloucester, and Hereford have for years past worked together in the joint causes of music and charity; and that the present is no less than the 131st record of their exertions. And we are glad to say that, so far as appearances may now be trusted, the present gathering is likely to be more remunerating than many of its precursors, despite various efforts to the contrary made in all sorts of places, both high and low.

Tuesday morning was not one of the brightest imaginable, yet it was passably fine. The sky had an ominous blackness now and then, to be sure; but people are not to be alarmed by trifles on festival occasions, and so they "turned out" pretty plenteously betimes, making the streets of the good old city glad with a busy tramp of feet and holiday jauntiness of costume, which their staid solemnity of aspect seems little accustomed to countenance.

Thanks to railways and cheap fares, and the tremendous propensity to locomotion which such things engender, most of our cathedral cities must be pretty well known by this time. And what delectable places they are! The dreamer, the man who lives in the spirit of the long-buried past, the lover of romance, the busy worker of to-day, awake but weary, aching bones and care-worn brains—every variety of temperament, from the fierce energy of Manchester to the dolce far nients of a south-country watering-place, may find in them some excitive or assuasive emotion. It is a treat to look at their glorious old churches, unmatched and unmatchable, save by copying—pretty plentifully done now-a-days, by the way. It is a treat to look at them, and a lesson too. A lesson, teaching us how far true art may be separated from true intelligence;—how entirely the loftiest perception of beauty, and even sublimity, may co-exist with a well-nigh Scythian amount of mental and personal bondage. It is a curiosity in the way of thinking, to reflect that these marvels of picturesque design and geometric skill, which, in their actuality, appear at once to transcend the painter's imagination, and to have exhausted the field of constructive science, were made when all the other arts were in their first or second childhood—when the world could not read, and when music, then, as now, the boasted hand-maid of religion, was but faintly lisping out its first-taught lesson in those uncouth utterances known as the "church scales!" But there are the churches to testify the fact, and we can only look, and love, and wonder. And, among other nice things, there are those cool cloisters, which the mid-day sun may seek if he likes, but finds not. What paradises for a walk and a book! And, above all, commend us to a "close," that refuge for deans, canons in residence, and other clerical unfortunates. What an infinite idea of cosiness does it not suggest! What a world of toil and heart-breaking does it not promise to shut out! There it is, now as ever, all grassy and luxuriant, shady with old houses within, and walled and gated without—a perfect type of seclusion, and comfortable plenty, and rest. Meanwhile the old church looks on this green and quiet spot with mild and reverend benignity, but with something of a warning withal;—telling the present, from every tinted window and climbing buttress, how much the past did for God's sake, as it thought; and—greater warning yet—that, with all this skill and toiling, the man who clambered last and highest to cap the spire with its topmost stone, was still no nearer Heaven than are now the fat capitulars who stay below and—do nothing, we had liked to have said; but let that pass. But we are growing dreamy, or stupid, or both, our readers will say; and so, therefore, a few words more as to Worcester itself, and then at once to the music.

Worcester is not altogether the beau ideal of a cathedral city, nor is its church one of the very first class. The city has neither the ultra-secluded air of Wells, nor the obstreperous importance of York: and its cathedral, in like manner, has neither the unspeakable solemnity of the one, nor the overwhelming magnificence of the other. Yet both are extremely well worth a visit. The church is a very fine one, and the town, though it grows a little, and has a shew of commerce from the vicinity of the Severn, and does other things not exactly in keeping with the ways of a cathedral place—(which, traditionally, are limited to profound quiet, great respectability, and capital trout-fishing in the neighbourhood)—has enough of the ecclesiastical cut about it to interest and impress the wayfarer from more bustling localities. It is a pretty, agreeable, old-world kind of looking place, with a very good bridge over the river, from whence one has capital views of the city and its church; and has, moreover, a particularly clean-washed aspect, and inodorous atmosphere. For the traveller's delectation, there is an abundance of inns, clean, inviting, and redolent of good cheer; there is a beautiful neighbourhood plentifully studded with "halls" and "houses," where those who, in the language of the Lord Chamberlain, have "the privilege of the entrée," will surely find everything that can make welcome a substantial blessing; there are salmon from the river, and cyder from the orchards, and ale of the best from everywhere,—for a right beer-loving people are they in these mid-western places. In short, though, as we before said, not exactly the beau ideal of a cathedral city, it is a thoroughly pleasant, fat, wholesome, and tranquil place to live in. Consistently with its clerical reputation, it is not so much put out of its way by these triennial festivals as some people would imagine. It gets up its excitements in a grave and sober way. Of course, on these occasions, there is an extraordinary influx of visitors, and, we believe, never more so than at the present festival. So, at least, goes our experience; for we can vouch that "good accommodation for man and horse," during this week has been a thing not to be sought without patience under much denial, both in the city and neighbourhood. Yet with all this great extra population leavening the whole lump, as it were, and forcing the sober old city into a holiday mind,—with all the crowding about the streets, and gay dresses, and constant paradings to and from the Cathedral and College Hall, with a great deal of interpolated visiting and sight-seeing besides, there is no noisy and vulgar bustle. There is a brim-full but quiet happification above the whole scene that, to our taste, contrasts most favourably with the riot, heat, and turmoil emitted by those surging and crushing masses of humanity, which usually represent public beatitude in more populous places.

On Tuesday morning the cathedral, though not absolutely crowded, was, at least, satisfactorily full. As is customary on these occasions, the opening event of the festival was the complete cathedral service, assisted, where admissible, by the resources of the orchestra. This is a proceeding we hope never to see abolished. In its inward signification it exhibits an act of worship as the first step towards success, even in that best of causes, charity; while, with an outward and vulgarer purpose, it affords one of the rarest opportunities of hearing, with becoming effect, some of the grand old music of our church. If in this latter purpose there should be some slip—if the music selected should not be of the best, or its performance not the most perfect conceivable—the fault lies not with the system, but with its application. The service, on this occasion, was, of course, choral throughout—the version employed being that of Tallis. The chant for the Venite was that misnamed the "Grand Chant;" that for the Psalms of the day a very average composition by the Rev. Mr. Havergal. The Te Deum was Händel's "Dettingen;" the Jubilate, again, chanted to the "Grand Chant" aforesaid; the anthem after the third collect was Purcell's superb "O sing unto the Lord;" that before the sermon, Blow's "I beheld"—anything but one of his best, by the way; and the service closed with the beautiful and well-known "My heart is inditing," from Händel's set of Coronation Anthems. Throughout the morning it happened—and we have noticed the same thing on many similar occasions—that that which should have been the most impressive point (especially to the less habituated part of the congregation)—namely, the responsive part of the service, fell short of what we conceive to be its due effect. The responses were sung very fairly in tune and time, and, so executed by a powerful body of voices, the masculine, square, old phraseology of Tallis could not fail to have some share of imposing effect. But a great deal more than this sort of correctness is required. In a choir gathered from all manner of distant localities, and employed on music essentially recitative and unrhythmical in character, there must be vast differences of style to reconcile before any approach to unity of effect can be arrived at. Perhaps the Exeter Hall element may be a trifle in excess—there may be a little too much of sharp, coarse, military precision. Or, perhaps, the "pure English vocal school" may somewhat predominate, and the "slower" provincials be inclined to constitute themselves a rear-guard, with a drawl slightly beyond cathedral limits. All this should be taken into account and practised against. Everything should be done to eliminate the grandeur and sentiment of this service. The language, in itself sublime, should receive all that breadth of utterance so justly its due; and the voices, in giving it its musical vitality, should be trained to swell even to the filling of every nook of the vaulted roof, and, anon, to sink downwards to the point of melting into their own echoes. We by no means wish to encumber festival conductors with more than their share of trouble. Far be it from us to recommend an essay at that microscopical finish we are told is given to the Miserere of Allegri in the Vatican chapel. All we advocate could certainly be done by any practical musician who happens to possess three things—namely, the power of forming an opinion and expressing it, a black-lead pencil wherewith to manifest certain marks of crescendo and diminuendo, and an hour's time to spare for the drilling of his choir. We know, from experience, what can be done with this choral service with small means; but with such choirs as triennially assemble at Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester, a little intelligent direction would extract from these strange old harmonies such an effect of grand and devotional solemnity, as few other things could ever approach.

The Dettingen Te Deum, in spite of sundry morsels of big-wiggery—not to say twaddle, is truly a grand work. Its opening is one of the most majestic things in all music; and—as if to test his quality in the opposite phase of expression—the composer has left us, in the bass-solo, "Vouchsafe, O Lord," such a model of divinely inspired pathos as all musicians must reverence, but few will ever equal. But altogether there is a breadth—perhaps the very foremost quality in art—about the whole work, that is as refreshing as instructive. Take, for instance, the most obviously accountable piece—the chorus "To the Cherubim and Seraphim," the form of which is as utterly simple as its materials appear, at first sight, common-place. Take this as a text to preach from, and ask the modern mystics of Germany—alas! how fallen from the estate of their great old countryman—when will they be able to do likewise? How long will it be ere the affectations, crudities, and complexities of Wagner, Schumann, and "young Germany" in general, will yield, by any process of extractive distillation, one drop of such clear, grand, and effective music as is found in this very simple chorus?

The performance of this fine work was, generally, very satisfactory. The solo singers, in this and the other musical items of the morning service, were Mrs. Weiss, Mr. Jones, the organist of Tewkesbury (who, at a moment's notice, undertook, and most creditably executed, the alto parts allotted to Miss Dolby, but left vacant by her sudden indisposition), Mr. Lockey, Mr. Thomas, a lay-vicar of Worcester Cathedral, and Mr. Weiss Much praise must be given to Messrs. Harper and Irwin for their trumpeting throughout this Te Deum;—it was a very successful struggle with most abominable difficulties. By the way, for what species of leather-lipped mortals could Händel have written his trumpet-parts? Were they made expressly for some mighty man, born of the wind-bags of Æolus, just in the nick of time to serve his needs? Or was he contemptuously unmindful of the personal convenience of his executants? Or did he care nothing that his music should suffer here and there by a few occasional nastinesses in its performance? Any how, these parts, if played at all, must be played on trumpets to the end of time! for certainly there are no other instruments, or combinations of instruments, which can imitate their effect.

The two anthems of Purcell and Blow did not go so well as the more generally known compositions of Händel; and this, evidently, for the reasons we have before stated with regard to the responsive parts of the service. There is so much of tradition and so little of certainty about the manner of performing the anthem music of our church, that a miscellaneously-collected choir can scarcely be expected, without much rehearsal, to do it justice.

An excellent sermon, in behalf of the charity, was preached by the Rev. C. R. Somers Cocks, Vicar of Wolverley, and so able was his advocacy, that upwards of £255 was realized by the collection,

We may here state, once for all, that the orchestra employed on this, and the other performances of the festival, comprised an excellent band of 70, composed of the best London instrumentalists, and a chorus of nearly 240 voices; with, for vocal soloists, Mesdames Clara Novello, Castellan, Weiss, and Viardot Garcia, Miss Dolby, Messrs. Sims Reeves, Lockey, and Weiss, Signor Gardoni, and Herr Formes; and lastly, though not leastly, Mr. Done, of Worcester, as conductor, Mr. Amott, of Gloucester, as organist, and Mr. Townshend Smith, of Hereford, at the pianoforte.

On Tuesday evening the first miscellaneous concert took place in the College Hall,—a room very fairly adapted for musical effect, though, we regret to say, much too large for the audience; who, though numbering about 500, did not occupy more than three-parts of its space. The programme was well calculated to display the vocal strength at command, and to gratify the necessarily mixed taste of the audience; but did not—and perhaps wisely not in a provincial city—contain much of such novelty or strong interest as would demand extended comment. The great known feature of interest was Mendelssohn's overture and music to A Midsummer Night's Dream, which was very well executed, and evidently created general delight; while the absolute novelty was comprised in the tenor scena from Mr. Charles Horsley's Comus—a very clever composition, and sung by Mr. Sims Reeves with powerful effect. There were two solo instrumental performances—Spohr's second concertante for two violins, magnificently played by M. Sainton and Mr. Blagrove; and Mr. Pratten's concert-stück for the flute, performed in most masterly style by the composer to the infinite delight of his auditors. For the rest, there was a large variety of songs by a great number of singers—the music of various degrees of merit, the execution in every case worthy of the vocalists, and the audience universally in a high state of gratification. Specially noticeable, perhaps, as having stirred up the warmest clamours of approbation, were the "Di piacer," by Mad. Castellan, the "Ah, non giunge," by Mad. Viardot Garcia—(the ladies, in both cases, appearing to think rather more of their own, than the composer's, dexterity)—and the "Ah, se giungo" of Mad. Clara Novello; who, in this instance, wasted a vast deal of admirable singing on a song which the composer—one Cagnoni—might have made, and probably did make, by machinery; so exactly similar is it, in fashion and merit, to all the cabalette of the modern Italian stage. Our list of these superlative captivations closes with Purcell's "Come if you dare," sung by Mr. Sims Reeves as no other man now alive can sing it; and Mr. Blumenthal's pretty romance, "Le chemin du Paradis," very tastefully rendered by Sig. Gardoni. Both these pieces were encored—the former, probably, out of patriotism, the latter, certainly, out of pure sentimentality. "Rule Britannia," the solo parts by Mad. Novello, Mrs. Weiss, and Messrs. Sims Reeves and Weiss, terminated the concert.

On Wednesday morning the good old city was early alive and stirring. The evil promise of the previous day's sky was, like many other evil promises, most gloriously broken; and never needs there a finer day for a finer deed than was Wednesday for the performance of Elijah. Whether it was the genial influence of the sun, or the urgent claims of the charity, or the announcement of Mendelssohn's great masterpiece, matters not;—something or other certainly stirred up the inhabitants and their visitors to a much more determined invasion of the cathedral than was effected on the opening day. The nave, from the screen to the west window, looked a perfect sea of heads. It is said, and, we trust, correctly, that between two and three thousand people were present. The merits of Mendelssohn's immortal work have been so often discussed in the Musical World, that it seems impossible—it is certainly unnecessary—to add another word in its praise. Thanks to repeated performances, the public is becoming impressed with those wondrous beauties in it which musicians at once so eagerly recognised; and though it may not yet have passed into every nook and corner of the land to dwell among the people like a second nationality, as the Messiah has done, it has already so far attained its place in the catalogue of what are called "Stock Pieces," that no festival programme would be deemed complete without it. There is certainly no place to hear great, broad music in like a cathedral. Whether one's emotions under such circumstances arise from religious association, or whether they are of a wholly common and material nature, and result from the reverberative properties of the building, giving a mystic, half-vague, and wholly etherial condition to every sound developed within it, we do not care to discover; but certain it is, we never listened to the inspired music of Mendelssohn with more entire delight than on this occasion. In the first place it was, as a whole, very finely performed; there were few points that could be quoted in exception; then, again, the aspect of the building itself nourishes and ripens all those feelings of reverence with which we ought ever to hear music of this sort; and, lastly, come in to help the effect, those invariable acoustic qualities of the "long drawn aisle and fretted vault," echo and resonance, giving to all tone that floating outline, and grand and solemn continuity, before which the hard responseless crash and sharply defined edge of the best performance in an ordinary concert-room, sink into something altogether common and of this world.

The solo portions of Elijah were assigned to Mad. Clara Novello, Mrs. Weiss, Mad. Viardot Garcia, Mad. Castellan, and Miss Dolby (who, to universal satisfaction, was sufficiently recovered from her sudden illness to take part in the morning's performance); Sig. Gardoni for the tenor music of the first part, Mr. Sims Reeves for that of the second, Mr. Weiss and Herr Formes, all of whom exerted themselves with the greatest possible success, There were two encores—directed, as usual, by the president, the Bishop of Worcester—namely, the trio, "Lift thine eyes," sung by Mad. Novello, Miss Dolby, and Mad. Viardot Garcia, and the air, "O rest in the Lord," sung by Miss Dolby.

On Wednesday evening, the second Miscellaneous Concert in the College Hall was extremely well attended. The programme was certainly better, in a musical point of view, than that of the previous evening. It was, however, tremendously too long—the directors being evidently puzzled how to employ the mass of materials at their disposal. The principal instrumental features were the overture to Guillaume Tell, which commenced the concert and was vociferously encored; and Beethoven's Sinfonia Pastorale, which opened the second part, and was, all things considered, very well played, and received much applause. The vocalities were legion, and highly "miscellaneous" in character and merit. The salient point in this department of the programme was, undoubtedly, the wonderful finale to Mendelssohn's unfinished opera, Lorely. There are few singers physically capable of the prolonged exertion demanded by this piece, but in the first rank of this few certainly stands Mad. Clara Novello. We never heard her sing it better than on this occasion; not only did its length and difficulty leave her voice in unflagging brilliancy to its close, but its powerful and strongly varying sentiment found in her artistic quality the aptest possible exponent; she was very ably supported by both band and chorus, and was rewarded, at the conclusion, by enthusiastic salvos of applause. The other most noticeable points of the vocal programme, were the well-known and lovely trio for female voices from Spohr's Azor, which, in the hands of Mesdames Novello, Weiss, and Lockey could not fail of its accustomed effect; the fine duet for Valentine and Marcel from the Huguenots, sung with immense dramatic fervour by Mad. Viardot Garcia and Herr Formes; and the beautiful tenor air from Euryanthe, which Mr. Sims Reeves delivered with perfect and exquisite feeling. Bishop's ever fresh and charming chorus, "Now tramp over moss and fell," was executed with all due spirit and effect. As much cannot be said for the performance of Festa's madrigal, "Down in a flow'ry vale," which the choir ought to have known by heart, but, nevertheless, sang so badly as to deserve hissing; however the audience were good-natured and refrained.

The concert was not over till nearly twelve o'clock—quite an hour too late, we should think, for even the most ravenous musical appetite.

On Thursday the day broke gloomily—dark clouds strode over the sky, and everything threatened rain, and muddle, and the misery these always bring to an Englishman. Nobody, however, can be weather-wise in this climate; and so the prophets of ill were again disappointed, for long before the time appointed for entering the Cathedral, all atmospheric threatenings had vanished, and the sun was shining as gladly as on the previous day. The church was again well and fashionably filled. The music consisted of the first and second part of Haydn's Creation, and the whole of Spohr's Last Judgment. The first needs but the barest mention at our hands. Its choruses are so utterly familiar to all choirs, whether metropolitan or provincial, that they could hardly fail, by any accident, of good execution. And as to the soli portions of the work, we need, surely, only record their committal to the artistic charge of Mesdames Novello and Castellan, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Signor Gardoni (who surprised us by the fluency of his English), and Mr. Weiss. Familiar, almost hackneyed, as is this work to musicians, however, it comes ever welcome and fresh to a general audience. The sweetness of its melody, the simplicity of its forms, and its naturalness and intelligibility throughout, make it a treasure which the listening world will not easily, neither should they, be persuaded to abandon.

Very different is the case with Spohr's Last Judgment. Despite its obvious and great beauties, it is music hard to listen to by the uninitiated, and extremely difficult of execution. Its great elaboration and complexity, make it lose much of that breadth which should be paramountly characteristic of church-music,—its style is more elegant than grand, more tender than devotional; yet it is undeniably a fine work of one of the world's greatest musicians. The difference of style, and difficulty between the Creation and the Last Judgment, soon told its own tale in the performance. The chorus marched on with the confidence of easy victory in the former; but in the latter, the diminished strength of tone and frequent halting at formidable harmonic intervals, showed the courage of the troops rather shattered under the formidable nature of their work. To drop metaphor, the chromatic texture of Spohr's harmonies does not agree with the constitution of choral societies in general. The everlasting semitonic progression of his parts and restless wandering from key to key, puts them sadly out of their way—we make no exception even in favour of the redoubtable "800" of London and their autocratic general to boot. It was not to be expected, then, that there should be otherwise than much indifferent chorus-singing in this work at Worcester, and some positively bad; and yet it is odd enough that one of the most difficult pieces of the whole oratorio, the chorus "Destroyed is Babylon," went as well as anything during the performance. The solo singers were Madame Viardot Garcia, Mrs. Lockey (who sang the music originally allotted to Miss Dolby), Mr. Lockey, and Herr Formes who did ample justice to the music entrusted to them.

On Thursday evening, the third and last miscellaneous concert took place; and the College Hall was occupied by a far more numerous and brilliant assemblage than on any former occasion. The selection of music was interesting, beyond doubt, but so fearfully, so cumbrously long, that the wonder is how any audience, however well intentioned, could be induced to sit it out. Yet remain they did, en masse, to the end; and this with the most undeviating good humour and satisfaction. The first part included the overture to Oberon, admirably executed by the band, and seventeen vocal pieces from the same opera, faultlessly given, in all respects, by Mesdames Clara Novello, Weiss, Castellan, and Miss Dolby, Messrs. Sims Reeves, Lockey, and Weiss. And as if this were not enough, in all conscience, for the "first part" of a concert, we had en suite, the air for Sarastro with chorus, from Mozart's Zauberflöte, sung by Herr Formes. Some most astonishing aggravations of Rossini's "Non più mesta," wonderfully achieved by Mad. Viardot Garcia, and a very characteristic performance of the Chorus of Dervishes from Beethoven's Ruins of Athens. The great feature of the second part was Mendelssohn's Symphony in A major. The difficulties of this magnificent work, for the orchestra, at first thought considerable, have been much increased since the true times of the first and last movements have been comprehended and acted on. But remembering that we had present neither the Old nor the New Philharmonic band, tout pur, the performance was quite unexceptionable, and afforded a high treat to every one in the room at all capable of appreciating such music so played. Of the remaining items of the concert it may be sufficient to say that they were strictly limited to popularities—small Italian cavatinas, smaller ballads, and the like. Nevertheless they sufficed to please to the utmost, and their aim was thus accomplished. The concert terminated with a performance of the National Anthem, sufficiently abominable to disgrace all concerned in it.

On Friday morning, in the cathedral, the Messiah, for the thousandth time, asserted its prerogative, as the most popularly attractive work of all times and countries. If there was little reason for comment on the performance of the Creation, still less, on the same grounds, can there be for remark on that of the Messiah. Of all the products of human art, under every phase, this surely is, to every Englishman, the best known, and the most intimately cherished. There never was, or will be, an apter illustration of the saying that "the sublime and the ridiculous meet on the same threshold," than is found in the fact that the most universally popular of all musical creations are the Messiah, and the last Nigger melody, whichever it may happen to be. Wide as the poles asunder in art-value, they yet meet on the common ground of universal appreciation; and this is a distinction confined to only the best and the worst of music. We need not stay to inquire why the latter should please; we know there are hosts of people who will trouble themselves with nothing beyond the first impressions of their senses. But in the Messiah, as in all such works, we find a fitness to every species of intelligence; we find sublimity of conception for the poet, learning for the scholiast, symmetry for the artist, and everywhere overflowing ceaseless melody for all—the greatest and the least alike. Known as is this great work, bit by bit, from the "Comfort ye my people," to the closing "Amen," how can it fail, in England, its traditional home, of a worthy performance? While the present race of singers exist, at least, it will always be the most popular and most perfect performance of every Festival; and thus it was at Worcester.

Thus terminated the Worcester Festival, and we are glad to be able to state that, satisfactory as has been its musical issue, its pecuniary result will, most probably, be equally gratifying. Independant of voluntary contributions—which are usually plentifully forthcoming on these occasions—the sum of £1,028 has been realized from the performances;—an amount very considerably larger than that of the last Festival, and which contrasts, we believe, very favourably with that of most previous occasions.

A highly laudable novelty has been started at this Worcester gathering,—namely, the performance of full service in the cathedral at an early hour on each morning. From this plan, as was anticipated, three benefits have arisen,—namely, a small amount of contribution to the general fund, an opportunity for strangers to become better acquainted with the proprieties of cathedral music, and, lastly, a plaister to the tender consciences of such as objected to these Festivals on the ground that they occupied the cathedral to the prevention of its routine of daily service.

THE NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

Though not distinguished for novelties of great promise and importance, the prospectus of the 11th anniversary of the Norfolk and Norwich Musical Festival was very good, and the list of singers engaged unusually strong. The two new oratorios produced at the last meeting (1852), though both possessed a certain degree of merit, were by no means successful enough to encourage the hope that they could ever become stock pieces, or have any chance of being presented at future meetings. The music of Israel Restored was well-written, but not original; while that of Jerusalem was original, but not well-written; so that each lacked one essential quality. Discouraged by this result, the managers of the Norfolk and Norwich Musical Festival determined to run no risk this time; and, instead of two new oratorios by English composers, they have offered to their friends and patrons, the clergy, nobility, and gentry, of the county and its vicinities, no new oratorio at all, either of English or foreign manufacture, relying upon the unfailing attraction of certain acknowledged masterpieces.

The festival was under the patronage of Her Majesty the Queen and Prince Albert. The continuance of Mr. Benedict as conductor and director-in-chief of the musical department has given unanimous satisfaction. The band secured by Mr. Benedict consisted of 18 first and as many second violins, 14 violas, 10 violoncellos, 10 double-basses, 5 flutes, 4 oboes, 4 clarinets, 4 bassoons, 6 horns, 4 trumpets, 6 trombones (3 for each choir), 2 ophicleides, 2 drums, and triangle—altogether a force of 108 instrumentalists selected from the best available talent. The chorus comprised 80 trebles, 60 altos, 60 tenors, and 70 basses, which joined to the band, made a competent and imposing orchestra of little short of 400. The list of principal singers was more than ordinarily varied and attractive:—sopranos, Mademoiselle Bosio, Madame Castellan, Madame Clara Novello, and Mrs. Weiss; contralto, Miss Dolby; tenors, Signor Gardoni, Herr Reichardt, and Mr. Sims Reeves; basses, Signor Belletti, Mr. Weiss, and Signor Lablache. The solo instrumentalists were M. Sainton and Mr. Blagrove (violins), Mr. Hausmann (violoncello). As usual, there was no pianist—a serious oversight, since no solo instrument affords such grateful relief to an orchestral concert as the pianoforte, and for no instrument have so many fine compositions been written. A first-rate pianist would have been an agreeable substitute for one or two of the principal singers.

TUESDAY.—The musical performances began in the morning with a grand miscellaneous concert of sacred music, in St. Andrew's-hall, which was well attended. Between 400 and 500 persons were assembled, among whom were—Lords Stafford and Suffield, the Dean and the Mayor of Norwich, Sir H. Robinson, Sir Fitzroy Kelly, the Hon. E. Fellowes, M.P., and other vice-presidents. Whatever may be thought of Saint Andrew's-hall as a concert-room, it amply merits its reputation as the most splendid building devoted to municipal purposes which this country can boast. It was originally the nave of a church belonging to the Convent of the Black Friars, which was destroyed by fire at the beginning of the 15th century. Its architecture is of the later "pointed" style. At the west end of the building is an immense gallery, which is used for the orchestra at the festivals; and at the back of the gallery an organ, belonging to the Choral Society. The appearance of the orchestra, with the immense band and chorus, was vastly imposing. The concert began with the National Anthem, finely sung—a verse in duet for Messrs. Sims Reeves and Weiss, and another, solo, for Madame Clara Novello, being especially remarked by the audience, who stood up during the performance. Rossini's well-known Stabat Mater was then executed in a manner which we have not only never heard surpassed, but have never heard equalled. Every piece in this very popular composition, choral, solo, and concerted, was done perfectly. Mr. Sims Reeves was admirable in "Cujus animam," and the modest cadenza introduced at the end was highly appropriate; nothing could be better than Signor Belletti in the curious aria, "Pro peccatis;" Sig. Lablache sang "Eia mater, fons amoris," with magnificent solemnity; Miss Dolby's "Fac ut portem" charmed by its genuine and pure simplicity; and Madame Bosio gave the "Inflammatus et accensus" as well as it could possibly be given. The quartets, "Stabat mater dolorosa," and "Sancta Mater," by Mrs. Weiss, Miss Dolby, Signors Gardoni and Belletti, left nothing to be desired; and the last quartet, "Quand corpus morietur," by Madame Bosio, Miss Dolby, Signors Gardoni and Lablache, was equally good. The band and chorus were beyond reproach. The second part of the concert began with Meyerbeer's new setting of the 91st Psalm, "Qui in manu Dei requiescit" ("Who so dwelleth under the defence of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty," English version). This piece, one of the most remarkable compositions of the celebrated author of the Huguenots, is written in eight parts—two trebles, two altos, two tenors, and two basses—without any accompaniments.

The execution of the 91st Psalm by the Norwich choristers (solo parts by Mrs. Weiss, Miss Dolby, Messrs. Sims Reeves and Weiss) was on the whole, little short of marvellous. Mr. Benedict very judiciously allowed the organ to be introduced at intervals. This sustained the voices and prevented them from getting flat, which would have soon engendered inextricable confusion. The organ part was extremely well managed by Mr. Harcourt. The concert finished with a miscellaneous selection, beginning with Händel's overture to the "Occasional" oratorio, which was followed by Guglielmi's aria, "Gratias agimus tibi," sung by Madame Castellan, with Mr. Lazarus's clarionet obbligato. The overture was well played, and Mr. Nicholson's oboe solo in the minuet was perfect; Madame Castellan's vocalization was remarkably brilliant, and Mr. Lazarus displayed his usual beauty of tone and faultless execution on the clarionet. The beautiful soprano air from Spohr's Crucifixion—remarkable for the richness of its instrumentation and the effective manner in which the violin, horn, clarionet, bassoon, and harp are combined in obbligati passages—and the trio to which it is the prelude, sounded very agreeably after the "perruque" of Signor Guglielmi. The air was sung by Madame Novello; the trio by the same lady, with Mrs. Weiss and Miss Dolby. Signor Gardoni came next, with Stradella's "Se i miei sospiri," which, if there were violins in the accompaniment—the effect of the tenors, violoncellos, and basses being inconceivably dreary—would be always welcome. So good a melody deserves better treatment, and Signor Gardoni sings it irreproachably. Cherubini's "Oh, salubaris Hostia" is worthy of Mozart, and Miss Dolby, with whom it is an especial favourite, sang it exquisitely. The concert terminated with the superb air and chorus from Händel's Ode to St. Cecilia—"As from the power of mighty lays"—in which the glorious soprano voice of Madame Clara Novello was heard to much the same advantage as when, at the opening of the Crystal Palace at Sydenham, she sang the solo verse of "God save the Queen" with a power and brilliancy that cannot easily be forgotten. The chorus, "The dead shall live," which brings the Ode to a conclusion, is one of Händel's grandest, and most wonderfully elaborated. At the Cathedral not the least attraction was the choir, which performs the service in a manner that reflects high credit on Dr. Buck, the organist, and adds to the musical reputation of Norwich. On Sunday there was a very interesting selection, the chief point being Mendelssohn's "Te Deum" in A—the chants to the psalms and the "Jubilate" were by Dr. Buck himself, who, besides his skill and assiduity in training the choir, and producing the best effect from the fresh and sympathetic voices of the boys, is a composer of merit in the church style. The trio and semi-chorus, "Suffer little children to come unto me," from Mr. Henry Leslie's sacred oratorio, Immanuel, was also introduced with great propriety as an anthem. In the evening Dr. Nare's anthem. "The souls of the righteous," was performed, in honour of Dr. Stanley, late Bishop of Norwich, whose "memorial window" was opened on Sunday morning.

The first miscellaneous concert in the evening, notwithstanding its almost intolerable length, was really a splendid affair; and there was little to complain of, either in the selection which Mr. Benedict had provided, or in the general style of its performance.

The performance began with Händel's Acis and Galatea. The cast of the dramatis personæ was strong and efficient:—Galatea, Madame Clara Novello; Acis, Mr. Sims Reeves; Damon, Signor Gardoni; and Polyphemus, Signor Belletti. Mozart's additional accompaniments—in which the delicate taste, the reverence for Händel and the masterly skill of the great musician of Salzburg are so eminently conspicuous—were judiciously employed. With the exception of Damon's third song. "Consider, fond shepherd" (omitted), and some not very important curtailments in the recitatives, the whole of the "serenata" (as it is styled by the composer) was performed, and for the most part, it must be acknowledged, admirably. The airs "Hush! ye pretty warbling choir" and "As when the dove" were charmingly sung by Madame Clara Novello, and the exquisite song, "Heart, the seat of soft delight," was given by the same lady with a tenderness of expression that captivated the audience, who insisted, à vive voix, on having it again. Signor Gardoni, too, made a pleasant Damon; and the persuasive airs—"Stay, shepherd, stay!" and "Would you gain the tender creature"—were delivered with perfect taste and excellent articulation by the favourite Italian tenor.

The graphic recitative and love-song of the giant, "O ruddier than the cherry," was declaimed with prodigious spirit by Signor Belletti, and unanimously encored. Nevertheless, we do not agree with his reading. There is nothing comic in the declaration of Polyphemus, who is burning with uncontrollable passion, and expresses his feelings in a manner peculiar to his supposed individuality. Signor Belletti entertains a different view, to judge by the half jovial, half buffo style in which he renders the air. He sings it, moreover, so quick and "staccato" as to rob it in a great degree of its weight. The second song of Polyphemus, "Cease to beauty to be suing," was thoroughly understood, and irreproachably sung by Signor Belletti, whose facility of execution is unsurpassed by that of any bass or barytone. The most unexceptionable, and, so to say, the most Händelian singing was assuredly that of Mr. Sims Reeves, who not only exhibited surprising energy and vigour in the fine air where Acis sets the monster at defiance ("Love sounds the alarm"), but the utmost refinement of feeling and expression in the two beautiful songs, "Where shall I seek the charming fair?" and "Love in her eyes sits playing"—songs that in grace and sentiment have not been excelled by Mozart himself, who has been justly declared supreme in this kind of music. The choruses were executed with famous spirit and decision, and the picturesque introduction to the second part, "Wretched lovers," was sung with unfailing accuracy. Altogether a more satisfactory performance of Händel's most admirable secular composition has rarely been listened to. The grand overture in C to Beethoven's Leonora formed the orchestral prelude to the second part, and was played as well, under the intelligent direction of Mr. Benedict, as at either of the Philharmonic Societies of London. Then the sparkling scene from Auber's Concert à la Cour, "Entendez vous au loin," was sung by Madame Castellan so delightfully, and made so agreeable a contrast with all that had preceded it, that it was like experiencing a new sensation. Equally effective, brilliant, and skilfully vocalized was the cavatina, "Ernani! Ernani involami," by Madame Bosio, who stands high in the favour of the Norwich amateurs, and was enthusiastically applauded. Two duets, one from Linda, the other from Don Pasquale—the first sung by Madame Castellan and Mr. Sims Reeves, the last by Madame Bosio and Signor Lablache—were equally successful with the audience, who seemed resolved to be pleased with everything. Herr Reichardt, who came tolerably early in the programme, was deservedly praised for the graceful and unaffected manner in which he sang the romance with tenor obbligato (Raoul's first air) from the Huguenots. Mr. Hill's performance of the viola part was, as usual, first-rate. A very pleasing ballad, by Mr. Henry Leslie, "When tear-drops hang upon thine eye," was charmingly given by Miss Dolby; and the fine dramatic air from Mr. Benedict's opera of the Gipsy's Warning, "Rage, rage, thou angry storm," was capitally sung by Mr. Weiss. Besides these there were three concerted pieces, all excellent and all well performed, but, under the circumstances, all superfluous. These were the well-known quintet from Mozart's Così fan Tutti, the unaccompanied quartet for male voices from Rossini's Comte Ory (sung with perfect intonation by Signors Gardoni and Lablache, Herr Reichardt, and Mr. Weiss); and the splendid finale to the second act of Rossini's Mosè in Egitto, commencing with the morceau d'ensemble, "Mi Manca la voce." In the last, Madame Bosio was the first soprano, Signors Lablache and Belletti were the basses, Signors Gardoni and Herr Reichardt the tenors, and Mrs. Weiss the second soprano.

WEDNESDAY.—The performances began with Beethoven's first Mass (or "service," as it is styled in the programmes) in C, sung to English words—in obedience to what must be termed a very untenable prejudice, since St. Andrew's-hall is not a church, and a concert of music is not a religious ceremony. Some of the finest points in the musical expression were thus either damaged or altogether lost. In other respects the execution of Beethoven's fine work was admirable—quite as good, indeed, as that of the Stabat Mater. The principal singers in the mass were Madame Novello, Miss Dolby, Herr Reichardt, and Mr. Weiss, who showed themselves intimately versed in the music, and sang the various solos and quartets which are interspersed with, and relieve the choruses, as well as they need be sung. When the beautiful chorus, "Holy holy, holy, Lord God of Sabaoth," (the "Sanctus") commenced, the entire audience rose, and remained standing until the quartet, "He is blessed, O Lord" (the "Benedictus").

Of the Creation—which followed, and terminated the concert—it is necessary to say but little, since the principal singers, with two exceptions—Signors Gardoni and Belletti—were the same as at the Worcester Festival, and their performances, while quite as good on as that occasion, offered no new feature for comment. To Signor Gardoni were assigned the recitative and air of Uriel, "Now vanish before the holy beam," and the declamatory recitative, "In splendour bright" (Part 1); to Signor Belletti the bass part in the duets between Adam and Eve—"By thee, O bounteous Lord," and "Graceful consort," and the intervening recitatives (Part 3.) The other singers were Madame Castellan, Madame Clara Novello, Mr. Weiss, and Mr. Sims Reeves, as before. At the desire, we believe, of a great majority in the patrons' gallery, Lord Suffield made signals for the repetition of the airs, "With verdure clad," sung by Madame Novello, and "On mighty pens," sung by Madame Castellan, to the apparent gratification of the audience. The choruses were magnificent throughout; and "The Heavens are telling," during which the audience stood up, overpoweringly grand and impressive.

The miscellaneous concert, which took place in the evening, though the programme contained some good things, was by no means so interesting as the first. There were not only too many pieces, but too many of the same character; while the second part, which chiefly consisted of selections from the works of Spohr and Weber, came in the rear of such a quantity of more ephemeral matters, that it was impossible to pay the requisite attention—the ear being surfeited and the mind worn out. The concert began with a very fine performance of Beethoven's symphony in C minor, which was listened to with interest from first to last, and applauded heartily. There was only one other instrumental morceau in the whole of Part I.—a fantasia, on Scotch airs, for the violoncello, played with great spirit and mechanical facility by Mr. Hausmann (a great favourite at Norwich), and encored; by which the theory that solos for instruments afford a pleasant and necessary relief to these lengthy selections of vocal music was plainly illustrated. Another agreeable contrast was provided by Festa's delightful madrigal, "Down in a flow'ry vale," which was sung to perfection, but, strange to say, did not obtain a hand of applause. Among the vocal pieces were two quartets—one from Don Pasquale, sung to perfection by Madame Bosio, Signors Gardoni, Belletti, and Lablache, and encored; the other from Flotow's Martha, by Madame Novello, Miss Dolby, Signors Gardoni, and Mr. Weiss, which went just as ill as the other went well. Mr. Lindsay Sloper's clever fantasia for voice and piano, entitled, "The Lady and the Nightingale," was charmingly sung by Miss Dolby, who was accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Benedict. Two duets were introduced; the first, by Signor Cagnoni, even if sung more effectively than it was sung by Madame Novello and Mr. Sims Reeves—no easy task—would still remain what it intrinsically is—trash, without a redeeming point. The second, from La Cenerentola ("Il segreto"), a masterpiece in the buffo style, was given by Signor Belletti and Lablache with such "verve and entrain" as to elicit another encore, and a genuine one. Madame Bosio sang the florid aria from Matilda de Shabran, "Ami alfine," in her most brilliant and finished manner; and Mad. Castellan was equally happy in the cavatina from Lucrezia Borgia, "Quanto è bello." Both ladies, in high favour with the audience, were liberally and unanimously applauded. The remaining vocal morceaux in the first part were far superior, in a musical point of view, to the majority of those we have enumerated. These were the quaint and exquisite romance, "When the evening bells are chiming," from Mendelssohn's comic operetta, Heimkehr, sung with great taste by the German tenor, Herr Reichardt, who, though without pretension, is not the less an excellent artist; the vigorous song, "Ah quel plaisir d'être soldat," sung as well as ever by Signor Gardoni; the fine bravura air, "Sorgete," from Rossini's Maometto Secondo, in which the even and fluent vocalization of Signor Belletti could not fail to be admired and appreciated by connoisseurs; and last, not least, the splendid battle-song and Chorus from Purcell's King Arthur—"Come if you dare." Mr. Sims Reeves may justly be said to have made this fine piece his own, with such manly simplicity and straightforward English sentiment does he sing it. The selection from Weber and Spohr was made with Mr. Benedict's accustomed taste and musical appreciation, and would have pleased generally had it come first, instead of last, in the programme; but, as it turned out, the singers were tired and the audience almost weary.

The overture to Der Freischütz, played with great animation by the band, was the prelude to the vocal selection from Weber, which began with the well-known scena for soprano, followed by the not less admirable scena for tenor—both admirably executed, the first by Madame Novello, the last by Mr. Sims Reeves. The original tenor air from Oberon "Von Jugend auf" (for which, to oblige Mr. Braham, the composer substituted "Oh, 'tis a glorious sight"), though not one of Weber's best, is an interesting relic, and Herr Reichardt is entitled to praise for the very intelligent manner in which he sang it. The popular "Huntsman's Chorus," which we have heard given with more spirit and attention to light and shade, terminated the Weber selection. That from Spohr, though good, was less effective. To Mrs. Weiss was assigned a recitative and air from Der Alchymist—an opera little known, although it contains some of Spohr's finest music. No fault could be found with the lady's singing, which was tasteful and artistic; but the air is one of the dryest and least expressive of the master. The splendid and picturesque introduction to Jessonda, with the intermingled choruses of Priests and Bayaderes (solos by Mrs. Weiss, Miss Dolby, and Mr. Weiss), was much more attractive; and the execution in general left nothing to be desired. Equally acceptable was the characteristic war-song of Florestan ("Amid the battle raging") admirably sung by Signor Belletti. After the "selections" Miss Dolby gave two national songs, Irish and Scotch, accompanying herself on the pianoforte. The last, "Over the sea," was encored. The concert terminated with Meyerbeer's new march, entitled Marche aux Flambeaux, written for a popular and well-known German ceremony. Had the composer been present he would certainly have been astonished—perhaps offended. The march was scored by Meyerbeer for a military band; but, on the present occasion, stringed instruments were interpolated, and scarcely a bar of the author's own instrumentation was recognizable. It mattered not much, however, since, as it happened, the Marche aux Flambeaux—which enjoys an immense reputation in Paris—merely served as a voluntary to play the audience out.

THURSDAY.—Mendelssohn's Elijah was performed on Thursday morning in a style that has rarely been surpassed, and appreciated, by an audience of 1100 persons. On no occasion do we remember this sublime oratorio more worthily interpreted, or more thoroughly enjoyed. The principal singers—Mesdames Castellan, Novello, and Weiss, Misses Dolby and Chambers, Signors Gardoni and Belletti, Messrs. Smythson, Weiss, and Sims Reeves—without exception, did their duty well; and the members of the band and chorus were entitled to unqualified praise for their exertions. So alive were the audience to the beauties of the music, and to the singular merits of the execution, that no less than seven pieces were obliged to be repeated:—The tenor air, "If with all your hearts you truly love me" (Signor Gardoni); the grand chorus at the end of Part I., "Thanks be to God, he laveth the thirsty land;" the soprano air, "Hear ye, Israel" (Madame Clara Novello); the unaccompanied trio for female voices, "Lift thine eyes to the mountains" (Madame Novello, Mrs. Weiss, and Miss Dolby); the contralto air, "O! rest in the Lord" (Miss Dolby); the bass air, "For the mountains" (Signor Belletti); and the tenor air, "Then shall the righteous shine forth" (Mr. Sims Reeves). Such a result is without precedent. But there were points in the general performance quite as much open to hearty commendation as anything specially selected for compliment by the occupants of the patrons' gallery, and their representative, the Mayor of Norwich, who gave the signals for the encores. The charming duet with chorus, "Lord, bow thine ear to our prayer" (Mrs. Weiss and Miss Dolby), so difficult to give smoothly, was never more delicately sung by the principals, or better in tune by the chorus. Signor Belletti must be warmly praised for the very great improvement he displayed both in his reading and execution of the music of the Prophet; and Signor Gardoni for the chaste and artistic manner in which he executed that of Obadiah. Madame Castellan, in the duet of the Widow and the responses of the boy whom Elijah sends forth to see if there is rain, sang delightfully; and the fervid and truly devotional feeling with which Mr. Sims Reeves delivered the air, "Then shall the righteous," could not have been surpassed. All the choruses went admirably; and "Thanks be to God"—which equals the loftiest aspirations of Händel—with greater precision and more overwhelming effect than on any occasion we can call to mind. Of Madame Novello and Miss Dolby, nothing more need be said than that they sang as well as at the recent Worcester Festival; sing better they could not. The band was beyond reproach. In short, the entire performance, from the overture to the last chorus—was in the highest degree creditable to the conductor, Mr. Benedict, who never more eminently distinguished himself. In such extravagant measure did the bellringers deal out their peals throughout the week, that the quieter inhabitants of the city who had no interest in the Festival could get but little sleep; while, during the musical performances at St. Andrew's Hall, when any of the singers had to sing pianissimo, the sound of their voices was drowned in that of the chimes; and Mr. Benedict, the conductor, perplexed in his duties, was compelled to give instructions to "arrest" the bell-ringers.

(The conclusion of the Festival will be reported next week.)

ROBERT LE DIABLE.

Some years since a rich Dutchman commenced forming a library of a thousand volumes, consisting entirely of playbills published in all parts of the world. He spared no expense, no trouble, to complete this collection of singular statistics. Through correspondents in the principal towns in Europe, he obtained all the yellow, red, and blue placards which are to be seen daily on the walls of theatres. Having made his selection he classified those he had chosen, and had them bound. In this singular library are to be found the débuts, the benefits, the names of all the actors, the expedients of managers driven to extremities, the varied history, the stirring life of the dramatic crowd, who, rushing from theatre to theatre—applauded in some, condemned in others—changing from one rôle to another, sometimes covered with diamonds, sometimes with tinsel—occasionally rising to the top of the profession by their talents or good luck, and afterwards falling from the first parts to mere supers—playing the lovers in company with five or six successive generations, or ending their career by disappearing to retire—the more fortunate to their ease, the more unfortunate to the hospital; this bustling history of a world quite separate from ours—a world which lives every night before the foot-lights—is written in these bills, in every description of letter used by printers, and tells—how truly—the increase or diminution of the actor's reputation, marked by the size or form of the type in which his name appears.

The drama has also its history and its patent of nobility in these archives. From this pile of advertisements, collected with so much labour, it appeared that the operas which were most frequently represented within a quarter of a century, up to the year 1840, were Der Freischütz, Tancredi, and Robert le Diable. We shall not attempt to base any theory upon this singular similarity of success. It would be difficult, for instance, to tell why the public has always given so decided a preference to Tancredi, above all Rossini's chefs d'œuvres, unless we can attribute it to the well-known air, "Di tanti palpiti," which has been sung by the whole world, and has been even heard by travellers in most remote regions of South America. Whatever the cause, the universal success of Robert le Diable is easily understood. The music comprises specimens of every style; and each auditor may generally select from this opera some favourite air for his particular keeping. The story is considered philosophical in France, poetical in Germany, picturesque in Italy, interesting everywhere. All nations and people of every age, are pleased with tales of wonder, and delight in fables. The Devil, who has a son whom with paternal kindness he wishes to bring into the infernal regions, has always been considered a most natural character by everyone. Add to this the great variety of the situations, the novelty of some of the passions put in movement, the diversity and the splendor of the scenery and dresses, the nature of the dances, graceful and serious at the same time, the supernatural apparitions, and above all the admirable music, so perfect, that fresh beauties develope themselves upon each repetition of it; and we cannot feel surprised that the world has made this work known, and that it must continue to enchant the eyes and ears of all audiences.

Robert, in the first eight years of its production, was performed in one thousand eight hundred and forty-three (1843) European theatres. It was first produced in November, 1831, and it is not easy to imagine the influence its immense success has had upon art and artists. What successive generations of tenori, of prime donne, have essayed the parts of Robert, of Alice, and of Isabelle! How many instrumental performers have learned, executed, varied, and arranged this music! Singers do not last long, particularly tenors; they disappear after a short career, and are heard of no more. At the opera in Paris, a few years makes a striking change; they produce three or four Roberts, and five or six Alices, who pass away as quickly; without speaking of the other characters. We could well fill a library, although, perhaps, not usefully, with the pieces arranged by a thousand composers from the airs of this opera; and in 1834, in Paris—will it be believed—a grand Mass was selected from its inexhaustible stores. Everywhere, at the theatre, in the tavern, at military parade, in the churches, at concerts, in the cottage, and in the palace, was and is to be heard the music of Robert. Goethe pretty nearly predicted its success—he pointed at Meyerbeer as the only composer, in his opinion, who could understand Mephistopheles, and bring him upon the stage. But Goethe entertained a patriotic antipathy to Italian music, and would not have considered even Robert as sufficiently orthodox. Nevertheless, Germany seized upon it as being essentially German, and within two or three years it was played in all the German States. At Vienna, however, the censure forbade the representation of the work, German religionists being too strict to permit the production of devils and saints, of monks and the church, the cross and the gates of hell, upon the stage. However, the music was spoken of so enthusiastically, that permission was obtained to produce it, suppressing the scenes of the cross and the nuns in the third act, and the church scene in the fifth act; thus changing the plot, and giving to the opera the name of Robert de Normandie. Fortunately it was produced in a less mutilated condition, at two of the Vienna theatres, and as usual was most successful.

In London it has been played at four theatres at the same time. Six months after its representation in Paris, during the ravages of the cholera, Nourrit, Levasseur, and Madame Cinti Damoreau were preparing to bring it out in London. Meanwhile, an attempt had been made to produce it in English, but this was difficult, as the music had not been published. Bishop went to Paris, obtained some isolated portions of it, attended every representation, remembered all he could, invented the remainder, and arranged it à la Bishop. He took merely the outlines, like a traveller making a hasty sketch of a picturesque site while rolling along au grand galop.

Notwithstanding its many deficiencies, Robert thus arranged, met with great success, though we can imagine how much it lost in crossing the channel, when it was necessary to play two other pieces to fill up the evenings of its performance.

In Italy also, Robert was rejected by the censure at the moment when Milan, Florence, and Trieste were preparing translations of it. But in a few years afterwards the Marchese Martellini obtained permission to produce it at Florence, and Nourrit was engaged to sing his usual part. A few days before his death, his mind was full of his first appearance as Robert in Italy; and in his last letters he spoke warmly and feelingly of the great success he anticipated. In 1840-1, Robert was at length given at Florence on the stage of the Pergola, and played to crowded houses four or five nights a week, for the greater part of the Carnival, and drew to la bella città crowds of fanatici from all parts of Italy.

We need not trace the history any further, the sequel is too well known.

Save us from our Friends.—A concert given not long ago, at Shrewsbury, by Mr. Hay, a resident professor, not having been, it would appear, successful, a critic in a local paper, who is friendly to Mr. Hay, thus indignantly apostrophises the public:—

"The proud Salopians must be very poor, or very shabby, to hold back under these circumstances, or there is an absence of all spirit in Shropshire, except where eating and drinking are concerned. The mind appears to be quite a secondary consideration, and the belly the all-absorbing object of the affections. These are plain words, but not one whit the less true. Were we Mr. Hay, we would see the town of Shrewsbury, and the county, d—— before we would toil, and sustain loss, for such an illiberal-minded set."

Concord and Discord.—"A man unskilled in music," says Dr. Beattie, "might imagine that the most agreeable harmonies must be made up of the sweetest concords, without any mixture of discord; and, in like manner, a child might fancy that a feast of sweetmeats would prove the most delicious banquet. But both would be mistaken. The same concord may be more or less pleasing, according to its position; and the sweeter concords often produce their best effect, when they are introduced by the harsher ones or even by discords; for then they are most agreeable because they give the greatest relief to the ear; even as health is doubly delightful after sickness, liberty after confinement, and a sweet taste when preceded by a bitter. Dissonance, therefore, is necessary to the perfection of harmony. But consonance predominates; and to such a degree, that, except on rare occasions, and by a nice ear, the discord in itself is hardly perceptible."

A Hint to Young Professors.—"I have rarely seen that a man who conscientiously devoted himself to the studies and duties of any profession, and did not omit to take fair and honourable opportunities of offering himself to notice when such presented themselves, has not at length got forward. The mischance of those who fall behind, though flung upon fortune, more frequently arises from want of skill and perseverance. Life, my young friend, is like a game of cards—our hands are alternately good or bad, and the whole seems at first glance to depend on mere chance. But it is not so; for, in the long run, the skill of the player predominates over the casualties of the game. Then do not be discouraged with the prospect before you, but ply your studies hard, and qualify yourself to receive fortune when she comes your way."—Sir Walter Scott.

Brussels.—The Theatre of the Monnaie opened its doors to the public on the 31st of August, with M. Halévy's Juive.

DIED.

On the 11th instant, at her residence, Richmond Lodge, Putney, after a short illness, Fanny Elizabeth Fitzwilliam, of the Haymarket Theatre, aged 52.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, September 16th, 1854.

In our first article on the Livepool Organ, we pointed out the sparing amount of novelty—apparent, at least, from the list of stops—which the Liverpool scheme displays in the matter of tone. The table of its contents speaks for itself. The Great Organ is certainly poor, considering the general magnitude of the instrument. The Pedal Organ is undoubtedly large; if anything, disproportionately so, in comparison with the great organ. The Solo Organ contains a great many stops; but unless there is some secret peculiarly about the voicing of them to which the printed description affords no clue, this part of the instrument is open to the same objection we alleged against the fourth manual of the Panopticon Organ, namely, that with the exception of one or two stops, it is little else than a repetition of solo qualities to be found on the other manuals, and, to this extent, a needless expense and complication. The swell is certainly magnificent as to quantity, and, if the voicing be, as the description states, "such as, perhaps, has never been equalled," must yield a fine effect. But this effect will be due rather to the mass of material employed, than to any novelty or decided purpose exercised in its selection. The Choir Organ, on the other hand, is weak, and altogether unworthy the calibre of the rest of the instrument. In fact, that which most strikes us in looking over this "table of contents," is the plain, everyday, almost old-fashioned cut about the whole of it. Even the list of couplers, or "mechanical connections," affords no exception to this remark. It contains nothing that has not been known and practised in this country for twenty years at least. Indeed, all those novelties in this department which the French long since, and our own makers in late years, have given us, and from which such charming and surprising effects are derivable, seem to have been carefully eschewed in this instance. Whether their existence had escaped the designer's contemplation, or whether they were deemed trifles unworthy the dignity of St. George's Hall, we know not; but certainly they are not there, and, as certainly, they ought to have been. To sum up this part of the subject, the Liverpool Organ is, undoubtedly, a very large, and, as far as numbers of pipes can so constitute it, a grand instrument. But when we are told that it is the most complete and perfect organ in the world, we can only reply that such a statement is contradicted by the description furnished by the constructors themselves. When it is impressed on us that "the powers of tone and the variety of effects will far exceed those of every instrument yet built," we can only patiently but doubtingly await the result; for, verily, if these all-exceeding "powers of tone" and "variety of effects" do exist, they have to be developed from sources altogether extra to, and unmentioned by, the programme now lying before us.

We have a few words yet to say—they will be few, for the task is not agreeable—about the description given of the mechanism of this instrument. Seriously, we never remember to have seen in print any greater amount of puff, brag, and assumption. Mr. Willis would evidently have the public believe that, if he has not a patent-right for the world in the use of the pneumatic lever, he is, at least, the possessor of some extraordinary secrets in its manufacture and application, which were born, and must die, with him. By his own account, he is a species of Deus ex machinâ descending among the extremely unscientific population of this island to unfold all the mysteries of this—according to our notion—very well understood piece of mechanism. We need not suggest to our readers, who know what has been done here and elsewhere, that this is the sheerest and most impertinent piece of pretence. What, for instance, can exceed the audacious quackery of the assertion that "means are in this instrument employed, for the first time, by which all the great, and, as it was thought, insurmountable obstacles to the building of an immense organ are entirely overcome"? Why! Heaven help the man! what can he have been thinking about? Has he forgotten, or does he think every one else has, the existence of the organ at St. Denis? Unless we greatly misplace dates, this organ of Cavaillé's—who then first adopted Mr. Barker's invention—magnificent alike in tone and workmanship, must have been finished almost before Mr. Willis had completed the term of his apprenticeship. Besides all this, does not the memory of the Exhibition of 1852, suggest any comparisons to Mr. Willis? It certainly does to us. We well remember Ducroquet's organ there, the beautiful, artist-like character of its workmanship, and the admirable construction and faultless performance of its pneumatic apparatus. We also remember Mr. Willis's organ there; and, with it, we remember his version of the pneumatic lever. Unless our memory be treacherous, its principle was more strange than mechanically correct, its workmanship, as compared, at least, with its French neighbour, did not excel that of a highly respectable carpenter, and most of all, it was remarkable for the singular, and, indeed, ridiculous defect, that it was in no way applied to the couplers! The fact is, that all the difficulties in the way of constructing an organ at once immense and manageable, vanished with the first appearance of Mr. Barker's invention of the pneumatic lever. The great principle was then, "for the first time," developed. Everything since has been mere variety of application. In like manner, James Watt's discovery of the principle of separate condensation may be said to have "invented" the Steam Engine, once and for ever. Every advance since his time has been simply in greater refinement of workmanship, and more enlarged fields of application. But even, limiting the question to application, will Mr. Willis pretend, or rather will his Liverpool work substantiate, that, with all his vaunted appropriations of the pneumatic apparatus, he has made any better or more novel use of it than is found in Mr. Hill's Panopticon Organ? Above all, will his use of it be distinguished by as much mechanical correctness of design, and excellence of workmanship in construction, as are found in Mr. Hill's grand instrument?

The spirit of puff and pretence of which we complain runs throughout the account of the Liverpool mechanism; and with it, by the way, an affectation of acquaintance with engineering technics often more dashing than correct. Witness the "exhausting valve to the pneumatic lever, which would, by engineers, be called an opposition surface valve"—(though we are compelled to inform Mr. Willis that "engineers" have no such term in their vocabulary;—they would call such a valve an "equilibrium valve")—and the "throttle valve:" neither of which contrivances, wonderful and "patent" though they both be, has been found at all needful to the accurate and noiseless performance of the pneumatic apparatus in the best French and English examples we have seen. Witness also the "mechanical contrivance so unique," &c.,—the "No. 6 (not patent)," which, after all, if we understand the description, appears to be nothing more wonderful than a system of octave couplers between the pedals and the manuals,—a thing that has been done in many instances before, but is now, we believe, discountenanced by all persons of taste and judgement.

We cannot further pursue this vein of remark. It has been forced on us, most unwillingly, by a display of bold and unscrupulous assumption as unbecoming as it is unnecessary. Mr. Willis is undoubtedly a clever man, or he could not have done what he has; moreover, his substitution for composition pedals, which, by the way, he so infelicitously describes by help of the "six handsome gold gilt knobs," is original, ingenious, and very convenient and effective. But Mr. Willis is also a very young man, and not yet entitled—whatever he may think to the contrary—to rank with the great organ builders of the world. His preferable course would have been to have finished his Liverpool work with as little parade as possible, and then stood on its merits. In place of this, however, he has chosen, by way of prologue to the ordeal he must undergo, to claim a species of mechanical supremacy not altogether warranted by his antecedents. When the Liverpool organ is finished, we will talk further about it.

DRAMATIC.

Drury Lane Theatre re-opened its portals to the admirers of the English lyric drama on Monday evening last, but the company did not prove strong enough to attract the apathetic citizens remaining in London, and on Friday the theatre was closed without notice. Wallace's Maritana was performed on the four nights the theatre was open, and although indifferently given, it pleased much. Madame Rudersdoff, Mr. Eliot Galer, and Mr. Corri, were the principals of this English operatic company, which first appeared on Monday, and was last heard of on Thursday night.

Drury Lane Theatre is to be re-opened on the 2nd of October, when Mr. G. V. Brooke will re-appear before a London audience. His performances are to be limited to seven nights.

Musical Men of War.—Since the commencement of the present war, the bands of music on board the Royal Navy have greatly improved in numbers and strength. The larger vessels can now boast of brass bands almost as efficient as those supported in the military service. Instead of being an expensive and almost useless appendage to a ship, the band now performs an important duty, by contributing to the intellectual amusement of the officers and the cheerfulness of the men during long periods of repose, consequent on the ravages of cholera, or the tediousness of inaction. The Royal Albert is to muster twenty-seven excellent performers, who are to be supplied with the best concert instruments from Messrs. Boosey and Sons' manufactory.

Signor Carlo Minasi, the gentleman who a few months ago composed "Delightful Polkas" and "Delightful Waltzes," and has since patented improvements in Concertinas, has now again addressed the public in the extraordinary capacity of egg-hatcher.

PROVINCIAL.

The musical life which has abandoned London for a time, has sprung up in all parts of the provinces: festivals, operas, concerts, and theatres are spreading over the face of the land, and, from the accounts we have received, with every prospect of a good harvest. We copy the following from a Dublin jounral of the 12th September:—

"The first of a series of Italian operas was performed last night in the Theatre Royal. The favourite opera of Norma was selected for the introduction of Madlle. Cruvelli to a Dublin audience. The other artistes consisted of Madlle. Marai, Signor Tamberlik, Signor Tagliafico, Madlle. Albini, and Signor Santi. All parts of the house were crowded. The brilliant manner in which the theatre was lighted, and the costly and effective mode in which the scenery, costumes, and decorations conduced to the general effect, reflected credit upon Mr. A. Harris, to whom the mise-en-scène was entrusted. Mr. A. Mellon conducted the opera. The leadership of the orchestra and chorus devolved on Mr. Levey. Madlle. Cruvelli is full of genius, attractive in face and figure, accomplished, and possessing a voice with an extensive range, deep and strong in its lower, sweet and thrilling in its higher notes. Signor Tamberlik has a strong tenor voice, of much compass. The seconda donna, Madlle. Marai, possesses a sweet, well-cultivated voice. Signor Tagliafico has a fine bass voice. The orchestral and choral departments were satisfactory. The audience encored several pieces in the course of the opera. La Somnambula will be performed this evening."

Oxford.—We learn from the Oxford University Herald that the mayor of Oxford gave a musical réunion in the Town-hall, on Tuesday, the 29th ult. The vocalists were, the Misses M'Alpine (who gave great satisfaction in a number of Scotch ballads and English duets), and Messrs. Mathew and Roberts, both Oxford gentlemen. The Oxford Choral Society, and two able professors on the cornet and concertina, assisted in rendering the concert attractive. A duet by the Misses McAlpine, entitled "The Rhine Maidens," excited great admiration, and was vehemently encored.

Ramsgate.—(From a Correspondent).—A series of four evening concerts were given in the Music Hall last week by Mr. F. Wüstemann, all of which were fashionably, if not fully, attended. Mr. Wüstemann, who is a flautist of great ability, was assisted by Miss Lascelles as vocalist, Master H. Werner as pianist, and Herr Oberthür as harpist. The programmes were judiciously selected, and comprised the names of Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Spohr, Chopin, Moscheles, Doehler, Oberthür, Bochsa, Tulou, Richardson, &c., &c. The most successful pieces were Oberthür's popular fantaisie on Lucrezia Borgia, for harp and piano, played with great effect by the composer and Master Werner, two elegant harp solos by the same author ("La Grâce" and "La Cascade") and his effective fantasia on the "Standard Bearer," which was much admired. Master Werner, who, by the bye, is greatly improved, played a fantasia by Doehler, and Moscheles' "Recollections of Ireland," with great brilliancy; and his extemporary performances, on subjects given him at the time by Lady Clarke Travers ("Annie Laurie," "Auld Robin Gray," &c.), elicited much applause. Miss Lascelles was greatly applauded and encored in "Come off the moors," by Glover, as well as in Mrs. Groom's pretty ballad "Over the sea." Mr. Wüstemann's performances were also deservedly applauded, his execution of Richardson's "There's nae luck" was excellent, and he deserves the thanks of the Ramsgate visitors for the amusement his concerts have afforded them.

Brighton.—(From a Correspondent).—Mr. and Mrs. Bond's Musical Festival took place at the Town Hall on the 1st inst., and was honoured with a large attendance of fashionable company. It consisted of a selection from Handel's Judas Maccabæus, and the whole of Rossini's Stabat Mater. The execution of these works were entrusted to a very excellent band and chorus (composed of Brighton and London professors), and the following singers: Mrs. Bond (soprano), Miss M. Wells (contralto), Mr. G. Perren (tenor), Mr. J. Marshall (bass). Mr. Bond presided as conductor, and the first violin was taken by Mr. Henry Blagrove. The selection from Judas Maccabæus gave great satisfaction. Mrs. Bond especially gained much applause by her expressive singing of "Pious orgies," and her brilliant rendering of "From mighty kings." Miss Wells' voice appeared to advantage in the recitative to "See the conquering hero comes," which was encored. Messrs. Perren and Marshall likewise acquitted themselves admirably. The performance of the Stabat was very excellent, and reflected great credit on the chorus and all concerned. There were several encores, and much applause throughout the evening. Considerable praise is due to Mr. Bond for his successful attempts at entertaining the Brighton public with intellectual musical performances.

From our own Brighton Correspondent we learn that a concert, entitled a "First Musical Recreation," was given at the Music Room, Royal Pavilion, on Wednesday morning. The programme was brief and good, and not divided into parts. The performers were Misses E. and R. Niebour (concértinist and pianist), and Madame de Melza (vocalist). Miss E. Niebour is a capital concertina player, as our correspondent assures us, and Miss R. Niebour a good steady pianist. Both concertinist and pianist were heard to decided advantage in Messrs. Osborne and De Beriot's Grand Duo Brilliant, for concertina and pianoforte, on airs from Il Pirata. By the way, has not our correspondent made a mistake? Surely, unless we are mistaken, the Duo of Messrs. Osborne and De Beriot was written for violin and pianoforte. But this, by the way. Our correspondent goes on to inform us that Madame de Melza sang Donizetti's Cavatina, "Se non ti posso offrir," and with unmistakeable effect. The lady possesses a mezzo-soprano voice of "beautiful quality"—our correspondent's very words—and sings like an artist. Madame de Melza also sang "Oh, would I were yon silver moonbeam," by M. E. Silas, and joined Miss R. Niebour in Gabussi's duet "Se, O Cara, sorridi." Miss R. Niebour played Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata with good feeling and nice execution, and was much applauded. She also performed Schulhoff's "Carnival de Vénise." "An elegant audience," concludes our correspondent, "filled the music room."

We learn from the Cheltenham Chronicle, of the 12th instant, that the Lyceum Company commenced a short season last night at the Royal Old Wells. The performers, twenty in number, embrace the talents of Mr. and Mrs. Matthews, Mr. Roxby, &c. The evening's entertainments consisted of The Lawyers, the musical piece of The Welsh Girl, and a farce Who Speaks First The house was well filled.

A Grand Concert will be given at Cheltenham in October, under the direction of Mr. Simms. The artistes engaged are, Mad. Clara Novello, Mrs. Endersson, Mrs. Lockey, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Lockey, Mr. H. Phillips, and Mr. Hobbs.

The Clifton Chronicle informs us, that the theatrical campaign will begin on Monday next. A performance was given last Monday in aid of the funds of the Bristol Infirmary, when the theatre was crowded to the ceiling. The pieces performed were Colman's comedy of The Poor Gentleman, and the farce of Bamboozling.

The Manchester Examiner and Times of the 13th Sept. states that Mr. C. Mathews has been playing to indifferent houses; he will retire on Saturday next, when the theatre will be closed for the purposes of repair. The opera company will commence operations on the second of October. The subscription list is rapidly filling.

The fifth season of the Leeds Madrigal and Motet Society was inaugurated on the 6th inst. The subscriptions are on the increase, and the report of the vice-president proved that the society is in a most satisfactory state. We see that Mr. G. V. Brooke is starring it at the Queen's Royal Theatre, Dublin. He has been playing Othello to excellent houses; Miss Cathcart is the Desdemona, and Mr. Rayner the Iago.

The Liverpool Standard states that the preparations for the inauguration of St. George's Hall are being pushed forward with steadiness and celerity. At the south end, the ponderous gates enclosing the entrance to the portico have been put up, the wooden paling on the south side has been removed, and the area on the east side has been almost cleared. The outward casing of the organ is almost finished, and the temporary orchestra is completed. The statue of George Stephenson, by Gibson, has been placed in its niche, accompanied by one of Sir Robert Peel, by Noble. The bronze gates leading from the hall to the different subsidiary divisions of the building have been put up, and all the fittings are nearly completed. It is not expected that the Concert Hall will be finished by the day of the inauguration.

Atherstone.—The Birmingham Festival Choral Society announce Elijah for the 21st instant. The principal vocalists engaged are Mrs. Sunderland, Mrs. Paget, R.A.M., Mr. Perring (of Manchester), and Mr. Thomas. Organist, Mr. Stimpson; conductor, Mr. Surman of London.

Mr. William Cooke's, of Astley's, and Hernandez, Stone, and Newsome's American troupe have been giving equestrian performances in Bristol.

The Leeds Mercury of the 2nd inst., gives an account of a new organ erected at Highfield Chapel, Huddersfield.

"The organ has been built by Mr. Joseph W. Walker, of London (the builder of the Exeter-hall organ). The plan of the instrument was laid out by Mr. Dean, of Huddersfield, organist at this chapel. It has three entire rows of keys, extending from C C to G in alto, and contains in the great organ 14 stops and 952 pipes, viz, double open diapason, open diapason large, open diapason small, stopped diapason, quint, principle, flute, twelfth, picolo, fifteenth, sesquialtra, three ranks, mixture two ranks, trumpet, and clarion. In the swell 11 stops and 718 pipes, viz: double diapason, open diapason, keraulophon, stopped diapason, flute, principal, fifteenth, sesquialtra three ranks, horn, oboe, and clarion. In the choir, six stops and 256 pipes, viz: dulciana, viol-de-gamba, stopped diapason bass, stopped diapason treble, flute and cremona. In the pedal, three stops and 87 pipes, viz: open diapason, bourdon and octave, space being left for trombone. There are nine couplers. One of the couplers of the swell to the great organ is called the super-octave, and has the effect of bringing down the octave above the air, in addition to the other notes played by the right hand. Another coupler of the swell to the great organ, called the sub-octave, brings out the octave below the lowest note played. These arrangements were planned by Mr. Dean. The coupler to the pedals is also a super-octave. The double open diapason of the great organ is of metal throughout, and all the stops of the swell go through, and not to tenor C only. The entire cost of the organ and alterations will be under £1,100, of which £704 15*s.* 4*d.* has been already collected."

Leeds.—(From a Correspondent).—On Wednesday evening, Sept. 13, a concert was given in the Music Hall as a compliment to J. L. Hatton, Esq., the popular composer, of London, by the members of the Madrigal and Motett Society. There was a very excellent selection of music, comprising the chorus, "Hear, holy saint" (prayer from Masaniello), which was very effectively performed by the full choir. Miss Barwick was warmly applauded in that ever pleasing ballad by Duggan, "Yes, 'tis a spell." Mr. Hatton was very successful in the descriptive scena, "The wreck of the Hesperus." He rivetted the undivided attention of the audience by the varied and chaste style in which he performed the whole sixteen verses of this touching ballad. The whole choir gave a beautiful interpretation of Mr. Hatton's part song, "Sweetly blows the western wind." Mrs. Sunderland was deservedly encored in a very classical song, composed by Hatton, under the title of "Absence." Messrs. Hatton and Spark performed a very difficult duet upon the pianoforte in most admirable style. Mrs. Sunderland gave "Evening Thoughts," by Linley, in a very correct and pleasing manner. Mr. Hatton amused the audience very much by singing a new song, composed by himself, under the title of "Tom the Tinker." As a sample of English composition, few things could have been selected as a better specimen than Bishop's solo and chorus, "The Halt of the Caravan," which was very effectively given by the whole choir. The second part was introduced with the fine classical chorus by Mozart, "Calm is the glassy ocean," which we hope to hear performed again and again at our Leeds concerts. Mr. Hatton sang, by request, "Day and night," a charming song of his own. Miss Barwick was very earnest in "Bonnie Dundee." She was loudly applauded, and in reply to an encore, gave "Why do I weep," in a style which gratified all present. Mr. Pew was very much applauded for the able manner in which he performed a concerto by Mendelssohn, accompanied by Mr. Hatton on the pianoforte. He is a youth of whom the Leeds public may some day be proud. Mr. Hatton conducted his "Summer Eve" and "Tantara," in a very masterly way. The whole concluded with song and chorus, "Haste thee, Nymph," by Händel, which was the least effectively performed piece of the evening. The concert was, on the whole, a very excellent one, the audience being large and of the most respectable character. There is every prospect of the ensuing musical season in Leeds being more attractive and prosperous than any that have preceded it.

FOREIGN.

PARIS.—Madame Stoltz has played three times at the Théâtre Impérial de l'Opéra in the part of Leonora, in La Favorite. Her reception was good, and she was frequently applauded during the progress of the piece. Madame Stoltz seems to have softened down the asperities of her upper notes, which were formerly shrill and piercing, but which are now much more pleasing; the medium is also said to be considerably improved. She was ably supported by M. Gueymard and M. Bonnehé. M. Roger has also re-appeared in Le Prophète with considerable success. The part of Fides was played by Mdlle. Saunier, a pupil of the Conservatoire. She seems to have made a favourable impression. On Friday se'nnight Madame Cerito appeared in M. Théophile Gautier's ballet of Gemma. On Monday, Madame Stoltz, Messrs. Roger and Bonnehé, will sing in La Reine de Chypre. The differences which had arisen between the Opéra-Comique and the Théâtre-Lyrique have at length been removed, and it is most positively decided that M. Perrin will be the lessee of both houses. The Society of Authors and M. Perrin have come to terms on all the disputed points, and the greatest harmony now prevails between all the parties concerned. The Théâtre-Lyrique will re-open its doors to the public on the 1st of October.—At the Opéra-Comique a new piece by M. Victor Massé, entitled Miss Fauvette, is in rehearsal, and will shortly be produced; the principal part will be sung by Madame Carvalho-Miolan.—The following is a list of the troupe of the Italian Opera in Paris:—Tenors, Messrs. Baucardé, Bettini, Neri-Baraldi, F. Rossi and Bady; basses and baritones, Messrs. Gassier, Graziani, Ardavani, N. Rossi, Dell'Aste, Florenza, and Guesne; soprani, Mesdames Frezzolini, Bosio, Gassier, Ardavani, Weith, and Judith Ellena; contralti, Mesdames Borghi-Mamo and Ernesta Grisi; director of the music, Signor Alary; conductor, Signor Bonetti. The rehearsals have already begun, and the season will commence by Semiramide, with Mad. Bosio and Mad. Borghi-Mamo. The first novelty will be Mercadante's Leonora, the choruses of which are already in rehearsal. The principal parts will be filled by Mesdames Frezzolini and Ardavani, and Messrs. Rossi, Gassier, Bettini, and Neri-Baraldi. An opera-buffa by Signor Cagnoni, entitled Don Bucefalo, will be brought out as soon as possible, and the lessee, M. Ragani, further promises, if possible, to produce Verdi's Rigoletto and Il Trovatore.—Mdlle. Rachel made her first appearance for this season at the Théâtre-Français, in the part of Marie Stuart, on the 9th inst.—The Odéon will re-open in a few days with a new piece by M. Tiperant, Le Vicaire de Wakefield.—Several new pieces are now in rehearsal at the Vaudeville, Le Cabaret du Pontcassé, in three acts; Un Essai de Mariage, in one act, and Allez vous-en, gens de la noce, also in one act. Mdlle. Théric, of the Comédie-Française, has been engaged at this house.—At the Variétés, Messrs. Lucas and Jautard have produced a new piece entitled, La Fille Mousquetaire, which was received favourably.—At the Ambigu-Comique, a new national piéce is in preparation, entitled La Prise de Bomarsund.—The receipts of the month for the theatres, balls, concerts, and other public establishments of Paris, amount to rather more than twenty-one thousand pounds.—Madame Cabel has been singing at Boulogne during the visit of Prince Albert to the camp of St. Omer.—Madame Tedesco and Messrs. Ronconi, Lablache, and Bassini, have started for St. Petersburg.

ITALY.—The autumnal season of the Pergola commenced at Florence on the 27th of August with Il Barbiere, and Madame Borghi in the part of Rosina. The Gazzetta Musicale is very enthusiastic in its praise of the lady, and seems to consider her as one of the few remaining artistes who are equal to the interpretation of Rossini's master-pieces. At the same time the other singers are coldly dismissed with a few words of encouragement, and a broad hint to the effect that if they had studied more they would probably sing better. The tenor, Stecchi Bottardi, has neither a powerful nor a pleasing voice, although he is not wanting in execution. The Figaro, played by Signor Mastriani, was lamentably deficient. The choruses were all abroad from beginning to end.—At Turin, the opera of Signor Cagnoni, Amore e Trappole, continues to please, and draws crowded houses. The artistes, Madame Lipparini, and Signors Errani, Bonafos and Frizzi are nightly applauded both in their solos and in their concerted pieces. The overture is always encored. The other pieces most relished are the prima donna's cavatina, the sestett finale of the first act, the duet between Mad. Lipparini and Sig. Errani in the second act, the trio of bass voices, the duet of the third act between Signori Bonafos and Frizzi.—The Theatre dei Floridi at Leghorn has been closed on account of the cholera.—The new opera, by the Chevalier Capecelatro, to be produced shortly at the Pergola at Florence, is entitled Gastone di Chauley.—At Ceneda Donizetti's Poliuto has inaugurated the season with great success. —At Viterbo Il Trovatore has been much applauded.—The Neapolitan papers are silent on musical matters, all the principal theatres being closed on account of the ravages of the cholera. One of its most lamented victims is Count Pepino, a distinguished composer of theatrical and chamber music.—The Milanese papers announce the arrival, in New York, of Mad. Marietta Bedei, and Signori Carlo Scola, Cuturi and Lanzoni, engaged for California and Peru. They cannot, however, proceed for some time to California, on account of the cholera, but will play for a month at Boston, and thence return to New York to open the new theatre. The Gazetta Musicale of Milan, of the 10th, states that the Theatre Canobbiana will commence operations on the 12th of the present month. The programme, which is already published, promises five operas, La Saracena, by Sig. Butera, Fiorina, by Sig. Pedrotti, Il Pirata, by Bellini; the fourth is a new opera by Sig. Torriani, the fifth is not yet decided. Mad. Capuani, and Signori Armandi, and Della Santa, will sing in La Saracena, which will be the first brought out. The same journal also mentions that Leopold de Meyer is at present at Milan, en route for Florence; he had been rusticating on the Lago di Como.

ITALY.—(From another Correspondent.)—The Italian papers are more filled with deaths than with any new productions of interest. The cholera at Naples now seems, however, to have done its worst, and the theatres that have re-opened betray a most beggarly account of empty benches. We find that a new opera by Signor Antonio Gandolphi, of Catania, entitled Il Sultano, has been played at the San Carlo with a certain amount of success. The principal parts were filled by Mesdames De Roissi and Carrozzi, and Signori Pancani and Pacini. The company of the Theatre of Messina, for the Carnival, is composed of Mesdames Conti and Chini, and Signori Vecchi, Giannini, Carbonell and Raffaelli.—At Lucca, Verdi's Il Trovatore has been played with great success. The opera seems to be well got up as regard the scenery and appointments, and the singing of Madame Albertini and of Signori Ottaviani and Latry is worthy of all praise.—At Turin, the new opera by Sig. Cagnoni, Amori e Trappole, is played every night with increasing success. We are sometimes highly amused at the style of criticism of some of our Italian contemporaries, of which a bright sample is now before our eyes. It would seem that, at Udine, I Puritani has been played but indifferently well, and among other remarks about the opera, the correspondent of the Italian musical paper in question very sagely remarks that the part of the baritone is very low, and was written for Signor Tamburini, then in decadenza. The critic most certainly never heard Signor Tamburini at the period he mentions. If he was not then in his prime we certainly know nothing about the matter, for it must be remembered that twenty years have now passed away, and at the time we are now writing, Signor Tamburini is superior to any one we have ever seen in that particular part.—At Trieste, the new opera Marinella, by Signor Sinico, has been successful. The libretto by Signor Welponer is said to be good, and the music is described as of a pleasing character. Madame Lorenzetti, the prima donna, as well as the tenor, Signor Hubly, was much applauded, and both were recalled several times during the course of the opera. At Brescia, Maria di Rohan has been played several times. We read of a new opera by Signor Carlo Romani, written for the Pergola at Florence; it is an opera buffa, and is entitled Le perle della Corona; and it is also said that Verdi's Il Trovatore is being translated into French for the opera of Marseilles.

WIESBADEN.—Madlle. Lucile Grahn has appeared several times. Herr Dalle Aste has been playing Bertram, in Robert der Teufel. Mademoiselle Storck was the Alice.

Digitized by Google

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.—Herr Theodor Formes has lately become a favourite with the public here. He has appeared as Raoul in the Huguenots, and Masaniello in the opera of the same name. Madame Stradiot-Mendi, also, has given entire satisfaction. Her principal parts were Valentine in the Huguenots and Fides in the Prophet.

BERLIN.—The royal theatres are all closed, and the others are in a most desperate state of insolvency. At the Opera they talk of getting up the Orphée of Gluck, and Rossini's Tancredi. There was some question about Herr Wagner's Tannhaüser, but as the composer insisted upon having Listz to conduct, the orchestra revolted, so that no one can predict how it will all end.

VIENNA.—At the Josephstadt-theatre, an opera, written by Weber at the age of twenty-four, and entitled Abou Hassan, was represented on the occasion of the Emperor's birthday. The score of this opera, which preceded Der Freischütz by ten years, was written while Weber was studying under the direction of the Abbé Vogler. Abou Hassan is said to contain many pretty and expressive melodies.

MUNICH.—La Sonnambula, with Mademoiselle Rettich, Herren Young and Kindermann, and Norma, with Mesdames Behrend-Brand, Dietz, Herren Brandes and Kremenz, have been performed here. The execution of the two operas—if we except the singing of Madame Behrend-Brand—was anything but satisfactory.—The Brothers Wieniawski have already given two concerts, which were most fashionably and numerously attended. —According to report, the Exhibition Jury have awarded the first three prizes for pianos to Herr E. Seuffert (Vienna), J. Biber (Munich), and Scheidmayer and Sons (Wurtemburg). Prince Carolath-Bathen has purchased one of E. Seuffert's pianos, for 1200 florins—a large price for Germany.

ZURICH.—Two grand musical festivals—Das Eidgenössische Musikfest and Das Süngerfest, were celebrated last month. As a general rule, a year or so is allowed to elapse between the two festivals, in order that they may not clash with one another; but this year they were celebrated almost simultaneously, because no person could be found last year to direct the Musikfest. It almost experienced the same fate on this occasion as well, and, in fact, it can hardly be expected to be ever very successful, if only from the remote spot—Sitten, in the canton of Wallis—where it takes place. It came off on the 12th and 13th July. Among other pieces in the programme, were Beethoven's symphony in A, the overture to Herr Richard Wagner's Tannhäuser, and Mendelssohn's Lobgesang. Herr Richard Wagner was to have conducted the first two works, and Herr Methfessel, from Berne, the last. After his arrival, however, Herr Wagner refused to execute the charge entrusted to him, because he considered the orchestra too weak. Hereupon, Herr Methfessel stepped forward, in a noble manner, free from any professional envy, and conducted the whole. The choruses, executed by the members of the Gesangverein, who, in most cases understand only French, were very imperfectly rendered. Some of the solos, however, were very satisfactorily sung, and the orchestra, which certainly was weak, did its best. The Süngerfest, on the other hand, which was given in Winterthur, went off brilliantly. The meeting took place in an immense and elegantly built hall, richly decorated. On the 16th July, nineteen Vereins contended for the five prizes, consisting of as many handsome silver goblets, which were awarded to the Vereins: Harmonie (Zurich), Stadtverein (ditto), Männerchor (Basle), Frohsinn (St. Gallen), and Harmonie (Lucerne). Herr Schnyder von Wartensee was president of the board of umpires. The performances on the succeeding day were not altogether satisfactory. The director, Herr Methfessel, jun., of Winterthur, although, in other respects, a very excellent musician, was not equal to the task of commanding and guiding so large a body of singers, amounting to nearly a thousand. The execution wanted life and freshness, and not merely were the finer and more delicate shades, which are hardly to be expected after one rehearsal, wanting, but even the ordinary differences between piano and forte were nowhere observed. Great as the number of singers was, they never once reached a real fortissimo. Some of the compositions selected were by the older masters, such as Beethoven, H. G. Naegeli, and Weber, and some by more modern ones, such as C. Kreutzer, Y. Otto, Haeser, etc. The next Fest (1856) takes place in St. Gallen.

HAMBURGH.—Madame Tedesco has taken leave of the Hamburgh public, and returned to Paris, in order to make the necessary arrangements for her journey to St. Petersburgh. The programme, on the night of her last appearance, was composed as follows:—The first act of Norma, a farce entitled Der gerade Weg der beste (played by the German company at the St. James's Theatre, London, last year), the first and second acts of the Barber of Seville, a ballet divertissement, and the grand air of the Favorite. Mad. Tedesco was warmly applauded—Mr. Pierson has sent in a new overture to the second part of Goëthe's Faust. It will be played in the Stadttheater, on the 28th of August, the great poet's birthday.

WEIMAR.—A complete edition of Dr. Franz Liszt's Sinfonische Dichtungen will be published in a few months, and, shortly afterwards, be played at a public concert.—Herr von Bülow, a pupil of Dr. Liszt, has composed an overture to Julius Cæsar, and a fantasia for full band.

LEIPSIC.—M. Panofka is at present stopping here, as well as Madame Jenny-Lind-Goldschmidt and Herr Otto Goldschmidt. The "Nightingale" intends proceeding to Nordeney. Miss Stabbach is expected.

BRESLAU.—Herr Liebert has made a successful début in Herr R. Wagner's Tannhäuser.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—Madame Marra-Wollmer has appeared as Maria, in Die Regimentstochter, and Amina in La Sonnambula. Mozart's Figaro's Hochzeit has been revived after a considerable interval, and created the greatest enthusiasm among the public, who are in raptures with the music of the immortal composer, which they have not heard in the theatre for a long time.

FRANKFORT, Sept. 8.—M. Eliason's attractive soirées have recommenced. Last week, we heard at one of them Mdlle. Arabella Goddard, a young English pianiste, who, by her performances last season in London, made a great sensation. If we can apply the expression "sound" to talent, then we may conscientiously do it to this young artiste, of hardly eighteen years of age, who with enormous execution unites a truly classic repose of manner, and at the same time enters thoroughly into the spirit of the composition she may be playing. This repose might engender an idea of coldness, were it not for the intensity of her style of delivery, which completely annuls it. Mdlle. Goddard played with M. Eliason and Herr Siedertopf Mendelssohn's trio in C minor, as well as Beethoven's Grand Sonata, Op. 111, and some preludes by Sebastian Bach. Who will not admire the taste for good music shewn by so young an artiste? It would be desirable if Mdlle. Goddard, who, notwithstanding her youth, must be ranked among the first pianistes, would afford the public an opportunity of hearing her admirable performance.—Didaskalia.

GOTHA.—The Gotha Liedertafel, in conjunction with several similar associations, from the neighbouring cities, lately gave a concert in the Orangeriegebäude. The performances commenced with Gluck's overture to Iphigenia, executed by the city band from Arnstadt, under the direction of Herr Harras. Among other pieces sung by the members of the Liedertafeln, were Mendelssohn's finale from Lorely, Herr Tschirsch's prize composition, "Eine Nacht auf dem Meere," and a manuscript Festgesang, for wind instruments, by Herr Knapp. The whole concert gave universal satisfaction.

TOPLITZ.—Herr Laub, the violinist, lately gave a concert, which was well and fashionably attended. Herr Laub, assisted by Herr C. Wehle, on the pianoforte, performed Mendelssohn's Sonata in D major, Prume's Menlancholie, F. Sebastian Bach's Chiaconne, and M. Ernst's Ludovik-Fantaisie. Herr Wehle performed alone several pleasing Salonstücke, among others, Un Songe à Vaucluse, and a Marche Cosaque of his own.

LISBON.—The Italian opera will shortly commence operations and it would appear that Verdi is so extremely popular, that none other but his compositions are to be played, as will be seen by the following list—I Lombardi, Attila, Giovanni d' Arco, Macbeth, Rigoletto, Il Trovatore, La Traviata, and Ernani.

RIO JANEIRO.—Affairs are going on swimmingly with the Italian company. Six operas have already been given, L'Elisir d'Amore, Ernani, La Cenerentola, La Sonnambula, l' Italiana in Algeri, and Lucia. The great star of the company is Madame Charton, and the enthusiasm of the public is such that they do not know what to invent to express their delight. The house is crowded to suffocation every night she sings.

AMERICA.—We have received our American papers, and correspondence up to the 2nd of September. Nothing is talked of in New York but of the arrival of Mad. Grisi and Signor Mario, which took place on the 19th of August, both our favourites being in excellent health and in good spirits. On the following evening at nine o'clock, three or four hundred persons of both sexes assembled in the dining room, of St. Nicholos Hotel, to see the newly-arrived strangers; the pretence being a complimentary and musical welcome, offered by the American musical fund Dodworth's band attempted to play several pieces, but not a note was heard until they struck up Casta Diva, for which they were complimented by Signor Mario. The first appearance of Madame Grisi and Signor Mario, at Castle Garden, is fixed for the 4th of September, and the opera selected is Lucrezia Borgia; the price of tickets is fixed at three and five dollars, the reserved seats to be sold by auction—The New York Musical Review states that the managers of the New York theatre are to be Messrs. Willard and Ettinge, of Bostcn, and that they have already issued their advertisement, which that paper styles as pretentious and absurd. Quantity seems to be the main reliance of the manager; they are to present an English comedy, an Italian opera, and a French ballet, all in the same evening. The late season of the Italian Opera turns out to have been a most decided failure; M. Maretzek's troupe is broken up and its members are preparing to return to Europe. Signor Salvi is spoken of as a bout to join the new troupe at the New York Theatre. —At Boston the musical convention under the auspices of Messrs. Baker, Johnson, Frost, and Adams, seems to have gone off in excellent style. It lasted nine days.

THE COMPOSER'S COAT.—The day after the first performance of Otello at the San Carlos, Naples, at the moment when Rossini was in the midst of his intimate friends, who were felicitating him—glass in hand—on the success of his new opera,—somebody knocked at the door. Barbaja (the manager) got up to open it. There presented himself an Englishman, aged fifty, or thereabouts.—"What do you want?" said Barbaja.—"M. Rossini," was the answer.—" "And what do you want with M. Rossini?" —"I want to see him."—"Very well; see him as much as you like."—During this interlude Rossini had made a significant sign to the Count de F——, and asked him to take up a position opposite to the Englishman.—The end was, that the Englishman sat down at the table, staring at the Count de F——, who, like Rossini, wore a blue coat and white cravat. The party continued drinking, and the Englishman was invited to make one at the breakfast. Like the rest, he drank and proposed a toast to the health of the illustrious composer; to which the Count de F—— replied with the most perfect modesty. The company began to laugh at the ridiculous scene, when the Englishman rising with the utmost coolness, saluted Rossini, or rather the Count de F——, in his own stiff way, and departed. Going out, he whispered Barbaja, and said, "Sir, I must have either a coat or a waistcoat of M. Rossini's at any price." The plot thickened. "Wait an instant," replied Barbaja; "I will come back in a moment."—When Barbaja announced this strange fancy on the part of the Englishman, the guests began to laugh like mad. The Count de F—— took off his coat, and handed it over to the impresario. The Englishman was waiting.—"Here," said M. Barbaja, "is M. Rossini's blue coat." The Englishman quietly took out his purse, drew thence a hundred pounds, and, charging M. Barbaja to offer these to M. Rossini, disappeared.—"This sum," said Rossini, "will be a good thing for the chorus singers at El Fondo and San Carlo"—turning towards Barbaja; "I will have it divided among them." This comical scene the next day furnished diversion for all the salons of Naples. A paper got hold of it and printed it at full length. At the second representation of Otello the Englishman was to be seen in a stall. During the second act, while Iago was singing his cavatina— an exclamation of rage was to be heard among the audience. It came from the Englishman, who had been reading the article in the papers, narrating the amusing episode of which he was the hero. Every eye was turned towards the person who disturbed the effect of the singer. The Englishman was recognized;—he had stuffed himself into the coat of the young Count de F——. The mirth excited by this discovery was such that the unfortunate victim of Rossini's facetious humour was obliged to leave his stall.

CHEAP MUSIC.

SIR,—It is doubtless very satisfactory to the young lady whose letter you printed last week to get her music so extremely cheap, but it is not quite so satisfactory to the publisher. He has bought and paid honestly the market price of a copyright work, and in justice and common sense the work should be his property, but the learned lords say No! because he bought it of a foreigner. This they call sound law, but it is a gross outrage on common sense, and an inconsiderate destruction of much valuable property belonging to Englishmen; as, bear in mind, it is only Englishmen who are injured by this decision, the foreigner of course, not refunding the money which he has received, and to which he is justly entitled by the law of common sense; the foreigner no doubt will be injured for the future, but that is not the present question. I think there is not another country in Europe where such a decision would have been come to. In France a Frenchman may buy copyrights of a German, an Italian, or composer of any other nation, and his property is protected and any purloiner thereof is subject to fine and imprisonment, it being very properly regarded there as a similar crime to picking a pocket; and this is without any international law between the two countries—it is merely according to the law of common sense: they cannot see why the purchaser of an Italian's composition should not be protected in the same way as the purchaser of an Italian's pockethandkerchief. I suppose they are poor ignorant people, and not able to make the subtle distinctions that our learned lords are; but I think, Mr. Editor, you will agree with me in saying that in the article of musical copyright, as well as in a great many other cases "they manage these things better in France."

Now look to the effect of this decision. A set of envious men, who never had the courage to buy copyrights, although the market was open to them, but preferred the safe but dishonourable course of attacking the rights of others, which it appears were unprotected by our laws—although an honest man, Mr. Editor, does not require laws to tell him what is his own and what his neighbour's—now engage in what Mr. Novello has justly called "an indecent scramble" for the spoil. The holders of the late copyrights, naturally indignant at having their valuable works published and hawked about the country by these harpies, are compelled in self-defence to sell them at whatever price they can get. It is well known that out of fifteen or twenty works seldom more than two or three become popular, and these two or three only are printed by these birds of prey: but as publishers do not quite see the advantage of being the caterers to these worthies, they must naturally cease to introduce new talent into this country.

There is a good deal of cant about free trade, no monopoly, and giving cheap music to the masses. I admit that music is dear, and think that some reduction in the price to the public might be advantageous; but certainly the mode of cheapening it by robbing the copyright holders is neither just nor respectable. We all know that the baker who steals his flour can sell his bread cheaper than the baker who pays for it; the public is undoubtedly benefitted by the cheap bread, but the miller is robbed and ruined. This is called benefitting the many at the expense of the few, and is considered by the champions of non-copyright as the true principle of commercial and political economy, and no doubt they look upon themselves as musical Cobdens and Brights.

I am convinced that this decision will benefit no one. The popular composer will get much less than ever for his works; the unknown composer will remain unknown, for no publisher will invest his money in anything of a speculative nature; the retail music-seller will find his profits gradually diminish to an unremunerative point; the public will certainly have cheap music, but will never again have the works of all the best composers in Europe brought to them by research, enterprise, and capital; and even those, who in their own imagination, were to be the benefitted par excellence, will not be able to stand against the competition of the larger houses which they have brought upon themselves, but will sink still lower in the scale of commercial respectability.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

September 6th, 1854. AN OLD MUSIC SELLER.

SINGING IN CHURCHES.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—In my humble estimation, your correspondent on this subject in your last number has said so much truth in so little space that I feel anxious that neither his remarks nor the matter of which he treats should be forgotten. Do, sir, let us try to upset that wretched parsimony which deems it liberal to "spend a couple of hundred pounds upon the organ," and let us also try to clear away the mists of error and quackery in which the simple subject of Church Singing has been so long enveloped.

I can speak feelingly, from a few years' experience of the miseries connected with organs and church music (so called), owing to the ignorance which prevails in quarters whence (unfortunately) emanates the power to inflict these miseries on people who desire better things. But as the only antidote to ignorance is instruction, I hope to see your correspondent in the field again; and I would respectfully suggest that a little space constantly allotted to the review of such matters amidst your columns might be useful in conveying information where most needed, and in obtaining a hearing for those who have worked at the business, but who are generally treated as if they had no business to understand anything about it.

A few absurdities I could point out, for a caution to self-opinionated church-musical-meddlers, if ever you should be in want of any; but I know full well that you have only to invite organists to say what they know and experience in the discharge of their, at present, unenviable trust, and it will be long ere you need a paper from, 13*th Sept.*, 1854. Sir, your most obedient servant, H. A.

THE HARMONIC UNION.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

Sir,—I am anxious that you should allow me a little space to correct some errors into which you have fallen in an article respecting the Harmonic Union which appeared on the 26th ulto.

I have been absent from London, or should have taken an earlier opportunity to ask for this favour. With the general tone of the article it is not, of course, my business to find fault. Indeed, I can but be satisfied with the opinions generally expressed, for you state that in the executive department the society has "merited and obtained praise." You speak well of the band and declare the chorus to be "very good." The fault found with the intentions and management of the Society, I am able to show, is based upon erroneous "report—that great liar," which in this instance can be easily retorted.

1. I beg to say that it is altogether an error to suppose that the Society was started with the direct intention of opposing any existing Society, and least of all is it true that its managers had any wish to upset Mr. Hullah.

When the Society was formed, Mr. Hullah's concerts had for some time been discontinued, and nothing whatever was known to our directors of his future plans. During the whole of the first season of the Harmonic Union, Mr. Hullah gave no concerts; and it has been a source of pleasure to us that this year (he having started them afresh) we have been able to avoid any collision, or even the appearance of opposition.

Although in the course of the series we have both given several of the same works, they have, in each instance, been arranged for quite different parts of the season. To show that this has been well-intended by our Society (and I believe it has been equally so by Mr. Hullah), I may mention that our Board having arranged to give Beethoven's Choral Fantasia at one of our later performances, upon seeing it advertised for Mr. Hullah's next concert (our announcement had not appeared) immediately decided upon substituting another work, it being the unanimous wish of the Directors to maintain the good understanding which had evidently existed throughout the year. I may add that we have hired music from Mr. Hullah, lent him parts, and altogether been on the best terms.

2. I wish also to correct the error that we "did not find all the expenses" of the performance of Mr. C. Horsley's Joseph, with which the first season of the Society was opened.

I beg to assure you that no assistance was given in this respect, and that although a large loss was the result, a second performance of the work was given which also showed a heavy balance against the Society. Mr. Charles Horsley will, I know, bear out these statements, and is well aware of the large pecuniary sacrifice made by the Society, to bring his work thus prominently before the public. I believe none of us regret that sacrifice, for we feel that the composition is well worthy of an established place in a series of concerts, such as those given by the Harmonic Union; but that the public will not pay to hear new oratorios, and that the Society lost heavily by giving two performances of Joseph, Mr. Charles Horsley is quite as well assured as any member of our Board.

3. Report is erroneous again when it says that we received £400 for performing Mr. Pierson's Jerusalem, and by this arrangement, although "Horsley's Joseph and Macfarren's Lenora did not pay, Mr. Pierson's Jerusalem paid very well." Instead of this being true, there was the same result as with the preceding new works—a very considerable loss had to be borne by the Society in consequence of its performance.

4. But the error which is perhaps, the most serious, and one which is, certainly, the most unfounded, is that which charges the Society with departing from its original promises, and finding that new works did not pay, falling back to redeem its losses upon the Messiah, the Creation, and Elijah.

Now, sir, I must be permitted to say, in the very plainest language, that this charge is altogether unjust and untrue. Whether it was a good thing for the Society to give these works is a matter of opinion about which I do not care to dispute, but what I have to assert is, that the Society originally promised them; that in the earlier prospectuses, issued before a concert had been given or a subscription received, it declared (I quote from a prospectus before me) that the "oratorios Messiah, Creation, and Elijah would be given at suitable opportunities." Had, therefore, these works not been given, the Society would have failed to fulfil the promises upon which subscribers joined; and yet these are the very three works upon which it is said we "fell back," and because we gave them we are told:—

"Now, we must insist that this kind of proceeding is unfair. 'Live and let live' is a good motto; and the Harmonic Union had as much right to speculate with the masterpieces of the oratorio composers as Mr. Hullah, or the Sacred Harmonic Society. But what it had no right to do, was to come before the public with a set of professions which were never really intended to be carried out. Failing to succeed, as they had anticipated, the members of the Harmonic Union immediately fell back upon the domain of other societies; and, instead of giving their bonâ fide subscribers what they had promised, they endeavoured to set up an opposition, both uncalled for and unjust."

In opposition to all this, I must insist that we only did what we all along intended to do, what we had promised in print to do, what our subscribers required us to do, and what nineteen-twentieths of them will require us to do again. So much for this error. I do not, of course, believe that we should have been subject to the animadversions I have quoted, had you known that the promise I mention was given in our first prospectuses.

5. You say that Naumann's Oratorio was a failure, that it possesses little merit, and "why it was brought forward is best known to the Harmonic Union." To this, I reply that it was promised to our subscribers at the commencement of the season, at the express and urgent desire of Mr. Benedict. In the next sentence you speak of him as one of the most experienced living conductors.

Were we, therefore, wrong in being guided by his advice? It would ill become me to enter the lists with the Editor of the Musical World as to the merits of the work, but I may, perhaps, be permitted to say that I took considerable pains to obtain the opinions of the principal vocalists, the leading members of the band, and the most practised chorus-singers, and that with hardly an exception they were highly favourable. I ought to apologize for trespassing at this length, but I must ask the further favour to be allowed to append a list of the various works which, during the two short seasons of the Harmonic Union, it has produced for the first time in Exeter Hall, and looking through it I think I may justly inquire if the Harmonic Union is not entitled to some praise for its production of unknown works and its assistance to living composers. At least, I may ask what other Society can be compared with it in these respects, and what grounds there are to say that our directors "tried a dodge and missed their mark, and no sooner lost a penny than they buttoned up their pockets?"

5, Exeter Hall, I am, sir, yours faithfully,
Sept. 7th, 1854. HENRY JOHN LIAS, JUN., Hon. Sec.

Horsley's Joseph (performed twice), Beethoven's Ruins of Athens (do.), Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night (do.), Macfarren's Lenora (do.), Händel's Acis and Galatea, with Mozart's accompaniments, (do.), Pierson's Jerusalem, Mori's Fridolin, C. E. Stephens' Symphony in G minor, Wober's Preciosa, Naumann's Christ, the Messenger of Peace, besides several smaller compositions, including W. S. Bennett's Concerto in F minor, Caprice in E, etc.

OPENING OF ST. GEORGE'S HALL, LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Reporter).

Liverpool, Sept. 21.

The inauguration of the new Grand Hall, yclept St. George's, and to which for some time past all England, musical and commercial, had looked forward as a great and important event, worthy to find narration in the history of the country, has proved a failure—an unmistakeable failure—an opprobrium and a disgrace to the city of the "Liver." There is no mistake in this. Had the people of Liverpool come forward and supported what, but for their backwardness, might have elevated itself into a festival, instead of a failure we should have had to record a success. On each performance, morning and evening, strangers more than half-filled the hall. Out of a population numbering about 500,000, not one in a thousand could be found to subscribe to the glory of his native town. Is it that ship-broking, dealing in cotton, and speculating on the Stock Exchange, must necessarily be incompatible with a love for the fine arts? Does business, as an inevitable consequence, absorb refinement; or the amor nummi preclude a feeling of nationality? Why else should the wealthy merchants and traders have held themselves aloof on such an occasion, and secreted themselves in their dingy offices, or—instead of lifting up their voices in St. George's Hall, when applause followed some glorification of song—joined at the Stock Exchange in the frantic yells of losers and gainers which arose on the declaration of some rise or fall in "those martyred saints the Three per Cents?" The boasted "Liver" is no bird of song, and, like the dog in the manger, it neither performs nor permits. It sings not itself, and suffers not others to sing. Look at the difference between Liverpool and Manchester, and between Liverpool and Dublin! In Liverpool the Cruvelli-Tamberlik party were received with coldness; in Manchester their success was great; in Dublin immense. Why should this be? Is the Mersey an unmusical stream, whose Naiads are voiceless, and who, in their godlike prerogative, will that the sons and daughters of their tutelage should have neither hearts nor ears for melody? And yet these same sons and daughters appeared to be enthusiastic about Jenny Lind. Ah!—that was a fashion—an excitement of the moment—and, moreover, Jenny Lind brought people to the town, and people brought money to the town, and the money went into their own pockets. Enthusiasm is never so wild as when it has ready money in perspective. If the Liverpool folks ever had a reputation as supporters of the fine arts, the opening of the St. George's Hall has set the world at rest upon that matter. Henceforth, whoever hears of a Musical Festival at Liverpool, or the inauguration of a public building—though never so likely to redound to the honour and glory of the town—will be tempted to smile. I doubt if, for many a long day, we shall see the name of Liverpool connected with art. In future it will be art-less—which, considering its thirst of gold, and its cunning in traffic—is a paradox. Let it pass.

It is nearly one hundred years since the Town Hall of Liverpool was opened in state by Mr. Charles Gore, the worshipful mayor. The inauguration was celebrated with concerts, balls, public fêtes, and regattas. The inauguration was then worthy of the occasion, and the men of Liverpool showed themselves superior to cotton and the funds. St. George's Hall is deserving of a better christening than it has received. It is a noble building, and, despite of many faults which the connoisseurs in architecture point out to the inquirer, is a temple worthy of any town or any nation. The scaffolding and boarding was entirely removed before Monday morning, the day appointed for opening the Hall, and the public and strangers had a full opportunity of admiring its numerous beauties. The origin of the building of St. George's Hall may be thus briefly stated:—

Formerly a musical festival on a grand scale used to be held in Liverpool every three years. Sacred oratorios were performed in St. Peter's Church, and miscellaneous concerts were given in the evening, as at other festivals in large towns. So liberally were these meetings patronised by the aristocracy and gentry of Lancashire, Cheshire, and the vicinities, that between £3,000 and £4,000 was generally handed over at each anniversary to the funds of the hospitals, infirmaries, and other charitable institutions of Liverpool. About fifteen years ago these festivals were discontinued, in consequence of the Rev. Mr. Brooks, rector of Liverpool (now Archdeacon of the diocese of Chester), refusing to allow the parish church to be any longer appropriated for the morning performances. A public meeting was called by those who felt an interest in the charities, and it was resolved that a hall should be built expressly for the festivals, and entitled "St. George's Hall." A subscription was set on foot, and a large sum guaranteed, to be paid by instalments. The first instalment was duly forthcoming, but the second was less easy to obtain. At this time the Mayor and Corporation of Liverpool, having also come to the determination of building a hall for judicial purposes, proposed to the festival committee that their two plans should be incorporated. This was agreed to; what remained of the instalment which had been paid was refunded, and the committee of St. George's Hall was forthwith instituted. From among a great number of designs, that of Mr. Henry Lonsdale Elmes, a London architect, was accepted. In 1841 the building was commenced, and in 1851 was far enough advanced towards completion to be honoured by a visit from Her Majesty. Having accomplished the greater part of his design, Mr. Elmes went for the benefit of his health to Madeira, where he died of consumption, and Mr. Cockerell was appointed to succeed him. Under the superintendence of the last-named gentleman St. George's Hall has been completed.

At half-past ten o'clock on Monday morning St. George's Hall was inaugurated; the Mayor of Liverpool (Mr. J. B. Lloyd) in his robes, attended by the town-clerk, the members of the corporation and officials bearing the insignia, proceeded from the Town-hall, opposite Castle-street, to St. George's Hall, which they entered at 11 o'clock. As they passed through the streets, a crowd of no less than 30,000 besieged all the avenues to the Hall, while the windows of every house, from top to bottom, were crowded with curious and anxious spectators. The scene outside was sufficiently exciting, but that inside was still more so. About 2,000 were assembled in the hall, among whom were the Bishop of Chester, the Earl of Derby, Earl Sefton, and other eminent persons, who sat close to the places appointed for the Mayor and Corporation. The orchestra, towered over by the gigantic organ, and filled to the extremities with the members of the band and chorus, under the direction of Sir Henry Bishop, occupied the entire breadth of the hall on the north side, and looked very imposing. As soon as the Mayor and Corporation were placed, the conductor waved his bâton, and the band played the symphony of the National Anthem. The first solo verse was sung by Mr. Sims Reeves, and the satisfactory manner in which this gentleman's voice was heard in every part of the building at once engendered the belief that the hall was favourable to sound. The verse in duet with Herr Formes, and the last solo by Madame Clara Novello, helped further to establish this conviction. After the National Anthem, all the audience remained standing, and the Bishop of Chester delivered a prayer for the prosperity of Liverpool, and invoked a blessing upon the new building. The Mayor then rose, and in a very few words declared that the hall was opened, and stated for what purposes and uses. The whole ceremony scarcely occupied more than twenty minutes. The Messiah was then begun, and terminated shortly before four o'clock. The choruses, although admirably sung by the members of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, to whom they are, of course, familiar, did not, on the whole, sound so well as the songs and recitatives for solo voices. This must be attributed to the deep recesses, of which there are five on each side of the hall. These recesses are necessarily inimical to the musical effect which springs from the great masses of voices and instruments, and must therefore militate against the pretensions of St. George's Hall, when compared with other large arenas devoted to musical performances. The same deficiency was noticeable when the band played the overture to the Messiah. Although composed of 100 executants, the instrumental effect was comparatively feeble. In this department the committee of St. George's Hall have hardly displayed the same liberality which has characterised most of their preliminary arrangements. The solemnity of the occasion taken into consideration, a much superior orchestra ought to have been secured. Why they neglected so important a feature in a musical performance, and why they postponed the engagement of the band and choruses to so late an hour, requires explanation. But for Mr. Sudlow, one of the managers of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, they stood the chance of having no chorus at all. Dr. Samuel Sebastian Wesley, of Winchester cathedral, presided at the new organ, which was built expressly for St. George's Hall. This instrument, possessing 108 stops and 8,000 pipes, cost £8,000, and is one of the largest in the world. Dr. Wesley (the designer) and Mr. Willis (the builder) insinuate in the description they have furnished for the Stranger's Guide to Liverpool, that the St. George's Hall organ is wholly "unrivalled" in quality and resources—a point I shall leave to be settled by judges less inevitably partial. The band comprised 24 first and 24 second violins; 12 violas; 10 violoncellos; and 10 double-basses; with the usual complement of wind instruments, and making 99 in all. Of these, however, more than half were provincials. The chorus consisted of 300—85 trebles, 60 altos, 70 tenors, and 85 basses. The list of solo singers was as follows:—Mesdames Clara Novello, Castellan, Weiss, Lockey, Dolby, G. Holden, Millar, Stott, Viardot Garcia, Messrs. Sims Reeves, Lockey, Millar, Armstrong, Weiss, Signor Gardoni, Signor Belletti, and Herr Formes.

The annexed brief description of the new monument will not be without interest. It is extracted from a little work called The Stranger's Vade Mecum, or Liverpool Described, and runs as follows:—

"In the determination to erect this noble building, the Corporation of Liverpool desired to provide better accommodation for the law courts; and since December, 1851, the judges have discharged their important functions in the courts of the north and south ends. The central part, well marked externally by the uprising portion of the building, is par excellence the Hall. Originally both assize courts communicated directly with it, but the organ at the north end of the spacious hall has closed the approach to one of them. The young architect of St. George's Hall has not lived to witness its completion, but with it the name of Mr. Henry Lonsdale Elmes will be ever associated. His plans were adopted in May, 1841; in 1851 the building was sufficiently advanced to be visited by our Sovereign, and this year has witnessed its completion, and with that event the meeting of the British Association."

"The beauty and grandeur of the effect will not be witnessed till further alterations in the adjoining property are made, but, isolating the building from surrounding objects, it must be pronounced one of the most imposing combinations of beautiful, massive, classic designs existing. The composition is a unity of several styles, the Corinthian order prevailing throughout. The northern aspect is semi-circular, the columns being eight in number, and attached. Viewing it from the north-east, a very striking effect is produced by this projection, and the long row of pillars of the eastern façade. This is the longest aspect of the building, and is 140 yards; the columns rising to the height of 45 feet, each four-and-a-half feet in thickness. The central colonnade advances 26 feet, and extends 200 feet; on either side the subordinate portion of the façade is extremely effective, and a striking contrast has been produced by the introduction of square pillars, and pediments for statuary on the screen which rises between them. Looking upon the building now from the south-east, another change presents itself, and it is the most commanding view which can be obtained. The eye takes in the whole range of columns in the eastern façade, and those of the southern entrance. The south front is a noble design and specimen of workmanship, and were it not that the ground sinks rapidly the effect would be complete. A terrace, however, has been constructed, from which the portico and its stylobate (carried on to the eastern side) arise. The height from the ground-line to the pediment is 95 feet. In this portico, which recedes 24 feet, there is a double row of massive, lofty pillars, eight in front and four within; and above these is a piece of emblematic sculpture, specially worthy of careful inspection. The motto on the hall, under this fine design, is 'Artibus, Legibus, Conciliis, locum Municipes constituerunt. Anno Domini, 1841.' The figures in this sculpture are large and numerous, the weight of the whole being about 50 tons. They were executed in Caen stone by Mr. W. G. Nicholl, from a design furnished by Mr. Cockerell. The uncovering of the sculpture in this pediment took place in the autumn of 1850.

"The western side is different from any of the other three, yet similar in the style. Corresponding with the projecting façade at the opposite side we have a lofty screen, with square Corinthian pillars, extending upwards. In this screen windows light up the numerous small apartments connected with the courts of law; and above, receding several yards, are the side windows, which throw light into the interior. The workmanship within is massive, like that without, much of the carpentry being of oak, and all highly finished. Within we find many apartments, most of which are subordinated to the grand purposes of the hall—the courts of law. At the south we have the Nisi Prius Court, and grand jury room; at the north, the Crown Court, and a large concert-room upon a level with the galleries of a noble chamber in the centre. There are also court-rooms for the Duchy of Lancaster, and for the sheriff, and a library, with other chambers.

"There are three entrances to this magnificent building, after passing the approaches. The chief one is by the southern portico, on each side of which a noble staircase leads to the recessed galleries of the great hall, and to the minor apartments, including the grand jury room. The northern entrance is through an apartment under the semicircular concert-room, in which is a flight of steps, and numerous pillars supporting the massive fabric above. This leads also to the central hall, and to the concert-room, but primarily to the Crown Court, situated between the central hall and the public room above the entrance hall. The third entrance is from the eastern façade, opening directly into the corridor, which passes round the hall. Judging from the impression upon our own mind, we would recommend the stranger to view the central hall first from the galleries, then from the raised steps at the end opposite the organ. The effect is very fine; and the Græco-Italian style, well carried out, with so much ornament, yet so chaste, impresses the spectator with the grandeur of the building and the munificence of the Corporation. It is to be regretted, however, that the organ has shut off the distance which was given to the building by the Civil Court. This hall measures 167 feet by 77, and rises by an arched roof running along the hall to a great elevation, the height being 82 feet. It is lighted by gallery windows in the west, and by windows near the roof, in arched recesses, at the ends. The breadth of the hall is increased to 100 feet by ten recesses, five on either side, 12 feet in depth, containing five rows of benches. The organ is placed at the north end, occupying the space between four of the lofty, beautifully polished red granite pillars which support the roof, and nearly filling the entire breadth of the hall. The organ gallery projects inwards in a semicircle, and is supported by six light red granite pillars. At the other end, and approached from the floor by a flight of steps, is a lofty door, between two grey granite pillars, leading to the Crown Court. There are six entrances to the ground floor of the hall, three on either side, from the long corridors. These are flanked with grey granite, on which are hung brass doors of remarkable workmanship. The expense of these metallic doors is said to be about 2,000*l*. The floor is sunk a little in the centre, which produces a fine effect, and when used as a ball-room will contribute to the interests of the spectators. But then it will be boarded.

"The great hall is paved with tesselated tiles, manufactured by Minton. The design is beautiful, and may be thus described:—The general form consists of three circles; the central, which is the largest, is about 40 feet in diameter, and on each side of this, towards the ends of the hall, is a smaller circle, which is again surrounded by four still smaller, the ends being terminated by areas of a similar radius to the large central circle. These circular compartments are all of them surrounded with bands of classical ornament, which intersect at the junction of one circular compartment with the other, after the manner of the guilloche ornament, thus uniting the whole into one grand design. The field of the floor is a diapered groundwork, of ornamental encaustic tiles, in blue, red, buff, chocolate, and white; the diaper is also divided into panels by bands of chocolate tiles, six inches wide, their points of intersection being formed by white tiles, having a red and black ornament, which gives the whole a brilliant, yet rich and chaste effect. In the centre of the large circular compartment, and immediately in the centre of the floor, is introduced the Royal Arms, on a blue ground, about five feet in diameter, surrounded by a laurel wreath, from which radiates a star of 16 points, between which appears the caduceus of Mercury; this is surrounded by a richly ornamented border, following which there is another border, or frieze, three feet in width, bearing figures emblematical of the seas, such as tritons, dolphins, etc.; this is again surrounded by bands and borders of rich classical ornament, appropriate to the enrichments of the building. In the centre of each of the two smaller circles is placed the arms of the corporation of Liverpool, also surrounded in a similar manner to the Royal Arms by richly-ornamented borders, and in the centres of the other smaller circular compartments is placed alternately the star of St. George, and the thistle, rose, and shamrock, which is repeated in another form in the diaper. The raised platform, or pathway which surrounds the hall, is laid with encaustic tiles, of a similar design to the diapered ground of the centre, formed into panels the length of the spaces between the doors, by rich borders, into which are introduced inscriptions in English and Latin, appropriate to the figures emblematical of Justice, Temperance, Prudence, Art, Science, etc., which are seen above, between the pillars and the roof. Opposite to each of the doors are rich circular panels, bearing in the centre a dolphin, in proper colours, on a deep blue ground, surrounded by a rich framework of ornament. In the space immediately under the organ gallery the crest of the Prince of Wales is introduced, surrounded by a laurel wreath, and bands of geometrical and foliated ornament, the whole forming a beautiful panel of about 20 feet in diameter; the panels at each of the four corners of the floor are also richly ornamented, and bear the motto of the corporation, 'Deus nobis hæc otia fecit.' These tiles cost £4,000. exclusive of laying down.

"Looking upwards to the galleries the balustrade is remarkably striking. This is composed of black and variegated marble, with serpentine slabs at intervals. Serpentine is likewise introduced upon the walls. The roof is supported upon 22 red granite pillars of large diameter. Rising above the capitals, and between the minor arches of the galleries, are 12 emblematic sculptures in bas relief, white on pale blue—extremely beautiful and chaste. Within each of these 10 galleries the work of the sculptor has further adorned the building, and the ceiling, which is arched, is one of the most splendid specimens of chaste decoration. The 15 shields, duly blazoned, and the gilded stars, are the most striking objects; but one knows not whether most to admire the classic character of the designs about the ceiling, or the colouring of pale blue and white and delicate red with which the work is finished. In niches between the pillars are twenty white marble plinths for statues, and it is understood that Peel and Stephenson, Dr. Shepherd, and our townsman, Mr. William Brown, will be among the first to adorn the hall. By the way, the statue of Huskisson might be removed from the Custom-house to St. George's Hall with propriety. The whole apartments are warmed by hot water pipes, and great attention has been paid to ventilation. In fact, for this, and for the wind-chests of the organ, a powerful steam-engine works in the vaults below.

"The lighting of this gorgeous hall was a subject of some consideration to the committee; and, although we are not aware that a plan similar to that so effectively adopted in the Philharmonic Hall was ever contemplated, the mode selected is very satisfactory, and the designs of the burners are in keeping with the architecture. Before each of the ten recesses a gasalier depends from a design in the ceiling, representing the prow of a ship. This projects the burners under the great arch, and produces little shadow, and, as the lights range with the capitals of the columns, the eye is not distressed with undue brilliancy. The burners are arranged in double circlets.

"The concert-room, at the north end of the building, is horse-shoe shaped, and elegantly fitted up, the boxes running round being very handsome. There is a spacious orchestral arrangement, but there is no organ. We have heard persons remark that the organ in the central hall might also have done for this; but, apart from the inconsistency of this, the Civil Court intervenes."

Notwithstanding there is much in the above description which might be readily controverted, and making allowance for some natural partiality in the writer, I am compelled to admit that St. George's Hall is a honour to Liverpool, and that in the metropolis there is nothing of its class to which it can be compared.

The first concert on Monday night disappointed everybody. The Hall was not more than one-third filled, and presented an aspect of dreary and desolate splendour. No doubt the high prices of admission kept many away; and those who could hear an excellent concert at the Philharmonic Society's Hall, with occasionally some of the first London singers for one shilling, naturally refused to pay fourteen shillings for an entertainment but of little more excellence, and which held out no single novelty whatsoever. The programme was of the London-Wednesday-Exeter-Hall stamp—longitudinous, scraggy, crooked, and obsolete. Madame Viardot sang "Ah! non giunge;" Miss Dolby, "Ah! non rendemi;" Madame Clara Novello, "Come per me sereno;" Madame Castellan, "Di Piacer;" Signor Belletti, "Sorgete;" Signor Gardoni, "Le Chemin du Paradis;" Mr. Weiss, "I'm a roamer;" Herr Formes, "In diesen heil'gen Hallen;" Mr. Sims Reeves, "O, 'tis a glorious sight;" Mr. and Mrs. Weiss, Nicolai's duet, "Oh, du geliebte," and numerous other pieces as old as the hills, and not quite so lofty, which have been made just as familiar in Liverpool as in London. Then, too, old as they were, and well known as they must have been, many of our "familiar friends" did not go as smoothly as might have been expected. Sir Henry Bishop's admirable glee, "Blow, gentle gales," although entrusted to excellent singers and directed by the composer himself, was not altogether satisfactory. Nor was the band at all up to the mark in the Wedding March from A Midsummer Night's Dream, nor in the overtures to the Nozze di Figaro, and The Ruler of the Spirits. There was, by the way, one novelty in the concert—the recitative and air from Mr. Horsley's Comus, "Come, Lady, while Heav'n lends us grace," which Mr. Sims Reeves sang with admirable expression and exquisite taste. Mr. Sims Reeves had previously introduced this composition at the Worcester Festival.

The Hall looked magnificent, lighted up. The richness and variety of its details were even rendered more apparent than in the daylight. The lighting was undertaken by Messrs. Messenger, of Birmingham. The candelabras, or "gasaliers," in brass and bronze, are of Grecian design, and, though elaborate, extremely light, delicate, and graceful. Of these there are 10, which emit a multitude of jets of gas, from five-pointed stars, with unprecedented brilliancy of effect. Every one of the candelabras, bearing 140 jets, gives a total of 1,400—which is ample and splendid. Yet there is no oppressive heat, the hall being lofty and spacious, and the ventilation, so far as we could judge from its half empty condition, satisfactory.

The opinion as to the adaptation of St. George's Hall for sound was more unfavourable after the evening concert than after the morning performance. The absence of the chorus from their places in the orchestra no doubt increased the reverberation. But why were the chorus absent from their places in the orchestra? The committee anticipating a tremendous rush to St. George's Hall, at 14s. a-head, printed and distributed the following order in the "Regulations for the Orchestra:"—"7th Regulation—The Choristers will not be present on Monday and Tuesday evenings, as that portion of the orchestra will be let to the public." This is the first time we ever heard that "Monday and Tuesday evenings" might be interpreted into "that portion of the orchestra." However, the committee must have been dolefully disappointed, when they found, not only that "that portion of the orchestra" was not crowded, but that literally not one person paid to go there. It must be owned that the evening was wet; but all things considered, the first concert was a failure.

Tuesday morning looked more favourable for the visitors. The sky was clear, the air was warm, the breeze was pleasant. The townspeople, however, seemed not to care or not to know anything about the musical affairs going on. Elijah was the oratorio, but I am certain I did not meet an individual on my way to the Hall who cared a rush for Mendelssohn, or his mighty masterpiece. When I entered the Hall—just before the overture commenced—I was astonished. The seats were more than half empty, and the artists looked anything but comfortable at having to sing to empty benches. Elijah was more carefully executed on the whole than the Messiah—which was certainly not to be expected, the Liverpool chorus being more familiar with the latter—at least, I should have supposed so. The distribution of the parts in Elijah was as follows:—sopranos, Mesdames Castellan, Novello, and Weiss; contraltos, Miss Dolby, and Madame Viardot Garcia; tenors, Signor Gardoni, and Mr. Sims Reeves; bass, Herr Formes. The air, "Then shall the righteous shine forth," of Mr. Sims Reeves, is one of the most perfect examples of sacred singing that can be cited, and was encored with enthusiasm. The unaccompanied trio, "Lift thine eyes," sung by Madame Novello, Mrs. Weiss, and Miss Dolby, was also encored, and the same compliment was awarded to the air, "O rest in the Lord," which, nevertheless, Madame Viardot executed in too measured a style. This lady's declamation of the recitatives of Jezebel was, as usual, dramatic and elaborate. The chorus of the infuriated people, "Woe to him, he shall perish," was anything but clear and decided. The air of the Israelitish woman, "Woe unto them," was sung perfectly by Miss Dolby; and Madame Castellan's delivery of the supplications of the bereaved widow to Elijah, in the duet, "What have I to do with thee?" was artistic and effective. Signor Gardoni sang the air, "If with all your hearts," with great taste and purity of style. Madame Novello was encored in the soprano air, "Hear ye, Israel."

The second miscellaneous concert, on Tuesday night, was of the same description as the first; the programme, however, was more happily selected. The attendance was not more numerous than on Monday night. There were eleven pieces in the first part, out of which three were encored. These were, "O ruddier than the cherry," sung with more vigour and dramatic meaning than executive power, by Herr Formes; "Largo al factotum," which Signor Belletti sung with more volubility than humour; and "Sull' aria," charmingly given by Mesdames Castellan and Clara Novello. The band played the overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream, and the war march of the Levites, from Mendelssohn's Athaliah, with spirit; but the time of each (of the first, especially) was too slow. Two of Mozart's most beautiful songs—"Della sua pace," and "Deh! vieni, non tardar"—the first from Don Giovanni, the other from Figaro, as everybody knows—by Mr. Sims Reeves and Madame Novello, were among the gems of the concert. Madame Castellan again introduced "Com 'e bello," and again overlaid it with fioriture; and Madame Viardot was pathetic and impressive with "Ah! mon fils" (from the Prophète); Signor Gardoni was animated in Boieldieu's most genial air, "Ah! quel plaisir d'être soldat!" and Mr. and Mrs. Lockey, Messrs. Millar and Armstrong afforded a perfect specimen of English part-singing in Mr. Horsley's, glee "By Celia's arbour." The second part began with the grand overture to Leonora, rather beyond the capabilities of the orchestra—and concluded with Cherubini's Les Deux Journées, which went better. "The Spirit Song" of Haydn was sung by Miss Dolby in her best manner. The popular duo, "Da quel dì," from Linda, by Madame Castellan and Mr. Sims Reeves, roused the audience to quite an enthusiasm; the noble song of the Count, from Le Nozze Figaro—"Hai già vinta la causa"—was vigorously sung by Mr. Weiss, who, however, failed to sing the florid passage at the end as the composer intended, and which nobody but Tamburini can sing; the cavatina, "Ah! se potessi anch'io," by Signor Cagnoni, was executed by Madame Novello in a most satisfactory manner; the song of Osmin—"O! wie will ich triumphiren," from Mozart's Seraglio, was finely declaimed by Herr Formes; and the plaintive "Una furtiva lagrima," was rendered by Signor Gardoni in the best possible taste. Madame Viardot Garcia's execution of "Non più mesta," and the movement that precedes it, "Ah, non credea," were in her usual style of daring and excellence. Weber's fine song from Euryanthe, "Soft airs around me play," was sung better than ever by Mr. Sims Reeves; "Là ci darem la mano," by Madame Castellan and Signor Belletti, and the exquisite quintet from Così fan tutte, given to perfection by Madame Castellan, Miss Dolby, Mr. Weiss, Signors Gardoni and Belletti, brought the concert to an agreeable close. Between the first and second parts of the concert Dr. Wesley performed on the new organ in such a masterly manner as to prove that he is the greatest living professor of the instrument. That the instrument is deserving of all the extravagant encomiums lavished upon it, I take leave to doubt. The organ is certainly in a very unfinished state, and opinions should not be ventured too freely; but Dr. Wesley's performances on any instrument would have proved acceptable. The concert appeared to give great pleasure to the audience, and was over at a reasonable hour.

The attendance on Wednesday morning was an improvement. The audience was tolerably numerous, but not at all what might have been expected at the last Morning concert. The performance consisted of the two first parts of Haydn's Creation, and the whole of Spohr's Last Judgment. The execution of Haydn's oratorio was, on the whole, remarkably good. The Liverpool singers were heard to great advantage in the light and melodious choruses. The solo singers were unexceptionable. The favourite airs of the Creation, "With verdure clad," and "On mighty pens," by Madame Novello and Madame Castellan, were received with great favour; but the air that created the profoundest sensation was, "In native worth," sung by Mr. Sims Reeves in a style at once so chaste and impressive, that the audience insisted upon hearing it again. Mr. Weiss deserves praise for his distinct and effective enunciation of the recitatives of the first part, and for the artistic manner in which he gave the air, "Rolling in foaming billows." Signor Gardoni, in "In splendour bright," and Signor Belletti, in "Now Heaven in fullest glory," gave evidence of the great pains they are taking to perfect themselves in sacred music, and to obtain a mastery of the English tongue. The three trios, "How day unto day," by Madame Novello, Signor Gardoni, and Mr. Weiss; "Most beautiful appear," and "On thee each living soul," by Mr. Sims Reeves, Signor Belletti, and Madame Castellan, went capitally. Spohr's Last Judgment was not so satisfactory. Sir Henry Bishop seemed less intimately familiar with the score of Spohr than that of Haydn. The principal singers, however, would have redeemed a multitude of sins. The music is too high for Madame Viardot; but this fact entitles her to still more credit on account of the very artistic manner in which she gets through it. Mr. Lockey sang the whole of the tenor part, which is arduous and difficult, and can only be given efficiently by a thorough musician. Mrs. Lockey had nothing to sing but a short solo, and a part in the quartets. The quartets, of which there are three fine examples in the Last Judgment, were among the most perfect features of the performance. Herr Formes was assigned the whole of the bass part, and gave it due weight and dignity. Nearly all the choruses were too slow, and the band was not so much at ease in the varied and elaborate harmonies of Spohr as in the more simple and unpretending instrumentation of Haydn. There were about 900 in the room.

The musical proceedings terminated on Wednesday night with "The People's Concert," at half-a-crown. The festivities, however, accompanying the inauguration of St. George's Hall will not come to an end so soon. A new excitement has been caused by the arrival of the British Association, whose members hold their twenty-fourth annual meeting in Liverpool. The proceedings began on Wednesday, at one o'clock, with a preliminary committee, held in one of the courts of St. George's Hall. The Mayor gave a grand dinner in the Town-hall to the officers and council of the Association at five o'clock. In the evening, at eight o'clock, the President (the Earl of Harrowby—formerly a Member for Liverpool) delivered an inaugural address in the Philharmonic Hall, which included a general survey of the progress of science since the last meeting of the British Association. None but members of the Association were admitted to the lectures and conversaziones. A new hall in Lime-street, not far from St. George's Hall, although not nearly finished, will be opened for the convenience of members of the Association and their friends. The inauguration of Teutonic Hall, as it is called (a large and handsome erection in the Italian style of architecture) will be chiefly celebrated by eating and drinking. Dinners on an extensive scale are to be provided, every day except Saturday, for four hundred guests, at the moderate charge of five shillings a-head, not including wine. The surplus members and friends are to be accommodated in one of the large rooms of the Adelphi Hotel. The dinners will be presided over by men of note, such as Sir P. Egerton, Lord Rosse, Sir R. Murchison, Ex-president Hopkins, Professor Sedgwick, &c. The grand "presidential banquet," to which seven hundred guests are invited, takes place on Saturday, in the Philharmonic-hall.

Some idea of the advantages likely to be derived to the local charities from the performances at the St. George's Hall may be obtained from the following tabular statement of the numbers who attended at the morning and evening concert:—

| | | | £ | s. | d. | | £ |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Monday morning ..... | 1,900 | at | 1 | 1 | 0 | ..... | 1,995 |
| „ evening ..... | 450 | at | 0 | 14 | 0 | ..... | 315 |
| Tuesday morning ..... | 800 | at | 0 | 14 | 0 | ..... | 560 |
| „ evening ..... | 550 | at | 0 | 14 | 0 | ..... | 385 |
| Wednesday morning ... | 800 | at | 0 | 14 | 0 | ..... | 560 |
| „ evening ..... | 2,800 | at | 0 | 2 | 6 | ..... | 350 |
| Total ..... | 7,300 | | | | | | £4,165 |

On the other hand, the expenses may be pretty nearly estimated as below:—

|---|---|
| Chorus ... ... ... ... | £615 |
| Band ... ... ... ... | 550 |
| Erection of the orchestra ... | 200 |
| Principal singers ... ... | 1,590 |
| Conductor ... ... ... | 150 |
| Total ... ... | £3,105 |

This, of course, does not include the various other outlays incidental to a large undertaking like the opening of St. George's Hall; so that it is more than probable the charities will have to put up with some five or six hundred pounds—a poor presentation for such a town as Liverpool on such an occasion.

On Thursday the Mayor gave a grand dinner in the Town Hall, and the first general meeting of the British Association took place in the evening at the Philharmonic Hall; so that music gave way to feasting, and modulated into science. The report of the proceedings would not much interest your readers, wherefore I will not report it.

The townspeople are wroth to a pitch with Mad. Clara Novello, Mr. Sims Reeves, Signors Belletti and Gardoni, and Herr Formes, because they did not stay to sing at the "People's Concert" on Wednesday night, and have lifted up Mad. Viardot to the ninth heaven of their favour in consequence of her remaining to sing for them. The storm of the multitude, however, would be likely to turn into a perfect calm, and the elevation of Mad. Viardot, in all probability, would run the hazard of a sudden counter-depression, if the simple truth were made known, viz.: that Mad. Viardot was requested by the Mayor to remain, and the other singers were not. "One story is good till another is told," and "One man's meat is another man's poison," as Sancho Panza would say, making use of a proverb that had no reference whatsoever to the subject. A good conclusion, and not to be amended.

Mr. Gustavus Vasa Brooke.—This much-sifted actor, who has been starring with chequered effects in various parts of the kingdom, is announced for nine pet performances at Drury Lane, commencing with Virginius on the 2nd of October. The nine performances concluded, Mr. Gustavus Vasa Brooke sails for California, where he is anxiously expected.

THE NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

The concert on Thursday night was the best of the three, and drew the largest attendance. A more elegant audience was never assembled, or one more capable of appreciating and eager to applaud. The artists, thus encouraged, were warmed into increased exertion, and everything passed off in the most satisfactory and brilliant manner. The programme was miscellaneous, it is true, but well arranged, the various pieces—vocal and instrumental—being distributed in such a manner that, although, as usual, there were too many of them, the effect of contrast was secured, and monotony avoided. The concert opened with Mendelssohn's symphony in A major (the "Italian symphony"), which created a real sensation. The performance of this splendid work was for the most part unexceptionable. The first Allegro was, perhaps, a shade to fast; but the andante, minuetto, and last movement, were perfect. The saltarello was taken at a prodigious speed for so immense an orchestra; but, under the steady and intelligent guidance of Mr. Benedict, to whom the music of Mendelssohn is "familiar as household words," it went to a nicety. The piano passages were beautiful, and the crescendo always well managed; so that what is termed the chiaroscuro by musicians as well as painters was obtained throughout, with entire success. When it is considered that the symphony in A major was composed at the age of twenty, the ripe experience and deep scholarship, to say nothing of the freshness of invention it displays, are wellnigh inexplicable. The Norwich audience must be complimented for the unremitting attention they bestowed on the symphony. The symphony was followed by a duet from one of the operas of the late Viennese composer, Otto Nicolai, which, though extremely well sung by Mr. and Mrs. Weiss, was but a dull affair at the best. M. Sainton's vigorous and masterly execution of his own Rondo-Mazurka (with orchestra) was unanimously applauded; and Madame Castellan, who succeeded him with "Ah, non giunge," sang brilliantly and won the first encore. The pretty quartet from the last act of Rigoletto, sung with great spirit by Madame Bosio, Miss Dolby, Signors Gardoni and Belletti, evidently pleased the audience. A selection from the works of Mr. Benedict, which came next, had no fault but that of extreme brevity. It began with a new MS. overture to Shakspare's Tempest—a composition equally to be admired for its poetical treatment of the subject, for the fancy displayed in its several themes, as happily imagined as they are skilfully contrasted, and for the ingenious and effective manner in which it is scored for the orchestra. The band played it magnificently, thereby testifying in their own way the esteem they entertained for its composer. The other pieces were vocal. Two of them were encored—a duet for Madame Bosio and Signor Belletti, "Siam nati su queste montagne" (the Styrian patois), and the chorus of students from the Gipsy's Warning, which every one knows and admires. In the duet—the clever vocalization of Madame Bosio, to whom difficulties are as nothing, was universally praised. The "Morning Song" of Barry Cornwall, which Mr. Benedict has set to such a genial and sparkling melody, and a graceful air from the Gipsy's Warning, completed the selection. The former was intrusted to Madame Clara Novello; the latter to Herr Reichardt, whose singing was thoroughly artistic, and evidently pleased the composer. There was only one novelty in the rest of Part I. This was a very refined and graceful musical setting, by Mr. Howard Glover, of Shelley's beautiful serenade, "I arise from dreams of thee," which was sung with impassioned feeling by Mr. Sims Reeves, and made a powerful and legitimate impression on the audience. A few more such songs would have done no harm to the concerts. Miss Dolby having set the fashion for reviving old Scotch ballads, Madame Clara Novello followed her example on this occasion, and introduced a couple of the most ancient and approved—"My heart is sair," and "Bonnie Prince Charlie," a love ballad and a loyal ballad. Both pleased; but Madame Novello could not be induced to repeat the last, although it was the unanimous wish of the audience—wherein she showed discretion, treating her unconscionable admirers better than they merited. Once more the accomplished Signor Gardoni, "the favourite tenor of the ladies," treated us to the "Chemin du Paradis" of M. Blumenthal, and once more it was encored. Madame Bosio "warbled"—the term is not inappropriate—the famous cavatina from I Puritani ("Qui la voce") with wonderful grace and facility; Madame Castellan and Signor Lablache gave the buffo duet between Adina and Dulcamara (L'Elisir) with as much spirit, stage humour, and abandon as if they had been on the boards of the Italian Opera. Mr. Weiss sang a pleasing ballad of his own ("In distant lands") with true sentiment; and the First Part came to an end with the march from Meyerbeer's Camp de Silesie, which—we suppose in order to enhance the attractions of the programme—was put down as "Grand March from L'Etoile du Nord." The piece, however, which is dashing and brilliant, was capitally played, and the amateurs of Norwich did not dispute its genuineness.

The second part was good, without exception, from beginning to end. It should, however, have been awarded the first, instead of the last, place in the programme, being a selection from the works of the great Mozart. The incomparable overture to Die Zauberflöte—"enlevée," as the Parisian critics say, by the orchestra, with an energy such music can hardly fail to inspire—was gracefully contrasted with the quiet and tender aria, "L'Addio," sung by Miss Dolby in her chastest manner. Not the least interesting point in the Mozart selection was the cavatina "Dalla sua pace," omitted so inconsistently from the opera of Don Giovanni at the Italian theatres, although it is the only opportunity allotted to Don Ottavio of saying something intelligible about himself and his passion for Donna Anna. Mr. Sims Reeves gave this pure and expressive air with admirable feeling, showing himself to be as thoroughly imbued with the spirit of Mozart's music as he had already, in Acis and Galatea, proved himself a sincere worshipper at the shrine of Händel. Another charming air—"Constanze, dich wieder zu sehen, dich" (from The Seraglio), in which the exhaustless vein of tender melody possessed by Mozart is again displayed—was sung with true expression by Herr Reichardt, who more than confirmed the highly favourable impression he had already made at the festival. The "Non più audrai," delivered with infinite gusto by Signor Lablache; the flowing "Sull' aria," the sweetest and simplest of duets (from Figaro—not, as put down in the programme, from Don Giovanni) sung with perfect taste by Mesdames Castellan and Novello; the familiar, but never unwelcome "La ci darem," equally well given by Madame Castellan and Signor Bellatti; the aria, "Deh! vieni, non tardar" (Figaro), and the well-known "Batti, batti," both sung exquisitely, the first by Madame Novello, the last by Madame Bosio; and the whole of the grand and unequalled finale to the first act of Don Giovanni—in which all the principal singers, except Madame Bosio, Miss Dolby, and Signor Gardoni, took part—completed the second part, and brought to an effective termination a concert which, lengthy as it was, deserved the warmest eulogy, and afforded unmixed satisfaction to the audience.

The performance of Handel's Messiah, on Friday, in presence of an audience of more than 1,350 persons, virtually brought the musical proceedings to a close. All the principal singers, except Lablache, were employed, and the general execution of Händel's masterpiece, was as grand, impressive, and correct, as could possibly have been desired. The only new feature was Madame Bosio's "Rejoice greatly," which was one among the numerous encores that prolonged the duration of the oratorio to such an unseasonable hour, and which, though surprisingly fluent and brilliant, did not come up to the expectations formed by her singing at the rehearsal, in consequence of the lady's extreme nervousness. This was Madame Bosio's first attempt at English sacred music. A more auspicious beginning could not have been desired.

The pecuniary results of the eleventh anniversary meeting cannot yet be calculated with certainty. The following statement of the numbers who have attended each day, and classification of tickets and prices, may afford some clue:—

| | Patrons at 21s. | Reserved, 12s. 6d. | Unreserv. 10s. 6d. | Sets. | Total. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Tuesday morning ..... | 85 | 212 | 90 | 61 | 448 |
| Tuesday evening ..... | 40 | 195 | 61 | 311 | 607 |
| Wednesday morning... | 168 | 510 | 244 | 57 | 979 |
| Wednesday evening ... | 54 | 211 | 100 | 254 | 619 |
| Thursday morning ... | 114 | 481 | 264 | 66 | 925 |
| Thursday evening..... | 72 | 443 | 247 | 444 | 1,206 |
| Friday morning ..... | 213 | 593 | 574 | 65 | 1,445 |

From the table subjoined, showing the total number at each of the last three meetings, it appears that, although there was an additional morning concert this time, the issue is considerably in favour of 1848 and 1852:—

| | 1848. | 1852. | 1854. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Tuesday Morning ... | — ... | — ... | 448 |
| „ Evening ... | 1,256 ... | 1,023 ... | 607 |
| Wednesday Morning... | 1,289 ... | 482 ... | 979 |
| „ Evening ... | 980 ... | 762 ... | 619 |
| Thursday Morning ... | 1,646 ... | 1,343 ... | 925 |
| „ Evening ... | 1,087 ... | 1,053 ... | 1,206 |
| Friday Morning ... | 965 ... | 1,947 ... | 1,353 |
| | 7,173 | 6,610 | 6,137 |

This decrease is laid to the account of the prices of reserved seats, which they declare to be too high, and affirm that the old prices of one guinea for the patrons' gallery, and half-a-guinea for the other places, were preferable. The enormous expenses of the meeting may be guessed when we state that, to the principal solo singers alone £1,500 has been paid! The band, chorus, and all the incidental expenses remain to be accounted for. If such a system is continued, it will be a farce to announce this meeting in aid of the charities of Norfolk and the city of Norwich.

The chief direction of the proceedings devolved upon the hon. secretaries, Messrs. G. E. Simpson and Roger Kerrison, from whom we have to acknowledge the utmost attention and civility, and to whose judicious management and indefatigable zeal the satisfactory nature of all the arrangements were mainly due. Mr. Benedict proved himself one of the most able, diligent, and untiring of conductors. To Mr. Hill, the chorus master, and Mr. Bray, the leader at the rehearsals, much praise is due; as also to Mr. Goodwin, the librarian.

The dress ball took place on Friday night in the Assembly Rooms. There was not more than 300 persons present—a sad falling off from the last Festival, when upwards of 500 met together to celebrate the termination of the Norwich Triennial Jubilee, with dancing and light chat. However, the 300 made themselves very merry on Friday night, and kept up the ball till late in the morning. Wherefore, the 11th anniversary may be said to have died a natural death.

ALPHONSE KARR ON LITERARY PROPERTY.

[The following translation of an article on literary property, by one of the most celebrated living essayists, will be read with interest at the present time. Had M. Karr been an Englishman, whatever he might have found in the social condition of the painter, he would have seen nothing to boast of in that of the musician, who is really as ill off as any of those who are compelled to live by the work of their brain, and yet are unable to secure it in perpetuum for the benefit of their old age, or for the good of members of their family who may survive them.—ED.]

WHEN I was travelling in Belgium I found many people discussing the subject of literary piracy. While awaiting the result of the efforts made to protect literary property from the foreigner, I began to reflect upon the situation of this species of property.

"The heirs of a literary work or any other production of mind and genius which appertains to the Fine Arts, shall have the exclusive proprietorship of it, namely: the widow of the writer or of the artist, during her life-time: and the children for twenty years."

"The heirs of a house,—of a hogshead of molasses, clos à crochet, shall have the exclusive proprietorship for ever to themselves, and transmit it intact to their descendants to the end of the world."

Why this difference between the man who built the house opposite, and him who wrote Cinna and the Cid?

"The works of genius are too far above the material works of the hand to be regulated in the same manner,—they are torches whose light belongs, like that of the sun, to all: it cannot be left to the will of an heir to extinguish these torches, and leave minds in darkness."

This is flattering: so spoke the fox to the crow. Meanwhile, let us see how these men, so necessary, so luminous, are treated, when they attempt to meddle with material affairs, political or otherwise; there is then a commotion: people shrug their shoulders and send them back to their lyres. Writers are unfortunate centaurs. If, like men, they ask for bread and breeches, people say to them: "Allons donc! you are horses—equi ut poetae alendi, sed non sagisandi—you shall have neither bread nor breeches. Eat hay, while you are waiting for a load. Now draw—hu! ho! diah! especially do not caper." "Well, then! give us hay." "What!" is the reply, "do you then forget your celestial origin? You are men made in the image of God—os homini sublime dedit. Oh! we will take better care of your dignity than you do. We will beware of giving you hay. Accept the assurance of our profound admiration."

Literary property has been long and repeatedly discussed. Ten years since I proposed, and I propose again to-day, a solution so simple, that it is almost ridiculous to state it, almost ridiculous that it should not have been adopted at once without discussion.

"Literary property is property."

This principle laid down, I defy you to find a single case in which the laws respecting property in general do not apply perfectly to literary property. Let us take at random some examples from the circumstances which most frequently present themselves. A vaudevillist finds the subject of a book to his liking, he wishes to dramatise it—what is the legal position of the two authors? Nothing is more simple: that of two neighbouring proprietors, one of whom wishes to build on the wall of the other; the first buys of the second the right to do so. Let us accept for a moment the coarse phrases of torches, luminaries, &c., by means of which writers are despoiled. I suppose that in fact a work concerns the glory of a country: it is feared that the heir may, by ill-will, ignorance or indifference, allow to become extinct a work useful for public instruction, the elevation of minds, the honour of the nation; this case may be still more simply settled. There is a house which occupies a location indispensable for a railroad station,—for a hospital—in a word, for a destination which concerns the public good—what do you do? You turn out the proprietor "for public utility," and pay him the estimated value of the property. What would the proprietors of houses say if a law should read thus:

"Houses shall belong to the heirs of those who may have built them during twenty years, dating from the decease of the latter. At the expiration of twenty years they shall belong to whoever may wish to take them."

It is impossible to reflect for five minutes on this state of things, without feeling a powerful astonishment at a class of men, who alone cannot leave to their children the result of their labours, whose entire lives, days and nights, have not succeeded in creating a heritage which can ensure bread for their families. I was present, a short time since, at the interment of Doctor Blanche, celebrated for the cure of mental maladies. The church of Passey was full of the friends of the deceased. Blanche loved artists and writers, and in these professions, where one is poorer and becomes insane more frequently than in others, he had occasion but too often to give them proofs of sympathy and disinterestedness. I looked at those countenances, of which no other assemblage could give an analogous representation: those bald heads, those locks whitened by care, those deeply furrowed brows, those eyes darting sombre glances from hollow orbits, those meagre and debilitated bodies, those nervous movements, those anxious countenances, those marks of approaching death imprinted on the countenances of men of forty years: and I reflected that there were present the élite of artists and thinkers, that these men were the master minds of the entire world, and I said to myself: "I could wish that the bourgeois might see this assembly, and perhaps they would at least pardon talent and genius.". On my return from the cemetery, I recalled to memory the names of authors who had died of hunger.

"Quel bien posséda Homère?
Une bésace et un bâton."

Torquato Tasso, in a sonnet to his cat, entreats her to lend him the green light of her eyes, for he has not the wherewith to buy a candle.

"Non avere candelle per inscrivere i miei versi."

Milton sold the librarian, Thompson, his Paradise Lost for ten pounds sterling, stipulating that half of this price should be payable only in case the work reached a second edition. This poem brought the family of Thompson more than a hundred thousand crowns. Milton died in poverty; it is true that this was partly his own fault,—he had been an ardent republican, and, at the restoration of the Stuarts, imagined, I know not why, that he might retain his principles and opinions. Camõens died in a hospital, wounded, maimed, and poor, at the age of sixty-two. Cervantes lived and died also maimed and poor, in 1616. Ariosto inhabited a very mean dwelling, and jested on the magnificence of the palaces he had described in his Orlando. He said: "It is easier to collect words than stones." La Sage passed his life in forced labours and in poverty. Where would La Fontaine have died, if, after having passed nearly twenty years in the house of Mdme. La Sablière, he had not found an asylum with another friend, Mdme. Flervant, who said to him: "Madame de Sablière is dead, come home with me:" "I was coming," he replied. Diderot considered it a good business to write for a missionary six sermons for which he received fifty crowns. A writer complains of the dearness of bread in Paris—that writer was Jean Jacques Rousseau. Dryden died indigent at the age of seventy. Linnæus mended his old shoes with bits of pasteboard.

We might find other examples among our contemporaries. We ask for writers and artists neither pensions nor charity—encouragements of this kind are too often held out to mediocre people, who do not need encouragement, for them alone I despair. We ask only that writers and artists should have the benefit of the common law, that they be no longer parias, and their children disinherited. The law is equal for all—it is said—yes, for the chiffonier and the prince, for the peasant and for the duke and peer—there is but a single exception, it is that of the writer and artist, whose children, among us, possess an inheritance only during twenty years.

It is a remarkable thing that, amongst all those who consecrate their existence to the Fine Arts, the writer receives the worst treatment. The vulgar man pardons the talent of the painter and the great musician. In their presence his self-love does not suffer too much; he has not learned painting, he has not taken lessons in music; but for that, who knows?—nothing proves that he also might not have been a great musician or a great painter. But the writer! He has learned to write; the vulgar man is therefore obliged to admit a superiority of intelligence, and to make him pay for it dearly. Invent, respecting a celebrated author, the grossest falsehoods, the vilest calumnies, people believe them without hesitation. It is so pleasant to reduce him to a level with the multitude!

I therefore sum up my arguments by repeating once more: I demand but one thing relative to literary property—a law thus worded:

"The labours of the mind shall be henceforth treated as equal to the labours of the body."

Literary labours are labours. What a man constructs with his blood, his marrow and his thought, shall be elevated to the rank of that which is built of stones and plaster. The man of letters possessing genius is a man and a citizen in spite of that. The law, equal for all, shall be so for him. His children shall not be disinherited and dishonoured. The property of Lamartine and Hugo shall be considered as important as that of the hosier at the corner. In a word:—

"LAW.

"Literary property is property."

WHITBY.—Two performances took place at Whitby on the 8th inst.—one in the morning and one in the evening—consisting of selections from Händel's Messiah and Haydn's Creation, in aid of the funds for the erection of a new church at Ugthorpe. It is proposed that the new church in contemplation shall consist of nave, transept and chancel, with a stone spire at the west-end, and shall contain two hundred and ten sittings, all free and unappropriated. The probable cost was estimated at about one thousand pounds, of which £555 had already been collected. In order to procure the balance, the Rev. W. Long, vicar of Lyth, conceived the idea of an oratorio, and engaged the services of Messrs. Kaye, Ashton, Martin and Bates, from the Durham choir; Mr. Baker and Master Sanderson, from York; Mrs. Sunderland, and Miss Barwick. The Yorkshire Gazette of the 16th inst. reports very favourably on the performance, but at the same time expresses its regret, that the inhabitants generally did not give the scheme the support to which it was fairly entitled. Mr. H. C. Barker, son of Mr. Barker, of the York Cathedral choir, presided at the organ and accompanied the different pieces in the most efficient manner. The Wizard of the North, Professor Anderson, has been astonishing the natives of York with his feats of legerdemain, and seems to have been driving a very fair trade at the Theatre Royal.

KEIGHLEY.—The annual meeting of the Keighley Musical Union was held on Tuesday evening last, the chair being taken by the retiring president Mr. W. L. Marriner. The expenses of the society for the current year having been examined and found correct, were passed unanimously. The cash account shows a very encouraging balance to commence the ensuing year, from which the committee will, no doubt, be enabled to afford their subscribers and the musical public in Keighley an extra provision of musical entertainments, both in number and quality, during the coming season. The following gentlemen were unanimously elected officers for the ensuing year:—Mr. Thos. Blakey, president; Mr. Thos. Brigg, vice-president; Mr. W. L. Marriner, treasurer; Mr. John Smith, secretary; Mr. John Normington, collector; and Mr. John Sugden, librarian.

CLIFTON.—The Clifton Chronicle of September 20, announces a concert for the following Monday, at the Victoria Rooms, for which Miss Poole, Miss Milner, Mr. Weiss, Mr. H. C. Cooper, Herr Hausmann, and Mr. Charles Blagrove are engaged. Early in the ensuing month a visit is promised by Mrs. Clara Novello and Mr. Sims Reeves. The veteran Henry Phillips is also announced to give his pictorial and musical entertainment, "The City of the Sultan," in the course of next week. The theatre was opened for the season on Monday last. The house was good, and the company, both in talent and numbers, highly respectable. Mr. Walter Shelly, who played Hamlet, comes from the Edinburgh theatre with a good reputation. He was listened to with favour. The parts of Gertrude and Ophelia were ably sustained by Miss Fanny Bennett and Miss Young.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

To Messrs. C. Hale and Son, of Cheltenham.—We beg to say that the paragraph in question was copied from one of the Bath or Clifton (we believe the latter) papers, of last or the preceding week.—(Ed. M. W.)

A Constant Reader is informed that the Musical World has no connection whatever with the paper in question; moreover, we cannot "set his mind clear" on the point; thirdly, there are many of the same opinion as the writer in the journal alluded to; and, to conclude, Lablache was a great artist.

To Organists.—The papers on the Panopticon Organ are published, in Nos. 28 and 32 of the present series. The article on the Leeds Organ will be found in No. 30; and the Review of the Organ at St. George's Hall in Nos. 34, 35, and 37.

F. L—o. is informed that the term "Sordine" in pianoforte music means the damper, and that, in fact, "Con Sordine," and "Senza Sordine" implies the disuse and use of the pedal—the pedal, of course, taking off the dampers.

Il Flauto Magico.—We cannot print Correspondent's diagram, and to publish his letter without it would amount to giving our readers a conundrum. Perhaps "Il Flauto Magico" could explain, by words, the flute fingering which he is anxious to make known. We shall be glad to make known his explanations. To us the diagram appears like a series of eggs hatched and unhatched—the white and black notes carrying with them a strong resemblance. But we are no flute-players, and plead ignorance.

OBITUARY.

Mrs. Liston, widow of the late John Liston, the celebrated comedian, died on Tuesday last.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, September 23rd, 1854.

The fate of the Royal Academy of Music appears settled. There can be little doubt that, in its present shape at least, this, now not over-young, and never over-flourishing, institution is doomed either to present extinction, or even a less honourable state of dwindling insignificance. Several weeks since, we had occasion to refer to the difficulties in which the Academy finds itself placed. They are now almost wholly of a pecuniary nature. The lease of the premises in Tenterden Street is on the point of expiring, and cannot be renewed. The revenue derived from the payments of students does not meet the current expenditure. The masters, it appears, can with difficulty, if at all, obtain their stipulated remuneration; the scholars "on the foundation" can no longer be afforded the advantage of free residence and "commons;" and everything, in short, gives note of rapid dissolution. Several schemes of remedy for this mortal ailment have been proposed, but none, we fancy, will be judged worth the cost of trial. The Queen, it is understood, has been solicited openly to patronize the Academy, but has declined,—whether because it is an English establishment, and, therefore, innately unworthy of the honour, or because it is considered proper to reserve the benefit of patronage for such institutions as are already sufficiently flourishing without it, is not, of course, given us to know. Among other projects, Parliament is to be applied to for a grant of money; and again, it is proposed to form a musical joint-stock company, in the shares of which the public will be invited to speculate. Touching these two schemes, we can safely predict, that the first will fail, because under no semi-democratic constitution, like ours, is the public money voted in aid of private enterprise, save in rare cases, and then wholly on high commercial and utilitarian considerations; and the second will share a like fate, because the capitalist and speculating masses, though eager enough to bite "on undeniable security," will assuredly fight shy of anything so little promising of dividend as a school of musical art.

The difficulties of the Academy, however, though now taking wholly a pecuniary form, are, we fear, not remediable by the agent so generally sought for in this Plutonic class of disorders. They lie far deeper than the mere plus or minus result of a banker's balance. They are constitutional, and irradicable by all temporary measures. Their evil seeds were cast in with the foundations of the edifice, and have ripened and flourished with its extension. Like the armoured giant in the Castle of Otranto, they have grown too big for their house, and find their strength only in rending it to pieces. It is grievous to see an institution which ought to have done so much for music in this country,—which has so many successful congeners abroad,—and which, even here with all its faults, has been the alma mater of not a few excellent men and choice musicians, thus falling helplessly to decay. And it is additionally grievous to reflect that this fall, come when it may, will be eagerly hailed, in many quarters, as another proof that England is not a musical country. To this latter doctrine the Musical World has never subscribed. In our view of the matter, it seems sheer and self-evident absurdity to revile, as unmusical, a country in which, more than in any other, the greatest music of the world is thoroughly known, habitually well performed, and as well appreciated;—a country which Händel chose for his home, and which, in late years, led the van of universal opinion in proclaiming the wonderful powers of Mendelssohn;—a country wherein those monster festival gatherings, so lauded elsewhere as things of rare and national importance, have for years past been settled in many of our provincial cities, as matters of triennial course and certainty;—a country, finally, which, in some branches of the art altogether pre-eminent,* has, in all, produced a number of men of whom it may be safely said that their great talents deserve a far larger meed of public recognition than fashion and opportunity have hitherto been willing to permit. Not, then, because England is unmusical, will its Academy of Music fall. It will fall—apart from all question of its birth-place or any adventitious consideration whatever—because it deserves to fall. It has failed in its engagements. In so far as its own operation is concerned, it will leave us perhaps worse than it found us.

Twenty years ago, a musical instinct, truly extraordinary in comparison with all that preceded it, was springing up in this country. Young, warm, ardent blood was found welling out on the surface of an effete and worn-out profession—fitly not then dignified with the title of an art—bearing with it everywhere the promise of reconstruction and ennoblement. A race of youngsters arose whom no traditions could bind—no faith, save that of their senses, could convert. They thought they saw what music had been, then was, and might be, and were stiff-necked and perverse in their lovings and hatings. The Beggar's Opera was for them no opera; but in the Eroica at least they found a symphony. They would neither accept Arne and Shield because their fathers had dubbed them great, nor reject Mozart and Beethoven because they were pronounced insane. They could think for themselves, they could feel keenly, they could even create—it might be roughly, perhaps. Their one need—the need of all who have not had it—was education. They wanted all these elements of the artist-spirit agglomerated, refined, and instructed by the master's hand, and finally led on to success. Just at this opportunity, and most aptly as everybody thought, up rose the Academy. The chief musical necessity of England had been a school of art, and the Academy was to supply this want. It was to systematise musical education, and make it accessible to all. It was to be the discoverer and nurse of genius. It was to produce fruit, and of the best, in abundance; first-class instrumentalists for our orchestras, singers unimpeachable for our theatres and concerts, composers great at all points, and armed to throw down the gauntlet to all comers—as fast, by the way, as nature happened to supply the raw material. Finally, since all cannot find entrance to the exhibitive and imaginative regions of art, and some must teach for other's pleasure and their own profit, it was to replace the scrub-race of the profession—the quack, pretentious, ill-taught, unlettered, mere music-masters, by a plentiful supply of teachers who should combine, with mechanical skill to instruct, the knowledge of the musician, the taste of the artist, and the habits of the gentleman. These were the promises of the Academy;—the performances we can sum up in few words. We begin exceptionally. There is a certain number of men to whom the Tenterden-street authorities will point triumphantly, as specimens of their culture;—men whose unquestionably great talents are most warmly recognized by all musicians. We need not name them,—they are perfectly known and as perfectly esteemed. These men, however, were reared in the very earliest and strongest days of the Academy, and before the evil principles of its foundation had had time to assume importance. They brought with them great natural gifts; they worked hard at their school, and have worked harder since they left it. Of all the rest, be they as they may, composers, instrumentalists, singers, it may be confidently said that not one has reached eminence—not one is there who has not been beaten at all points by men who have had no academical advantages. The current issue has been plain, flat, but sadly too prolific, mediocrity. For nothing was the Academy looked to more hopefully than the production of a race of fine singers; and in no particular has failure been more palpable and complete. Some few of the earlier students have, by much after-diligence and fortunate opportunity, raised themselves into merited repute; but in the main the fact is as we have stated it. The singers of the Academy are inferior to those not of it; and the institution, therefore, has done nothing for one of our greatest public deficiencies. In the article of teachers we have, at present, abundant proof of academical fecundity, but, unfortunately, nothing more. There are, of course, honourable exceptions,—such men as we have already referred to; but the mass is composed of eager youngsters, intensely struggling for employment at any price. Compelled by circumstances to teach before they themselves have learned, they have much of the swagger and assumption usually found in large public schools, and too little of the solid culture and gentlemanly feeling such institutions reputedly engender. The noble founder of the Academy is reported once to have said that he "should never be satisfied until music was taught here, as abroad, for a shilling a lesson." If the Noble Earl did say this, he has certainly two merits,—the first, that of making the most extraordinary oversight on record as to the differing fiscal pressures of this and other countries; and the second, that he pledged himself to nearly the only practical result the Academy seems likely to accomplish.

The causes which have induced this utter decadence of so promising an institution are, doubtless, many and complicated. But they are also worth the trouble of investigation; for, if any vigorous attempt at reconstruction be made—and such an attempt is due to the rising musical importance of this country—the future must comprehend, in order to profit by, the lessons of the past. The limits of such a paper as this are obviously insufficient to permit a close scrutiny into the history of the Academy, and to extract from it and discuss every circumstance that might seem to have influenced its original prospects. One cause, however, there is, which we shall briefly notice, and which is well nigh sufficient to account for the present result. We mean the total want of general system prevalent, from first to last, in the Academy's teaching. No school of art, obviously enough, can make great pupils without great materials to work with. We are mindful of the old proverb, which teaches us how we cannot make silk purses. We do not expect any Academy to create genius, or feeling, or industry; or, by any sic volo, sic jubeo process, to turn out great men by the dozen at will. But the complaint against our Academy is identical, in nature and verity, with that against our "National Opera,"—namely, not that it does not do better than all the rest of the world, but that it does not do as much as it might with the materials at command. The first duty of the managers of such an institution, before a pupil is admitted or a fee taken, is obviously to determine on a complete system of instruction. For every branch of the art, theoretical and practical—from composition to the kettle drums—"a method," as it is termed, should be provided, and its employment enforced on every master, whatever his pretensions. And as these "methods"—more especially about harmony and the like—are legion, and the difficulty of selecting from among them might chance to be considerable, this task should devolve on a committee of the ablest professors in the country; who, it were rational to suppose, would form part of the executive government of the Academy. If they could find no written systems in England sufficiently able and comprehensive, they should import them;—if still unsatisfied that their curriculum of teaching was the best possible, they should make one for themselves. System and authority should reign supreme throughout. It should be impossible to find, in such an institution, two pupil-violinists who would differ in the bowing of any passage; or two harmony-scholars who would disagree as to the spelling of a dischord. No such fixed idea as this, however, seems to have prevailed at the formation of our Academy. The Earl of Westmoreland—a most excellent and kind-hearted man, a good diplomatist, a great lover of the arts, and not a very disreputable compiler of music—who led the way in this undertaking, appears to have considered that, a school-building provided, an endowment partially secured, and a number of competent masters assembled, all was done that the occasion demanded; and that this Academy had from thenceforward but to march on gloriously to a total reconstruction of English art. But in so thinking, lay, as we believe, the root of almost all the evil the Academy has since so plentifully done and suffered. A collection of masters was established, instead of a system of teaching. As there was no original authority capable of binding with the force of law, each master gradually became a small focus of attraction, as his method or manner was more or less popular. By-and-by, the Academy began to be spied out from afar off as a snug haven for the destitute. Messieurs, Herren, and Signori, began to arrive, with pressing recommendations from the Count of Saxe-this, and the Grand Duke of Hesse-the-other. They might not have much ballast for the voyage, either in their heads or pockets; but they had a goodly blast of ambassadorial trumpets to fill their sails, and so their passage was quick and land-fall happy. Many of these gentlemen were ambidexterous on instruments, and some sang with a loud voice. To be sure, they had acquired these properties, for the most part, by a species of scramble with nature, and therefore could scarcely be expected to instruct others scientifically in the things which they themselves only knew by instinct. Besides, they were far too great to be cramped by systems;—they must teach as they pleased or not at all. There were obvious disadvantages—to the pupils, at least—about all this; but coming recommended as they were, what was the Academy to do? We know what it ought to have done, and we see pretty well the result of what it did do. Among its executants there are nearly as many styles as there are masters; while, as to the grammar of music, we much doubt if six Academy lads could be found to parse a tolerably stiff sentence from one of Bach's five-part preludes, and agree as to any of its particulars.

One word more, and we have done. General mental culture is as necessary to the musician as to any man alive. There never was an ignorantly-minded artist since the days of the deluge, and never will be to those of the last great conflagration. A profession which is, here at least, neither over-paid nor too much honoured, will never, as a rule, have its ranks filled from the aristocratic or upper-middle class of society. There may be exceptions, from inclination or otherwise; but the numbers who follow music for a subsistence will always be drawn from the lower-middle ranks of the people. Among this class—we speak, we trust, without offence, for we mean none—education of the best kind is not abundant. The want of it tells strongly on every step in the career of a man who is studying and struggling for the position of an artist. He must necessarily imbibe abstract ideas for which his mind has not been prepared. Poetry, elevation of sentiment, the imperishable principles of truth and beauty, are to be the impelling agents of a nature, hitherto untaught to recognize their existence. And palpable as is this effect in the instance of all general musicians, it becomes even absurdly obvious when applied to the case of the singer. How can a man declaim that which he does not comprehend? How can he sing the language of the grand poets, while he will fail to read the first six lines of Paradise Lost with intelligent emphasis? In a word, how can any one enact the true semblance of a hero, who, in his own inmost soul, knows himself to be a snob? Surely, it is not too much to expect of a National School of Art, that it should be aware of such hindrances as these, and take special measures to counteract them.

As a practical result of the causes on which we have touched, the Academy owes its present position to having, in commercial phrase, "overstocked the market with an unsaleable article." No country needs a college specially for the propagation of mediocrity and common place. They grow fast enough everywhere without academical assistance. But this is just one of those simple facts which our great music school has overlooked. Instead of devoting its energies to the rearing up of a few men of paramount ability, it has been satisfied to produce mere quantity, and that of a very ordinary character. Great men were wanted, and would have paid for the making: the Academy is, by this time, in a position to estimate the pecuniary worth of its labours in the small-ware department.

DRAMATIC.

HAYMARKET.—Mr. Hudson, the Irish Comedian, made his first appearance on Monday last, in the Irish Ambassador, after an absence of several years from England. His name in the bills did not act as a powerful attraction, for a scanty audience assembled to greet him. Scanty as they were, however, they greeted Mr. Hudson most warmly, showing that he had friends in London, and was not altogether unremembered. Mr. Hudson is a rattling, good-humoured and vivacious actor, not very refined, nor very original, nor subtle to wit; but, at least, straightforward and honest, and is always perfect in his business. His Sir Patrick O'Plenipo is not one of his best parts, because it wants elegance, and courtliness, which an Irish gentleman may possess, as well as any other gentleman, as Mr. Hudson knows, but cannot convey in his acting. The Sir Patrick O'Plenipo of Mr. Hudson is just as low and conventional a stage Hibernian as Murtoch Delaney, Teddy Malowney, or Paddy O'Rafferty—three individuals who bear a striking resemblance to each other. Mr. Hudson, nevertheless, was greatly applauded in Sir Patrick O'Plenipo, and was recalled at the fall of the curtain. The other parts in the capital little comedy of the Irish Ambassador, were excellently filled. Mr. Rogers was most admirable as the Spanish Envoy, and displayed genuine comic talent. Miss Reynolds made a graceful and interesting Isabella. Afterwards, Mr. Hudson played Tim Moore in the Irish Lion, and, to our thinking, infinitely better than Sir Patrick O'Plenipo. The Spanish dancers terminate this week an engagement which has proved highly successful.

ADELPHI.—The opening of this theatre for the winter season drew together a very large audience on Monday night. Not satisfied, however, with the attractions of a first night—a sure "card" at the Adelphi, irrespective of the performances—Mr. Webster engaged Mr. Morris Barnett to play his celebrated character, Monsieur Jacques, in the drama so called. Mr. Morris Barnett had given up acting as a profession so long, that his name, except with old play-goers, or the real lovers of the drama, had become dissociated with the stage. His name, nevertheless, was honourably mentioned among those who might be called creators of characters. Mr. Morris Barnett was in high estimation for his delineation of French rôles, but his Monsieur Jacques, so far surpassed all his other performances, as to have left him but an isolated reputation. We forget how many years ago it is since we had previously seen this gentleman personate the old simple-minded Frenchman, but his acting seemed on Monday night to be as natural and powerful as ever, as finished, his notion of the character as finely conceived, and as finely worked out. If we cannot apply the term "elevated" or "ideal" to Mr. Morris Barnett's performance of Monsieur Jacques, we can at least pronounce it as striking and complete a piece of acting as the modern stage can boast of. The audience—those who had previously seen the actor in the part, and those who had not—were all equally delighted, and equally lent their hands and voices to pay tribute to Mr. Morris Barnett's talents. Norma (burlesqued, or travestied) has been revived, with Miss Woolgar and Mr. Paul Bedford in their original parts of Pollio and Norma.

SURREY.—This day se'nnight Miss Romer took her benefit, when the Prophet was given, and the fair lessee appeared for the last time this season, which is the last of the present operatic lease. We believe we may safely congratulate Miss Romer on account of her uninterrupted success throughout the season, which Meyerbeer and Halévy have divided pretty equally between them. Although the appeal in the case of the latter writer has certainly been to popular rather than to sound taste, we honour the sagacity which, in these days of blundering and bankrupt management, can discern and avail itself of a demand that has borne so fair a harvest. Miss Romer's portrait of Fides is one of her happiest efforts. The duet in the third act was encored, and Miss Romer's acting throughout was natural and touching. She was called forward more than once during the evening, and finally retired amidst a shower of bouquets. The opera was followed by a concert, supported by Messrs. Henri Drayton, St. Albyn, and Miss Lowe. Mr. Drayton obtained an encore for a song of Henry Russell's, and Mr. Albyn was recalled for Balfe's "Remember me." The season will close on this day week. On Thursday night The Bohemian Girl was played by desire, Miss Romer appearing in her old part of Arline.

STRAND.—A pièce de circonstance, called The New Wags of Windsor, on the subject of the late court-martial of the 46th, was produced here on Monday. Detail would, of course, be superfluous. It has some excellent practical jokes. The court-martial is held by ladies. Among the hits the best are the "non mi recordos" of the witnesses. The piece was received throughout with loud laughter and applause, and Miss Fanny Beaumont, as counsel for the defendant, in a gown and wig, contributed largely to keep the merry mood at high pressure. The house has been full all the week.

PROVINCIAL.

MANCHESTER.—We give the following extract from the Manchester Courier on the doings of the Royal Italian Company:—"Since our announcement a few weeks since, that it was intended by Mr. Knowles, the proprietor of the Theatre Royal, to afford the musical public of Manchester an opportunity of hearing a series of operas performed in a manner surpassing any previous attempt, both in extent as respects the scheme, and excellence as regards the executants, the plans have been further matured. We find that the répertoire includes Fidelio, Der Freischütz, Zauberflöte, Il Seraglio, La Dame Blanche, Les Huguenots, Robert le Diable, Il Barbiere di Siviglia, Ernani, Norma, Puritani, La Sonnambula, Lucrezia Borgia, La Figlia del Reggimento, La Favorita, Linda di Chamounix, Lucia di Lammermoor, Acis and Galatea, and the new and original opera, by Mr. Loder, of Raymond and Agnes. The engagements include, for prime donne—Madame Caradori, Mademoiselle Agnes Büry, Madame Rudersdorff, Mademoiselle Sedlatzek, and Mademoiselle Albini. For tenori, Herr Reichart, Herr Zape, Signor Santi, and Signor Octave Benedetti. For baritoni, Herr Hubert Formes, Signor Pierini, and Signor Fortini. For bassi, Monsieur Zelger, Signor Gregorio, Signor Ferara, and Herr Carl Formes. The chorus is to consist of thirty voices, chosen from the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, and the Royal Opera, Drury Lane. The ballet will be efficient for the incidental divertissements in the operas, whilst the band will be very complete. With this scheme before us, there can be no doubt of the excellence of the performances, and we should say just as little as to the patronage which will be extended to the scheme."

LEEDS.—We highly approve of the following project, which we extract from the Leeds Intelligencer, and trust that the example may be followed by other of our provincial towns:—"Church Music.—We understand that a society is now in course of formation in this town for the purpose of promoting a knowledge of church music, and affording those who feel an interest in the subject an opportunity of regularly meeting together for its practice, so as to enable them to take an efficient part in the choral service of the church. We believe that an official announcement of the objects of the proposed society will shortly be published, and we have every confidence, from the names of the gentlemen already associated with it, that the designs in contemplation will be fully and effectually carried out. We are glad to hear that our townsman, Mr. W. Bower, has kindly undertaken the responsible duties of musical conductor."

MARGATE.—Mr. Wright has been starring it at the theatre in several of his favourite characters. He took his benefit on Friday evening, when the house was crowded to the ceiling. He is well supported by Mrs. Saville and the rest of the company.

DUBLIN.—We were persuaded that Sophie Cruvelli would please the Dublin public, and so it has turned out. The excitement is universal, and was beyond precedent on her appearance in Fidelio, which will be seen by the following paragraph from the Daily Express:—"The attraction of Cruvelli and the rest of the corps dramatique seems to increase every night, and each new performance adds to the enthusiasm with which she is greeted. The Fidelio was most likely to strike the taste of a Dublin audience, which has been so long accustomed, by its excellent choral societies, to hear music of a solid and classical style. The result has proved it to be so, for the house was crowded in every part. It is also pleasant to add that the performance was deeply and truly appreciated throughout by this vast assemblage. Cruvelli and Tamberlik were loudly called for at the end of the performance, and retired laden with bouquets; nor were the audience satisfied until Cruvelli appeared again, and was again overwhelmed with flowers flung from the most distant parts of the house, while the audience rose and cheered as an Irish house alone can cheer. We must not omit to mention that the chorus and orchestra accomplished their task with the utmost correctness and vigour."

GRISI AND MARIO IN NEW YORK.

MADAME GRISI and Signor Mario made their first appearance before a New York audience at Castle Garden, in the opera of Lucrezia Borgia. The American Journals are in ecstacies, except a few of the very knowing ones, who are inclined to turn restive at the idea of copying their brethren on this side of the water, and accordingly take exceptions, not always in the very best taste, to prove their own independence in musical matters. The fact is, that enthusiasm was never so great, and the reception of the two great artistes far surpassed any thing ever witnessed before. All the honours were paid them. We give the following extract from the New York Weekly Herald which will suggest some idea of the state of public feeling, and how artistic affairs are managed in the States: as regards its being any test of the estimation in which Grisi and Mario are held, that is sheer nonsense. We opine that it is merely a test of the gullibility of such Americans who have more money than wit, or a device of the Barnums, Hacketts, and tutti quanti, who get up such auctions to swindle the public into a belief that there is a tremendous run upon the box-office, to suit their own purposes. We put our readers on their guard against the episode of Mario and the English lady, and leave the whole responsibility with the journal from which we take it:—

"The auction which was to test the estimation in which Grisi and Mario are held by our fellow-citizens was held at Castle Garden, yesterday afternoon. At the hour fixed upon for the beginning of the sale of tickets, there were present about 1200 persons, gathered in front of the stage both on the ground floor and in the gallery. At half-past three o'clock Mr. Leeds made his appearance upon the stage, and without delay proceeded to open the sale.

"'Well, gentlemen,' said he, coming forward to the front of the stage, 'we will now go on with the sale of the tickets, and we shall sell them for a premium on the prices named. Before I commence, however, I will merely say that from No. 1 up to 56, in the front of the gallery, are reserved for the governor and suite. The seats fixed at five dollars are numbered from 600 to 853 inclusive, and from 1100 to 1338, all of which are in the gallery. All the rest of the seats in the gallery will be disposed of for three dollars. We have no diagram of the pit, as the lithographer did not have it out in time; but we will designate the seats by a person holding a red flag over them when they are put up for sale.' A voice: 'How many seats have you reserved for the governor?' Mr. Leeds: 'From No. 1 up to 56, which are directly in the front line of the gallery.' A Voice: 'What governor do you mean?' Mr. Leeds. 'Governor Seymour, the Governor of the State of New York.' A Voice: 'I am a democrat, and that is the reason I ask the question.' Mr. Leeds: 'Yes, sir; that's all right—perfectly right. Now, then, where is the flag-man?' 'Flagman: 'Here I am, sir.' Mr. Leeds: 'Well, hold up the flag so as we can all see where you are. There—that will do. Now, gentlemen, we will give you a privilege—we will begin with No. 600, and give you the privilege of taking ten seats at the premium offered. How much do you bid for 600? There it is, you see; the flag designates the exact place; it is exactly in front of the stage, on the ground floor. How much, gentlemen—how much? Come.' A Voice: 'Fifty dollars.' Mr. Leeds: 'Fifty dollars is bid for it.' Another Voice: 'Seventy-five.' Mr. Leeds: 'Seventy-five. Come, gentlemen—eighty, ninety, one hundred, one hundred and twenty-five, one hundred and fifty, one hundred and seventy-five, two hundred, two hundred and twenty-five, two hundred and fifty. This is the choicest seat. At two hundred and fifty this seat will be sold if there it no more bid for it—at two hundred and fi—one more bid for it, or it is gone now—two hundred and fifty, going—going—gone, at two hundred and fifty to Mr. Coutts.'

Digitized by Google

A Voice: 'Who is Mr. Coutts?' Mr. Leeds: 'Well, gentlemen, in reply to that question, I have only to say that I have had deposited with me fifty pounds sterling, and I pledge you my honour that it is a bonâ fide sale. I have the money to show for it. Now we will go on with the rest.'

"As Mr. Leeds did not, however, enlighten the audience in regard to the purchaser, and as considerable curiosity is manifested in this unknown personage, we will endeavour to enlighten the public in regard to her, for she is a woman, though assuming the name of a man. It appears that Mario has for a long time been beset with the attentions of an English lady of great wealth, who persists in following him wherever he goes, although he has frequently denied her an interview. While in London she was never absent a night during his engagement, and always occupied the most conspicuous place in front of the stage. When he went to St. Petersburgh she followed him, and on his appearance there, one of the first persons he saw among the brilliant audience of the Russian capital was his constant and ardent admirer. In her devotion to him she crossed ocean and continents, and although he has always slighted her attentions and refused to listen to her addresses, her love—if love it can be called—has never grown cold, but appears to increase with time. As soon as she heard of his intention to visit this country, she kept a vigilant watch on his movements, till she found that he was coming in the Baltic, when she immediately engaged rooms on board that vessel, and accompanied him to this country. On their arrival Mario and Grisi put up at the St. Nicholas, and so did Mr. Coutts; and now at the first auction of tickets we find him (we beg the lady's pardon—her) giving two hundred and fifty dollars for the first seat. The other seats sold at similar premiums.

"In a leading article, commenting upon the above scene, it is stated that the amount realized by the sale of tickets must have been close upon 25,000 dolls. As a considerable number of the seats were sold to speculators, who in their turn will make a large profit upon them, we may set down the actual amount that will be paid for admissions at little short of 30,000 dolls. When we add to this the sums that will be disbursed by the fairer portion of the audience for dresses, new coiffures, kid gloves, and eau de Cologne—to say nothing of carriage-hire, we think that we shall not be overstating the amount which the début of Grisi and Mario will cost the New York public in fixing it at 35,000 dolls. After this, he will be a bold and wildly speculative individual who will venture to hint at the remotest chance of anything like a commercial revulsion."

The following abridged extract from the New York Daily Times, of Sept. 5th, will enable our readers to form their own opinion of the success of Signor Mario and Madame Grisi:—

"No event in the musical history of New York deserves to be chronicled with more exactitude than the appearance last evening of Madame Grisi and Signor Mario. Long as the public mind has been prepared for this now realized pleasure, it came even at last as a surprise. For the past ten days only have we been certain that it would occur. Rumours of the first appearance of Mario and Grisi were fast becoming part of the standard newspaper literature of the age. At the last moment it was difficult to divest oneself of mere rumour for the substitution of real fact. But it is accomplished. Grisi and Mario, those glorious exponents of divine art, have played before an American audience, and received a small instalment of that admiration so justly their own.

"The vocation of a critic is never less facile than when—as in the present case—he has to closely follow in the footsteps of others. Every form of praise—every atom of criticism, has been exhausted on these renowned artists. Repetition is a necessity with those who would speak of them anew. A repetition of praise, however, when well deserved, is gratifying, and always obtains the suffrages of the public.

"Simply, then, Grisi and Mario are what they are said to be—emphatically the greatest artists of the age. It is scarcely necessary, nor indeed is it possible, to say in what their especial excellence consists. Physical perfection is, of course, a main element, but not the only one. Perhaps the most striking—as it is the most gratifying—peculiarity of their performance, is the intellectuality that pervades it. On the lyric stage, it is customary to sacrifice sense to sound. The majority of artists are content if they can give an extraordinary exhibition of florid vocalism. The text is consequently sacrificed, and, in the end, we are impressed only with the dexterity of a lengthy singing lesson. Now, with Grisi and Mario it is totally different. They are never going to sing; they make no demonstrations of song-like propensities, but simply speak with the passion of the moment and the intensity it demands—in song. The wonderfully natural effect this produces, and the singular air of intellectuality it throws in consequence over the performance, must be experienced and enjoyed to be understood. We have had nothing like it before.

"Of Madame Grisi's performance last evening, perhaps the most effective portion, dramatically and musically considered, was the finale to the opera. There was an agonized intensity about it—a wild grief—that was little else than awful. The finale to the first act, however, appeared to gratify the audience in a greater degree. It was, of course, admirable.

"Signor Mario, with his fine, handsome face, and the air of perfect breeding, fairly intoxicated the audience. In the romanza, "Di Piscatore Ignobile," he permitted the narrative meaning of the composer to explain itself, and did not once strive for a vocal effect. He quietly spoke an exquisite melody as no other man living could have sung it. The story of his birth was narrated, as we might expect it to be on the suggestion of the moment. Thus much we can say easily of the romanza; but we lack words to describe our admiration of Signor Mario in the scena of the second act—"Com' è soave"—and in the famous terzetto—"Guai se ti sfugge un moto." Our readers must hear for themselves, and know how completely it exhausts praise. Signor Mario's acting throughout was quiet and reserved, with occasional touches of dramatic power. The death scene was eminently dramatic."

Of the second performance we have not received any authentic report. Lucrezia Borgia was to have been repeated, and Norma was speedily to follow.

THE USE OF THE "CORNET"-STOP IN ORGANS.

A CORRESPONDENT writes to tell us that, in wandering about lately, for health and relaxation, he found himself at Great Yarmouth, and having heard that the church of St. Nicholas, in that goodly town, contained one of the very finest old organs in England, he determined to inspect it. He gives us his general impression as to the organ,—by the way, we shall be tempted, some day or other, to describe it particularly to our readers, for it deserves all that can be said in its praise,—but tells us that "a cornet of five ranks, belonging to the Great Organ, was unusable, the slide being fastened up;" he was told "it had not been used for years;" and concludes by asking us the nature and use of the stop, and what its offence might be that it should be thus treated.

We will endeavour not only to satisfy him, but also to give our readers some information as to the nature and original intent of this register, now so misused and so little understood.

We must premise that by the word "Cornet," we have no reference whatever to that detestable inversion of the three-rank sesquialtra, from middle C upwards, which used under name of "Cornet" to prevail some five-and-twenty years since, and may still, perhaps, be found in the work of the inferior organ-builders. We speak only of the "Cornet," as Byfield, and such men, used to make it. This stop existed separately from all the other compound registers. It was usually "mounted," i. e., its pipes were placed on a groove-board of their own, and elevated some four or five feet above the sound-boards of the great organ,—it extended only from middle C upwards, and was almost invariably of five ranks—the first rank being a metal stop-diapason of eight feet pitch, and the rest consisting of principal, twelfth, fifteenth, etc., according to the judgment of the maker. There is no stop in the organ which has been so ignorantly treated, and the intent of which has been so entirely misconceived. If we turn back to the days of Marsh and Stanley, whose organ voluntaries once so popular, are not in some places, we fear, quite yet forgotten, we find entire movements written purposely to display this cornet stop as a solo. In fact, "Cornet Voluntaries"—(the cornet performing a series of brilliant solo passages, accompanied by some other portion of the instrument)—were, in those days, reckoned among the chief vehicles for the display of finger dexterity for the organist. How anybody, enjoying the blessing of ears, could have endured this howling assemblage of strong harmonics treated as a solo-stop, may well pass our comprehension. The modern organist who happens to possess one of these registers in his great organ, abhorring its solo-use, and not aware, by tradition, of any other, rather naturally, than otherwise, prefers its total silence to its presence in a manner which distresses his ears and draws ridicule on his favourite instrument. Thus much, then, by way of answer to our correspondent's query as to the, "fastening up of the slide" in the Yarmouth organ.

The original intent of the cornet was, beyond all doubt, to remedy an evil in the full organ, that was then perceived, has been felt and struggled against ever since, and is only now, after a lapse of some two hundred and fifty years, beginning to receive its real and scientific abolition—we mean the weakness of the trebles as compared with the basses. The old builders undoubtedly perceived the defect, and, as undoubtedly, introduced the five-rank cornet with only a treble compass, as its remedy. But this remedy, tolerably effectual as it is, so far as power is concerned, has the serious disadvantage of altering the quality, as well as the force, of the trebles to which it is applied. Some of the continental builders of the same date equally felt the defect in question, but took another method of remedying it. They made the upper octaves of their eight, four, and two feet stops, to consist of two ranks of pipes each; and on this construction we find the organ at the great church in Rotterdam, and some others. This remedy, however, was neither so philosophically correct, nor so successful, as the other; for the two unisons so nearly destroyed each other that their combined effect was scarcely, if at all, greater than that of a single pipe.

The true remedy for this defect is now, at length, found in Cavaillé's system of increasing the scales for the treble pipes, accompanied by correspondingly increasing air-pressures. As is the case with everything this great builder has done, this discovery was the result of purely logical deduction. He perceived that, in all orchestral wind-instruments, since the diameter of the tube remains unchanged, the scale must, relatively, increase enormously for the higher notes, but also demands a vastly increased tension of air. He has transferred this principle to his organ-building—with what results, those who have heard his magnificent instruments at St. Denis and the Madeleine, will be able to testify.

In all new organs, this "increasing-pressure" system should, without hesitation, be adopted; but in all old ones which possess a cornet-stop, we recommend, instead of "fastening up the slide," putting the cornet into the best possible order, and using it with the full organ. After the more scientific plan of the French builder, it is the next best remedy we know for an evil which both were designed to overcome.

MADEMOISELLE RACHEL.

The following interesting particulars respecting the great French tragic actress are extracted from the fourth volume of the Mémoires d'un Bourgeois de Paris, by Dr. Véron, and will, no doubt, possess an attraction for all our readers, who, in their character of artists, must necessarily be always the first to appreciate and admire the grand representatives and models of art:—

"In my rapid course through the first half of the 19th century, I take a pleasure in relating, with ample détails, everything which has caused a sensation in arts and literature. The stage and literature procure for a man, even at the present day, universal and lasting celebrity, and our curiosity is excited by the very names of the poets of the most ancient times. Euripides and Sophocles occupy as much room in men's memories as Miltiades and Themistocles. La Fontaine wrote to Madlle. de Champmeslé:—

"'La nuit des temps nous la saurons dompter,
'Moi par écrire et vous par réciter!
'Nos noms unis perceront l'ombre noire.
'Vous régnerez longtemps dans la mémoire,
'Apres avois régné jusques ici
'Dans les esprits, dans les cœurs même aussi.'

"One fine summer's evening, the 12th of June, 1838, being in search of shade and solitude (if you search well, you will find everything at Paris, even solitude and shade), I entered the Théâtre-Français, about eight or nine o'clock. There were four spectators in the stalls; I made the fifth. My attention was attracted to the stage by a strange physiognomy, full of expression, with a projecting forehead, and a black eye, hidden beneath the orbit, and full of fire, the whole placed upon a fragile body, endowed, however, with a certain degree of elegance in its postures, movements and attitudes. A resonant, sympathetic voice, of the most happy pitch, and particularly intelligent, enchained my mind, which was listless and more inclined to idleness than admiration. This strange physiognomy—the eye full of fire, the fragile body, the intelligent voice, were those of Mademoiselle Rachel, who was reciting the part of Camille in Horace for her first début. The lively and profound impression the young actress instantaneously produced on me, recalled to my mind a train of confused thoughts. At last, by taxing my memory, I remembered a young girl, with a singular physiognomy, playing the part of la Vendéenne at the Gymnase, and I also remembered a mere child, with poor garments and clumsy shoes, who, on being asked before me, in the passage of some theatre, what she was doing, replied, to my great astonishment, in a bass voice and with the utmost seriousness: 'I am pursuing my studies.' I recognised in Mademoiselle Rachel the singular physiognomy at the Gymnase, and the young girl, poorly clad, who 'was pursuing her studies.'

"Those persons are greatly to be pitied who, in matters of art, can neither abhor nor admire. Whether I have to do with pictures, statues, monuments, singers, comedians, or tragedians, I abhor or admire. Little Rachel astonished me—her talents rendered me enthusiastic. Nothing would satisfy me but to find out, as soon as possible, my friend Merle, whose literary tastes and partialities I shared, and compel him to attend the débuts of what I called my little prodigy. 'When the twelve or fifteen hundred clever persons who compose public opinion in Paris,' I said to him, 'shall have heard and pronounced judgment upon that child, she will become the glory and fortune of the French theatre.'

"In 1838, I had quitted the Opera; the talent and success of my tragic actress became my fixed idea and business. Before saying good day to anyone, I used to inquire: 'Have you seen her in Horace or Andromaque?' Most persons did not know whom I meant. I used to lose my temper and not spare reproaches or even familiar insults. The pleasures and joys of my summer of 1838 were assured; my emotions as habitué of the Théâtre Français were destined to replace all rural pleasures as well as the incidents and surprises of travel.

"During the entire month of June and the entire month of July, very few persons seemed converted to my new faith; it mattered nothing that Mdlle. Rachel played Camille, Emilie, or Hermione; the apostles of the new divinity preached in vain in the desert. In the month of August, however, in spite of the dog-days, the débuts of Mdlle. Rachel, in the parts just mentioned, began to be better attended. When the house struck me as tolerably full, I used to wipe my forehead, and, like the fly on the coach-wheel, say to myself with a degree of satisfaction amounting to pride, 'Mdlle. Rachel and myself will beat the public. These people have got common sense.'

During the entire month of October, the young tragedian played nine times, and the smallest receipts (for Monime in Mithridate) amounted to 3,669 francs 90 centimes. When she played Hermione, the receipts amounted to more than 6,000 francs; her victory was complete—her triumph absolutely astounding. Corneille and Racine once more flourished among us, as in the grand age of Louis XIV. A feverish popularity surrounded the young tragédienne and old tragedy.

"While still a child, Mdlle. Rachel who was already admitted at the Conservatoire, begged for private lessons from M. Prévost, a greatly esteemed actor, possessed of real talent, and a sociétaire of the Théâtre-Français. On seeing the poor weak and sickly child, he replied 'Go and sell nosegays, my good girl.' One evening, young Hermione revenged herself in the most clever and charming manner for the disdain of her brother-artist, who had proved so bad a prophet. After having been enthusiastically applauded and frantically recalled, she was actually able, when the curtain had dropt, to fill her Greek tunic with the flowers thrown upon the stage. She then ran up to him who could give her no other advice than to go and sell nosegays, and, sinking down on one knee before him, with the most graceful coquetry, said: 'I have followed your advice, M. Prévost, and taken to selling nosegays. Will you buy some of me?' With a smile, the learned professor raised up the young artist and expressed his delight at having been so completely deceived.

"Madlle Rachel's celebrity soon descended from the competent judges, from the cream of the aristocracy, to the general body of the public. In 1771, Voltaire thus flattered a celebrated actress of the day:—

"'Quand, dans les arts de l'esprit et du goût,
'On est sublime, on est égal à tout;
'Que dis-je? On règne, et d'un peuple fidèle
'On est chéri, surtout si l'on est belle.'

"At first, Madlle. Rachel did not even achieve the success due to youth and attractive beauty.

FOREIGN.

PARIS.—(From our own Correspondent.)—After making her début at the Grand Opera, in La Favorita, Mad. Stoltz has appeared with success as Catarina, in La Reine de Chypre. M. Roger was well received as Gérard. M. Meyerbeer's Robert le Diable has been given for the reappearance of M. Dérivis, who has been absent for some time from this establishment.

The Théâtre-Italien opens on the 3rd October, with Otello, Mad. Frezzolini and M. Bettini sustaining the two principal parts. The next opera produced will be La Cenerentola for the début of Mad. Borghi-Mamo, and, also, for that of M. Gassier, in the character of Dandini. We are then promised Ernani, with Mad. Bosio, and the first representation of Mercadante's Leonora, supported by Mad. Frezzolini, MM. Bettini, Napoléone-Rossi, Néri-Baraldi, and Ardavani.

Le Pré-aux-Clercs has been revived at the Opéra-Comique.

The Théâtre-Lyrique is announced to open on the 1st of October. Whether M. Perrin, however, will be enabled to keep faith with the public is rather doubtful, for, at this moment, the theatre is full of workmen, who have even taken possession of the stage, so that the actors are obliged to rehearse in the green-room. The following is a complete list of M. Perrin's company, according to the musical feuilleton of the Moniteur:—

"Tenors: MM. Rousseau de la Grave, Sassin, Achard,* Sujal.

"Ténors Comiques: MM. Allais, Colson, Legrand, Leroy.

"Barytones: MM. Meillet, Crambade, Cabel, Ribes.

"Basse chantante: M. Marchad.

"Basses: MM. Junca, Adam, Grignon.

"Chanteuses: Mesdames Marie Cabel, De Ligne Lauters, Colson, Meillet, Amélie Bourgeois, Vadé, Chevallier, Garnier.

"The orchestra, under the direction of M. Deloffre, will be composed of sixty-three musicians. The choruses will consist of fifty-five persons."

The season will be opened by Mad. Marie Cabel in La Promise, and on the next evening, the 2nd, will be produced the Billet de Marguerite, a three-act opera, the libretto by MM. Leuven and Brunswick, and the music by M. Gevaert. MM. Meillet, Colson, Achard, Mesdames Meillet and De Ligne Lauters will sustain the principal characters.—Hopes are entertained that the new work of MM. Dennery and Adolphe Adam, in which the first female character is allotted to Mad. Marie Cabel, may be produced before the end of October.

At the Théâtre Frangais, Mdlle. Rachel has re-appeared in Marie Stuart, Polyeucte, and Adrienne Lecouvreur, and been enthusiastically received.

There is no particular novelty at the other theatres just now, if we except a trifle entitled La Dette et la Dot, by M. Honoré Déo, at the Variétés—a one-act farce, Voyage autour de ma Femme, by MM. Michel Carré and Louis Dugard, at the Palais-Royal—and a military drama, in twenty tableaux, called La Guerre d'Orient, at the Cirque. The most important fact in theatrical circles is the re-appearance of M. Bouffé, after a long illness. It is said that this celebrated comedian will shortly give a series of representations at the Porte St. Martin. There is also a report that Mdlle. George will return to the stage for a limited period.

ITALY.—(From our own Correspondent at Milan.)—On the 31st ult., another evening's performance was given at the Carcano, for the benefit of Miss Adelaide Phillips, who repeated, with the usual applause, the cavatina of "Arsace." She also sang the rondo from Cenerentola, and executed the difficulties in an easy and graceful manner. Afterwards, she gave the last scena of Vaccaj's Giulietta e Romeo, for which she was enthusiastically applauded and recalled. The prima donna Ansaldo, the tenore Petrovich, the buffo Lanari-Bellini, and the flautist Signor Calliezie, were also well received. —On the 6th instant, the annual vocal and instrumental concert of the pupils of the I. R. Conservatorio, took place in the Concert-hall of the Institution. The selection was miscellaneous, consisting principally of the compositions of the following students, viz.: A sinfonia, for grand orchestra, by Giovanni Zaytz, executed by about fifty of the first professors and students in Milan; a cavatina, for soprano, by, Francesco Sandi, sung by Signora Elisa Galli; a quintetto, with chorus by G. Zaytz, executed by the Signore Narini and Lucioni, the tenore Limperti, the barytone Vietti, and the basso Maestri; a duetto, for two soprani, by Francesco Pollini, sung by Signore Narini and Berini; a cavatina, for contralto, by A. Ponchielli, sung by Signora Paganini-Froldi; also, a scena, with grand finale, by the same composer, interpreted by the Signore Narini and Paginini-Froldi, the Signori Limperti, Vietti, and Maestri, with a chorus of about fifty of the junior students. The whole of these compositions were meritedly and encouragingly applauded, and in an especial manner the opening sinfonia, by G. Zaytz, and the last-mentioned finale, by A. Ponchielli.

Amongst the vocal students, Signorina Paganini-Froldi (pupil of the Maestro, Lamperti) obtained the first honours; not so much for her voice, as for her pure and artistic style, and true dramatic accento musicale."

The instrumental students were Signorina Sinico-Belloni, a child only eleven years of age, who completely electrified the audience with her performance of a fantasia upon the harp (composed by her Maestro Signor Bovi, upon airs from Poliuto)—indeed, the little creature's playing upon this difficult instrument, and in the presence of so select and numerous an audience, was quite wonderful. Upon her being asked, afterwards, if she had not felt afraid of appearing before so large an assemblage, she replied, with much naïveté, "Oh, no! I was only afraid of the gentleman in the grand dress!" alluding to the Governor of the City, in his uniform. The young violinist, Giulio Basevi (scarcely sixteen), played a souvenir upon the last scene from Lucia. He was warmly applauded, and has made much progress since we had the pleasure of hearing him two years ago. Signorino Rovere played a capriccio of his own composition, for the piano, and Signor G. Perini a fantasia upon the violoncello (composed by the Professor Quarenghi, of the I. R. Conservatorio). Both of these students displayed good taste in their performances, and were received with approbation. The institution is now closed for the vacation, and will be re-opened in November.

The opening of the I. R. Canobbiana has been finally decided to take place on the 12th instant. The Saracena of the Maestro Butera, as we have before mentioned, will be the first opera. La Fiorina of Pedrotti, which gave us so much pleasure on the same stage, two years ago, has been chosen for the second. For the third, the new opera, Anna Campbell, has been promised, composed expressly by the Maestro Torriani. Le Sorrentina, also a new work of the Maestro Muzio, is expected to be the fourth.

At the Pergola, at Florence, Rossini's La Cenerentola has been highly successful. The Gazzetta Musicale is in raptures and augurs more favorably of musical taste since this eventful circumstance. We are persuaded that the execution of the opera had much to do with this success of one of Rossini's masterpieces, as we understand that Mad. Borghi-Mamo is one of the few artistes who can sing Rossini's music. We may add that the other parts were well filled by Signori Everardi, Scalese and Stecchi-Bottardi. We read in Il Diavoletto that Signor Verdi has composed a new opera in which the principal singers will have nothing to do but to recite their parts, all the music devolving upon the choruses. We shall be curious to hear Signor Verdi's new opera.—Leopold de Meyer is expected at Florence.—The Milanese papers say that Signor Butera's opera was not successful. It is entitled La Saracena. Mad. Capuani went most drearily through her part up to the third act, when she obtained some slight applause. The baritono, Signor Della-Santa, was well received and frequently applauded, especially in his last aria. On Sunday, Sig. Pedrotti's opera, Fiorina, will be produced.

VIENNA.—(From our own Correspondent).—The most important events at the Imperial Opera-house lately have been the production of Don Juan and Les Huguenots. The principal characters were satisfactorily sustained by Herren Beck, Draxler, Stegel, Hölzl, Mesdemoiselles La Grua and Liebhart. A new ballet entitled Violetta has been produced, but it is a very poor affair. The parts in the Etoile du Nord, which will be produced at the end of October, are already given out.—Spontini's Ferdinand Cortez is the last novelty.

* The artists whose names are printed in italics, did not belong to M. Séveste's company.

HANOVER.—Madlle. Schwarzbach, from the Theatre Royal, Munich, has produced a favourable impression, in the three characters, viz., Martha, in Herr von Flotow's opera of the same name, Bertha in Der Prophet, and Marie in Die Regimentstochter—which she has sustained up to the present moment. Herr Nicolai's opera of Die Lustigen Weiber von Windsor, is in active rehearsal and will shortly be produced. Herr Schott will play Falstaff. Mad. Nottes, the prima donna is so much indisposed as to be unable to fulfil her professional duties.

DRESDEN.—The royal opera-house was announced to re-open on the 7th inst. with Iphigenia auf Tauris.

LEIPSIC.—The opera season has commenced with Bellini's Sonnambula, under the direction of Kapellmeister Witt, in the place of Herr Rietz, and, on the 7th instant, Herr Riede gave a grand concert in the Hôtel de Prusse for the benefit of the sufferers by the late inundations in Silesia. Among other pieces comprised in the programme were Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, Herr R. Wagner's Liebesmahl der Apostel, the Fest Ouvertüre by Herr Rietz, and the scene and chorus of the second act of Tannhäuser.

HAMBURGH.—Méhul's Joseph en Egypte and Herr Nicolai's Die Lustigen Weiber von Windsor are in active rehearsal.

BERLIN.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Mad. Nimbs has appeared at the Royal Opera House in the Huguenots, Der Freischütz, and Die Jüdin. She was favourably received and well supported by the other members of the company.—M. Meyerbeer has returned from his trip to Spa, but has again left.

COLOGNE.—Both the Vaudeville and Stadttheater were re-opened in the middle of this month, under the management of Herr Röder. Among the artists newly engaged are Mademoiselles von Westerstrand, from Coburg; Johansen, from Stettin; Günther, from Danzic; Herren Erl, from Gratz; Röhr, from Wiesbaden, and Thomatseck, from Cassel. Among the first operas to be produced may be mentioned, Herr Wagner's Lohengrin, M. Meyerbeer's Etoile du Nord, Herr Marschner's Austin, M. Adam's Giralda, and M. Verdi's Rigoletto.

AUGSBURG.—Among the persons who have fallen victims to the cholera, is Herr Carl Ludwig Drobisch, Kapellmeister of the Protestant churches here. He died on the 26th of August, aged 51 years. He was born in Leipsic, and studied music under the celebrated organist, Dröbs.

PRAGUE.—Herr Franz Steger, a vocalist of repute from Vienna, lately gave a concert in the Sophieninsel-Saale, which was fully attended. Herr Steger's singing was greatly admired, and he was much applauded in several of Schubert's Lieder. Herr Wiener, in a violin solo by Lipinski, proved himself a clever artist. The orchestra played two overtures in excellent style, Mendelssohn's magnificent overture to Ruy Blas, and a new one by C. Oberthür, entitled Macbeth, which was very favourably received and deservedly applauded.

NORDENEY.—Mad. Jenny Lind Goldschmidt, assisted by Herren Joachim and Matys, from Hanover, intends giving a concert for the benefit of the poor of the place.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—Mad. von Marra-Wollmer has been favourably received, and bids fair to become a favourite. Herr Pischeck and Mad. Jägels-Roth are "starring" here. Herr Wagner's Tannhäuser has been given lately with almost an entirely new cast.

UDINE.—L'Assedio di Malta, of the Maestro Graffigna, sung by Signora Piccolomini; the tenore Baucarde; the barytone Cresci; and the basso Pons, was received with a little opposition the first night, but it afterwards increased much in the favour of the public.

FERMO.—Lucrezia Borgia has been produced for the second opera, interpreted by Signora Barbieri-Nini, and the Signori Agresti and Nanni. The execution has obtained many honours for the artists.

LUGO.—Verdi's Trovatore has been received with its accustomed acclamations: sung by the Signore Cremont and Guerrini; and the Signori Cecchi, Dalle-Sedie, and Biacchi.

TRIESTE.—The new opera, Marinella, of the Maestro Giuseppe Sinico (the poetry by Signor P. Welponer), has had a most triumphant success, and obtained many calls for its young composer, although it has been found to contain a few reminiscences. The action takes place in the year 1500: the subject is founded upon the annals of Trieste. The principal parts were sustained by Signora Lorenzetti; Grutner (Marinella), Carlotta Cavini (Elvira); the tenore Rubly (F. Cappello); the basso Nerini (Falca), and Signor Giacomelli (Bacio). The execution gave great satisfaction.

BERGAMO.—Don Sebastiano, of Donizetti, has pleased exceedingly, executed by the prima donna, Signora Bendazzi; the tenore, Malvezzi; the barytone, Corsi; and the basso profondo, Vialetti.

BRESCIA.—Maria di Rohan has had a most favourable reception, interpreted by the Signore Salvini-Donatelli, De Gianni Vives, and the Signori Bettini and Ferri.

Of all the evidence published in the Cäcilia, that of Herr Krüchten, the Attorney-General (Landes-Advocat) at Pesth, is without doubt, the most important. Not being acquainted with Herr Krüchten, Herr Weber did not send him one of his circulars, but Herr Krüchten of his own accord forwarded some well authenticated and very minute details respecting the origin and even first performance of the Requiem. Herr Krüchten appears to have been a confidential and very necessary member of Count von Wallsegg's household. He stipulated that some of the facts communicated by him should be kept secret, but, on the other hand, authorised Herr Weber to publish the rest, which, by the way, were drawn up with the most scrupulous exactness and almost in the form of a legal deed. The Countess von Wallsegg, Herr Krüchten informs us, died in 1791, at Stuppach, an estate in Lower Austria, about four posts and a half from Vienna, and the ordinary place of residence of the Count. The latter, an enthusiastic lover of music, commissioned his steward, Leutgeb, to order a requiem for the funeral of his (the Count's) wife, but, for certain reasons, which were not made public, Leutgeb was furthermore ordered not to name his principal, who thus remained unknown to Mozart. After the score had been delivered to his agent, the Count had the work rehearsed in Wienerisch-Neustadt, in the house of the late Herr Obermeyer, the Count's physician, and Herr Krüchten's uncle. The members of Obermeyer's family, all very good musicians, took a part in the performance, as well as Herr Trapp, director of the music-choir, with the various persons under his orders, and several dilettanti of the place. The physician's eldest daughter, Theresa, sang the soprano part at this rehearsal, as well as at the public performance of the Requiem at the burial of the Countess von Wallsegg, which was solemnised with great solemnity in the church of the Cistercian Abbey (commonly called the New Cloisters) in Wienerisch-Neustadt.

As far as Herr Krüchten can remember, this performance of the Requiem took place late in the autumn of 1791; that is to say, before Mozart's death, as Herr Weber understands the passage.

All the conditions of probability which go to form what is called a moral and historical certainty are here united in favour of Herr Krüchten's evidence. That gentleman was a person to whom tradesman-like calculation in the matter was as unknown as those petty interests and considerations which necessarily influenced the language of professional musicians, either on account of the widow or of Herr Weber, whose colleagues and good friends or opponents they were, as the case might be. Herr Krüchten was a public official, who had never had any dealings either with Mozart or his widow, but who, on the other hand, was most intimately acquainted with the affairs of the Count von Wallsegg. The account bears the impress of the strictest truth, and reads almost like a legal document, so accurately are persons and places named and described in it. His uncle Obermeyer, in whose house the first rehearsal took place, was, also, a public functionary, being Landes-physikus and Civilarzt in the Cadet-Academy in Neustadt. Finally Theresa, Obermeyer's daughter, who sang the soprano part at the rehearsal and the funeral of the Countess, was still living when Herr Krüchten sent Herr Weber his two letters, which are dated December, 1825, and January, 1826.

There are two circumstances which might strike us as strange in these communications, in other respects so satisfactory. The first and most serious one is: that Count von Wallsegg, wishing to remain unknown, should have selected for his agent Leutgeb, with whom Mozart was acquainted, having, at various times, composed for him several works, one of which, a concerto for the French horn, is entered in the thematic catalogue under this person's name. When I say "for him," there is every reason to suppose that it was for his master. If, therefore, Mozart knew this Leutgeb, or, according to the orthography adopted in the catalogue, Leitgeb, we have every reason to believe that he was aware in whose service that person was, more particularly as Count von Wallsegg, who lived almost at the gates of Vienna, and appears to have been very rich, was a great lover of music, kept up a large establishment, maintaining, for instance, a chapel of his own, and, consequently, could not be unknown to a musician residing at Vienna. Some of Herr Weber's correspondents called attention to this fact, to which other witnesses replied that it was not Leutgeb, but the Count von Wallsegg himself, who came to Vienna incognito, and ordered the Requiem. It appears, however, very improbable that Mozart should have seen the Count. For my part, I incline to the belief that Count von Wallsegg commissioned his steward to confide the task to some confidant of lower rank. The first obstacle, as my readers will perceive, is thus not very difficult to overcome. The second exists, properly speaking, only in the mind of Herr Weber, who, from Herr Krüchten's testimony, concludes that the score was completed in Mozart's lifetime, since the performance of it took place in the autumn of 1791, and Mozart did not die before the 5th of December of the same year. Herr Krüchten does not say, however, by whom the score was delivered into the hands of the Count's messenger, and, moreover, the expression "late in the autumn" (Spätherbst) is accompanied by the words: "As far as I can remember," the only doubtful phrase employed by Herr Krüchten, who on all other occasions is so positive in his style. But we will go further than this, and admit that his lawyer's memory was not a few weeks wrong with respect to a musical rehearsal which had taken place thirty-three years previously, but then we must not forget that Herr Krüchten writes in the style of an attorney, and employs precisely the same accuracy that he would when drawing up a legal deed. Looking at the matter in this light, we shall find that, by the expression "late in the autumn" (Spätherbst), he might mean any time up to the 22nd December, before which day the autumn does not end in Western Europe. It sounds almost ridiculous, I am aware, to combat any denial of the incomplete state of the Requiem,—a circumstance as satisfactorily proved as any in the whole world. Thus much, however, is certain, if we are to believe Herr Krüchten—and it is impossible to refrain from doing so—thus much, I repeat, is certain: that the Requiem was performed immediately after the decease of its composer. Even the widow states—as we shall see further on—that, immediately after her husband's death, the messenger came to fetch away the score, which was forthwith given him. This cuts through the question, as Alexander's sword did through the Gordian knot; it is conclusive; it furnishes us, in support of the genuineness of the work, with proofs which go far beyond those of the Abbé Stadler, for they take from Süssmayer even the shadow of any participation in the first three parts of the work. We will reserve the conclusions which a child might draw from the approximative date given by Krüchten, until the end of our arguments, which will rest upon the most impartial, most important, and most credible of all the evidence collected in the Cäcilia.

Tormented in turns by mortal weariness, passionate curiosity, and bitter disappointment, such only as those who love music above everything else can understand, I waded through the endless labyrinth of the controversy at the epoch it was exciting public attention. I was just engaged on the clever pamphlet, "Mozart und Süssmayer,"* by M. Sievers, which appeared in the year 1828, when the musical papers announced a fresh biography of Mozart, to be published by his widow. My joy was indescribable. At last, I said to myself, all will be cleared up! at last, after more than a quarter of a century, the actors in this mystery resolve to confess! Well, better late than never. It is here important for us to recollect that Herr von Nissen's work appeared in the year 1828, that is, about three years after the first article in the Cäcilia, which called forth so many others. Herr von Nissen died in the year 1826, but his work had evidently been considerably augmented by others, which it might be, all the more easily, from the circumstance of its consisting of nothing but a number of mere facts badly arranged. We might take away from, add to, change, and, indeed, do whatever we liked with the production, without in the least injuring its arrangement. The editing of Herr von Nissen, if we can so name an entire want of editing, is not worth a straw. The persons who assisted the widow in any biography of Mozart, could not possibly be ignorant of the questions concerning him which were then being discussed with so much noise, and which so deeply compromised Herr von Nissen, the author of this very book. What was to be expected from a work of this description, appearing under such circumstances and such auspices, but a frank and straightforward explanation of everything which had previously been kept concealed, or, supposing nothing had been kept concealed, a positive refutation of all those scandalous reports which were circulated far and wide in all musical circles, and which alike injured the fame of the dead and the reputation of the living. I felt almost convinced I should find that one or other of these two courses had been adopted. At last, the long wished-for book was brought me. Its thickness caused me to utter a cry of joy, for it contained nearly a thousand pages with thirty-eight lines upon each page. What a piece of good fortune! Everything will be explained, I thought to myself. I began at the beginning; I read—I devoured the volume—until, on the last page, I came to the inscription upon Herr von Nissen's tomb, which I did not so much care about. Hereupon, under the impression that I had had a disagreeable dream, I again commenced from the very beginning—I once more turned over and read through the thousand pages, to reach once more the expressions of Mad. von Nissen's grief, which are sculptured upon Herr von Nissen's grave. No—I had not been dreaming! There was not a phrase, a word, a syllable, concerning questions which would have furnished matter for a most important chapter. All the points which had been pressed into the controversy are described without any commentary and with remarkable brevity, perfect tranquillity, and a tone of simple narrative, as if not a single one of them had even given rise to a doubt. Herr Weber and his paper are nowhere mentioned—in fact, they are not so much as alluded to. The strictest silence is observed with regard to the various details which the discussion, during the three years it had already lasted, had brought to light; while, on the other hand, the work was full of the most palpable contradictions and revolting untruths. I do not think the annals of literature could produce an example of impudence carried to a greater extent. It would, most certainly, be a crying shame to lay all this to the charge of a poor old woman of seventy, imperfectly acquainted with literature, and who, perhaps, had not read all that had been printed or said upon the subject. Herr von Nissen had a still less share in the book. He was no great author, it is true, but he was an honourable man, who was very highly esteemed. The crusade against the Requiem commenced only a short time previous to his decease; in all probability, he himself was not acquainted with some of the particulars, and, under all circumstances, he would have added to his book another chapter which had become indispensable. The disgrace of the whole proceeding falls, therefore, altogether on those who directed the publication, and whom neither my readers nor myself can have any desire to know.

In this compilation of Herr von Nissen, the historical facts connected with the Requiem are confined to the few that we have related in our twentieth chapter, and which we look upon as true, or very nearly so. After this short enumeration of facts, we read, however, as follows:—

"Immediately after Mozart's death, the mysterious messenger was announced. He demanded the work, unfinished as it was, and obtained it. From that moment the widow never saw him again, nor did she ever learn the slightest particular either about the Requiem itself or the unknown customer. Each of my readers will easily believe that every effort was made to discover the mysterious messenger, but every effort and every endeavour were in vain."

My readers, on the other hand, will have perceived ere this that these assertions, advanced with so much certainty and confidence, contain two very important errors. We already know that it was not Mozart's unfinished score, but that completed by Süssmayer, which was delivered over to Count von Wallsegg's messenger. Mozart's manuscript could not have been used for the performance, because the last four pieces, as well as a portion of the "Lacrymosa," were wanting, and the instrumentation not written out at full. Had it been in such a state, the anonymous customer would have sent it back again, and requested his money to be returned. There is a second, and, if possible, far more evident piece of inaccuracy, but one which has been formally refuted. Where? the reader will ask. In the work of Herr von Nissen himself.

"From the moment the score was given up we never heard anything more either of the Requiem or of the unknown, who consequently always remained so."

This is what we read at page 566 of the first part of the compilation, and the following is to be found at pages 169, 170, of the Appendix:—

"When Breitkopf and Härtel wanted to bring out the Requiem, they asked the widow to let them have her copy of it; they said they had several copies by them, as the work was well known, but that they wanted to publish it according to the best copy there was. It would have been published under any circumstances; the widow was naturally desirous that, for the honour of her husband, it should be published in conformity with his best copy; the work was more than ten years old. She, therefore, let them have her copy. In the meanwhile, the Unknown who ordered the Requiem (Count von Wallsegg, then residing upon his estate of Stuppach, in Lower Austria), sent the Viennese advocate, Sortsch to her, complained very loudly, threatened to take proceedings, and then offered to be satisfied with copies of several pieces of music, which he obtained, as an indemnification."

We can now understand why the anonymous customer employed a celebrated advocate and no common legal adviser. The fact was, he had to prosecute, in a court of justice, those who had infringed his rights of property. On this occasion, too, we learn the name, rank, and residence of him who always remained unknown.

But, in addition to these two facts, which the passage just quoted clears up (the task confided to the lawyer and the incognito of the person ordering the Requiem)—the one being explained at the price of a degrading confession, and the other by the interpolation of a clumsy lie—how many other facts does not this very passage endeavour to obscure or present in a false light? How everything is screwed and twisted into these ill-written lines, jotted down in the form of a mere remark, but every word in which was carefully weighed, for the purpose of justifying an error which it was impossible to conceal any longer; this was the motive of the attempt made to jumble the different epochs together and to confound the facts, without there being any appearance that this was the case. It was not in the year 1801, but in 1792, or, at the latest, 1793, that the Requiem was sold to Breitkopf and Härtel. It was not Breitkopf and Härtel who asked the widow for a copy of the Requiem, but it was the widow who sent them one, before they had the slightest idea of the existence of a Requiem by Mozart; it was the widow, who, shortly afterwards, went to Leipsic for the purpose of carrying on the negotiations personally with these publishers.* When the bargain was made public, it was highly important to spread abroad the belief that the work was at least ten years old, otherwise it would have been an absurdity to make Breitkopf and Härtel say they possessed several copies of a work only just completed, and because there were only three copies of the perfect work, one of which had been sent to Count von Wallsegg, while the two others had been dishonestly retained by the widow. Lastly, the business was not put into the hands of Advocate Sortsch in the present century. The Abbé Stadler informs us that the celebrated advocate took up the matter shortly after Mozart's decease—in all probability, therefore, immediately Count von Wallsegg heard of the sale of the Requiem to the publishers in Leipsic.

But even supposing that, at the time of this sale, which is set down eight or nine years later than when it really occurred, copies had improperly been put in circulation, and that it was impossible to prevent their publication, we find the widow still placed between two opposite duties which can never be made to agree with one another. On the one hand, for the honour of her husband, she must necessarily have desired the work to be published from the most correct manuscript, while, on the other hand, Count Wallsegg's sole right hindered her from letting a music publisher have a copy. The evil, however, was done, without, as she says, any blame attaching to her; the work would have been distorted and rendered irrecognisable, and the great name of Mozart would as it were, stand fastened to the pillory. She had no choice left, but gave up the most correct copy made from that still more correct one which she kept for Herr André of Offenbach. Let the client and advocate come! Let them raise their voices as loudly as they like before the judgment seat! The widow is waiting for them—she expects them. With one hand she points to Heaven, where her husband now dwells, and, with the other to the score of the Requiem, which, but for a little pious deceit, would have been lost to the Christian world. Every one applauds her—the public, the lawyers, and the judges. Even the celebrated advocate, who has got a fulminating speech all ready, wipes away a tear, under pretence of taking a pinch of snuff.

The explanation of the riddle contained in the two passages I have quoted above, is this: Herr von Nissen wrote the first passage in full security, before the 11th number of the Cäcilia appeared. The second passage, however, was not penned until after his death, when it was drawn up under the tyrannical, although never acknowledged, influence of Herr Weber's articles, and all that followed them. From an oversight, or perhaps a wish to be agreeable to the reader by allowing him to take his choice, room had been for the two passages to live together under the same roof, but with a considerable space between them, so that they should not clash. The house was exceedingly roomy.

These miserable explanations, with something of greater value, namely, the evidence of Schack, are grouped, as if accidentally, in the form of a farewell to the reader, around a thing placed at the very end of the book and resembling a kind of æsthetical analysis of the Requiem. But what an analysis! It is so remarkable that I will here give you a specimen.

"All the pieces of the Requiem are fugued phrases."

This is true of half at most, and scarcely that.

"A sombre earnestness and gloomy melancholy are its principal characteristics."

Certainly, but not the only ones, as is proved by some of the finest pieces; for instance, the "Recordare" in which sombre earnestness and gloomy melancholy are no more to be found than in the "Benedictus" and "Sanctus."

"The passage: 'Rex tremendæ Majestatis' is unique of its kind."

Nothing more.

"The same holds good of the 'Recordare.'"

This, too, is all that is said about the "Recordare."

"The mourning chorus of the 'Lacrymosa' presents the most coy imitation of anxious stillness, interrupted by sobbing and groaning. The crying key, G minor, '(!)' conduces in no trifling measure to the completion of this beautiful picture."

This is all, and, in fact, even this is too much. The key should not have been mentioned, as it is that of D minor and not of G minor. But it strikes me that this is quite sufficient.

With regard to the genuineness, we read in the same analysis that:

"Fate spun out the thread of Mozart's life at the 'Sanctus.'"

This is a specimen of the Classical style, although Fate is deprived of the indispensable epithet of merciless. In another passage it is cursorily remarked that: "Süssmayer completed the Requiem," but the reader would search in vain through the thousand pages of the book for a single word more upon this head.

* Herr Rochlitz is my authority for this fact, of which he was an eye-witness.

NO. IV.

HENRY BISHOP.

Henry Rowley Bishop was born in London. We have not ascertained the date of his birth, but, from the fact that previous to 1809 he had written two ballets for the King's Theatre (Italian Opera-house), and that in the same year he produced his first opera at Drury Lane, we cannot place the period when he was born later that 1788 or 1789. At a very early age Henry Bishop exhibited a remarkable precocity and a great liking for music. He was placed under the Italian master, Francisco Bianchi, from whom he received the principal part of his musical education, and from whom he imbibed, it may be supposed, that leaning to the Italian school which declared itself subsequently in several of his most important works, but could not altogether conceal his instincts and the turn of his genius, which were, unmistakeably, true downright English. Young Bishop had the advantages of a superior general education. He learned all that may be learned at a public school, and made great proficiency in the acquirement of the languages, living and dead. His musical career dates from his fifteenth year, when he commenced writing and adapting for the theatres. This is an unusual age, more particularly in this country, at which to begin authorship; and the reception of Henry Bishop by the manager as composer or adapter for the theatre demonstrates very satisfactorily that the boy's abilities and knowledge must have been then recognised as available for dramatic purposes—no mean argument in favour of their excellence, be it remembered, at a period of his life when other boys are about to enter upon their studies. We should like to learn how many youths in the Royal Academy of Music, at fifteen years of age, could be entrusted—granting their capacity—with the composition of a ballet, or the adaptation of music to an opera.

Henry Bishop produced his first opera, The Circassian Bride, on the 23rd of February, 1809, at Drury Lane Theatre. It was very favourably received, and promised to have a successful run. Its chance, however, was cut short by the burning of the theatre the night following, when the score was destroyed. Shortly afterwards young Bishop was engaged by the proprietors of Covent Garden as composer and musical director, and held the post to the year 1820. It was during this period that he wrote his most celebrated operas and single pieces, having for his interpreters, Miss Stephens, Mrs. Wood, Miss Paton, Mad. Vestris, Miss M. Tree, Miss Inverarity, Miss Byrne, Miss Love, and Miss Foote; Messrs. Braham, Sinclair, Pearman, Incledon, and many others less renowned, which have escaped our recollection.

In 1820, when his fame was at its fullest, Henry Bishop paid a visit to Dublin, and was presented by the Lord Mayor and Aldermen with the freedom of the city. Sir John Stevenson, the well known musician—composer of "Mary, I believed thee true," and, "Oh! then, dearest Ellen, I'll love thee no more," two ballads worthy of immortality—the coadjutor of Tom Moore in the earlier numbers of the Irish Melodies, being sometime dead, Henry Bishop undertook the arrangements of the national airs which Moore selected for his future numbers, and, though no Irishman, and not intimately versed in the nature and requirements of the pure Gælic and Celtic tunes, was no less eminently successful than his Hibernian predecessor.

On the return of Henry Bishop to London from Ireland, we find him conducting and managing the oratorios, then annually given at Covent Garden and Drury Lane theatres. As yet Exeter Hall had no musical existence. When the Philharmonic Society was first established he became one of its members, and was occasionally—according as it suited the views of the clique, which has always ruled the destinies of that institution—elected a director and conductor. Shortly after the foundation of the Royal Academy of Music, Henry Bishop was appointed one of the Professors of Harmony and Composition. In 1839 he took his degree of Bachelor of Music, at Oxford.

In 1839, a highly flattering compliment was paid to Henry Bishop, by the musical societies of Manchester. A concert was given, at which two hundred persons rendered their gratuitous assistance, the programme being made up entirely of Bishop's works. The performance took place in the theatre, in the presence of an audience of more than two thousand persons.

In addition to the appointments mentioned above, Henry Bishop continued to hold, up to their final close in 1848, the post of conductor of Her Majesty's Concerts of Ancient Music, the directors of which were, at various times, the King of Hanover, His Royal Highness Prince Albert, His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke of Wellington, the Archbishop of York, Earl Howe, Earl Cawdor, and the Earl of Westmoreland. He was presented by Prince Albert with a magnificent piece of plate, in token of His Royal Highness's approbation of his general conduct during the time of his holding office.

In 1842, Her Majesty was pleased to confer the honour of knighthood on Mr. Bishop. In an abstract of Mr. Bishop's life, published some few years ago in the Illustrated London News, it is stated that "the knighting Mr. Bishop was the only instance of that distinction having been conferred by the British Sovereign on one of the musical profession." Surely, if we mistake not, Sir George Smart was knighted by William the Fourth; and Sir John Stevenson, if he was not knighted by the Sovereign, the honour was at least conferred on him by the Sovereign's representative—the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

In 1843, Sir Henry Bishop officiated as conductor at the Edinburgh Festival, given on the opening of the new Music Hall. He was at that time Professor of Music to the University, under the will of General Reid, but did not retain his appointment more than a few years.

When the Great Exhibition of all Nations was established, Sir Henry Bishop was selected as chairman of the local committee for the class comprising musical instruments, and was afterwards chosen chairman and reporter of the jury for awarding prizes. In 1848, Sir Henry Bishop was appointed Professor of Music at the University of Oxford, which university, in last June, further confirmed its high estimate of the composer's talents by conferring on him, by a vote of convocation, the degree of Doctor of Music.

Later, at the inauguration of St. George's Hall, Liverpool, Sir Henry Bishop officiated as conductor of the whole music.

The following is a complete list of the works of Sir Henry Bishop, with the different theatres at which they were produced, and their dates of production:—

King's Theatre.—Tamerlan et Bajazet, ballet; and Narcisse et les Graces, ballet, in 1806; and Mora's Love, ballet, in June 1809.

Lyceum.—The Maniac, opera, in March, 1810.

Covent Garden Theatre.—Knight of Snowdon, February, 1811; Virgin of the Sun, in January; the Ethiop, in October; the Lord of the Manor (additional music), October; and the Renegade, in December, 1812. In 1813, Haroun Alraschid, in January; the Brazen Bust, May; Harry le Roy, July; the Miller and his Men, October; and For England Ho, in December. In 1814, the Farmer's Wife and Wandering Boys, in February; Sadak and Kalasrade, in April; the Grand Alliance, in June; Doctor Sangrado, and Forest of Bondy, in September; the Maid of the Mill, in October; and John of Paris, in November. In 1815, Brother and Sister, in February; the Noble Outlaw, in April; Telemachus, in June; Magpie, or the Maid, in September; John du Bart, in October; Cymon and Comus, in November. In 1816, Midsummer Night's Dream, in January; Guy Mannering, in March; Who Wants a Wife, April; Royal Nuptials and the Slave, November. In 1817, Humorous Lieutenant and the Libertine, in January; the Heir of Veroni, in February; the Duke of Savoy, in September; and the Father and his Children, in October. In 1818, Burgomaster of Saardam, Zuma, and the Illustrious Traveller; in February, December and May; Operatic piece, in May; and Barber of Seville, in October. In 1819, the Marriage of Figaro, March; Fortunatus, the Heart of Mid-Lothian, and A Rowland for an Oliver, in April; Swedish Patriotism, in May; the Gnome King, in October; and the Comedy of Errors, in December. In 1820, the Antiquary; and Battle of Bothwell Brig, in January; Henri Quatre and Twelfth Night, in April. In 1821, Don John and Two Gentlemen of Verona, in April. In 1822 Montrose, in February; the Law of Java, in May; and Maid Marian, in December. In 1823, Clari, in May; the Beacon of Liberty, in October; and Cortez, in November. In 1824, Native Land, in February; and Charles II. and As You Like It, in December. In 1829, Yelva; or, the Orphan of Russia, in February; Home, sweet Home, in March; and the Night before the Wedding, in November. In 1830, Ninetta, in February. In 1831, the Romance of a Day, in February. In 1834, Manfred; and in February, 1840, the Fortunate Isles.

Drury Lane Theatre.—Caractacus, ballet, March, 1806; and Love in a Tub, ballet, in November. In June, 1808, the Mysterious Bride (composed and selected). In February, 1809, the Circassian Bride (first opera). In 1825, the Fall of Algiers, Faustus, William Tell, Masaniello, and Coronation of Charles X. In 1826, Aladdin, in April, and the Knights of the Cross. In 1827, the Englishman in India, January. In 1828, Edward the Black Prince and Don Pedro. In May, 1830, Hofer. In March, 1832, the Alchymist, and the Demon, adapted from Spohr and Meyerbeer; in May, the Tyrolese Peasant; the Doom Kiss, in October, and Don Giovanni, from Mozart. In 1833, the Somnambula, adapted from Bellini, and the Maid of Cashmere and The Love Charm, from Auber. In 1838, the Maid of Palaiseau and Guillaume Tell, adapted from Rossini.

THE HAYMARKET.—The Vintagers, in August, 1809. In July, 1827, the Rencontre. In June, 1834, Rural Felicity.

VAUXHALL.—In June, 1830, Under the Oak; and in July, William and Adelaide. In June, 1832, the Magic Fan, the Sedan Chair, and the Bottle of Champagne.

We believe the last work upon which the talents of Sir Henry Bishop were employed was the arrangement of Old English Airs, published in the Illustrated London News, and commenced in 1851.

Sir Henry Bishop's music is not confined to England. Its grace and its spontaneous melody have made it a home wherever music is heard. It is no less the admiration of the grave musician than of the amateur. The composer may indeed be styled, the National Minstrel, par excellence. In an article of this nature, it cannot be expected that we should enter at length into the merits and peculiarities of Sir Henry Bishop's music. Its prevailing characters are—tunefulness, simple, natural, free, and genuine English, and a gracefulness not to be surpassed, combined with great readiness and clearness in the instrumentation. As a melodist Sir Henry Bishop has especially distinguished himself among musicians, and, while music lives, such songs as "Bid me discourse," "Should he upbraid," "By the simplicity of Venus' Doves," "Tell me, my Heart," "The Pilgrim of Love;" the duets, "As it fell upon a Day," "Orpheus," "On a Day," and others;" and the glees, "The Chough and Crow," "Mynheer Van Dunck," "Blow, gentle Gales," "When Winds whistle cold," "When the Wind blows," and numerous more, cannot well die. Some of Sir Henry Bishop's most charming and effective pieces may be found in the incidental music written to Shakspere's plays. Who that has heard can ever forget the elegance and flow of melody so conspicuous in the music to the Comedy of Errors, Twelfth Night, and The Two Gentlemen of Verona?

The prevailing taste for works of the French and Italian school has proved fatal to the simple ballad opera, in which Sir Henry Bishop's talents were mostly employed; but the composer, in his Glees, his Rounds, and many of his isolated pieces, may lay claims to a fairer and more enduring reputation than many can hope to obtain, whose compositions are more elaborate and of more pretension, and whose names are at present uttered with a louder and more protracted sound.

THE CELEBRATED BAND of the Corps de Guides of Paris will visit London in October, to give two Concerts for the benefit of the wives and families of the soldiers in the East. The band consists of 110 wind instruments, under the direction of M. Mohr.

SURREY THEATRE.—The operatic season will terminate to-night, but Miss Romer will not take final leave of her visitors and friends until Monday, when a "grand extra performance" will be given, on which occasion, we trust, that the Transpontians will give their fair and popular favourite a "bumper at parting." We have not heard whether the fair lessee will renew her lease.

DUBLIN.—On Saturday, the 16th inst., Verdi's opera of Ernani was given, and on the following Monday Madlle. Cruvelli took her benefit in the part of Norma. Her success was, as usual, immense, and no description can give an adequate idea of the enthusiasm of the Dublin admirers. On Tuesday, Sept. 19, Signor Tamberlik took his benefit in Otello, the part of Desdemona being filled by Madlle. Cruvelli. We have had no details of this, the last performance of the Italian company in Dublin, and must consequently reserve any further remarks until next week. From all accounts the speculation has been a most successful one, both as regards the artistes and manager.

MADEMOISELLE RACHEL.

"In the course of October, 1848, I occupied a very large ground floor with a garden in the Rue Taitbout. I was persuaded to give a ball to the former members of my company at the Opera. At this fête of artists, Mesdames Taglioni, Falcon, Elssler, and Dumilâtre, met Mesdemoiselles Mars, Rose Dupuis, and Dupont. A clever friend of mine, an assiduous frequenter of the green-room of the Théâtre-Français, undertook to invite, in my name, Mdlle. Rachel, with M. Samson her professor, and Mad. Félix her mother. The young tragic actress, who, if we may believe the report, stepped on this occasion for the first time into a drawing-room, excited the most sympathetic surprise on her entrance. She was dressed in white; without a jewel, without even a flower. In society and at home the magic countenance of Mdlle. Rachel is exchanged for the most graceful and good-natured physiognomy in the world. Hermione was a model of tact, wit, and good breeding; Hermione did not dance.

"Shortly after this, the only subject to be met with in the papers, both large and small, was the luminous and charming star that was casting floods of light upon the grey cold sky of Tragedy and the Théâtre-Français. Merle and Jules Janin, by their warm praises, ennobled Mad. Rachel's young talent. People strove with each other in surrounding the new artist with the most romantic interest, by narrating the misery, the privations, and the wandering life of her childhood and early youth. The arts, too, did all in their power to illustrate this favourite of the Muses, and nothing was to be seen but lithographs, pictures, and statuettes of Rachel.

"The possessors of great names and great fortunes are rather pleased with playing the part of Mecænases to young celebrities. It was the fashion, and accounted a great piece of luxe, to have the savage Hermione in one's saloons. She speedily numbered among her friends, who loaded her with marks of tenderness, and presents, the greatest personages of Spain, then in Paris: the Duchess de Berwick et d'Albe, the beautiful Marquise d'Alcanicès, the Princesse d'Anglona, the Countess de Toreno and her sister, Madlle. Incarnacion, M. de Roca de Togarès, at present Marquis de Molins, and Ex-Minister of the Navy in Spain, the Marquis de Los Llanos, Count de la Vega del Pozo, etc., etc. The Noailles family received her in the morning. The Duke de Noailles, at present a Member of the French Academy, became her assiduous councillor, frequently passing whole evenings with her alone, in literary conversation and paternal intimacy.

"The Countess Duchâtel was as madly attached to the seductive child of Melpomene as her grandfather had formerly been to Mdlle. Duchesnois. She made her take her place as frequently as possible at her table, or near her in her drawing-room, while Count Duchâtel, the minister, gave the young pensionnaire of the Théâtre-Français a rich and coquettish library, the shelves of which supported only our classical chefs-d'œuvre, and books of morality.

"There was never a meeting or literary fête at the Abbaye-aux-Bois, at Mad. Récamier's, without Mdlle. Rachel, who succeeded in pleasing and enchanting people, even when near the distinguished woman who, without fortune and no longer possessing the charms of youth, was able to preserve her illustrious friends, and who collected in a room in a convent the polite society of her time, to speak of works of wit or hear a chapter of the Mémoires d'Outre-Tombe, written the evening before. The actress astonished and delighted the little literary church of the Abbaye-aux-Bois by her airs of chastity and mystic purity.

"At one of the literary matinées, which were of frequent occurrence at the Abbaye-aux-Bois, Mdlle. Rachel had been requested by Mad. Récamier to recite for M. de Chateaubriand, one or two scenes of the character of Pauline in Polyeucte.

"'Mon epoux, en mourant, m'a laisse ses lumières!
'Son sang, dont tes bourreaux viennent de me couvrir,
'M'a dessillé les yeux, et me les vient d'ouvrir:
'Je VOIS, je SAIS, je CROIS!' . . . .

"The scene was interrupted by an unexpected visit; the Archbishop of * * * was announced.

"'Monseigneur,' said Madame Récamier, slightly embarrassed, 'allow me to introduce to you Madlle. Rachel,' who was just engaged in a scene of Pauline, from Polyeucte, which she had kindly consented to recite for us.'

"'I should greatly deplore interrupting the fine verses of Corneille,' replied the new-comer.

"From scruples of delicacy, however, Mdlle. Rachel would not proceed with the part of Pauline before the prelate. She was unwilling to exclaim, like a Christian convert. 'Je vois, je sais, je crois;' and thus be guilty of a falsehood before a Minister of the Roman Catholic Church.

"'If you will allow me, Monseigneur,' she said, with the most respectful good taste, 'I will recite some verses from Esther,' thus, thanks to the work written by Racine for the pupils of St.-Cyr, remaining faithful to the Jewish religion.

"When Mdlle. Rachel had concluded, the Archbishop complimented her in the warmest terms, adding.

"We, priests of the Lord, do not often enjoy the pleasure of meeting great artists. I shall, however, have enjoyed it twice in my life; I heard Mad. Malibran at Florence, and I shall be indebted to Mad. Récamier for having heard Madlle. Rachel. To recite fine verses so beautifully, it is necessary to experience all the sentiments they convey.'

"Making the most charming curtsey, Mdlle. Rachel replied, with downcast eyes, but, at the same time, with assurance.

"'Monseigneur, je crois!'

"In this unexpected posture of affairs, the young tragédienne display wit and propriety sufficient to entrance an archbishop.

"Her appearance used to create a sensation in all public places. Whenever she attended the sittings of the Chamber of Deputies, which she often did, like some great lady who took an interest in politics, the eyes of every one in that assembly of sages were attracted to her, the attention of the auditory being even diverted from the illustrious orators whom she came to hear and study.

"How much intelligence and good taste were requisite for her to bear with propriety this sudden change from the most obscure misery to all the intoxicating pleasures of success—to the happy position of the spoilt child of Fortune, of the fashionable world, and the public! The same persons who, at a later period, exaggerated her foibles, and unsparingly accused her of unpardonable excesses, only perceived in her, at the dawn of her celebrity, a heart perfectly innocent of all the bad sentiments and violent passions which, it was said, she could so well pourtray, without experiencing. The success that Mademoiselle Rachel achieved in the saloons of the great, and the feelings of partiality, full of tenderness, which she inspired in distinguished women and men of intellect and acquirements, can only be explained by the fact of her possessing good and rare qualities, peculiar, I will not say to an actress, but to a young girl, clever, amiable, and always mistress of herself. In this study of Madlle. Rachel, I shall therefore, have to seek for and appreciate all the coquettish secrets of the seductive woman as well as all those of the artist of talent. Let us first study the tragic actress.

"Although still very young, Madlle. Rachel was an old artist when she went to the Théâtre-Français. She first entered Choron's school, for the purpose of studying music. Her intelligence attracted the master's attention.

"'What is your name, my dear?' asked Choron, whose school of religious music was subsidised by the State under the Restoration.

"'Elizabeth Rachel.'

"'The name of Elizabeth would not sound very well in the midst of our pious Christian exercises. You must call yourself Eliza.'

"Already, at her early age, the future tragedian possessed a contralto.

"'You will not find parts fitted for your voice anywhere but in the Italian scores, I am afraid, my dear,' said Choron.

"An actor who had retired from the Théâtre-Français, where he had never shone very brilliantly, kept a school of declamation, and took Madlle. Rachel as a pupil at a very early age. He used to call her 'his little diablesse.'

"Immediately previous to their débuts, the pupils of the Conservatory and of the various private schools like to play before a certain public, with dresses and scenery, the parts they have selected; they call this: 'monter une partie.' The other parts are confided to fellow-students who, however, if they insist upon it, receive for their services the moderate recompense of two francs. In her poverty, Madlle. Rachel was always ready to lend her assistance in these performances, which were of very frequent occurrence, and for two francs on each occasion she used to play, with confidence and spirit, male or female characters, young lovers, soubrettes, or grand priests. Like Adrienne Lecouvreur, she became used to the boards from a very early age. If I am correctly informed, she was engaged, and even created a furore, at the Théâtre-Molière, under the name of 'the little Eliza.' M. Poirson, who put up La Vendéenne at the Théâtre du Gymnase for her débuts, said, in his turn:

"'This name of Eliza would not look very well in the bills; have you not got another?'

"'My name is Elizabeth Rachel.'

"'Ah, that will do! Rachel! that is a name which it is easy to recollect, and does not belong to everybody. In future, call yourself Rachel. The choice of a name has much more to do with success on the stage than people think.'

"Soon afterwards, he advised her to enter upon a course of serious study, and prophesied that she would achieve great triumphs in tragedy. The young artist immediately placed herself under the exclusive direction of M. Samson, professor at the Convervatory and sociétaire of the Théâtre-Français. Both tragic and comic actresses have invariably sought or accepted lessons and advice from some dramatic or literary celebrity.

"For my own part, I am certain that the knowledge and experience of M. Samson opened a wide field of resources for the talent of Mdlle. Rachel; she did not play a single character without rehearsing it before him; but, while acknowledging of what great use M. Samson might have been to the young tragedian, we must at the same time say, that only one Rachel ever issued from the classes of the eminent professor.

"Are the grand qualities of the Hermione of 1838, which I will here analyse, the fruit of art and study, or the fortunate result of natural gifts, inspiration, and superior intelligence?

"I can affirm, with certainty, that Mdlle. Rachel studies seriously her parts; in the first place, she copies them all out herself, she searches for and notes down the various effects of situation, and the lines tending to the delineation of the respective parts, afterwards composing and preparing, with all the nice gradations of light and shade, each character as a whole.

"M. Samson used then frequently to advise the adoption of effects that she had not prepared, delicate shades that she had neglected, and 'business' that she had omitted; he would comment upon her characters, give her the proper pitch, and point out to her their bearing and colour. The good advice of the master was never lost upon his ready and intelligent pupil.

"Nature has endowed Mdlle. Rachel with all the qualities necessary for finished execution. Her voice possesses volume and power, it is susceptible of extremely various inflections, and capable of expressing rage, without becoming screechy and loud. She has no defect of pronunciation, her lips and mouth being most admirably formed for a beautiful and perfect articulation. Between the end of her delicately shaped and charming little ear and the swell of her shoulder, the distance is most harmonious, imparting to all the movements of her head elegance and dignity. Her figure is slim and supple, and a little above the middle size. It has been remarked that, after her débuts—after, in fact, her existence became a happy one, Mdlle. Rachel grew a great deal, even when she was more than twenty. Her feet and hands are finely articulated, and her carriage noble and proud. Her chest alone is poor and narrow. Look at Mdlle. Rachel in society, in the midst of young and even most elegant women; she stands out from them by the natural nobleness and dignity of her deportment—Incessu patuit dea. It would be impossible for her to make a movement, to fall into any position or attitude, which was ungraceful or awkward. She drapes herself with marvellous art, and, on the stage, gives proof of an intelligent study of antique statuary.

"Her tragic physiognomy can express despair, hatred, pride, irony and disdain—that weapon which is as powerful in the theatrical as in the oratorical art.

"We are not here playing the part of a flatterer and courtier; we are discussing a question with equity and impartiality. We do not, therefore, fear to assert that, by the force of her art, fascination, and skill, Madlle. Rachel makes up for an important quality in which she is deficient. A greater amount of sensibility might fairly be required in some of her characters; she embues her words, her looks, her gestures, with life in the expression of the violent passions, but her heart is less skilled in pourtraying tenderness and love. All her artistic talents frequently fail to render the sufferings of the soul. In Madlle. Rachel's tragic acting, the sufferings of the soul often become sufferings of the body; her utterance then becomes spasmodic; she makes pauses, and utters cries, while her actions are agitated and convulsive. It is thus that she represents antique grief and pagan grief. Everything that comes from the heart is said with greater profundity and simplicity; the voice alone is the passionate and sympathetic interpreter of the joys and the tortures of the soul. It was not without reason that people have said of more than one great tragic actress: 'She has tears in her voice.' Champmeslé, Adrienne Lecouvreur, and Duchesnois, possessed sensibility, and it was more especially by that electric action that they excited and moved the public. Madlle. Rachel astonishes, charms, and moves us, by a style of elocution which is not deficient in correct intentions or grandeur; in her studied speeches she excites hopes of a communicative sensibility, of a profound feeling of inward tenderness, but she often stops half way. After seizing on, and, as it were, holding the audience in a state of breathless suspense, she leaves them free from all illusion, and, if not cold, at least tranquil and serene. Her talent in such cases, captivates the intelligence without grasping the heart: it does not penetrate as far as that!

Miss Stabbach left London on Monday for Leipsic, to sing at the Philharmonic Concerts. She was engaged by Mr. Sterndale Bennett, and will remain away two months.

Presentation to Herr Schallen.—A few days since the Band of the Sydenham Palace presented Herr Schallen with a bâton in silver. There were eighty subscribers, at five shillings; but, as two of them received their dismissal the day after the ceremony, ten shillings had to be refunded. But a testimonial is nothing without a feast. On the occasion alluded to, the eighty came to the determination of giving Herr Schallen a breakfast. A bargain was struck with the restaurant of the Palace at eighteenpence a head. Eighteenpence, however, was not enough. From some misunderstanding in the order, or from some extra calls, the breakfast bill was increased to six shillings per head; whereupon the eighty proved restive, and refused to pay. Latest accounts have not informed us whether they have paid.

The Royal Panopticon re-opens on Monday night with a variety of entertainments, the principal of which will be the performances of Mr. Best on the organ. Mr. H. Distin's Flugel Horn Union is engaged for future services, and also a company of glee singers, whose names we shall publish by-and-bye.

St. James's Theatre.—This fashionable place of entertainment opens on Monday night, under the direction of Mrs. Seymour, with a dramatic company. The performances consist of two new pieces, a five-act drama, entitled The King's Rival, by Messrs. Tom Taylor and Charles Reade, and a farce called My Friend the Mayor, by Mr. Charles Selby. The corps dramatique includes some well-known names; among others, Messrs. George Vandenhoff, T. Mead, J. Stuart, and the popular actress, Miss Glyn.

The Vocal Quartett Union, consisting of Miss Grace Alleyne, Miss Lizzy Stuart, Mr. George Tedder, Mr. Adlington Wallworth, with Herr Wilhelm Ganz as conductor, gave two concerts during the past week: one at Maidstone and the other at Rochester.

REVIEWS.

G. F. Händel's Oratorio, "Israel in Egypt"—G. F. Händel's Oratorio, "Judas Maccabeus"—G. F. Händel's Oratorio, "Alexander's Feast"—G. F. Händel's Coronation Anthem, "Zadok, the Priest."—Mozart's "First Service." All edited by John Bishop. Robert Cocks and Co.

These are capital specimens of that small style of printing great works which is now becoming so justly popular. The first very remarkable point about them is their cheapness. Israel in Egypt, for instance, in complete vocal score, with pianoforte accompaniment, is here offered for the sum of four and sixpence! And we are bound to add that their cheapness is not attained by the sacrifice of any necessary quality which the size of the editions would permit. We have looked carefully through them without discovering any typographical errors, or, at least, none of consequence; the pianoforte part is cleverly adapted—perhaps, here and there, a trifle over-crowded with notes; the printing is very clear, and the paper is good. What more would people have?

"The Old Hundredth Psalm," Transcribed for the Pianoforte by W. V. Wallace.—Fantasia for the Pianoforte, on "The Blue Bells of Scotland," by W. V. Wallace. (R. Cocks and Co.)

Mr. Wallace is one of those people who habitually do clever things. He has a ready wit at invention, great knowledge of the mechanical capabilities of his instrument, a happy vein of natural melody, and a good deal of skill in the manufacture of passages and such varieties of adornment as are necessary to deck it out withal. So it happens that, even in his lightest mood, Mr. Wallace's pianoforte pennings are always pleasing and teachable; and among his more ambitious works we may count some of the best and most genial pieces of display in the whole circle of fashionable music for the instrument. But why, in the name of Martin Luther, take such a theme as the "Old Hundredth Psalm," Mr. Wallace? Would nothing serve for mincing up into demisemiquavers but this old fragment of Gothic melody, which, of all things in the world, people here associate with their church and their worship? Frankly, we dislike the notion so much, the whole thing seems such a jumble of the absurd and irreverend, that the technical cleverness manifested goes for nothing.

The second piece on our list is a very different affair. Whether or not the North Britons may bring forward, as another charge against us "Southrons," the knack we have of diversifying and "making much of" their national melodies, the habit of so doing is, we fear, too settled for change, even should Lord Eglintoun preside over a meeting specially called to condemn it. The theme, as all the world knows, is very pretty, and Mr. Wallace's dealing with it does it justice. The air is very tastefully arranged in its simple form, and followed by two sorts of variation, in which a great deal of effect for the instrument is combined with an extremely moderate demand on the skill of the performer. It is altogether a highly recommendable piece for young pupils, and will doubtless become popular.

"The Nun's Prayer." Song, by Oberthur. (Boosey and Sons.)

The poetical sentiment of this song—done into verse very prettily, by the way, by Mr. Desmond Ryan—may be gleaned from the title. It embodies the aspirations of a young lady who has embraced the Tractarian and very unnatural preference for convents and cropped hair and seclusion from society, to the store of sunshine and kindness and love, which the Creator has so bountifully given here to all those who know how to accept them.

The music, which pretends to nothing more than the proportions of a ballad, is flowing, pleasing, and expressive. We dislike, however, the six-bar sentence of the second part, which makes a diversity in the rhythm more startling than agreeable.

Mr. Crawford, the Scotch vocalist, has just returned from a tour through the provinces, and has already given his entertainment at Leighton Buzzard, Croydon, and Tunbridge Wells. Herr Wilhelm Ganz accompanied him as piano-forte player.

Glasgow.—Our correspondent informs us that the committee of gentlemen who have provided such attractive musical entertainments for their fellow citizens the last two winters, are in negociation with a London band for giving a series of concerts of classical music during the approaching season.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, September 30th, 1854.

The Norwich Festival and the opening of St. George's Hall at Liverpool have both proved failures in a monetary point of view. The cause of the unsuccess of the latter has been variously ascribed to the ill-management of the Committee and Corporation of the town, to the apathy of the people, and to the large sums paid to the principal artists—vocalists, of course. Whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the falling off from general expectation in the case of the inauguration of the new temple at Liverpool, universal agreement holds that the charities of the Norfolk and Norwich Festival have suffered vitally from the exorbitant terms paid to the singers. Let us not be thought invidious, if we are compelled to give names. We attach no blame whatever to artists in their endeavours to obtain what they can for their services—especially as no one knows his own capabilities, or deficiencies; we only condemn those in authority who proffer more than the charities can afford; and maintain, that sooner than the surplus money should be handed over to a few principal singers, it were better there were no charity-meetings at all. The fault lies in the directors, who do not at once discountenance the system of paying extravagant prices for their leading artists—having so many of them—except in very rare instances, when high terms may be allowed to become an economy rather than an extravagance;—but singers like Malibran and Jenny Lind are not of every-day occurrence.

At the Norwich Festival just past, Madame Clara Novello and Madame Bosio were each paid £300, and Signor Lablache, Gardoni, and Belletti, £150 each, making £1050 for the five. True, Malibran at the Manchester Festival—where, swan-like, she died singing—was to have obtained for her single services £1000; but her immense reputation had brought crowds of people from the remotest parts of England, Ireland, and Scotland; and, arguing from the company she attracted to the Festival—if it be an honest axiom that a person is worth what he brings—she was literally underpaid. Jenny Lind also received enormous sums for singing at concerts and festivals, but she was always double-worth the money given to her, and no one found fault with her terms, which seemed apparently so preposterous. The question is not whether one artist is superior or inferior to another, but whether the prestige or attractive force is greater or less. There is not a doubt but the attraction of Malibran or Jenny Lind would have been at least—without disparagement—double that of the five artists above named; therefore, if the services of the five in the aggregate are to be estimated at £1050, those of Malibran or Jenny Lind should be taken separately at £2100. But at the Norwich Festival there were other celebrated vocalists to pay—to wit, Mr. Sims Reeves and Madame Castellan. We have not ascertained what the lady received—£200, we believe—but Mr. Sims Reeves was extremely modest in his demands, in consequence of the Festival being devoted to charitable purposes, only asking one hundred pounds. If Mr. Sims Reeves receives one hundred pounds for a certain performance, we need scarcely, we presume, point out to the reader, that one hundred and fifty pounds to Signor Gardoni or Signor Belletti for a like performance is extravagant. We shall refrain from saying more on this head. It speaks for itself, and requires no comment. At the last Festival in Norwich, in 1852, the charities were handed over five hundred pounds for the Festival Fund by the committee. This year the charities have received so little that the directors are absolutely ashamed to publish the sum. The fifteen, or sixteen hundred pounds paid to the first singers, have swallowed up all the surplusage. The directors of Festivals purporting to be devoted to the ends and objects of charity, have, we think, received a lesson by which they will not fail to profit. Let those celebrated artists, who stick out for exorbitant terms, be informed, that "stars" are of less importance in an oratorio or a miscellaneous concert than in a dramatic representation; and that, let it be mildly hinted to them, without violence, a prima donna like Miss Louisa Pyne, at one hundred pounds, may sufficiently make amends for the absence of a prima donna like Madame Bosio at three hundred; and that a tenor like Herr Reichart, at fifty pounds, justly and satisfactorily may supply the place of a tenor like Signor Gardoni at one hundred and fifty—three to one being rather more than the market odds. Be it borne in mind that throughout this notice we are not drawing invidious comparisons, and are offering no opinion as to individual merits or capabilities.

A second grand mistake made by the directors of the Norwich Festival was in the engagement of three "superfine" prima donnas, two of whom were in each other's way. If Mad. Bosio was engaged, why Mad. Castellan? If Mad. Castellan, why Mad. Bosio? Mrs. Weiss—an excellent comprimaria, and, by the way, a most improving singer—was ready to do adjutant's duty to either colonel when necessary. Had Mad. Clara Novello been reserved for the oratorios, and Mad. Bosio for the evening concerts, both concerts and oratorios would have been benefitted. As it was, both concerts and oratorios suffered, and Mad. Clara Novello and Mad. Bosio were occasionally out of their element. So much for the Norfolk and Norwich Festival of the year 1854, and its grievances, which we hope to see redressed and compensated in 1857, when, as we are confidently assured, Messrs. Roger Kerrison and G. E. Simpson, the honorary and most honourable secretaries, are determined to suggest, and, if possible, carry out a very different line of policy in the financial arrangements to that prosecuted in the current year. They have but to say "No," and success is certain.

A GREAT deal has been said by musical men about the supposed want of the necessary acoustic qualities, for concert purposes, of the St. George's Hall, at Liverpool; and we find at least quite as much grumbling on the part of architects about what they are pleased to term the "ruinous effect" on the building produced by the introduction of an organ and orchestra. The musical growl we dismiss at once; feeling tolerably satisfied that when the hall contains an audience sufficiently numerous to fill it—which, unfortunately, it did not on any one of the "grand" performances of the late Festival—the reverberation, now so much complained of, will not be found far in excess of that agreeable amount which small rooms invariably want. The complaint of the architects, however, is altogether a different matter. It is evidently a small outbreak, on the part of this class of artists, of that zeal to make everything bend to their own exaltation, which has already rendered good music nearly impossible in modern churches, and will, if suffered to proceed, do as much for all new concert-rooms. We shall, therefore, take occasion briefly to examine the grounds of this dissatisfaction with the presence of an orchestra and organ in St. George's Hall.

We are told, with no little flourish, both publicly and privately, that the most superb interior in Europe has been spoiled. It is conclusively shewn that the architect's intention has been entirely frustrated. His design was to exhibit a prodigiously grand vista, embracing not only the dimensions of the hall itself, but the additional length of the law courts, which occupy each end of the building. The placing of an orchestra and organ at one extremity of the central hall has, it seems, cut off a large portion of this optical length; and so architectural propriety is violated, and the memory of the architect is insulted. We know, from a variety of sources, that the late Mr. Elmes—to whose genius the Liverpool people stand indebted for this superb structure—always warmly opposed the placing of an organ and orchestra in his great hall; and in the Builder, of the 16th instant, we find his wishes on this point in print. In a letter addressed to a brother architect in the year 1846, there occurs the following passage:—

"I hope when you 'contemplated the finished structure,' that there was no organ at the end, but that you stood on the judge's platform in one court, your eye glancing along the ranges of ruddy columns on either side, in all the richness and strong colour of a foreground; then reposing for an instant on the lofty arched opening communicating with the hall, whose broad and richly coffered soffite throws a shadow upon the grey columns beneath, and forms the middle distance,—it pierces the atmosphere of the great hall, passes the corresponding opening into the other court, without distinguishing a particle of detail from the great distance, and finally rests upon the judge's throne in the other court. Such, my dear friend, is a faint expression of what I hope and trust some day we may see together."

From this, there can be no doubt as to what was Mr. Elmes's intention, and there can be as little that, by the cumbrous furniture necessary for a festival performance, this intention has been entirely frustrated. The question simply is, how far either esprit de corps or a right notion of the facts justifies the existing architectural condemnation of the arrangement as it now appears? What business has an architect, who is commissioned to design a room specially intended for musical performances, so to prepare his plans that the necessary apparatus for concert purposes cannot be introduced without destroying the proportions of his structure? And what possible ground of complaint can exist, if means are adopted by which alone the room can be adapted to the sole use originally contemplated for it? It is a fundamental principle of all art, that fitness for an intended use is the first excellence in design. It is the same of everything—of a church, a house, a piece of furniture, a hat, a boot-jack. If a thing, whatever it be, of which exterior appearance is any feature, cannot be put to its express use, without damage to its other qualities, the fault is in the structure of the thing itself, and not in the nature of its application.

Lest there should be any doubt of the original object of the St. George's Hall, we refer our readers to the history of the whole matter, often printed and now well known. They will find that, because festival performances were forbidden in St. Peter's Church, an attempt was made to accumulate, by subscription, the funds necessary for building a suitable room for the purpose; and that, at length, the Corporation were induced to take the matter into their own hands, and resolved to incorporate this projected music hall with the buildings necessary for the legal and municipal business of the town Thus much is proof that a music room, and nothing but a music room, was contemplated. And besides this, it appears impossible that a room of such dimensions could have been projected with any other than a musical use in view. It could not have been meant as a mere sight for travellers, nor as a parade-ground for barristers, clients, aldermen, beadles, and the like. It was to be the Liverpool Festival Hall and nothing else. To this end the architect was, unquestionably, instructed; but he, unfortunately, committed the error of permitting the abstract beauty of his design to swamp all thought of its purpose. He has succeeded in creating one of the most beautiful rooms in existence, but appears studiously to have shut his eyes to the fact that an orchestra and organ were indispensable attributes of the purpose towards which he was specially instructed. In due time the room was finished, the first festival within its walls approached, and the organ and orchestra, positively necessary for this purpose, were erected;—all this must necessarily have been foreseen; and yet we find people complaining that the architect's design has suffered by appropriation to the only purpose it ever could, or was intended to, serve!

In many respects, we think, the Liverpool people much more ill-used than their architect. In an art-point of view, they have paid a vast sum of money for a building which they cannot apply to its intended use without the charge of desecrating it, while, as a purely practical matter, the Festival committees will, on every occasion, have to suffer a heavy expense in the erection and dismantling of an orchestra which should have been permanently provided for their service. The organ, to be sure, could not be treated in this extempore fashion. It had, obviously, to be constituted a "fixture" in the building; so, as a compromise with architectural beauty, it stands perched up in a gallery of its own, looking as though it belonged to nothing, and would never have anything to do.

As a question of abstract beauty, St. George's Hall unquestionably claims the warmest admiration; as a room fitted for musical performances, it is, undoubtedly, a failure. Though firmly convinced of the necessity of its presence, we admit the organ to be a "dis-sight" to the building; yet we, as freely, maintain the fault to be in the architect's design, and not in the inevitable position of the instrument.

MUSIC AT BRIGHTON.

(From a Correspondent.)

It is long since so much excitement has been created in Brighton by any musical event as by the performance which took place last night in the Town Hall, under the name of "Mr. Benedict's Grand Evening Concert." The programme was altogether one of unusual interest for a miscellaneous selection without orchestra; but the great feature of attraction was Madlle. Sophie Cruvelli, who sang for the first time before a Brighton audience, and made an impression not likely to be soon forgotten. The hall, which can accommodate a very large audience, was completely crammed by a fashionable and brilliant company; and the concert passed off with immense éclat from first to last. After a trio from Beatrice di Tenda, very well given by Mdlle. Albini, Mad. Marietta Albini (under the name of Mad. Vellani), and Signor Pavesi, followed by "La calunnia," rendered with intelligence by Signor Fortini, Madlle. Cruvelli appeared and was received with distinguished favour. She sang the well-known "Ernani involami" in the most brilliant style, and was enthusiastically encored—in response to which she repeated the last movement with increased effect, and to the great delight of the audience, whose good opinion she had already won by this her first attempt to please them. The slow movement of "Casta Diva," her next performance, was still more exquisite, and showed that Madlle. Cruvelli was quite as much at home in the music of expression as in the pure bravura school. She was encored and again recalled after this; but declined to repeat it. The most perfect effort of all, however, was her last—the romanza from Otello, "Assisa a piè d'un salice," a melody where Rossini has equalled Mozart himself in tenderness. We have heard nothing more touchingly beautiful than the manner in which this, and the prayer that succeeds it in the opera, were sung—we may almost say breathed—by Madlle. Cruvelli. It was the perfection of sentiment, unstudied and deep at the same time—all indeed that was most expressive without a tinge of exaggeration. The audience were enraptured, and recalled her with acclamations; the preghiera was repeated, and at the end of this Madlle. Cruvelli was once more compelled to come forward. A greater success has never been obtained, nor one more richly merited. Besides her solos, Madlle. Cruvelli joined Signors Pavesi and Belletti in the trio from Ernani ("Solingo erranti"), and Signor Belletti in "Crudel perche."

Sig. Belletti produced a great effect by his very spirited execution of "Rage, thou angry storm," one of Mr. Benedict's best operatic songs; and also in Handel's "O ruddier than the cherry," which he has been singing very frequently of late. Sig. Pavesi gave a sensible reading of "Una furtiva lagrima;" and Mdlle. Albini proved herself possessed of a voice of agreeable quality and considerable vocal acquirement in the romance from Maria di Rohan, "Havvi un Dio." A duet from Semiramide, by Mdlle. Albini and Mad. Vellani; Rossini's "I Marinari," by Signors Pavesi and Belletti; and the preghiera from Mosè in Egitto, by all the singers, completed the vocal selection. There was also some excellent pianoforte playing. Mr. Osborne's brilliant duet on the Huguenots, for two pianofortes, was famously executed by Mr. Benedict and Herr Kuhe; and Mr. Benedict performed two graceful solo compositions of his own—Nocturne and "Mignonette"—in a masterly manner. Both were warmly applauded, which was also the case with two very interesting movements (andante and intermezzo) from a MS. sonata of Mr. Benedict, for violin and piano, which were played to perfection by the composer and Mr. Oury. Mr. Benedict accompanied Mdlle. Cruvelli in her songs; and the rest of the conductor's duties devolved upon Sig. Li Calsi, who acquitted himself with ability. The concert gave universal satisfaction; and the début of Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli in Brighton was pronounced a triumph, without one dissentient voice.

Mr. and Mrs. Sims Reeves are at present at Brighton. On Monday they start for a provincial tour of a week in Lincolnshire.

PROVINCIAL.

Birmingham.—(From a Correspondent). On Thursday evening, the 21st inst., the Birmingham Festival Choral Society gave an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah in the Town Hall, which was crowed in every part. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Sunderland, Mrs. Paget (Royal Academy of Music). Mr. Perring, and Mr. Thomas. Mr. Stimpson, presided at the organ. Mr. Surman, from Exeter Hall, conducted.

Birmingham.—We have received a lengthy account of a concert which took place in the Town-Hall, Birmingham, on Wednesday night. The programme, however, being nearly the same as that of another concert, also reported this week, it would be superfluous to publish it in extenso, or even abridged. The writer is in ecstasies with Madlle. Sophie Cruvelli, who made her first appearance at Birmingham, and was encored and recalled after everything she sang. Among other pieces she introduced "Ernani involami," "Casta Diva," (both slow movement and cabaletta); a kind of national melody, by Taubert (which Madlle. Jenny Lind used to sing); and the romance and prayer of Desdemona, besides "La ci darem" with Sig. Belletti. "Madlle. Cruvelli," writes our correspondent, "pleased as much by her quiet and lady-like manner, as she astonished and delighted by her artistic and charming singing"—with many other compliments unnecessary to reproduce. The other singers were, it appears, Sig. Belletti, Sig. Pavesi, Madlle. Albini (who pleased very much in "Nacqui all' affanno," from Cenerentola), Madame Albini (alias Vellani, who in the duet, "Serbami ognor," with her daughter, showed herself a thorough adept in the old and true Italian school), and Sig. Fortini. The only differences to note, between this and the other programme alluded to, were the trio, "Zitti zitti," sung with great animation by Madlle. Albini, Sig. Pavesi, and Sig. Belletti, and encored; "Madamina! il catalogo è questo," well given by Sig. Fortini; "La donna è mobile," in which Sig. Pavesi gave much satisfaction; "Sorgete!" (Maometto Secondo) admirably sung by Sig. Belletti; Mr. Benedict's brilliant fantasia, called Recollections of Scotland, executed by himself, with great and merited applause; and some other pieces of minor importance. Sig. Belletti was encored in "O ruddier than the cherry." Mr. Benedict was the sole accompanyist—a fact of which no one would be likely to complain. The concert was given under the name of Mr. John Tonks, a resident music-publisher. "The audience," adds our correspondent, "might have been more crowded, but could not possibly have been more thoroughly satisfied and pleased."

Manchester. — (From our own Correspondent.) — Herr Friedrich Unger's Concert, Town Hall, Sept. 21, 1854.

Part I.—Grand Trio Concertante (in E minor, Op. 119), L. Spohr. Vocal—"Ah! si questo di mia vita," nella "Zaira," Mercadante; Cantatille, "Les deux mules," Henrion. Grand Sonata—Pianoforte and Violoncello—(in D major, Op. 58) Mendelssohn.

Part II.—Grand Trio (in C minor, Op. 1, No 3), Beethoven. Solo—Pianoforte—Romance (in A major), Unger; Grande Etude "Les Trilles" (in G flat), Schulhoff; Reminiscences de "Lucia di Lammermoor," Fantaisie, Liszt. Vocal—"Stabat mater," Keller; Romanza Espagnole "Antonica," Amat. Grand Duo—Violin and Pianoforte—Fantaisie sur des motifs de l'opera "Robert le Diable," De Bériot and Wolff.

This was the début to a Manchester public of a young German artist, who is about to establish himself in this city as a resident teacher and professor of music. The room was far from crowded; but a most respectable muster was made of highly respectable families, including, of course, not a few resident Germans. The programme was quite on the classical chamber model. Herr Unger had secured the best talent available in Manchester as executants on the violin and violoncello in this class of music.

Of the débutant, we do not wish to speak in a discouraging tone; he is an artist evidently embued with an enthusiastic feeling for his art, and allowances must naturally be made for a first appearance before so highly critical an audience, amongst which we recognised Mr. Charles Hallé, Mr. J. Thorne Harris, and Mad. Szézepanowska, besides several first-rate amateur players on the pianoforte. Spohr's trio, with which the concert opened, is a trying ordeal for all engaged in it, and any want of clearness and expression in the pianist we attribute to nervousness on a first appearance, especially as Herr Unger got through the difficult scherzo very creditably. The larghetto we thought was taken too slow. It was in the duo of Mendlessohn and the trio of Beethoven that we discovered the greatest shortcomings—not that we consider it quite fair to test the performances of so young an artist, by comparing them with one of the world-wide celebrity of Charles Hallé; but who that has heard Hallé give such beautifully marked expression as he does to Mendelssohn's duet in D, and to the pianoforte part in Beethoven's splendid trio in C minor, can help thinking of Hallé when he hears them played. It was this forced contrast that tended to place Herr Unger at a disadvantage. There seemed a sort of spasmodic effort to overcome and grasp at all difficulties, which was so widely different from the cool, calm dignity of conscious power which gives such a charm when Hallé is expounding Beethoven or Mendelssohn! We were less surprised at this on subsequently hearing Herr Unger in a different class of music, in which, as a pupil of Liszt, he has evidently attained greater proficiency, viz.: in Liszt's Reminiscences de Lucia di Lammermoor. Here, in what we call the "thunder and lightning" school, the young pianist seemed thoroughly at home, was immensely applauded and encored. The concert was too long by three quarters of an hour, so we missed the violin and pianoforte duet. M. Charles Guilmette, announced as primo basso from Paris, was the vocalist on the occasion; he is almost a tenor, certainly more a baritone than bass, has a good voice of extensive register, and gave plenty of variety in Italian, French, Latin, and Spanish, but all with an extravagant exuberance of style that militated against the effect that otherwise might legitimately have been produced by his flexible and really fine voice—by exuberance, we mean the excessively ornate in his singing, and excessive mobility of feature. A quieter delivery, and more sustained method, would tell better here, whatever it may do in Paris, or in Rio, from which place we understand M. Guilmette has recently returned. Altogether, we think that Herr Unger may congratulate himself on the success of his concert.

It appears the Grand Festival at inaugurating the St. George's Hall, at Liverpool, has been a great fiasco!

How we wish a Hall had to be opened here! Your own correspondent flatters himself that Manchester would come out with better credit—but where is the Hall? Echo answers, where?

Manchester.—We copy the following curious sample of theatrical speculation from the Manchester Examiner and Times. We trust that our Australian friends will fully appreciate the efforts made to contribute to their amusement:—

"An Iron Theatre going to Australia.—Messrs. Edward T. Bellhouse and Co., of Eagle Foundry, are now engaged in the construction of a complete iron shell and framework of a spacious portable theatre, for Mr. George Coppin, who recently appeared at our Theatre Royal, in a round of characters. It seems that Mr. Coppin has engaged Mr. G. V. Brooke, the tragedian, to perform in the principal towns in Australia, for 200 nights, for which performances he pays Mr. Brooke the sum of £50 per night, or £10,000 for 200 nights! Now, with a vast scheme of this sort, it would not do to be at a stand-still, owing to the total absence of suitable room, or the caprices of the proprietary; so Mr. Coppin determines to go out with a complete portable theatre of iron, which, with all fittings and appurtenances, will cost a sum exceeding £4000. The building contracted for by Messrs. Bellhouse is 88 feet in length, 40 feet wide, and about 24 feet high from the ground level to the peak of the roof. As the floor level of the pit will be sunk about five or six feet below the ground level, there will be considerable altitude in the interior. The walls will be of cast-iron, upright (Bellhouse's patent), and galvanised corrugated iron sheets, No. 18, wire gauge. The roof will consist of strong iron principals, having the galvanised sheets bolted thereupon. To the gable end of the building, which forms the front, will be attached an ornamental building, which will be arranged as box and pit offices, lobbies and entrances. A degree of ornamental effect will be given to this façade. The pit will be very spacious, extending back from the foot-lights to the wall below the boxes to about 54 feet, and being 59 feet across. The gallery for the boxes will project 24 feet from the wall opposite the stage, and eight feet from the wall on each of the sides of the theatre. This gallery will be supported on iron columns and strong framework of timber. Messrs. Bellhouse have undertaken the complete shell of the building, the ornamental façade, and the principal framework of the interior, and have engaged to have the whole on board ship in London in about 30 days from date of contract.

The Hungarian band of instrumentalists gave the first of two concerts in the Corn Exchange, on Thursday evening, the 21st inst.

Oldham.—On Wednesday evening, a miscellaneous concert took place, the performers being the Oldham Borough Choral Society, consisting of about sixty members, assisted by Mrs. Winterbottom, and Mr. Mellor. The room was crowded to excess, and several of Mrs. Winterbottom's songs were encored. The attendance, since our last publication, has been, Tuesday, 840; Wednesday, 1*s.* per day, 1,201; Thursday, 717. The unsettled state of the weather has done much to impede its progress.

Halifax.—On Tuesday evening last, a concert was given in the Odd Fellows' Hall, Halifax, by "the Lancashire Choral Union" a party of ten male singers, with the addition of Miss Whitham, as a solo treble, and Mr. Frobisher presiding at the pianoforte. The "Lancashire Choral Union" consists of ten young singers, who, in training, make a fair imitation of the celebrated Cologne Choral Union. The singers of the Lancashire Choral Union (who all reside in Ashton) sing their music without instrument, begin without a key-note, and perform much of their music without copy. They are without a conductor and they sing English words. The music by the "Lancashire Choral Union" on Tuesday night was well sung. Among the glees were Tom Cooke's "Strike the lyre;" Spofforth's "Come, bounteous May;" Battye's "Child of the Sun;" Glover's Gipsy chorus, and Festa's quaint old madrigal, "Down in a flowery vale;" in the execution of which all their character was exhibited. The performance of Kücken's Musicians by the "Choral Union" showed that the Lancashire singers are competent to the interpretation of this music; its modulations were accurately given, and the sforzandos naturally and without exaggeration. We must not omit to notice the fine tenor voice which sung Balfe's "In this old chair," with a vocal accompaniment after the more legitimate manner of the Cologne singers. The song was encored, and the singers substituted "Cheer boys, cheer," in which a fine counter voice gave the song. Miss Whitham sang Bishop's "Echo Song," Linley's "Welcome, my bonnie lad," Barnett's "I saw him on the mountain," and Glover's "Laughing girl," and, being encored, in two of these songs, substituted "Wha's a' the steer, kimmer" and "Come dwell with me," accompanying herself in these two songs upon the pianoforte.

The Theatre Royal is being entirely re-decorated, and will be quite ready for Mr. Charles Mathews and the Lyceum company, who will make their début on Saturday.

Boston Spa.—On Wednesday evening last, Mr. Newhill, the spirited proprietor of the Bath Hotel, gave a grand concert, at which the following celebrated performers appeared:—Mrs. Sunderland, Mr. J. L. Hatton, Mr. Watson, Mr. Holt, Mr. Ackroyd, Mr. Winn, and Mr. Pew. The music, which was mostly vocal, gave the highest satisfaction to a numerous and fashionable assembly. Miss Millner announces a concert for next Saturday.

Scarborough.—A concert was given on Thursday evening by Mr. Burton, organist of the parish church, which was attended by a numerous and highly respectable audience, the large rooms of the Town Hall being filled in every part. The artists were Mrs. Sunderland, and Messrs. Perring and Hinchcliffe, and the Masters Giles and Appleyard, from the Leeds Parish Church Choir. The energy and feeling shewn by these youths were characteristics in their performance worthy of many more advanced in the profession. Mr. Burton intends giving a concert annually, and from the favour he has now received, there remains no doubt that future seasons will yield an increasing patronage.

At the Spa Saloon, Miss Barwick and Messrs. Ryall and Bolton are engaged, and are no small attraction to the visitors. Mr.

Wilson's performance on the piano-forte is also worthy of all praise.

BRISTOL.—Mr. Chute commenced the season on Saturday last with Hamlet, which was put on the stage with much accuracy and effect. The part of Hamlet was well played by Mr. Shelley; Miss Bennett took the part of the Queen, and Miss Fanny Young that of Ophelia. The Ghost was played by Mr. Warde. We understand that the manager, Mr. Chute, has transmitted to the Mayor of Bristol a cheque for £90, being the nett proceeds of a performance on Monday, September 11th, in aid of the fund now raising for the Bristol Royal Infirmary. A concert is announced to take place by Mr. Marks, a German professor of music, resident at Bristol, at which his pupils, varying from nine to ten years of age, are to form the principal attraction. We understand that the development of the musical faculty in these incipient musicians is most surprising.

Mr. Henry Phillips gave a musical entertainment, entitled "the City of the Sultan," at the Broadmead Rooms, on Monday evening. Some capital songs, of ancient and modern date, sung in Mr. Henry Phillips's best style, introduced by some connecting observations and anecdotes, and aided by a large and well-executed series of pictorial illustrations, form together a very pleasing entertainment. The rooms were not so full on Monday as we have seen them on similar occasions, probably owing to the concert at the Victoria Rooms, and other attractions, but we are glad to hear that the entertainment was repeated to a fuller audience yesterday (Tuesday) evening.

BRIGHTON.—(From a Correspondent.)—M. Edouard de Paris gave his first concert for the season at the Town Hall, on Friday evening last. It was numerously and fashionably attended. As a pianist, M. Edouard de Paris' merits are well known. Mayseder's trio, with Ernst and M. Paque, the violoncellist, was played with good execution and excellent taste. The adagio escaped an encore. A solo by M. de Paris, of his own composition, exhibited his peculiarities in a more palpable degree. Mad. Caradori sang the "Trono e corona involami" with a power and expression peculiarly her own. In consequence of the non-arrival of Herr Formes, whose absence created much disappointment, Madame Caradori and her youthful coadjutor, Miss Katharine Smith, sang an extra song each. "Casta Diva" was sung by Mad. Caradori, as was also the song of "The Queen of Night," which was encored. The duet from Norma was a fiasco. Voices so dissimilar in weight and quality as those of Mad. Caradori and Miss Katharine Smith should never be joined together; it is an unfair approximation. The soft, fluty, and delicate tones of Miss Katharine Smith's voice were overpowered by the hard, trombony, and powerful notes of Mad. Caradori. Notwithstanding this the duet was applauded. Miss K. Smith made her first appearance before a Brighton audience on this occasion. Her youthful and lady-like appearance, her pure and pleasing voice, with a style at once simple and chaste, won for her the sympathies of her audience. Sig. Marras's aria "Sio fossi un angelo" was sung by her with nice expression, though she was evidently suffering from extreme timidity. In "Robert, toi que j'aime" this was partly got over, and she was more successful. There is a plaintiveness in the tone of this young lady's voice which is well adapted for a pathetic ballad—a thing we so rarely hear "now-a-days." Ernst, the magician of the violin, played as only Ernst can play. Style, tone, fire, pathos—all combine to make the consummate artist. The duet with M. de Paris was as near perfection as one perfect instrument could make it, and drew forth expressions of delight from all parts of the room. M. de Paque executed a fantasia with much success on the violoncello. His tone his full and round, and his mechanism is neat and very distinct. The airs from Lucia were well put together, and were admirably played, and M. Paque's share in the trio proved him a sound musician. But for the disappointment alluded to, and of which the great basso will have to render a strict account, a more pleasing concert could hardly have been given. Herr Wilhelm Ganz conducted.

KIDDERMINSTER.—On Monday last, the members of the Choral Society in this town, which, under the superintendence of Mr. Fitzgerald, has lately made much progress both in numbers and proficiency, gave a public rehearsal at St. George's School Room. The room was filled, and among the auditory were many of the principal inhabitants of the town and neighbourhood. The music selected consisted chiefly of choruses from Händel, with selections from Mozart, Ford, and Calcott. These pieces were all performed in a highly creditable manner, and elicited strong marks of approbation. One chorus, "Oh, the pleasures of the plains," was enthusiastically encored. At the conclusion, the Mayor, J. Kiteley, Esq., in the name of all present, heartily thanked Mr. Fitzgerald and the Society for the great gratification their concert had afforded.

CORK.—(From our own Correspondent)—THE ITALIAN OPERA COMPANY.—Talk of Italiana in Algieri, Gli Italiani in Cork was a far greater event. Year after year have the music-loving inhabitants of "the beautiful city" hoped and sighed for such a thing. The railway would surely bring them down; but, alas! when there was a railway, there was no theatre. However, thanks to the spirit and enterprise of Mr. Burke, the theatre was rebuilt, and visions of the days or rather nights of Siddons, O'Neil, Kemble, Young, Kean, Incledon, Braham, Catalani, Billington, Selvini, etc., etc., began to dawn on the generation who knew them by tradition, and a few old stagers who remembered them. It was reserved for Mr. Beale* to realize the vision, and well has he done it; there is even some talk of a testimonial.

On Thursday, the 21st, the Theatre Royal, Georges Street, (Cork), opened with Lucia di Lammermoor, the principal parts being sustained by Mdlle. Albini, and Signori Luchesi and Fortini, in which the duet was encored; but Friday was the night, par excellence, for them. Sophie Cruvelli appeared as Norma, and it was a magnificent display of singing and acting. Mdlle. Cruvelli felt that her dramatic talents, rare organ, and finished style, were fully appreciated. Numbers from Cork were at the Italian Opera in London this season, but had no opportunity of hearing her, and the consequence was that every part of the house was filled, and great numbers turned away. The great point in Norma, the rendering of "Son Io," was the most pathetic contrite cry for pity and mercy perhaps ever heard on the stage. In La Sonnambula, on Saturday night, Amina was presented in a new shape to an audience who have the music by heart. In the second act, Mdlle. Cruvelli was Siddons-like, while again in the "Ah! non giunge," her rendering of the song, which she commenced more piano than usual, showed a total absence of cunan pensiero; it was towards the end that she gave way to the full sense of happiness. Too much praise cannot be given to Mdlle. Albini, whose sweet mellow voice, and absence of affectation and assumption, almost divided the honours. Sig. Luchesi went through his parts most creditably, as did also Sig. Fortini, whose Oroveso, particularly in the last scene, was excellent. Madlle Albini, in the third scene of La Sonnambula, sang and played admirably when she came out to request the villagers not to wake her daughter, and was capital when producing Lisa's scarf. The orchestra contained the picked members of the Dublin performers, and with the chorus were admirable. The singing and playing reflect great talent on the conductor, Mr. A. Mellon. Too much praise cannot be given to Mr. Harris, who, with very limited resources, left nothing to be wished for in the stage management.

THE CRUVELLI-TAMBERLIK tour came to an end on Thursday evening, with a concert at Brighton. The tour has been one of the most profitable and brilliant ever undertaken by Mr. Beale. Sig. Tamberlik, Madlle. Marai, Signors Tagliafico and Polonini, left Dublin last week for St. Petersburgh. (We trust they may get safe there, and, what is more, safe back again.) Sig. Pavesi and Sig. Belletti were engaged to fill up some of the gaps thus left at the concert; though so great has been the success of Madlle. Cruvelli everywhere, that scarcely any other attraction was required. Madlle. Cruvelli arrived in London yesterday, and started immediately for Boulogne.

* That there will be a pretty brisk sale of the music of Norma and Sonnambula there is no doubt.

FOREIGN.

PARIS.—(From our own Correspondent.)—At the Grand Opera the Prophète has been given with Madlle. Wertheimber, as Fides. She was especially applauded in the fourth and fifth acts. The other principal parts were sustained by Maddle. Poinsot and M. Roger. M. Gounod's Nonne Sanglante is announced for the commencement of October. Mad. Stolz has appeared in La Reine de Chypre. This lady will take a congé on the 1st October. She has received various offers from managers, both in France and abroad, but there is reason to believe that if she sings at all, during her holidays, it will be in France, for the benefit of the poor. M. Roger will soon cease to belong to the Grand Opéra. His engagement expires in a few weeks. Madlle. Sophie Cruvelli returns on the 1st October, when she will immediately begin to rehearse the new opera by Messrs. Scribe and Verdi. Mad. Rosati has been seriously indisposed; she is, however, much better at present, and hopes are entertained that she will very shortly be able to make her re-appearance in Jovita. The new management has introduced a great improvement, which London managers would do well to imitate. The "starring" system in the bills is abolished. The names of all the actors, both in opera and ballet, will henceforth all be printed in the same sized type.

The season at the Théâtre-Italien commences on the 3rd October. The principal artists are already at their posts, and have attended rehearsals for some time past.

At the Opéra-Comique, L'Etoile du Nord will shortly be revived. The next novelties will be three one-act pieces, so as to form an entirely new bill. The following is a list of the towns in which M. Meyerbeer's latest chef-d'œuvre is shortly to be produced:—Nimes, Lyons, Toulouse, Valenciennes, Lille, Limoges, Avignon, Cologne, Stuttgart, Brussels, Gand, Lisbon, New York, and New Orleans.

At the Théâtre-Français, M. Bressau and Mdlle. Madeleine Brohan have made their re-appearance in Le Verre d'Eau. Mad. Girardin's beautiful little comedy of Joie fait Peur has been revived, as well as an old comedy by Etienne, La Femme Colère, which dates from 1804, and maintained its position on the boards for a long time—thanks to Mdlle. Mars, who sustained the principle character. It was afterwards set to music by Boïeldieu, and accepted at the Opéra-Comique, the 12th October, 1812.

The Odéon has re-opened its doors to the public with two new pieces: a comedy, entitled Amour et Caprice, by MM. de Judicis et Blanquet, and Le Vicaire de Wakefield, by MM. Tisserant and Eugène Nus.

There is a report that a new comedy, entitled Le Chapeau de l'Horloger, is accepted at the Gymnase—Mad. George Sand's Mariage de Victorine is announced for revival.

The last novelty at the Vaudeville is a piece called Le Cabaret du Pot cassé, by MM. Clairville and Lambert Thiboust, for the débuts of M. Felicien, Mesdemoiselles Thério and Dubuisson. It was successful.

A one-act trifle, Quand on n'a pas le Sou, has been produced at the Variétés. MM. Arnal and Numa have made their re-appearance in some of their favourite pieces.

Three novelties are announced for speedy production at the Palais Royal: La Cloche d'Or, by MM. Armand Durantin and Raymond Deslandes, and two one-act comedies by M. Henri Monnier, in each of which the author himself will play the principal part.

M. Bouffé lately signed an engagement with M. Marc Fournier at the Porte-Saint-Martin, but it has since been cancelled by the Minister of the Interior, who, in virtue of a recent decision, intends henceforth confining each theatre to the peculiar class of performance for which it is licensed. At the Porte Saint Martin, the representation of short vaudevilles, serving as levers-de-rideau, only is allowed. M. Bouffé has, however, obtained permission to play twice in what are called représentations extraordinaires.

A grand five-act drama, Anglais et Français, the first effort of a young author, M. Anguste Bardolet, has been successful at the Ambigu-Comique. The dresses and mise-en-scène are very magnificent and correct, and the principal characters ably filled by MM. Hoster, Léon Joliet, and Mdlle. Fernand.

ITALY.—Our Correspondent from Milan, to whom we refer our readers, informs us that the success of the new opera Fiorina was considerable; this is confirmed from other quarters, so that we may conclude that there is but one opinion on the subject. In the present dearth of composers we hail this consummation with much satisfaction—at Verona Mr. Balfe's opera La Zingara was played on the 22nd September, and, in spite of illness of one of the principal singers, met with complete success. The correspondent of the Gazzetta Musicale of Milan thus speaks of The Bohemian Girl done into Italian:—"The opera in spite of numerous defects in the execution, owing to the illness of one of the principal actors, gave me the greatest desire to see it a second time. It was received with much favour and deservedly so, for it contains many beauties and good scenic effects."—At Florence Verdi's opera La Traviata, produced under the name of Violetta has been received rather coldly at the Pergola. In spite of the efforts of Mad. Crippa, Signor Fraschini and Beraldi, the first two acts went very heavily and marks of disappointment were not unfrequent. The third act went better. Three pieces of the last act are worthy of the author of Il Trovatore, and were much applauded. At the Pagliano, the new opera Viscardello has been resumed, and continues to be favourably received by the public. Signor Landi sang his best, and was encored several times, as well as Signora Biava, especially in the stretto of the duet of the second act. Signor Barili does not please the public. Il Trovatore will shortly be brought out.—The opera which Signor Buzzi is writing for the Teatro della Fenice of Venice has for its title Edita, or, La Moglie del Crociato; the libretto is by Sig. Canovai. Our old friend Ivanoff is now at Florence, on a visit to Rossini. Leopold de Meyer is also at Florence, where it is hoped he may be induced to play in public.

VIENNA.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Spontini's Ferdinand Cortez has been revived at the Imperial Opera House, after a lapse of two-and-twenty years. The reproduction of this opera excited great curiosity, and the house was densely crowded. Herr Steger sustained the part of the Spanish general, but his performance was anything but first rate. Madlle. La Grua was the Amazili, and Herr Beck, Telasco. The orchestra was steady and effective, under the direction of Herr Eckert. The public were loud in their applause.—The Imperial Privat-theater in der Josefstadt was opened on the 16th inst., under the direction of Herr J. Swoboda, with Herr Meisl's Schwarze Frau.

BERLIN.—(From our own Correspondent).—Two small operas, Czar und Zimmermann and Johann von Paris, have been given at the Royal Opera-house, as stop-gaps, before the re-appearance of Mdlle. Johanna Wagner, which takes place in a few days.

The second quartet soirée of Herren Oertling, Rehbaum, Wendt, and Birnbach, took place in Sommer's Rooms. The programme was composed of Mozart's quartet in D minor, Schubert's quartet in A minor, and that in F major (Op. 18) by Beethoven.—On the same evening, Herr Bock, the music-publisher, gave a concert in his saloons, for the purpose of introducing Miss Martinac, a pupil of Mad. Dulcken, to a Berlin public. The young lady was very well received.—A performance, under royal patronage, will shortly be given at the Imperial Opera-house, for the benefit of the sufferers by the recent inundations in Silesia. A concert of Sacred Music will, also, be given for the same object by the Königlicher-Domchor, as well as a performance of Haydn's Creation in the Garnisonkirche.

DRESDEN.—The manufacture of cheap musical instruments forms an important branch of commerce in many places in Saxony. Two small towns, Neukirchen and Klingenthal alone produce, every year, about 10,000 dozen violins at 30,000 thalers, 2,000 dozen at 8,000 thalers, 500 dozen at 4,000 thalers, 100 dozen at 2,000 thalers, and 10 dozen at 500 thalers, making a total of 12,610 violins at 44,500 thalers. They also make 2643 dozen guitars, worth 32,800 thalers, 600 double-basses, worth 4,000 thalers, 3,000 violoncellos, worth 8,000 thalers, as well as strings to the amount of 60,000 thalers. Most of these instruments are sent abroad.]

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—Your leading article, last Saturday, was very severe on the Royal Academy, and, acting on the well-known principle of English law, not to condemn any one unheard, I would beg permission to say a few words on behalf of the Institution which has been so severely handled. In taking up the pen, however, in behalf of the Academy, I do it with a strong recollection of the well-known anecdote of Annibale Carracci, who, after listening to an elaborate description of the Laocoon, in a lecture by his brother, turned to the wall, sketched the figure rapidly with a piece of chalk, and exclaimed, with a look at the orator "Poets paint with words, painters with their pencils." And thus practical musicians have a language of their own, and feel that they enter the lists at a disadvantage, when they have to strive with trained writers and experienced literary men.

A few plain words, a few facts clearly stated, are all that I can here aim at. I would fain engage your valuable aid in favour of the Academy, sincerely trusting that its fate is not "settled," in the sense in which your leader employs the word, and that, with respect to its funeral death-knell, you have been misinformed.

You do not seem to be aware that there has been a recent alteration in the management of the Academy: the working part of it has, this half year, been confided to a Board of Professors, of all of whom I know you highly approve. Every hope may therefore be entertained that the Institution, which, if certainly not "over-young," cannot be said to be "over-old," may become flourishing.

I did not know that there was anything Plutonic in pecuniary difficulties; perhaps the writer, who is so hard upon others, has evidently made a mistake which would be pardonable in a class in which we are told, "Education of the best kind is not abundant;" he has confounded Plutus, the god of riches, with Pluto, the god of hell. The old proverb of "glass-houses" recurs to the mind, but, of course, as a mere ignorant musician, I do not presume to make the application.

If, however, the Academy is poor, it is a misfortune rather than a fault. For the sake of art in this country, it is to be regretted that the Academy is not independent of the sums received from the pupils. Let the fault and the blame be attributed to the right quarters, viz., to those who have the means to aid, and who yet withhold their contributions, whether large or small, from an Institution which trains English musicians in the way that a musician ought to be trained, and that is, to have a theoretical and practical knowledge, and to be well versed (even though he be only a solo singer or player) in orchestral performance, as having a bearing upon everything that he does connected with his art.

I do not quite understand what is meant by "a method, as it is termed, should be provided, and its employment enforced on every master, whatever his pretensions." Now, the rules for musical science generally have been dictated by taste, and of course are always open to objections by all who differ in such matters of feeling, etc. With respect to the study of harmony, no one will deny that the language is universal, although there may be different methods of arriving at the same end. In the executive part (instrumental), is it indeed desirable that every master should teach the same method of bowing passages, etc.? If one master takes a different view of a passage, and gives a different reading or expression to what another does, should he be bound to go against his feelings, and be compelled to do that mechanically which he might have done from what is termed inspiration? It is by masters communicating their gathered experience and reflections to their pupils, and these to succeeding pupils with new accumulation, that will cause the art of music to advance. Now, although a master will not communicate directly his own feeling upon any passage in music, yet he will, if unfettered by mere system, give his pupil the advantage of his own taste and experience, and will judiciously be careful not to fetter the genius of his pupil; for one of the nicest and most interesting points in teaching a science such as music, is to remember that every composer or performer has a style peculiar to himself, and a master will always delight in giving full scope to the well-regulated peculiarities of his pupils. Is it not said, "The authority of those who teach is a frequent hindrance to those who learn, because they utterly neglect to exercise their own judgment, taking for granted whatsoever others whom they reverence have judged for them?" If we would find out truth, we must, in many cases, dare to deviate from the beaten track, and venture to think with a just and unbiassed liberty.

I agree, most feelingly, with the writer of the article, that "General mental culture is as necessary to a musician as to any man alive." In fact, general knowledge renders all particular knowledge more clear and precise. Music is a language of nature, intelligible at once to all susceptible minds. Some are naturally gifted, and the only education of mind they receive is from music. Music has its ripening and its elevating influences, and thus it is that there have been great artists who were uneducated in everything but music. In Italy, where music is a passion, and is studied almost as such, is it general education which produces all that fire and energy so peculiar to the Italians? It speaks volumes in favour of music that it can do so much. Who can analyse the emotions that music produces in the mind—emotions so great, so mysterious, that Martin Luther, who felt them most strongly, was wont to say, "There are two great studies, theology and music." The study of music, theoretical and practical, might occupy a great many life-times, for a real artist must feel that he is always learning. Yet, while I contend for unreserved devotedness to the art as the business of life, with those who follow music as a profession, I entirely agree with the writer as to the importance of general cultivation, for I feel sure that when the full reasoning powers of the mind are brought into play through various other channels of instruction, the mind is rendered susceptible of livelier and healthier impressions from music itself.

And now to conclude in a few brief sentences. The Academy has not accomplished what we desire, what we aim at, and what we hope for, but we trust and believe that a brighter day is before us. We look upon what has hitherto been done as preliminary; and even as the human mind was nursed and strengthened in the quiet of what were called the dark ages, and then took a bound and a spring, clearing old barriers, and advancing with rapidity previously unknown, so we trust a brilliant career is yet reserved for our National Musical Institutions, and great things will yet be done. Let all resolutely do their duty; let all be ready to help, encourage, and foster—not to crush and despise—and a bright, a prosperous, a glorious course may yet be granted to the Royal Academy of Music.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

RUDALL, ROSE, CARTE, and CO., 100, NEW BOND STREET, LONDON, have the honour of announcing that they have been appointed the Sole Agents in Great Britain for the Sale of the SAX-CORNETS, SAXOPHONES, SAX-HORNS, and all other Brass Military Instruments invented and manufactured by M. Adolphe Sax, to whom was awarded the only Council Medal of the Great Exhibition for Military Instruments in Brass, a list of which, with the prices, may be had on application, post free. It will be seen from this list, that M. Sax's Instruments can now be supplied direct from his own Manufactory, at a price not higher than the numerous imitations of them.

MILITARY BAND INSTRUMENTS.—Messrs. BOOSEY and SONS respectfully solicit Officers and Band-masters to call and inspect their stock of C. Boosé's unrivalled Military Musical Instruments, combining all the newest improvements, with every requisite an artist or amateur could desire. The high standing of these instruments in Her Majesty's Army and Navy, and Hon. East India Company's Service, is Messrs. Boosey and Sons' object to retain, by the most careful attention, both to the quality and price of every instrument that proceeds from their manufactory. C. Boosé's Journal for a Reed and Brass Band continues to be published monthly, on the 15th. Boosey and Sons, Military Musical Instrument Manufacturers, Holles-street, London.

THE SAXOPHONE.—RUDALL, ROSE, CARTE, and Co., 100, New Bond-street, sole agents in this country for M. Sax's military instruments, in addition to a large stock of Sax Horns, Sax Trombas, Sax Trumpets, and Cornets, have just received a great variety of soprano, alto, tenor, and bass, of Sax's new and beautiful-toned instruments, the Saxophone. "These new instruments (brass and played by a reed), possess a charm equal to the originality of their tone, and they carry to the highest degree of perfection, la voix expressive."—Report of Jurors, Great Exhibition.

THE LONDON ORCHESTRA.—Conductor, Mr. FRANK MORI; Leader, Mr. THIRLWALL. Messrs. Barret, Lazarus, Baumann, Rémusat, Lovell Phillips, Mount, Tolbecque, Nadaud, Payton, Mann, Carrodus, Vogel, D. Godfrey, Cioffi, Prospère, Chipp, Zeiss, Antoine, Guest, Russell, Standen, N. Mori, W. Thirlwall, Crozier, F. Godfrey, Gleadow, Anderson. This celebrated Orchestra may be engaged to perform at Oratorios, Operas, and Concerts, either in London or the Provinces. Communications to be addressed to Mr. A. Guest, Hon. Sec., 1, Kingston Russell-place, Oakley-square, Camden-town, or to Messrs. Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street.

MR. and MADAME G. A. MACFARREN beg to announce to their Friends and Pupils that they have removed to 26, QUEEN'S TERRACE, BAYSWATER.

ITALIAN VIOLIN STRINGS.—Messrs. BOOSEY and SONS beg to inform the Amateurs and Professors of the above Instrument, that they constantly receive consignments of the best Italian Strings from the first makers of Padua and Naples. The prices per bundle, &c., may be had at 28, Holles-street.

SIGNOR GREGORIO, after having given successful Concerts at Wiesbaden, etc., has returned to England, to fulfil his Engagement for the ensuing Opera Season in Manchester.

NOTICE TO THE TRADE.—A greater part of Signor GORDIGIANI'S Songs having been published by Messrs. BOOSEY and SONS during the Author's visits to London, notice is hereby given, that any parties infringing the copyright in these Songs will be immediately proceeded against. 28, Holles-street, Sept. 25th.

MUSIC and POETRY.—To Authors and Amateur Composers.—Mr. GEORGE BARKER (Composer of the "White Squall," "Mary Blane," the "Irish Emigrant," &c.) continues to set Words to Music, or arrange Melodies for the Pianoforte, either for private circulation or for publication. 56, Brompton-square.

THE BRIDESMAIDS' DUET, by DONIZETTI, the Poetry by RYAN.—This is one of the most charming chamber duets in English that have ever been composed. It is written for Mezzo Soprano and Contralto. Price 2s. 6d. Boosey and Sons, 28, Holles-street.

THE NUNEHAM PARK WALTZES, by EDWARD L. SHEPHERD (of Abingdon), are published this day, price 3s., by Boosey and Sons, 28, Holles-street, London.

SIGNOR CAMPANA'S NEW VOCAL MUSIC.—Il Marinaro Barcarolle, 2s. 6d. Amani, Romanza, 2s. 6d. Io t'Amero, 2s. Una sera d'Amore, Duetto, 2s. 6d. Boosey and Sons, 28, Holles-street.

THE SUMMER BLOOM IS PASSED.—Ballad by CAROLINE E. HAY. A third edition of this popular and beautiful ballad is published by Boosey and Sons, 28, Holles-street, London.

HONOURABLE MRS. NORTON'S NEW SONG "PETRIFACTION," set to music by GEORGE BARKER, is published by Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street.

NEW ORGAN MUSIC BY W. T. BEST.—Six favourite subjects from Lindpaintner's Oratorio, "The Widow of Nain," arranged for the Organ by W. T. Best, price from 2s. to 3s. each. London: Wessel and Co., 229, Regent-street.

BAND MUSIC.—Messrs. BOOSEY and SONS publish Monthly Journals of Music for Military, Brass, and Stringed Bands. A list of the contents of each work and prices may be had free by post, from Boosey and Sons, 28, Holles-street, London.

THE NUN'S PRAYER, Song by OBERTHÜR.—"This is the most entrancing composition which we ever heard, without one exception."—Eliza Cook's Journal. Price 2s. Also, the Song for Pianoforte, 3s.; and for the Harp, 2s. 6d. Boosey and Sons, 28, Holles-street.

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC, by ADOLPH GOLLMICK. From the "Critic," April 15th. "The characteristics of Herr Gollmick's compositions are fascinating melodies, an easy, brilliant, and graceful style of writing, offering a variety of effects without any great difficulties." Boosey and Sons, London.

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC, by ADOLPH GOLLMICK, of the most popular character.—Chanson à Boire, 3s. Farewell, 4s. German Volkslied, 3s. Minerva, Grand Valse, 3s. Europa Galop de Concert (second edition), 3s. Boosey and Sons, 28, Holles-street, London.

CONCERNING THE AUTHENTICITY AND HISTORICAL ORIGIN OF MOZART'S "REQUIEM."

(Concluded from p. 643.)

From this, we see that, with the exception of Schack's evidence and a few valuable particulars, for which we are indebted to Sophie Weber, concerning Mozart's last moments, the author, or, rather, the authors of the book, do not tell us anything that we desire to know, even if it is their intention so to do. On the other hand, however, we find in the book, which is nothing more nor less than a compilation in which the materials for some future biography of Mozart have been crowded together, after being collected, not with the care of a bee, but the indifference of a rag-picker, who puts into his basket everything that happens to come in his way, whether it be pure gold or filthy rags; we find, I repeat, in the book, one remark which seems to have been thrown in without any particular object or ulterior purpose, being apparently in no way connected with Herr Weber's controversy, but which, for all that, would seem to throw a new light upon the only doubtful point in the question of the authenticity of the Requiem. We are informed that Mozart, when travelling, always had with him small pieces of note paper and a pencil, in order to be able to jot down, as he proceeded on his journey, any musical ideas immediately they suggested themselves to him. We are further told that, after working out the ideas contained in these slips, he threw the latter into a tin case, which he called his travelling journal. These little pieces of paper play a prominent part in our conclusions, to which we shall now come at last, and in which we shall endeavour to re-arrange the history of the Requiem, with the help of such facts as are considered to be completely proved, and to have withstood uninjured the ordeal of the dispute we have narrated. These same facts, when combined with one or two suppositions, founded upon them, and from which they are most immediately and naturally deduced, will, I think, bring us very near the truth. By following this plan, I believe I shall supply a very important omission in the biography of Mozart.

Count von Wallsegg, a rich private gentleman and a great lover of music, lost his wife, and despatched Leutgeb, or some other servant, to Mozart, for the purpose of ordering a Requiem. Reasons of a very problematical kind, but into which it is hardly worth our while to inquire, induced the Count to wish to remain unknown. But did he, in addition to this, require that the name of the composer should remain a secret for the world, and did the composer make such a promise? We cannot do otherwise than believe he did not, because Mozart, who was an honourable man, made no secret at all of the matter; while, on the other hand, it is more than probable that one of the stipulations between the messenger and Mozart was to the effect that the Requiem should be the exclusive property of the person ordering it, and that, without the consent of that person or his heirs, the composer should have no power of disposing of the work, in any way whatever. Mozart at first accepted the order, without any more ado, regarding it merely in the same light as the many similar orders he was in the daily habit of receiving. Soon afterwards, business called him away to Prague, and, at the step of the carriage, he beheld the same messenger, dressed in mourning, who inquired after the Requiem. Count Von Wallsegg was, no doubt, very desirous of obtaining a work for which he had paid in advance, and was, in all probability, impatient to celebrate the obsequies of his wife, who had died some months previously. Living in the immediate neighbourhood of Vienna, and, perhaps, even stopping there at the time, it was very easy for him to learn the day on which Mozart set out. This second appearance of the messenger may, very probably, have produced an impression on Mozart's imagination, always extremely susceptible. Mozart was already very ill. He returned still worse than when he set out, and began working on the Requiem, for which he felt a most particular interest, that we think quite natural, because, in the first place, a musician cannot undertake a grander task than that of setting the words of a Requiem to music, and, in the second place, because occupation of this description was completely identical with the mental condition of a man, who, more than ever, was filled with sombre melancholy and thoughts of death. The musician's brain became more acute in proportion as his strength became less. Feeling he was dying, Mozart thought that, in the fact of the Requiem having been ordered of him, he saw a sign from heaven itself—and who would dare to assert that he was wrong.

The important point for us, at present, is to discover what system he pursued in carrying out the work, which thus engrossed all his mental energies and accelerated the decay of his bodily powers, and, also, how much time he had left to complete his task. We must here have recourse to the dates. Mozart returned from Prague towards the end of September; but the mortal crisis of his illness did not commence before the last ten days of November, and he kept his bed for a fortnight. He had, therefore, more than six weeks at his disposal. This was a very long period, if we take into consideration the extraordinary facility with which he worked. The score of Titus, which, without the simple recitative, is much longer than that of the Requiem, was composed in eighteen days. During the six weeks in question, Mozart had no other work in hand, and devoted himself day and night to the Requiem. My readers must here remember that, as a general rule, Mozart used not to write down his music until he had composed it, to the last note, in his head, and it was for this reason that he never made any sketches or rough drafts, like most of his colleagues. Another and more conclusive circumstance is, that the pieces in the original manuscript are complete, and that Mozart got his friends to sing them, while he himself played the orchestral accompaniment on the piano. Mere sketches, that is to say, the first notions of the pieces in an unfinished state, could not have been tried in this manner. My readers will, also, recollect what repugnance Mozart entertained for the actual trouble of writing, a repugnance which his weak and exhausted condition must necessarily have increased. The consequence of this was that, in order to save himself physical fatigue which almost exhausted him, Mozart wrote down only the vocal parts, and, more or less carefully, the principal orchestral figures. We can follow, in some degree, upon the manuscript, the progress of his disease. The instrumentation of the "Requiem," "Kyrie," and "Dies iræ," is such, that a practised copyist could supply what was wanting. In the "Domine" it is less full; the lines being more and more sparingly furnished with notes. When, however, a composer can jot down upon paper with such facility, eleven pieces, of considerable length and of the most learned style, he runs the risk of forgetting many details; and, perhaps, the principal idea from which they sprang. Was Mozart to incur this danger and loss of time, when he felt too well convinced that the moments of his life were counted, and that he was accelerating his work at the expense of the few he had yet left—was he to pursue such a course, when he possessed the means of avoiding this double evil, and of sending in the score before the appointed time, which he feared he should not live to see. The plan he adopted was to give the various pieces, as soon as they were written in the original manuscript, to a copyist who understood music, to whom the composer had communicated the plan and course of his instrumentation, which he then required to look over and revise. This copyist, this musician, this famulus, this person initiated in the thoughts of the great composer, was no other than Süssmayer. Who can assert that so obvious a plan did not strike a man who was killing himself to fulfil a compact! What other motive would Mozart have had to explain everything in detail to the copyist, and not to allow the latter to begin his work until he himself was no longer living and able to correct the faults that might be made? Was it not much more sensible and more sure, did it not advance the matter, to let the copyist set about his task immediately, under the composer's own eyes, and while the explanations of the latter were still fresh in his memory and ears? It may be objected that, however correct this argument may be, it is still only an argument. I am aware of this: but what will be said if Mozart had already entertained the idea, which I have attributed to him, as he most undoubtedly had, if he had already employed the means which I have named, and that, too, at not more than a few weeks previous to the time of his beginning the Requiem—what will be said when I mention the expedient he hit upon to hasten the completion of Titus? The overture, trios, and finales of that opera he composed himself; with regard to the rest, he merely wrote down the notion of the orchestral figures which Süssmayer then carried out under his superintendence. I trust that no one will dispute the perfect similarity between the two cases, and the peculiar circumstances which rendered such assistance indispensable. Mozart was ill while composing Titus, but he was much worse when employed on the Requiem. Even in the beginning of September it fatigued him very much to write, while in October and November the exertion was entirely beyond his strength. He was allowed a very short period for finishing his opera, the production of which was intimately connected with a great and solemn political event; but the time allowed him by Death, who was already stretching out his arms towards his victim, whom he was about to seize, was still shorter. Yet there is a difference between these two similar cases. The Clemenza, a piece written for a particular occasion, belongs to those classical operas of Mozart, in which, while the master's peculiar style is visible, the greatest concessions are made to the tastes of the day. There is, also, another fact worthy of remark, which is: that composers always devote especial attention upon the most prominent musical scenes, and those pieces which they intend for the first singers. They neglect the rest in proportion, as the subordinate parts are more or less efficiently filled. In those times, these last-named parts were generally confided to bad artists, and, for this reason, were more neglected by the composers than at the present day. With the exception of Don Juan, and, perhaps, Figaro, Mozart's operas form no exception to this rule, but in Titus a large number of the airs, perhaps the half, bear so plainly the stamp of the time, and resemble so little the compositions of Mozart, that, in the opinion of connoisseurs, they would pass quite as well for the productions of any other composer of the end of the eighteenth century, and we are ready to recognise in them, without the slightest hesitation, the hand of Süssmayer, the reputed author of the airs of Annius,* Publius, and Servilia. We will even willingly allow him to be the author of some of the airs of Titus, the first tenor part; but with works intended for the church, matters are widely different. In compositions of that description, there are no first, second, or third singers: the solos for the various voices are sung by one and the same artist. The pieces are of greater importance or higher interest than the rest. The entire text, rendered sacred by belonging to the ritual, forms a part of it, and each portion requires the same amount of pious attention from the auditory. Who will assert that if Mozart could complete the score of Titus in eighteen days, he was not capable of composing the Requiem, which contains a third less, in six weeks? Not a single piece of the Requiem was entrusted to Süssmayer during Mozart's lifetime, and there is not one which any person, not an actual or incipient lunatic, could ascribe to any composer but Mozart.

Lastly, what can be said when the widow, in the most positive manner, asserts that the score of the Requiem (and we know that by this the complete score was meant) was handed over to the Count's messenger immediately after the composer's decease.

The widow's word is doubted. Good; but there is another person, Herr Krüchten, whose word can be more readily accepted, and he says that: "The Requiem was performed, for the first time, late in the autumn of 1791," that is to say, a few days previous to Mozart's death. I ask, what more is required to establish the probability that the works of the composer and the copyist—the original manuscript and the perfect score—progressed simultaneously, and that all the pieces of the Requiem, as far as the "Sanctus," are by Mozart!

A single moment's reflection is, moreover, sufficient to convince us that the work must have been sent in exactly at the time mentioned by Herr Krüchten and Herr von Nissen. As soon as Count von Wallsegg heard of Mozart's death, which could not long remain a secret from him, and which, in all probability, he knew the day after it occurred, he no doubt immediately sent for the work, which he was very impatient to obtain. If he had been kept waiting for a period necessary to rewrite entirely the original manuscript, to complete the instrumentation, and to compose the three or even four pieces which Süssmayer claims,* and which, under all circumstances would have taken several weeks, Count von Wallsegg would have suspected the authenticity of the work, or rather would have immediately felt convinced that a musical forgery had been committed. It was, however, not until much later that he first entertained any doubts, in consequence of the infringement of his rights, which, at the first mentioned epoch, were not and could not be infringed.

It now remains for us to prove, upon historical grounds, who wrote the "Sanctus," "Benedictus," and "Agnus." I do not, however, express myself correctly; I should have said: how far these three pieces are the work of the great composer. Facts will again furnish us with an answer, and if not with the same exactness, at least in a tolerably satisfactory manner.

Mozart was confined to his bed and compelled to give up working regularly at his score. He still retained his mental powers, however, and we find that, a few hours before his death, he possessed strength enough to have a rehearsal of his Requiem, and to sing it with his friends. Now, composition cost him, undoubtedly, less exertion than singing. With him, composition was life itself, and his mind lived up to the latest moment during the last fourteen days of his existence. When he took to his bed, four pieces were still wanting to complete the work, which had so exclusive and so strong a hold upon him, and on which he founded his brightest prospects of reputation in this world, as well as, perhaps, his hopes of forgiveness for his sins in the next. Mozart was a Christian. Is it probable that his mind, out of which, so to say, there flowed forth one continuous stream of musical creation, should lie completely idle for a fortnight, and that his greatest work should remain incomplete? Does not Seyfried tell us that, if we can believe a report which was tolerably general among the musicians of Vienna, Mozart intended to rewrite the fugue of the "Hosianna" entirely in A flat, which proves very evident that it was already composed in D major after the "Sanctus." We then find Süssmayer seated at the bedside of the dying man, who tells him how the Requiem is to be completed. Completed!

* I except: "Torna di Tito a lato" which strikes me as being certainly Mozart's.

* Including the "Lacrymosa" of which, also, Süssmayer asserts that he composed a great portion.

It is a long way, however, from the Quam olim, da capo, where the original manuscript ends, to the Lux æterna—and the words alone would not enlighten any person as to the musical intentions, which existed only in the composer's brain. If I chose to indulge a very little in suppositions, nothing could hinder me from concluding that the models for the "Sanctus," "Benedictus,' and "Agnus" were ready and explained and handed over to the copyist as much as a fortnight before Mozart's death; probability would be entirely on my side, since even the great slanderer of the Requiem, Herr Gottfried Weber himself, acknowledges in these pieces the existence of flowers which sprang from some other soil than that of Süssmayer's mind. I exclude, however, from my arguments, which are found entirely on facts, all proofs resting upon art itself, because they do not possess the same amount of probability for every one, but always leave those who hold the balance accurately the choice of a favourable or adverse decision. We require something much more material and positive, something tangible, and this we possess in the little slips of paper, found upon Mozart's writing-table, and which the widow immediately handed over to Süssmayer. What could these last leaves of the travelling journal contain? They had not yet been put in the tin case, a proof that they formed part of some work not completed; they were scattered about upon the table of the composer, a proof that they contained the ideas for the work that was then engrossing all his attention, and, finally, a proof that they contained the principal notions for the three pieces wanting in the original manuscript. The plan Mozart had adopted in his carriage he could certainly practise in his bed, and, as certainly, did not fail to do so. Finally, with regard to the fourth and last of the pieces wanting, and which began with Lux æterna, the composer's hand was no longer sufficiently strong to write down his hints, although the motive was already found, and probably carried out in his mind. I am, also, inclined to believe that Mozart's last directions concerned the final piece alone, which he preferred rendering by a portion of No. 1 to entrusting anyone else with the task of composing it. Süssmayer, who implicitly followed the master's wishes, which, coming from a dying man, were doubly sacred in his eyes, endeavoured, in his letter, not to disclose the reasons actuating Mozart in this case. He tells us that, in order to impart more unity to the work, he concluded it with the commencement, and used the same music for two different portions of the text, employing the fugue of the "Kyrie" at the verse, "Cum Sanctis." What reasonable man will be contented with so lame a reason. If the person who is reputed to have completed the work was capable himself of composing three of the wanting pieces, there can be no doubt that he would have composed the fourth as well.

Is it necessary to extend our investigation to subsequent facts? These lamentable facts speak with sufficient clearness themselves. In treating of them, we need not employ any phrases containing any thing like mere supposition, a tone of doubt, or an attempt at proof. We can now throw aside any such like crutches of logic, and without any proofs, at once assert what is only too indisputably demonstrated.

When Mozart died, he left his widow in a state of destitution. She did not even possess sufficient to have got her husband decently buried; Mozart's corpse was thrown in a common grave. Her sole inheritance consisted of three thousand florins of debts, afterwards discharged by the proceeds of a concert, and of a few manuscripts of trifling value, most of which were purchased by Herr André, of Offenbach, after having first been offered to Herren Britkopf and Härtel of Leipsic. The latter gentlemen, however, gave the widow to understand that the best of the compositions she offered had been printed a long time previous. This was not the case with the Idomeneo, which Madame Mozart wished to publish by subscription, but could not obtain subscribers. According to her account, an unpublished pianoforte concerto, which she dedicated to the Prince of Prussia, likewise brought her in nothing, and all that she could obtain was a pension of two hundred and fifty florins, for which she was indebted to the Emperor Leopold. Alas! misery is the most powerful tempter! There was still a manuscript, more precious than all the rest, but it was already sold. The poor woman stretched forth her arm towards something which was not her own. Shame on the age, whose neglect compelled Mozart's widow, with her two young and fatherless children, to take such an extreme step! The autograph manuscript of the Requiem fell into the hands of speculators, who bought it in its entirety, under the promise of secrecy, and, in a much more mysterious manner, disposed of it in separate portions. The Requiem became the widow's principal means of subsistence. At her request, Süssmayer made a second copy exactly similar to that of Count von Wallsegg, which copy he had, perhaps, prepared during the lifetime of Mozart, and without his knowledge. Under all circumstances, however, it was very easy for him to re-write a work which was still so fresh in his memory. In more than one respect, too, it was the interest of Süssmayer to act as he did. He shared, as was natural, in the illegal sale of the work, and, in addition to this, enjoyed the exclusive reputation of having finished it. But this double profit did not agree with the plans of the widow. In order to obtain a great name, and as large a sale as possible, two things were necessary: the romantic and mystic colouring, which was greatly heightened by the mode in which the composition was ordered, must be cast over the origin of the Requiem, and the share that a second person had in Mozart's work—the extent and nature of which participation the widow did not, perhaps, know—must be carefully concealed. In other words, it was necessary to bury in silence two names: that of the person who ordered the Requiem, and that of the person who finished it. At this point, the respective interests of the widow and Süssmayer, which at first went hand-in-hand, naturally became divided and assumed a mutually hostile position. We have already seen whither this miserable question of interest, which outstepped the boundaries of right and truth, led those concerned in it. To this are to be attributed the contradictions, obscurities, ambiguities, omissions, and untruths in the statements of the several persons interested in the matter, as well as the reserve and silence imposed upon the other witnesses, out of respect for sacred reminiscences and friendship.

Such was the result of this too notorious defence, called forth by Herr Gottfried Weber; such the discoveries giving rise to a dispute, the object of which was nothing more or less than to place in the class of failures and uncertain productions a work which the world has unanimously pronounced the greatest wonder of musical art, and the most beautiful flower in the laurel-wreath of him who composed it. If Herr von Weber's assertion had been triumphant, the judgment of the universe would be nought but prejudice, and the title of a connoisseur nothing more than a nickname full of irony; no one would give a farthing for criticisms, not excepting that of Herr Weber himself; and a feeling for the Beautiful in all branches of art—that feeling which is one of the instincts of mankind—would be merely an empty coinage of the brain, while we should soon have new theories start up and prove that, æsthetically, an ape was a far more beautiful object than an Apollo Belvidere. Instead of this, however, Herr Weber's exertions have only added a new and very melancholy chapter to the theory of compensations. To him we are indebted for the proof that not only does a mysterious destiny hang over distinguished men, and, to a certain extent, endeavour to balance the greatness of their vocation by the wretchedness of their existence, but that it persecutes them even in their family, when they themselves are no longer here. The woman who bore Mozart's name was compelled, in order to maintain Mozart's sons, to have recourse to expedients far worse than begging; this is what penetrates and oppresses our hearts, and what Herr Weber has succeeded in proving. Thanks to another result of the law of compensation, the genuineness of the Requiem is in some degree more apparent than it was before, and this, to a certain extent, indemnifies us for the weariness and disgust that each page of the controversy excites in us. However painful my labours may have proved to me, I shall not consider them to have been quite in vain, if they have only tended to strengthen the faith of those musicians who have been somewhat shaken by Herr Weber's sophisms. Is it not almost as great a misfortune for a musician to doubt the genuineness of the Requiem, as for a firm believer to doubt that of one of the tenets of his faith.

THE IMPRESARIO AND HIS THEATRE.

(From Stendhal's Life of Rossini.)

From Bologna, which is the head-quarters of music in Italy, Rossini was engaged for all the towns in which a theatre was to be found. Everywhere the condition was imposed on the impresarij that there should be an opera composed by Rossini. He generally had a thousand francs for an opera, and wrote four or five in the year.

The following is a description of the mechanism of theatres in Italy:—A manager (and very often this part is taken by the richest patrician of the small town—it is a source of consideration and pleasure, but in ordinary cases leads to ruin); a rich patrician, I say, undertakes the management of the theatre in the town where he flourishes; he gets up a company, always consisting of a prima donna, a tenore, a basso cantante, a basso buffo, a second lady, and a third buffo. The impresario engages a maestro (composer) who writes him a new opera, taking care to adapt his airs to the voices of the individuals who are to sing them. The impresario buys the poem (libretto); this costs 60 or 80 francs. The author is some unfortunate abbé, a hanger-on to some wealthy family in the county. The very mirth-provoking character of the parasite, so well depicted by Terence, still exists in all its glory in Lombardy, where the smallest town has its five or six families, with fortunes of four thousand a-year. The impresario, who is the chief of one of these families, consigns the care of all the financial affairs relating to his theatre to an acting manager, who is generally some pre-eminently roguish lawyer, acting as his steward; and he, the impresario, falls in love with the prima donna: the whole public curiosity in a little town is concentrated in the important question whether or no he will offer her his arm in public.

When the troop at last is thus organised, the first performance is given, after a month of absurd intrigues which supply the small talk of the county. This prima recita forms the great public event of the little town, causing an excitement to which I can find nothing in Paris to compare. Eight or ten thousand persons discuss for a space of three weeks the beauties and defects of the opera with all the power of attention heaven has granted them, and likewise, more especially, with all their strength of lungs. This first representation, when it is not interrupted by some scene of scandal, is usually followed up by twenty or thirty more, at the end of which the company breaks up. This is generally called a season (stagione). The best of all seasons is during the carnival. The singers, who have no engagements, are to be found commonly at Bologna or at Milan, where there are theatrical agents, whose business is to procure them engagements and fleece them.

After this little account of the theatrical manners and customs, the reader will be at once in a position to form an idea of the singular life, without any possible parallel in France, which Rossini led from 1810 to 1816. He passed, in turn, through every town in Italy, remaining two or three months in each. On his arrival, a reception was given him; he was fêted and cried up to the skies by the dilettante of the country; the first fifteen or twenty days were taken up in receiving dinners and shrugging his shoulders at the stupidity of the libretto. Rossini, besides having an astonishing amount and fiery rapidity of wit, was initiated by his first mistress (the Countess P—, Pessario) into Ariosto, the comedies of Machiavelli, the fiabe of Gozzi, the poems of Baratti, and is quite able to detail the absurdities of a libretto. Tu mi ha dato versi, ma non situazioni, I have often heard him say to the mud-bespattered poet, who immediately overflows with apologies, and two hours afterwards brings him a sonnet umiliato alla gloria del più gran maestro d'Italia e del mundo.

After two or three weeks of this dissipated life, Rossini begins by refusing the invitations to dinners and to musical soirées, and makes up his mind to occupy himself seriously and study the voices of his actors; he makes them sing at the pianos, and he is obliged to mutilate the finest ideas in the world, because the tenor cannot reach the note necessary to complete the poet's thought, or because the prima donna always sings false in passing from such a key to such another. Sometimes out of all the company the basso is the only one who can sing.

At last, about twenty days before the first representation, Rossini, having become well acquainted with the voices of his singers, begins to write. He gets up late, composes amidst the conversation of his new friends, who, whatever he may be doing, never lose sight of him the whole day. He goes to dinner with them at the osteria, and often to supper; he returns very late, and his friends accompany him to the door, singing at the loudest pitch of their voices some air which he extemporises, sometimes a miserere, to the great scandal of the devout inhabitants of the quarter. At last he gets home, and it is at this period of the day, at about three in the morning, that some of his most brilliant ideas have occurred to him. He writes them down hurriedly without a piano on little scraps of paper, and the next day arranges them, instruments them, to use his own language, when lolling with his friends. Imagine a vivacious ardent mind receiving impressions from everything around, turning all to some account and embarrassed by no difficulties. For instance, latterly, when composing his Mosè, some one said, "You are making Jews sing, shall you make them snuffle as they do in the synagogues?" This notion struck him, and on the spot he composed a magnificent chorus, actually commencing with certain combinations slightly bringing to view the singing in a Jewish synagogue. To my knowledge but one thing is capable of paralysing this brilliant genius, ever creating, ever active, and that is the presence of some pedant talking to him of glory and theory, and overwhelming him with learned compliments. He then shows temper, and allows himself to break out into jests which are often more remarkable for their grotesque energy than for their perfect discretion or Attic polish. As in Italy, no disdainful court has ever amused itself with purifying the language, and no one thinks of reflecting on his rank before venturing to laugh, the number of things considered coarse or ignoble is infinitely small; hence the peculiar colouring of Monti's poetry; noble, sublime, and yet never calling to mind the absurd simples and timidities of an hotel Rambouillet. It is the reverse of M. l'Abbé de Lille; the word noble has not the same meaning in Italy as in France.

Rossini one day said to a pedant, a Monsignore by profession, who had ferreted him out even in his little inn-room, and was preventing him from getting up: "Ella mi vanta per mia gloria &c.—You are good enough to talk of my glory. Do you know' Monsignore, what is my real title to immortality? it is being the, finest man of my day. Canova told me one day that he meant to take me as a model for a statue of Achilles." As he spoke, he jumped out of bed and appeared before the eyes of the Monsignore (a Roman prelate) in the costume of Achilles, which in that country is a great mark of disrespect. "Look at this leg, look at this arm," he continued; "when a man is made like that, I fancy he is sure of immortality." I suppress the rest of his address. Once he had dashed into the current of the not very decent jest, he worked himself up at the sound of his own words, and of the inexpressible laughter caused by his own ideas; he extemporised an endless number of absurdities; at last he became grossly insulting, and nothing could stop him. The pedantic Monsignore was at last fairly driven to flight.

According to Rossini, composing is nothing, the troublesome part is having your music rehearsed. It is at this sad moment that the wretched maestro endures the torture of hearing his finest ideas, his sweetest and most brilliant melodies, disfigured in every key the human voice is capable of. It is enough to make a man hiss himself, Rossini would say. He came away from rehearsal, dejected and disgusted with what had the day before delighted him.

But these rehearsals, so painful to a young composer, constitute in my eyes the triumph of Italian sensibility; it is then that, assembled round a wretched kettle of a piano, in that den called the ridotto of the theatre, in some small town, such as Reggio or Velletri, I have seen eight or ten poor devils of actors rehearsing, accompanied by the clattering sounds emanating from the kitchen of the neighbouring house. I have seen them feel and render admirably the most fleeting and at the same time the most inspiriting impressions that music can convey; it is then that the inhabitant of the North sees with astonishment persons utterly ignorant, incapable of playing a waltz on the piano or of saying what constitutes the difference between one key and another, singing and accompanying by instinct, and with admirable brio, the most peculiar and the most original music, recomposed and arranged by the maestro before their very eyes, and as fast as they sing it. They make a hundred mistakes; but in music all errors arising from excess of verve are soon forgiven, as in love all errors proceeding from too much loving. However, these rehearsals which charmed me, an ignoramus, would no doubt have shocked M. Berton, of the Institute.

Every conscientious man, though a stranger in Italy, will at once admit that nothing can be more absurd than to want to make composers and singers at any distance from Vesuvius.*

In this country of the beautiful, the infant at the breast hears those around him sing, and not precisely airs like Malbrouk or C'est 'amour, l'amour. Under a burning sky, and a pitiless system of tyranny, which renders it dangerous to speak a word, despair and happiness are expressed more naturally by a plaintive song than by a letter. People talk only about music; they only dare to entertain an opinion, and discuss it with warmth and frankness, on music; they write and read one subject alone—satirical sonnets, in the dialect of the country,† against the governor of the city, while the governor, in his turn, on the first opportunity, sends all the poets, like so many carbonari of the place, to "quod." This is literally true, without the slightest exaggeration, and, if prudence permitted, I could give twenty names in support of what I advance. It is much less dangerous to write a burlesque sonnet against the governor or the sovereign than to discuss a political principle or a part in history. As the Abbé, or the Cavaliere di M., who plays the part of spy, is most ludicrously ignorant, if he reports to the chief of the police, in most cases a clever man, and a renegade from liberal principles, of any argument which can stand, and which bears the semblance of common sense, the matter is immediately confided to the police, and it is clear that the spy is not indulging in mere calumny. The Prefect of Police summons you and says gravely: "You are declaring war against the government of my master, you take the liberty of speaking, pescano in quel che dite."‡

To recite the satirical poem of the day, however, is a crime of which every one is guilty, and one of which every one may be calumniously accused—it does not go beyond the known province of the spy.

We have left Rossini having his opera rehearsed on a bad piano in the ridotto of some small theatre, in a town of the third class, such, for instance, as Pavia or Issola. Although the little room may be the sanctuary of musical genius and a modest enthusiasm for art, devoid of the least idea of braggadocio, the greatest pretension and the most grotesque disputes of the most incredible and naïf egotism surround the wretched piano, which sometimes perishes and is broken by dint of hard blows, the persons engaged ending by throwing the pieces at each other's heads. I would advise every person travelling through Italy, if he has any feeling for art, to convince himself by personal experience of a scene of this description. The private proceedings of the operatic company furnish matter for the conversation of the whole city, which looks for pleasure or ennui, during the most brilliant months of the year, to the success or failure of the new opera. A small town, in this state of intoxication, forgets the existence of the rest of the world; it is during this period of incertitude that the impresario plays an admirable part as far as his amour propre is concerned, and is literally the first man of the place. I have known miserly bankers who did not regret purchasing this flattering character with the loss of fifteen hundred louis d'or. The poet Sografi has written a charming one-act piece on the adventures and pretensions of an operatic company. It contains the part of a German tenor, who does not understand a word of Italian, and which is enough to make you die with laughter. It is worthy of Regnard or Shakspere; the truth is so outrée, and Italian singers, intoxicated as they are by the accents of passionate music and disputing about the various interests of their respective reputations, are so ludicrous, that the great task for the poet was to diminish, to weaken, by at least three-thirds, and reduce within the limits of probability, truth and nature, instead of caricaturing them. The truest truth would have resembled a caricature devoid of all probability.

Marchesi (a famous soprano at Milan) would never sing, during the latter years of his theatrical career, unless, at the commencement of the opera, he entered on horseback or was perceived on the top of a hill; under all circumstances, the plume of white feathers floating above his helmet was always, at least, six feet long.

Even at the present day, Crivelli refuses to sing his first air, if he does not find in it the words felice ognora, on which he has a facility of making roulades.

But to return to the Italian town, which we have left in the state of anxiety, and, we may say, agitation, preceding the day of the first representation of its opera.

The decisive evening at length arrives. The maestro takes his place at the piano; the house is as full as possible. All the people come from a distance of twenty miles round. The curious amateurs encamp their carriages in the middle of the streets: the inns are all crammed the evening before, and the insolence of the persons connected with them is something uncommon. All business has ceased. At the time fixed for the representation, the town resembles a desert. All the passions, all the doubts, and all the life of an entire population are centred in the theatre.

The overture begins; you might hear a fly buzz. It finishes, and a most terrible uproar breaks out. The overture is either extolled to the clouds, or hooted and hissed without pity. You do not see, as at Paris, an assemblage of individuals, each with his peculiar species of vanity interrogating that of his neighbour, but a number of demoniacs, endeavouring by shouts, stamping, and knocking their sticks against the backs of the seats, to ensure the triumph of their mode of thinking, and, above all, wishing to prove it the only right one, for there is no one in the whole world so intolerant as your sensitive man. Immediately you meet, in the matters of art, with a moderate and reasonable man, speak to him quickly about political economy and history; he may be a distinguished magistrate, a good surgeon, a good husband, an excellent academician, or, in fact, anything you like, except a man formed to appreciate music and painting.

After the most profound silence, the frightful uproar recommences with each air of the new opera; the roaring of a tempest-tost sea would convey but an inexact idea of it.

You hear the singer and the composer judged separately. People vociferate: Bravo, Davide; bravo Pisaroni; or the whole theatre re-echoes with Bravo, maestro! Rossini rises from his place at the piano, his handsome face assuming an expression of gravity, an unusual thing with him. He bows three times, is overwhelmed with applause, and deafened with strange cries. The audience halloo out whole sentences of praise. They then proceed to the next morceau.

Rossini appears at the piano for the first three representations of his new opera, after which he receives his seventy sequins (£32), attends a grand farewell dinner given him by his new friends, that is to say, by the entire town, and takes his departure in a vettura, with a portmanteau, much fuller of music paper than clothes, to play the same part at a neighbouring town, forty miles off. Generally he writes to his mother after the first representation, and transmits, for her and his old father, two thirds of the sum he has received. He sets out with eight or ten sequins only, but the gayest of men, and, on the road, if fate is kind enough to throw a fool in his way, never fails to mystify him. On one occasion, as he was proceeding in a vettura from Ancona to Reggio, he represented himself as a music-master, who was a mortal enemy of Rossini, and passed all the time on his journey making people sing execrable music, which he composed at an instant's notice, on the well-known words of his most celebrated airs, at the same time ridiculing the said music as that of the pretended chefs-d'œuvre of the animal called Rossini, whom people of bad taste were stupid enough to extol to the clouds. There is no fatuity on his part in thus leading the conversation to music. In Italy it is the most general subject of discourse, and after an observation on Napoleon, that to which people always revert.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(From a Correspondent.)

Now that the turmoil and excitement attending the inauguration of St. George's Hall have in a great measure subsided, a few exclusively musical notes may be welcome. On the 12th ult. the Philharmonic Society gave a choral performance, consisting of Spohr's Last Judgment, and Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise, in the Philharmonic Hall, which was well filled. I need hardly tell you that the effect of Spohr's accompaniments, and still worse of those to the Hymn of Praise (of which only the choral part was given), upon the organ solus, was simply ridiculous. Mr. Hirst is a clever organist; but he cannot do impossibilities. The chief singers were Miss Stott, Mrs. Scarisbrook, Messrs. Robinson and Armstrong. Altogether, although some of the choruses went well, this was the most inefficient performance ever given, at cheap prices, by the Philharmonic Society. The Messiah, the Creation, Judas Maccabeus, the Dettingen Te Deum, and the 12*th Mass* (not service) of Mozart—all of which have been presented at the Philharmonic Hall during the series of "shilling concerts"—were much more successful. Such works as the Lobgesang, which depend so greatly on their orchestral combinations, should be left to their evident destiny, which is not that of being performed with accompaniment for organ solo.

The 12th subscription concert of the sixth subscription of the Philharmonic Society (which was instituted on the 10th of Jan., 1840), came off on Tuesday evening, the 26th ult., and was considered a more attractive entertainment than any of the miscellaneous concerts that took place, the week preceding, in St. George's Hall. The great "star" among the singers was Sophie Cruvelli, who had already won a high reputation in Liverpool, at the Theatre Royal. The programme, however, was altogether a good one. Beethoven's symphony in B flat, entire, very well executed under the direction of Mr. J. Zeugher Hermann, began the concert agreeably. A trio from Beatrice di Tenda followed, nicely sung by Mdlle. Albini, Mad. Vellani, and Sig. Pavesi; and after this came Mdlle. Cruvelli, who was enthusiastically received, and sang "Ernani involami," with such surprising brilliancy that she was unanimously recalled at the end, and obliged to repeat the cabaletta. The charming and gifted prima donna afterwards joined Sig. Belletti in "Crudel! perchè finora;" and Miss Stott, Signors Pavesi and Fortini, in the "quartet-round" from Fidelio, which terminated the first part of the concert. In the second part Mdlle. Cruvelli sang "Assisa a piè d'un salice," and the subsequent preghiera (from Otello), with such divine and pathetic expression, that a still greater excitement was created, and she was encored in a tumult of applause. Mdlle. Cruvelli also took part in some concerted music. Her success was triumphant. Signors Belletti, Pavesi, and Fortini, Mdlle. Albini and Mad. Vellani, contributed a variety of vocal pieces with more or less success; the prayer from Masaniello, the Dervish chorus from the Ruins of Athens, and Bennet's madrigal, "My mistress is as fair as fine," were capitally sung by the Liverpool choristers; the band played the overture to Cenerentola, and the eternal but splendid Wedding March of Mendelssohn; and what M. Gounod, the French composer, entitles "Meditation," or Bach's first prelude in C major, was played admirably by Messrs. E. W. Thomas, C. J. Toms, and Hirst, on the violin, pianoforte, and organ, and redemanded. Among the other vocal pieces were "La ci darem," by Mdlle. Cruvelli and Signor Belletti; "Finchè dal vino," by Sig. Belletti; "Una furtiva lagrima," by Sig. Pavesi; and "Madamina," by Sig. Fortini—all of which pleased. The vocal part of the concert ended with the thrice-eternal preghiera from Mosè in Egitto, in which principals and chorus all took part. The hall was crowded, and looked magnificent. The audience, delighted with Cruvelli and everything besides—but with Cruvelli especially—stayed to the very last.

As your "own correspondent" has noticed the first three performances of Italian opera at the Theatre Royal—Norma, Ernani, and Sonnambula—I need not allude to them. A few words about the others, however, may not be out of place, since they brought Mr. Copeland's speculation to an honourable and brilliant conclusion. The succeeding operas were Fidelio and Otello, both of which were triumphantly successful. Fidelio was thus cast: Leonora, Cruvelli; Marcellina, Marai; Florestan, Tamberlik; Rocco, Fortini; Jacquino, Luchesi; Minister, Polonini; Pizarro, Tagliafico. Fortini and Polonini should, I think, have changed parts. The performance was admirable, the theatre crowded, and the opera created a real furore. The leading musical critic of Liverpool (Mr. Nightingale, I believe) writes in the Mail, the following enthusiastic panegyric of Cruvelli's Leonora:—

"We can scarcely trust ourselves to write in the ordinary matter-of-fact manner peculiar to English newspaper criticisms, with reference to the performance of the greatest musical chef-d'œuvre ever composed, the immortal Fidelio of Beethoven, which was played on Thursday night in a style of completeness which will ever remain a most pleasing remembrance in the memory of all who had the rare good fortune to hear it. We shall not have the presumption here to dilate upon the miraculous beauty of the music, or the charming and natural simplicity of this most perfect drama, the most artless yet the most effective ever written, and we cannot finds words to express our admiration of the performance of Cruvelli—in our opinion the greatest effort of musical and histrionic genius ever witnessed on the stage. Her Fidelio is in fact a masterpiece both of singing and acting; and, as the fond, patient, devoted, and courageous wife of the poor prisoner so long lost to her, she presented a picture of dramatic effect and intensity, which may rival with the most perfect creation of a Rachel or a Macready. In the first scene, where she quietly gains the confidence of the gaoler Rocco, and finds that she has unwittingly inspired a fond feeling in the heart of his daughter Marcellina, nothing could be more natural than her melancholy restlessness and her evident mental anxiety, so hard to be concealed. Then, again, with what searching looks does she scan the countenances of the poor prisoners, as with a sorrowful joy they thank heaven for a few minutes of liberty, anxiously trying to discover amongst them the beloved features of her husband. Her bye-play here is full of the finest touches of feeling, but all sinks into insignificance compared with the electrical effect she creates in the prison scene, where the acting rises into sublimity—every shade of feeling—fear, despair, hope, and joy, being rapidly alternated with the most vivid reality, rising into almost painful intensity, as the devoted wife throws herself into the arms of her newly discovered husband, and with a shriek of mingled defiance and joy saves him from the sword of his would-be murderer. The astounding display of dramatic genius created a perfect furore of applause, such as we have rarely seen equalled, and though the remainder of the drama is somewhat of an anti-climax, she still rivetted the attention of the enthusiastic audience to the glorious concluding finale, where, in a combination of sound, truly heavenly for its wonderful burst of almost unspeakable joy, the devoted wife, her long-lost husband, and their friends give expression to the raptures they feel at once more meeting and breathing together the air of liberty.

"Never did the Liverpool public witness a performance so full of womanly grace, romantic tenderness, picturesqueness, and dramatic intensity—so intellectual, so full of inspiration of true genius, yet, withal, so simple, natural, and effective. Whatever doubts there may be as to Cruvelli's personation of Norma, Desdemona, or other operatic heroines, there can be but one opinion as to her being the greatest representative of Leonora; both musically and dramatically, the most exacting character in the whole range of the lyric drama. As to her execution of the music, we can again only deal in superlatives, and in one word it was faultless. All the well-known and immense vocal difficulties of the music are executed by her with a consummate ease, which would lead the listener to doubt their existence. Her immense compass of voice enables her to sing every note with certainty and finish, and to give the fullest expression to every varying shade of feeling she is called upon to express. The great scena in which occurs the 'address to Hope,' was delivered with a degree of intense fervour and energy which roused the excitement of the audience to the highest pitch, and led to its being enthusiastically encored. The duet with Florestan in the prison scene was also sung with admirable tenderness and feeling, and in the grand finale, when her hopes are realized, she pours forth a flood of exulting sound, her face meanwhile illumined with a smile of saintly joy, which brings to a fitting and natural conclusion this matchless display of genius."

I shall not attempt to add anything to this. Otello was thus cast: Desdemona, Cruvelli; Emilia, Albini; Iago, Tagliafico; Rodrigo, Luchesi; Elmiro, Fortini; The Doge, Polonini, and Otello, Tamberlik. Again, Polonini and Fortini should have changed parts. The performance was first rate, and produced the next greatest impression to that which was made by Beethoven's Fidelio—a decided proof of the taste and judgment of the Liverpool amateurs. "Of Cruvelli," adds the same critic, "what can we say? With a vivid recollection of her Thursday's performance, we can only state that she maintains the position she then obtained as the first of dramatic vocalists." The writer does no less justice to the masterly performances of Tamberlik in Florestan and Otello; to the excellent conducting of Mr. Alfred Mellon; and to the indefatigable exertions of Mr. A. Harrison, the eager "regisseur" from the Royal Italian Opera of London.

"There is," your own correspondent informs me, "to be a glorious row in our Town Council, on Wednesday (to-day), in re St. George's Hall." The deficit in the receipts amounts, it appears, to £500!—a pretty scandal for the Corporation and rich burghers of Liverpool. The Anglo-Italo-Germano opera season began on Monday night. You will receive a full account of the performances.

DRAMATIC.

Drury Lane.—This theatre opened on Monday evening, with a series of tragic performances, the farewells of Mr. Gustavus Vasa Brooke, previous to his departure for California, which takes place next week, unless the success of the series induces Mr. T. E. Smith to induce him to remain for other farewells. The play was Virginius. The house was crowded in every part, and the actor was applauded to the echo, on his entrance, in various parts of his performance, and at the end, when he was called on the stage with a regular demonstration. Mr. Gustavus Vasa Brooke is seen to more advantage in the plays of Sheridan Knowles than in the plays of Shakspere. Hence his Virginius, or William Tell, is superior to his Othello or Hamlet. Indeed, the less ideal and abstract the character Mr. Brooke plays, the more truthful and forcible his impersonation. His talent is actual, not intellectual. Moreover, he is not a romantic actor, and lacks a feeling for the picturesque. Mr. Wright has appeared in farces to support the attraction of Mr. Brooke. The company is nearly identical with that which appeared with Mr. Brooke at his last engagement at Drury Lane.

St. James's.—For the first time since it was built—now more than twenty years—the St. James's Theatre has been made a regular establishment for the performance of English dramas. Originally intended as an English opera-house by Mr. Braham, it was for years applied to no other purpose, and promised to become the Opéra-Comique of London. The English opera, however, was not supported with vigour, and Mr. Braham retired from the management in disgust, and sold his interest in the theatre. Since then the St. James's has chiefly been used for the performance of French and German plays, with the occasional introduction of a French operatic company. At rare intervals performances of English operas were given; but, until Monday, no regularly constituted English company has appeared at the theatre since Mr. Braham quitted it.

The English company of actors who have united together at the St. James's Theatre for the advancement of native talent, do not indeed constitute a galaxy of talent, many of them being imported on speculation from the provinces, and many being selected from the minor metropolitan theatres. The best names in the new corps are those of Miss Glyn, who is well known for her readings of Shakspere; Mr. George Vandenhoff, late of the Haymarket; Mr. Stuart, ditto; Mr. T. Mead, an actor of some London fame; and Mrs. Seymour, the most fair and clever manageress.

Mrs. Seymour—who must be remembered as the pretty and vivacious Miss Allison—has considerable talent as a comic actress, reminding one forcibly of the late Mrs. Fitzwilliam, in manner, style, deportment, voice, figure, even face, with a difference. She is brim full of life and humour, and would constitute an acquisition to any company.

Miss Glyn is a most tantalizing actress, and although evidently an artist of no mean order of mind, is seldom or ever satisfactory. Her highest efforts always disappoint. When she attempts little, her native graces shine forth in their best light, and she is then exceedingly pleasing. For this reason, in high tragedy parts—although her friends deem her main strength lies in that line—her success can never equal her expectations. There is too much effort in all she does, too much striving after effect, too much industry in the making of points, too much thinking about herself, too little abstraction, no abandon. Miss Glyn's conception, if it were thoroughly understood, might be accepted as the right one. But it is not thoroughly understood. This lady studied under Mr. Charles Kemble for several years, but she appears not to have caught even a reflection of his natural graces and accomplishments. Better, we think, had she studied under Macready, who could have better taught her the use of art. Miss Glyn has many admirers. We admire her—with a reservation. We repeat, she is the most tantalizing of actresses.

Mr. T. Mead—now here is an actor of parts; but what an error to make him a lover, who has a voice like thunder broken on crooked rocks, or like the short growls of a bass hyæna in an unfed state. Mr. T. Mead is a good actor of the rough and ready school, and might always be turned to useful account. On Monday night he was not turned to useful account.

Mr. T. Stuart is a clever man, and an appreciator of Shakspere. He is best in fiery characters, for which he has the right enthusiasm. Mr. George Vandenhoff, on the contrary, is best in tame characters, for which he has the right phlegmatism. Mr. Stuart, in place of being put into a fiery character on Monday night, was put into a dismal, doleful character, in which his talent was lost. This was wrong.

So much for the leading persons of the new company at the St. James's Theatre. Much expectation was formed of Mr. J. L. Toole from Dublin and the provinces, where, we understand, he has enjoyed a first-rate reputation. Mr. J. L. Toole, on Monday night, failed to come up to any expectation. He certainly had the least possible chance of shewing off his talents—if he possessed any—in the two pieces he appeared in. It would have required the genius of a Robson to hammer out scintillations from such dull flintstone. Mr. J. L. Toole is no Robson. Of that we are assured.

The theatre opened on Monday evening with a new and original five act drama, by Messrs. Tom Taylor and Charles Reade, entitled The King's Rival. The story belongs to the reign of King Charles the Second, and turns upon the court anecdote of Miss Stewart's marriage with the Duke of Richmond. The king is in love with Miss Stewart, and finding the duke is in his way, employs all his wit and power to supersede him. The lady, however, is a pattern of virtue, and his majesty is foiled. The virtue of the lady, the jealousy of the Duke, and the anger of the king, are turned to tolerable account in a plot confused and diffused in the extreme. Never was so much made out of so little, and for this the authors are entitled to the highest praise. The play has evidently been written to the company, and as it was necessary to bring in all the leading members and several new aspirants for metropolitan fame, Messrs. Tom Taylor and Charles Reade laboured under the disadvantage of an embarras des richesses. Miss Glyn plays the heroine, Miss Stewart—the original model of the Britannia on the halfpence—and Mrs. Seymour personates Nell Gwynn. The last is sustained with remarkable spirit and vivacity: but Nell has been treated somewhat scurvily by the authors, who have hardly done her justice in the drawing. The character of Charles is somewhat of a loose pencil sketch, and the Duke of Richmond is a mere court bravado. Samuel Pepys, the comic personage of the drama, is entirely a mistake. He failed to elicit a single laugh. Mr. J. L. Toole certainly did not do much to brighten up his dulness. The dialogue is occasionally smart and forcible, but has not been written uno flatu, nor with any great consideration. Discrepancies and weaknesses so frequently occur that we are persuaded the talented co-operators had little or no heart in their task. One or two gross absurdities, which greatly endangered the success of the piece, might be pointed out; but enough has been said to show that The King's Rival is no chef- d'œuvre, and that it is not likely to obtain more than a moderate success.

The scenery was admirable, and the dresses rich and appropriate. The fair manageress displayed the nicest taste in the stage arrangements, which were unexceptionable in every respect.

The farce which followed the drama, My Friend the Major, is "new and original." It was written by Mr. Charles Selby, and is, at a word, the weakest and silliest concoction ever produced in any theatre of pretence.

We are glad to perceive Mr. Nugent has the direction of the box-office. The visitors may depend upon having every attention paid them.

The theatre has undergone great alterations. A dress circle has been made, the pit and galleries enlarged, and the interior newly painted and decorated. Altogether, nothing, excepting better actors and better pieces, was wanting to render the opening performance brilliant and satisfactory.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, October 7th, 1854.

The Society of British Musicians has just put forth a circular letter, addressed to the profession at large, setting forth some part of its position, and all its expectations, and concluding with a very straightforward request for the immediate accession of as many new members as possible. All this is, perhaps, rather infra dig. on the part of a society carrying so sounding a title; but, we suppose, members and their money are wanted, and must be had at any cost, pecuniary or social, of advertisement. It is hoped, we are told, "that a large accession of members, in November next, may enable them at once to undertake various plans for placing the Society before the public in a prominent and lasting manner." We hope so likewise. Prominence and lastingness in public opinion are, certainly, qualities properly to be expected of an institution possessing large national objects; but yet they are precisely those qualities which this Society has hitherto shewn no power of attaining. A society carrying out such professions as those of the British Musicians, was, and is much wanted. It had excellent ground to start with. It arose out of the midst of a well-founded grumble on the part of English composers, that they were practically shut out from all the avenues either to improvement or public appreciation. For the learner there was no practice-ground—no orchestra available which, in performing his works, would teach him their technical defects. For the master there was neither theatre nor concert-room in which he had a right to claim a hearing. He might make symphonies, operas, oratorios, by the dozen, if he had strength and hopefulness, to last out his task; but he had his labour for his pains and pleasure too. He, better than most men, could adopt the motto "labor ipse voluptas." All his toil and scribbling advanced him nothing towards a settlement of the long-vexed question as to whether it was in an Englishman's nature to have more musical brains than were just necessary to teach the school-rudiments of his art. Unless he could pay in meal or malt—in money or influence—he had no chance of breaking through that grim circle of managers and directors who sat entrenched on all the roads to public music. The society of British Musicians was just the very thing to get him out of his troubles. It purposed to associate all the creative and executive strength of the metropolis in a bond of mutual usefulness. The composers were to write, and the singers and players were to interpret their mysteries. Each one was to do his best for his neighbour; and, in short, it was to be a kind of "happy family," though composed of animals hitherto notoriously more difficult of social amalgamation than any others on the face of the globe. For a time all this worked tolerably well. Many concerts were given, and much new music was produced—to the great satisfaction, at all events, of the composers. But by some strange fatality, or stupidity—whichever it may happen to be—which always attends "native" attempts to combine for musical purposes, this prosperity soon began to wane. The public—whether because they were indifferent to "British Musicians" in the abstract, or because they found their music the reverse of agreeable—lent the concerts no remunerative patronage; and the members soon began to pass from a state of discontent with external circumstances to one of disagreement among themselves. Parties began to arise, formed and fostered, as usual, by the most inefficient men; and, at last, many of the wisest and ablest musicians on the Society's muster-roll, descrying, in all its doings, the approaching rule of favouritism and cliquery, under their meanest aspects, and the inevitable succession of insignificance, if not extinction, left it in disgust. Since then it has dwindled to next to a shadow. The public has forgotten its existence; its concerts, if any take place, pass unheeded; and only by some side-wind do we occasionally hear of those drawing-room soirées where "British Musicians" do congregate to sing and play each other's compositions—doubtless to their own supreme content.

It is truly pitiable to find an institution, honestly intended to remedy a great and self-evident defect, in such a state of hepless inaction. It is, unfortunately, however, but the history of many attempts made by English musicians in combination to raise their order into national importance. A large part of the failure is, doubtless, due to the character of the English people. Inflexible as we are in our enmity to foreign foes, utterly determined as our history exhibits us in our wars, ever ready to fight to the death for our "homes and altars," perpetually invoking Britannia, and the British Lion, and all the rest of our patriotic mythology, we have yet scarcely a particle of what may truly be called nationality in our character. We have neither the clannishness of the Irish and Scotch, nor that more extended nationality—that intense pride and satisfaction in every product of his native land—himself included—which makes the Frenchman or the German prefer everything French or German, with or without reason, to any thing else in the world. We are not a nation; we are a jumble of nations; and our nationality is therefore not one, but a dozen. An Englishman has no extra interest in a picture or an opera, because it is English. The very uncertainty of his origin—whether he be Pict, or Scot, or Roman, or Dane, or Gaul—has sown in him the spirit of free-trade, centuries before the time of Cobden and Peel. He has no more abstract reverence for British music than for British brandy. He deals with both on precisely the same principle. If he prefers the French article he will have it, and nationality may go to the bottom of the sea for aught he cares. Now, though this feeling, in its freedom from prejudice, has doubtless acted most powerfully in bringing our general civilization up to its present wonderful pitch, it has, probably, exercised nearly as potent an influence against the progress of art. The question is too long for discussion here; but as it is a curious one we shall recur to it at some favourable opportunity. We only wish, here, to assert that our musical institutions, and the Society of British Musicians as a case in point, have suffered much from this want of nationality in the English character.

But the mischief inflicted on this Society in particular, is not wholly produced by defect of patronage. Much, very much, is traceable to the character of the men composing it. There were among them too many little men who thought themselves great, too much petty and miserable jealousy; too little nobility of mind, too little genuine artist-spirit. In a game of sneaking, finesse, and partizanship, the worldly men—and they are always the worst artists—have invariably the advantage. It has been played in the Society of British Musicians nearly to the exclusion of every element of greatness it might have contained, and thus nearly to its own destruction. At present it is all but a nonentity; but yet, unfortunately, still hoists its banner as the ark of refuge and head-quarters of British musical art. This ought no longer to be a delusion. There is yet time and strength to make it a reality. In its circular, the Society promises amendment. Let the committee look to fulfilling these promises. Let them take to them all the best men they can find, and work with them zealously and honestly. They shall have our warm co-operation to the extremity of their deserts. There is as much room as ever for their operations, and the materials for success are thrice as abundant as when they first commenced. But let us have no more detestable intriguing—no more displays of that meanness of disposition, which has been a reproach to the mediocre part of our profession. Contrive that it shall become an honour to belong to the SOCIETY OF BRITISH MUSICIANS, and, with or without public patronage, it will succeed in its first and foremost object—the elevation of the English artistic character.

WE have received several letters from correspondents requesting to know what prospects there were for a winter musical season in London; what was likely to be done; and when a beginning was likely to be made. To the above queries, we are sorry to say, we have nothing satisfactory to respond. All we know for a certainty is, that the indefatigable and never-disappointing M. Jullien will arrive in town in about a fortnight, and that he intends to commence his series of miscellaneous concerts at Drury Lane. M. Jullien has been rusticating for the last two months at his chateau near Brussels; but, arguing from the antecedents of the excitable and eager-to-be-doing chef-d'orchestre, we may confidently presume that he is not idling away his hours in small talk and theories; but that the stirring times will serve to render his genius more than usually active, and that something original and rare, from his pen, may be expected at his forthcoming performances.

From M. Jullien, then, there is something to be hoped. His winter concerts are well-timed, and they come as a real boon to the lover of music, smiling away his weariness in the darkness of the season. This year, so pregnant with glorious and important events, more especially, we may with assurance look forward to as about to give us something worthy of M. Jullien himself and the time.

After M. Jullien, we know no other quarter whence we may expect musical recreation for the ensuing winter. Mr. E. T. Smith, the manager of Drury Lane, has advertised for an operatic company during the holidays. Great as the dearth of singers is in London at the present moment, we have no doubt the Drury Lane impresario will have a voluminous correspondence, from town and country, of flashing sopranos, die-away tenors, and double-chinned basses, all, knowing their own worth, desirous to enlighten musical London with their talent But what, in fact, is the inference to be drawn from Mr. E. T. Smith's advertisement? Either, that there is no musical talent in the country, or, that the musical talent in the country will not engage with Mr. E. T. Smith. The effect is the same—we shall have no opera worth the hearing at Drury Lane.

Is there nothing to be expected from any other source? Where is the theatre?—a query answered by a query! The Lyceum—built expressly as an English opera-house—re-opens on Monday with a dramatic company. The Princess's—which for years, under Mr. Maddox's management, was the very home of English opera—re-opens on Monday with a dramatic company. Drury Lane—which, under the administration of Mr. Bunn, might, with a stretch, have been termed, at one period, the "Grand Opera" of London—will, no doubt, prolong the farewell nights of Mr. Gustavus Vasa Brooke, and continue its performances with—another dramatic company. The Surrey has foregone music, and relies for its success upon a—dramatic company. The St. James's—where Charton delighted, and Marie Cabel entranced, and which held forth a promise that it might one day become the Opéra Comique of the English metropolis—has turned her back upon music, and paid her court exclusively to the drama. English music is absolutely without a home in the metropolis, unless she bide with Mr. Costa, at the huge building in Exeter Street, or take up her lodgment with Mr. Hullah in St. Martin's Hall—in neither of which localities, we fear, would she be made particularly welcome—without attributing any blame, be it said, what ever, to Mr. Costa, or to Mr. Hullah. Bref—every dramatic door in London is shut against music, and if a theatre is to be opened for opera, Englishmen will have to build a theatre for themselves. Let them not lay the flattering unction to their souls, that some theatre—the Lyceum, or Drury Lane, or St. James's—must inevitably fall to themselves. Know they not that actors of the present day—it would seem so, at least—are of higher intellects and vaster powers than ever, and moreover, are far more numerous; whence it follows that more theatres are required. Year by year music is undermined, and the drama extends its sphere. It is far easier to find a first-rate tragedian than a first-rate tenor, and what manager would think of engaging Mr. Sims Reeves, when he could have Mr. Gustavus Vasa Brooke at equal terms. Thus the drama makes progess, where the opera goes back; and music will have to bide its time, until there be fewer and less-celebrated actors; or, until she herself, by exertion in combination, place herself in that position to which she is entitled by right of birth and right of power.

Miss Arabella Goddard.—This accomplished young pianist, who, by the latest accounts, had been staying at Hombourg, was engaged, on the 25th ult., by the administration, to play at a concert given at the Kursaal. Miss Arabella Goddard performed Weber's "Invitation to the Waltz," Thalberg's "Don Giovanni Fantasia," and Charles Mayer's Etude, "La Fontaine." Her success was immense. She was recalled after each piece, and cheered by the whole audience. The fair pianist was about to proceed to Frankfort first, whence she departs for Darmstadt, Berlin, Hanover, and Vienna, where already numerous engagements await her.

Herr Dawison has commenced his duties as one of the principal actors in Dresden; he always draws full houses, and bids fair to be the first and greatest actor of the age.

Philharmonic Rooms, Newman-Street.—Mr. Charles Cotton gave an entertainment on Monday night, at the above locality, entitled "A Visit to Nelson's Flag-ship, the Victory," in which he introduced musical and pictorial illustrations of the glories of "Britannia's God of War." The room in which the entertainment is given has been appropriately fitted up as the poop and part of the quarter-deck of Nelson's flag-ship. The leading incidents of Nelson's life, and many amusing anecdotes and interesting incidents, are introduced by Mr. Cotton with excellent effect. The songs are by Dibdin, Dr. Boyce, Blewitt, Edward Loder, and Braham, and embrace all those that have direct reference to the hero himself, or bear an allusion to sea-faring life. Mr. Cotton possesses a good barytone voice, and sings both with spirit and taste. The dioramic illustrations are excellent, and were received with loud applause on Monday night. In short, we may pronounce Mr. Cotton's entertainment as one of the most interesting of the kind which has been given in London.

City Musical Union.—This society, which holds its music gatherings once a month at Crosby Hall, introduced its subscribers and visitors to a cantata, called St. Cecilia's Day, composed by Van Bree. The work is "of a mingled yarn," containing many pretty and graceful thoughts, not unmixed, however, with baser matter. Among the best things are a recitative and air, "Frascati, fairest vale of Italy," and an air and chorus, "Come forward with pleasure;" but the choruses, which are all deeply inlaid with brass, do not comprise the best portions of the work. So much, in brief, for a first impression. Of the performance, we say nothing, for we have no wish to dwell upon the defects of "unfunded" societies." The popular feature in the selection which followed the cantata, was a new-part song, entitled, "The Tar's Song," by Mr. Hatton. Although the clamorous encore it obtained was, in part, owing to its reference to passing events, it does not lack some of the strength and dramatic keeping which usually invigorate this gentleman's muse. Mrs. R. Limpus, who has a sweet and powerful soprano voice, which she manages with great taste and delicacy, was encored in Bellini's "Non giunge." Miss Hincks was similarly honoured in Keiser's song, "My guiding star; and Miss Cox was called on to repeat a pretty song of Geo. Linley's, which she delivered very nicely; and as, moreover, she is young and handsome, the youthful portion of the audience could have been at no loss where to apply the words—"Some one to love.'

PROVINCIAL.

Manchester.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The experiment of Mr. Knowles to establish a regular operatic season here, commenced on Monday last with I Puritani, being the first of a series of sixty performances, some few of which are to be English, the majority being Italian or German. The company is chiefly made up of the members of the late Royal Opera corps at Drury Lane. I Puritani did not attract a large audience. I am sorry, for the sake of music, to inform you, that the very low price of five pounds for a transferable ticket for thirty operas on alternate nights, or for a non-transferable ticket for the entire sixty, has induced but a limited number to take season tickets. Bellini's opera does not seem to be very popular here; indeed it scarcely deserves to be so; the libretto is confused and unconnected, and the music betrays little of the invention and spontaneity which so eminently characterises La Sonnambula and Norma. I Puritani undoubtedly owes its chief celebrity to the four great artists—Grisi, Rubini, Tamburini, and Lablache—who some fifteen years since used to enchain the audiences of Her Majesty's Theatre with their vocal performances. It served, on the present occasion, to introduce Mdlle. Agnes Büry to a Manchester audience as Elvira, Formes being the Sir Georgio, Reichardt the Arturo, and Fortini Riccardo. It was on the whole a successful, if not a great performance, and Mdlle. Büry made a favourable début. She has a most pleasing appearance. Her voice is more extensive than powerful; she exhibits no common powers in her execution, her ornaments at times verging on the daring and startling. Some of these, however, we could well dispense with for a little more of the sostenuto and legato. In the famous polacca, "Son vergine vezzosa," she warbled even like a bird, and was ably assisted by Formes and Reichardt in the accompaniment. Mdlle. Agnes Büry threw much feeling into her delivery of the "Qui la voce," which was loudly encored, but she merely returned to acknowledged the compliment. The popular quartet "A te o cara" was excellently sung by the four principals, Reichardt's part being delivered with admirable taste and feeling. Herr Reichardt was dressed most elegantly as the gallant cavalier, whilst Formes added another to the extensive gallery of portraits he has embodied here, adding Georgio to his Caspar, Oroveso, Rocco, and Marcel. He and Fortini were encored in the tempestuous duet, "Suoni la tromba," which was given with great energy. Owing to the glorious news from the seat of war—which up to the present moment, Thursday, October 5th, a morning contemporary takes leave to doubt—"Rule Britannia," at least the first verse of it, was given by the chorus before the opera, and "God save the Queen" after; the former was encored, and the audience joined heartily in the National Anthem. On Tuesday, Norma was given in the completest manner it was ever rendered in Manchester. The band and chorus were efficient in quality and number. The orchestra has been enlarged to the entire width of the pit, and comprises amongst its members all the best players in the Concert Hall orchestra, with C. W. Seymour to lead, and Messrs. Edward Loder and Charles Hallé to conduct alternately. Mr. Charles Hallé took the baton the first night with I Puritani, and on Tuesday night Mr. Loder conducted Norma. Madame Caradori was the druid priestess, which she played and sung with decided energy and spirit. Mdlle. Sedlatzek was the Adelgisa; it was her first appearance here. She is a pleasing singer, and acquitted herself creditably in her first duet with Madame Caradori, which was loudly encored, and even went better the second time. Both ladies were also much applauded in the well-known duet "Deh conte," and Madame Caradori was unanimously cheered in her defiance to Pollio in the finale to the first act. M. Zelger as Oroveso, and Signor Octave Benedetti as the Pollio, were also débutants in Manchester. The first was very effective as the High Priest of the Druids, and his deep voice told well in the concerted music, more especially in the last scene of the opera, after the "Guerra, guerra" chorus, which was given with force and energy.

Mr. Harris came in front of the curtain, before the opera commenced, to apologise for Signor Octave Benedetti, who was suffering from severe cold and hoarseness—but who would go through his part (omitting his aria), with the usual kind indulgence, etc., etc. Of course, under these circumstances, we must not criticise the singing of Signor Octave Benedetti. He seems to possess a voice of tolerable quality and power. It would be well, nevertheless, if he was to study Reichardt's graceful action on the stage, as his own is by no means becoming or graceful. The band and chorus were excellent throughout. The house was not so good a one as on Monday, which is the more unaccountable as Norma is both well known and popular here. On Wednesday, Fidelio was given, and was, in some respects, an admirable performance. Herr Formes made an inimitable Rocco—it is, I think, his best performance. Herr Reichardt was admirable as Florestan, and Madame Caradori's Leonora was entitled to high praise. But I must hear it a second time before venturing on a decided and confirmed judgment, so shall withhold full particulars until next week.

IBID.—At the Theatre Royal Mr. Charles Mathews had a full house on Saturday last. The theatre has been redecorated. Mr. C. Mathews was full of his usual humour, and kept his auditors in roars of laughter.—On Wednesday, the 27th, a concert was given at the Concert Hall, Mendelssohn's Lobgesang and Mozart's Requiem being the bill of fare for the evening, The principal soprano was confided to Mrs. Sunderland, who was assisted by Mrs. Thomas, and Mrs. Brooke. Mr. Perring was the principal tenor, and Mr. Guilmette the bass. The chorus, though numbering only about three dozen voices, appeared, however, to be tolerably correct. The room was excessively crowded, many ladies being compelled to stand during a great portion of the evening. We understand that a dress concert has been fixed for the last week of next month, for which Madame Clara Novello and Mr. Sims Reeves have been engaged.

NOTTINGHAM.—RE-OPENING OF THE ORGAN, MECHANIC'S HALL.—(From a Correspondent.)—The committee of the Mechanics' Institution gave a concert at the Mechanics' Hall, on the occasion of the re-opening of the organ, on Thursday the 21st ult. Mr. and Mrs. Weiss were engaged for the vocal department, and Mr. Shelmerdine was the organist.

The organ in the Mechanics' Hall was originally erected by Bevington and Sons, London, in 1849, and has just been reconstructed, revoiced, and enlarged by Mr. S. Groves, of London. The manuals are now placed on the platform, at a distance of about 12 feet from the organ-case, by which the organist will command an entire view of the orchestra. The swell and choir organs have been removed from the case to convenient ante-rooms underneath the orchestra, the swell being placed on the left, and the choir on the right of the organist. The choir also forms a swell, both swell and choir opening on to the platform. The advantage of this arrangement to the solo singer, I think, will be manifest. Mr. Groves is entitled to the highest praise for the manner in which he has completed his work. Before he undertook to reconstruct and revoice the organ, it had become comparatively useless, and was pronounced a failure, and its failure was partly attributed to the situation; whereas now it is unquestionably a very fine instrument, and for richness of tone and variety of effect, it ranks among one of the finest in the Midland Counties.

I send you a description of the organ, which is as follows:—Great Organ, compass CC to G.—Open diapason, open diapason (large scale), stop diapason, principal, twelfth, fifteenth, sesquealtra (three ranks), mixture (three ranks), hohl flute, wald flute, claribella, quint, decima, trumpet, octave trumpet, possaune. Swell Organ, tenor, C to G.—Double diapason, open diapason, open diapason (large scale), stop diapason, principal, quint, fifteenth, octave fifteenth, furniture (five ranks), wald flute, piccolo, oboe, cornopean, trombone, clarion, bourdon, CC to tenor C. Choir Organ, CC to G.—Double diapason, open diapason, stop diapason (bass), principal, clarabella, bassoon, clarionet, viol di gamba, dulciana, keraulophon, flageolet, flute, bourdon, CC to tenor C. Pedal Organ, CC to E.—Open diapason 16 ft. (wood), open diapason 16 ft. (metal), principal 8ft. (wood), fifteenth 4 ft. (metal), possaune 16 ft. 11 composition pedals: two for the pedal organ, three for the great organ, three for the choir organ, two for the swell organ, one forzando pedal. Couplers.—Swell to great organ, swell to choir organ, great to swell organ, swell to pedals, great to pedals, choir to pedals, pedals CC to E, pedal solo.

The pedals can be divided at pleasure. The upper part can be coupled to the third octave on the great manuals, for solo, the lower octave of the pedals being used in the usual way.

IBID.—(From a Correspondent.)—A concert was given at the Mechanics' Hall on Wednesday the 27th of September, for which occasion Mr. Henry Farmer engaged the services of Miss Poole and Miss Milner (vocalists), and Messrs. Cooper, Hausmann, and Charles Blagrove (instrumentalists). Miss Poole sang "In questo semplice" in her usual good style; also a song of John Barnett's, but we were rather disappointed in her singing of "'Tis best to be off with the old love," as she scarcely appeared to know, or understand the proper reading of it, although, we understand, it was written expressly for her by Mr. H. Farmer. Miss Poole's voice was very charming in the duets "Della Mosa," from Meyerbeer's Prophète, and Glover's "From our merry Swiss home." Miss Milner has a good voice, and sang the grand scena from Der Freischütz with force and great endeavour. She promises, with study and perseverance, to become one of our best concert singers. Her singing of Mr. Farmer's ballad from the Lamplighter, "We'll bide together," was excellent, and earned her warm applause. Mr. H. C. Cooper is a favourite in Nottingham. He played the andante and scherzo from Mr. Farmer's Second Concerto with brilliancy and effect. The concerto requires a first rate artist to interpret the various passages in double stops, staccato, bowing, harmonics, etc., all of which are very difficult, but Mr. Cooper did it full justice and narrowly escaped an encore. Mr. Cooper also played Ernst's "Carnaval de Vénise," and was encored. Mr. Hausmann delighted the audience with his fantasia on Scotch airs, and gained an encore; he also played a sort of medley duet with Mr. Cooper, from William Tell. Mr. Charles Blagrove is a good pianist, and played the trios (with violin and violoncello) with skill and effect, and accompanied the various pieces with taste and judgment. The room was not well filled, and we fear, that Mr. Farmer will be a considerable loser by it.

LEEDS.—(From our own Correspondent.)—An excellent concert of its kind, was given by Miss Milner in our Music Hall, on Saturday evening last. The artistes were Miss Poole, the fair beneficiaire herself, Mr. Cooper (violin), Herr Hausmann (violoncello), and Mr. Chas. Blagrove as "pianist and accompanyist." The whole party it appears are on a provincial tour, and one, which, so far, has been successful. Miss Milner is a native of Leeds, and, until within a few months since, has always resided here. As a chorus, and subsequently as a solo singer, she has invariably assisted at most of our local concerts. Her voice is a soprano of considerable power, flexibility, and sweetness in the upper part of her register, but deficient in all these qualities in the lower part. Latterly she has studied under Mrs. Wood (formerly Miss Paton), and from her she has evidently imbibed much excellence as well as peculiarity of style. Her career is watched with considerable interest by many friends in Leeds, and, we believe, she is destined to occupy a good position among the present race of home soprani.

The concert was of a miscellaneous character, and specially calculated to display the abilities of each individual executant. The violin and violoncello performances by Messrs. Cooper and Hausmann were listened to with real attention, and applauded to the echo. In each of their solos, the encore was most enthusiastic. Mr. Cooper's solo—Paganini's "Carnaval de Vénise"—was particularly admired; it was given with a breadth of tone, expression, and a finish in the execution, that left little to be desired. As much may be said of Hausmann's fantasia on Scotch airs, in which the clever violoncellist exhibited all his wonted excellence of tone and dexterity, not omitting those little comical eccentricities of manner, which, though pardonable, are, nevertheless, often the means of diverting the attention of the audience from the music to the performer. Miss Poole sang as she always sings—charmingly. There is a winning simplicity of style and execution in all her efforts, which combined with a mezzo soprano voice of the purest and sweetest quality, never fail to charm. In such ballads as "Bonnie Dundee" and "Jock o' Hazeldean," Miss Poole has now no superior. The distinctness of her enunciation—the accuracy of her intonation—her artless manner and style—all combine to ensure success. She joined Miss Milner in a duet from the Prophète, and in Glover's tripping "From our merry Swiss home," both pieces being sung with considerable taste and effect.

Miss Milner sang "Robert, toi que j'aime," "Softly sighs," "The sea has its pearls," and Moore's "Minstrel boy"—in excellent style, and elicited from the audience unequivocal marks of satisfaction and pleasure. Mr. Charles Blagrove officiated as conductor with skill and judgment. The room was not quite filled, but the audience was respectable and appreciative.

SHREWSBURY.—On Monday evening last a concert of vocal and instrumental music took place in the Music Hall, in behalf of the widow and children of the late Mr. W. V. Bourlay. The concert opened by a performance on the organ by Mr. Rawlings, organist of St. Julian's. The singers were Mdlle. Sedlatzek and Mrs. John Hayward. Mr. Henry Hayward performed "The Carnival of Venice" on the violin, and was much admired. Messrs. G. Hay and Master Wheeldon executed a duet upon the pianoforte. The first part closed with the overture to Der Freischütz, and the second part opened with the overture to Il Barbiere de Seviglia. Mr. Walter Hay played a solo on the cornet-à-pistons. A composition by Mr. G. E. Hay for the pianoforte, "Gage d'Amitié," was well rendered by Master George Wheeldon (a student of the Royal Academy of Music), who made his first appearance before a Shrewsbury audience.

BIRMINGHAM.—On the 28th ult. Mr. Duchemin's concert took place at Dee's Hotel. The artists who assisted Mr. Duchemin were Miss Poole, Miss Milner, and Miss Fanny Ternan; the instrumentalists, Mr. Cooper (violin), Herr Hausmann (violoncello), and Mr. Duchemin (pianist). The accompaniments were entrusted to Mr. W. C. Blagrove. The concert opened with Beethoven's grand trio, in B flat, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello. Miss Milner sang Bishop's song, "Should he upbraid." This young lady is a pupil of the celebrated Mrs. Wood. She possesses a clear and powerful soprano voice. Sainton's solo for the violin, from Lucrezia Borgia, was ably interpreted by Mr. Cooper. Miss Fanny Ternan followed in "Batti, batti," the violoncello obligato by Herr Hausmann. Mr. Duchemin performed Mendelssohn's capriccio in F sharp minor. Miss Poole next gave Donizetti's "In questo semplice." Herr Hausmann succeeded in his own fantasia for the violoncello on Scotch airs, which produced a unanimous recal. The duet between Berthe and Fides, "Della Mosa," from the Prophète, by the Misses Milner and Poole, closed the first part of the concert. In the second part, Mendelssohn's two-part song, "O, wert thou in the cauld blast," was charmingly sung by Miss Ternan and Miss Poole; Meyerbeer's "Robert, toi que j'aime," by Miss Milner, Thalberg's fantasia from Don Giovanni, by Mr. Duchemin; Miss Fanny Ternan's "Jock o' Hazeldean," accompanied by herself, and so charmingly sung as to demand an encore; Paganini's "Carnival," by Mr. Cooper, also encored; Miss Poole, "Over the Sea;" the buffo trio, from Cimarosa's Matrimonio Segreto, "My lady, the countess," were the chief items. The concert was brought to a close by Hummell's trio in E flat, for piano, violin, and violoncello.

PLYMOUTH.—The sixth and last concert, given at this theatre by Mr. Newcombe, took place on Monday evening, when a numerous and brilliant audience assembled. The artists engaged were Miss Poole, Miss Milner, Mr. H. C. Cooper, Herr Hausmann, and Mr. Charles Blagrove.

Miss Poole was encored in "In questo semplice," when she gave "Jock o' Hazeldean," as also in Dr. Arne's song, "Where the bee sucks." Miss Milner sang the grand aria from Der Freischütz, "Softly sighs," and "Robert, toi que j'aime," from Robert le Diable. Mr. H. C. Cooper played his variations on melodies from Lucrezia Borgia, on the violin, with brilliancy, eliciting unanimous applause. Herr Hausmann was no less successful in his fantasia on Scotch airs, and both gentlemen shared the applause in the duo on airs from Guillaume Tell. The "Carnaval de Vénise" by Mr. Cooper exhibited great facility of execution, as well as a perfect command over all the eccentricities of the instrument. The concert was most successful, and Mr. Newcombe has made arrangements for two more concerts by the same ladies and gentlemen, who will be strengthened by the assistance of the Organophonic Band, and of Mdlle. Lucia Escott, prima donna from the operas of Florence and Naples. One of the concerts will be for the benefit of Mr. J. R. Newcombe.

BRISTOL.—On Monday last, Mr. Cockram gave a concert of vocal and instrumental music at the Victoria Rooms, which was well attended. The principal vocalists and instrumentalists were Miss Poole, Miss Milner, Mr. H. C. Cooper, Herr Hausmann and Mr. C. Blagrove, who are now making a tour of the provinces.

CLIFTON.—A grand concert will take place at the Victoria Rooms, on Friday, October 20th. The following artists are engaged:—Mad. Clara Novello, Mrs. Endersohn, Mrs. Lockey; Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Lockey, Mr. Hobbs, Mr. Land, Mr. J. L. Hatton and Mr. H. Phillips.

HUDDERSFIELD.—Mr. T. Netherwood's concert came off at the Philosophical Hall, on Wednesday evening. Most of the performers were local, except Miss Senior and Mr. Hinchliffe, from Leeds, who took part in the proceedings. Miss Whitham also sang.

The same party who have been starring it at Plymouth and Bristol, gave a concert on the 26th September, in this town. The audience seemed much gratified, but they were not so numerous as might have been desired.

LOUTH.—(From a Correspondent.)—A concert was given in the Corn Exchange on Tuesday evening last, by Mr. C. F. Willey, professor of music, who had engaged, for the occasion, Mr. and Mrs. Sims Reeves, Mr. Farquharson, Mr. Sharp, R.A.M., and Mr. R. Clementi. The attendance was immense, and the concert was patronised by all the principal families in the town and neighbourhood. One distinguishing feature in the concert was, after Mr. Sims Reeves had sung Mori's new song, "England and Victory," and, amidst the tremendous applause of the audience, H. Pye, Esq. rose and said that the song just sung by Mr. Reeves brought forcibly before him and the audience the great and glorious victory which the allied forces had obtained in the East, and proposed "Three cheers for the Queen, and God bless her." The audience at once rose, and, if stentorian lungs are a proof of loyalty, that proof was not wanting on this occasion. Amid the general demand, Mr. Reeves repeated the song with, if possible, increased effect.

FOREIGN.

PARIS.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The following is a list of the principal officials connected with the new management of the Grand-Opéra:—"Baron de Chasseriau, administrator; M. Charles Plantads, chef des bureaux; M. d'Avrillon, commis d'ordre; M. Lami, treasurer; and M. Sausseret, assistant treasurer." M. Leduc retains his place as inspector of the theatre, and M. Guillet is still occupied in settling the accounts.—Mad. Stolz took leave of the public, last week, for her congé, as Catarina in La Reine de Chypre. She will not return before November.

The season commenced at the Théâtre-Italien with Rossini's Semiramide, supported by Mesdames Bosio, Borghi-Mamo, and M. Gassier. I was unable to be present, but will forward you the details in my next.

The new opera, Les Sabots de la Marquise, words by MM. Michel Carré and Jules Barbier, and music by M. Ernest Boulanger, has been very favourably received at the Opéra-Comique. Mdlle. Lemercier especially was greatly applauded in the part of the femme de chambre, Lise.

Faithful to his promise, M. Perrin opened the Théâtre-Lyrique this day week, with Mad. Marie Cabel in La Promise. On Sunday, La Reine d'une Jour was played, and next week we shall have M. Gévaërt's new three-act opera, for the début of Mad. Deligne-Lauters. The libretto of M. Pierre Pascal's opera, Le Roman de la Rose, now in rehearsal, is from the pens of MM. Jules Barbier and Jules Delahaye. According to the report, Mad. Ugalde will proceed to Marseilles next April, and give a series of ten representations, for which she is to receive the sum of 15,000 francs.

At the Théâtre-Français, Mad. Judith has re-appeared, and been most warmly received. M. Latour de St.-Ybars has read a one-act drama in verse. The principal part will be sustained by Mdlle. Rachel.

The Palais-Royal has just added a most amusing trifle, called Un Drôle de Pistolet, to its répertoire. The authors are MM. Varin and Léris, and the principal actors, MM. Luguet, Amant, Hyacinthe, Mesdames Duval and Thierry.

The last novelty at the Hippodrome is a military cantata, entitled La Triple Alliance. This is sung by the choristers of the 8th, 9th, 32nd, 63rd and 67th regiments of the line, and the 8th light infantry. Of course, it is wonderfully successful.

M. Henri Herz has returned from his trip to Germany.—The public meeting of the Académie des Beaux Arts will be held next Saturday, the 7th inst., for the distribution of prizes. As usual, the cantata of the lauréat who has gained the grand prize of Rome will be performed.—The pupils of the Conservatoire resumed their studies, after the vacation, last Monday.

BOULOGNE.—The theatre which has just been burnt down was originally built upon the space occupied by the garden of a monastery, which monastery, at the period of the occupation of Boulogne by Henry VIII., in 1544, was used as an arsenal for the English navy. The sea, which, at present, is a long distance off, used then to wash its walls.

VIENNA.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Spontini's Ferdinand Cortez has been played three times since its revival at the Imperial Opera, and seems to please the public more on each successive occasion. Robet le Diable will be produced on the 6th instant, in strict conformity with the manner in which it is got up in Paris.—Herr Nicolai's opera Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor will be revived in the course of the month.—At the re-opening of the Imperial Privat-Theater, a new Character gemälde (character sketch), entitled Mozart, has been produced with success. It is the first effort of a young author, Herr Wahlgemuth, who has woven some of the principal events of the immortal composer's life into a very interesting piece. Herr von Sappé, the leader at this establishment, has written a pleasing and clever overture, the motives of which are taken from Mozart's own compositions.—In the early part of this month, Shakspere's Midsummer Night's Dream, with Mendelssohn's music, will be produced for the first time at the Hofburgtheater, under the direction of the Capellmeister, Herr Titl.

BERLIN.—(From our own Correspondent.)—A great many concerts have been given for the benefit of the sufferers by the late inundations in Silesia; among others, I may mention that of Drs. Hoffe and Janson's Männer-Gesangverein, in the Theatre Royal, and that of the Brother's Stahlknecht and Löeckhorn, at the residence of the Geheim-Cabinet-Rath, Herr Illaire. At the Royal Opera-House the only thing worthy of notice that has happened since my last, has been the re-appearance of Mdlle. Johanna Wagner as Leonora in Fidelio, after an absence of several months. The theatre was filled to suffocation, but the audience were far from enthusiastic at the fall of the curtain. The fact is, that Mdlle. Wagner can no more set at defiance the laws of Nature than any other vocalist. The music of Fidelio lies completely beyond the compass of her voice; by great efforts, she formerly managed to give the high notes with a freshness which in some degree atoned for her now evident exertions in doing so—she could once sing F with tolerable success but she is now not able to reach E. I do not think it very probable that this young lady will ever occasion another action between the managers of two rival operas of London, or indeed of any other city. The Sing-Academie gave a performance on Wednesday, in the Garnisonkirche, of Händel's Messiah. The church was crowded.

STUTTGART.—Meyerbeer is here. His presence has created a great sensation. The day after his arrival he was admitted to a private audience by the king, and had the honour of an invitation to the Royal dinner table the same evening. The first performance of the Etoile du Nord is fixed for the 27th September. Meyerbeer will himself conduct his opera; at present he is busily occupied, with Herr Kücken, in superintending the rehearsals. Among the distinguished visitors who will be present on the first night, are the Queen of the Netherlands and Duke Bernhard of Sachsen-Weimar.

LEIPSIC.—Herr F. David has returned from Russia. The members of the Conservatory celebrated his return by a grand serenade in the garden of the establishment, which was tastefully illuminated in honour of the occasion. Lortzing's Wildschütz has been successfully revived. The first Gewandhaus concert is announced for the 1st of October.

COLOGNE.—The Männer-Gesangverein, always ready to act up to its motto, "Daroh das Schöne stets das Gute," gave a concert on the 16th instant, for the benefit of the sufferers by the late lamentable calamity in Silesia.—The Stadt theatre was lately opened. Three operas: Il Barbiere di Sevilla, Martha, and Lucia di Lammermoor have already been produced.

ST. PETERSBURGH.—Elsner's oratorio has been performed three times, and produced 3000 roubles, after the payment of all expenses. This sum will be devoted to the purchase of a monument for the composer, and the publication of some of his works.

STOCKHOLM.—The Theatre Royal opened on the 11th September, with Mozart's Zauberflöte. Rossini's Wilhelm Tell and M. Meyerbeer's Etoile du Nord will be produced this autumn. The Royal Singing Academy was re-opened on the 4th September. The number of pupils this session is 190—130 males and 60 females.

CASSEL.—Herr J. J. Bott's opera, Der Unbekannte has been exceedingly well received. favourable impression.

DUNDDORF.—Madame Clara Schumann has returned from Ostend.

MULHEIM-ON-THE-RUHR.—Herr Ferdinand Heller's Zerstörung von Jerusalem has been given with great success under the direction

NEW YORK.—The papers continue to comment on Madame Grisi and Signor Mario; some in the most express and loftiest terms of eulogy, and some rather coldly. From the general tone of the critics we are inclined to the belief that Mr. Hackett has not conciliated these gentlemen to their satisfaction. Why he should, we do not see; their independence must be the gainer, and the example of the London press is worth following, in a late well-remembered fracas. There is evidently something wrong somewhere, otherwise it is difficult to account for such discrepancy of opinions as we now witness among our American contemporaries. As far, however, as we can form an opinion, Grisi and Mario have not created the immense furore which was expected. We find in the New York Musical World that the receipts have been for the first night from 3,000 to 4,000 dollars; the second night, 1,700; the third, 1.900; the fourth, 6,000. With such results to the treasury, the speculation can hardly be lucrative in the highest degree. "To what is all this to be attributed?" says the Musical Review—"to the system of humbug." We stated as much in our last notice, and we are not surprised at the result. So far we are of the same opinion as the American journalist; but we entirely differ from him when he says "Barnum did the thing bravely and well with Jenny Lind; the public were delighted, and the operation was entirely successful." We have no particular interest in the success of the operation, more than a natural desire that genius of the first order should be ever ywhere recognised; but we say that of the two, Barnum was the greatre humbug, and, had he been discountenanced, as he ought to have been, he would have found no imitators. We are, however, glad to find that the auction system is to be abandoned, the New York gentlemen having found out, in spite of the word of honour of the impudent auctioneers as to the sales of tickets being bonâ fide, they in reality were undisguised swindlers, as complete as our own mock auction marts in Cornhill and Cheapside. Another advanced reason for the comparative non-success of Mad. Grisi and Sig. Mario consists in their being so badly supported. The orchestra is of the most miserable description, and rather seems to impede than sustain the efforts of the singers. With such drawbacks, we are not astonished at the result, the more especially when the high prices of admission are taken into consideration. The Musical Review says:—"The public wish to hear Grisi and Mario, and, under proper circumstances, will pay a fair price for doing so, if indeed the unfortunate management have not already excited, on the part of the public, such a dissatisfaction as to irretrievably ruin their prospects. Should there be an utter failure, however, and they return to England entirely disappointed, let it not be charged upon a lack of musical appreciation in America; let it not be cited as a proof that opera cannot be entertained here. The experiment of an opera has never yet been fairly tried among us. Adequate means and a judicious management are all that are necessary to ensure success."—We are perfectly of the writer's opinion, the star system, which reached its meridian with Jenny Lind, and was for a time successful, ruined Her Majesty's Theatre, as it is now ruining Mr. Hackett at Castle Garden. Since our last, Norma has been played, and Mad. Grisi created a tremendous sensation. The house was fuller than on any previous occasion.

CALIFORNIA.—Ole Bull has been giving concerts at the Metropolitan with immense success. The American and Union Theatres are full every night, the entertainments being exclusively dramatic.

CALIFORNIA.—(From a Correspondent.)—San Francisco, June, 1854. Mrs. Sinclair, the lady who has so successfully managed the Metropolitan Theatre for the last six months, took her benefit on the 7th of June, on which occasion she was supported by a house overflowing with patrons and friends. The Hunchback, in which Mrs. Sinclair took the part of Helen, with a popular ballet, completed the evening's performance, at the conclusion of which the directress addressed the audience in a very effective speech. Mrs. Sinclair took the opportunity of introducing to the public, her sister, Mrs. Lindan Voorhies, a vocalist of much merit. and not unknown to fame, who is announced to appear in a few days with a company of Italians, consisting of Mesdames Garbato and Bedei, and Signori Salvi, Cardon, Barilli, &c. The operas to be performed are Le Prophète, Ernani, Rigoletto, Louisa Miller, &c.

SOPHIE CRUVELLI AT CORK.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—Such of your readers as may be curious in cadenzas will not be angry with me for having noted down the following very original and daring examples, which Mdlle. Cruvelli introduced in the cavatina of Amina, "Come per me sereno," and in the finale on the occasion of her recent admirable performance of the Sonnambula in the fair city of Cork. They are quite at your service, if you think proper to publish them.

No. 1.

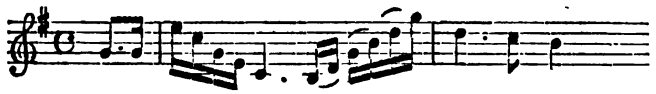
No. 3.



I paid great attention to them, and they took me some trouble to write down; but I think they are as nearly as possible what the talented prima donna sang. The first was in the "Come per me;" the second in the slow movement; and the last in the rondo of the finale. FANATICO PER LA CRUVELLI.

FLUTE FINGERINGS.

DEAR SIR.—I beg to forward you two new fingerings for E and F in altissimo for the Old Flute, which, I believe, are unknown among flautists. In No. 13. Vol. XXV. of the Musical World a new fingering is given for F in altissimo on the Böhm flute by W. A. H., who may justly claim to be the discoverer of that note on the flute. Nicholson was the first to introduce E flat in altissimo, and doubtless he discovered the fingering he used; but it is just to state that thirty five years ago my father an accomplished amateur, found out fingerings for E flat and E in altissimo, which attracted the attention of both Drouet and Nicholson, the former saying that he had never heard them, and the latter, that he should like to hear them, and I may also state that when at Milan I saw, at Ricordi's, some flute studies, in one of which, in E minor, the E was frequently introduced. I am, dear sir, faithfully yours,

"IL FLAUTO MAGICO.

FOR E.—The first fingers of the left hand and the second of the right, on; the B flat and G sharp keys, up; and the C sharp and C keys, down.

FOR F.—The first and third fingers of each hand, on; the B flat and G sharp keys, up; and the C and C sharp keys down.

FOR the convenience of our Provincial readers, we publish the following List of Book and Music Sellers of whom the Musical World may always be obtained.

MILITARY BANDS—REED AND BRASS.

C. BOOSE'S MILITARY MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—MESSRS. BOOSEY & SONS, in submitting to the Army and the Musical Public a few of the latest improvements in the above CELEBRATED MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, beg to return their sincere thanks for the patronage so liberally bestowed on their establishment; and to assure those who have not hitherto honoured them with their commands, that their undeviating principle of business is to manufacture instruments of the very best description only. By this means, Boosey and Sons trust to ensure the permanent patronage of their friends. A fair and moderate price is fixed on every Instrument. CLARIONETS.—Either of Cocoa-wood or Grenadille, with 13 German Silver Keys; of Box-wood, with 13 Brass ditto; or of German Silver, with 13 Keys of the same metal. The whole of these comprise every new improvement. FLUTES AND PICCOLOS.—In the usual keys, for Amateurs or Military purposes, either of Cocoa or Box-wood, with German Silver or Brass Keys, and every new improvement. FIFES (Boosé's Improved).—Either of Cocoa or Box-wood, with 4 German Silver or Brass Keys. BASSOONS.—The new French Model, of Maple-wood, with 16 Brass, or German Silver Keys. BOOSÉ'S UNRIVALLED CORNET-A-PISTONS.—The great success that has attended the introduction of Boosé's new patent Cornet, and the many flattering testimonials the beauty of the model and the exceeding richness of its tone have called forth, have induced the manufacturers to extend the improvements still further, and they have now the pleasure of announcing, that they have succeeded in adjusting to the same model, the Rotary Cylinder Action. By means of this beautiful and light action, the most rapid passages can be executed with marvellous quickness and dexterity. Price, with Valves, 7 Guineas, with the new Rotary Cylinder Action, 9 Guineas. Either instrument strongly Electro-plated (equal to Silver), 2 Guineas extra. CORNETTO SOPRANO, in D or E flat (for Brass Band); VALVE TRUMPETS, Althorns (Barytone), with Three Valves in B Flat, E Flat, or F. EUPHONIONS (Bass), in B Flat or C, with Four Valves. BOMBARDONS (Bass) in E Flat, or F, with Four Valves. All these Instruments can be had either with Valves or the new Rotary Cylinder Action. The Althorns are made on two models—either with Bell up or forward. The Euphonion is a new Valve Instrument, infinitely superior to, and rapidly superseding the Ophicleide. FRENCH HORNS either with Three Valves, or on an entirely new model, with the Rotary Cylinder Action. These Horns, Boosey & Sons can with confidence recommend as superior to any yet supplied to the Profession. Better cannot be made.—TROMBONES, Alto, Tenor, and Bass. In the usual Keys, either with Slides, Valves, or the new Rotary Cylinder Action. The Valve Trombone may be had either with the Bell up or forward.—THE NEW ROTARY CYLINDER ACTION. With this action, which is exceedingly light, the most rapid passage may be executed with marvellous dexterity and quickness. It is, further, more simple and much stronger than any patent actions that have hitherto been made.—VALVE, OR FIELD BUGLE, in B flat or C. By a simple contrivance, the valves of this instrument may be detached at pleasure, and placed in a small leather case, and the instrument remains an ordinary Field Bugle.—OPHICLEIDES, in B flat or C, with 10 or 11 Keys. Cavalry Trumpets, Turkish Crescents, Triangles, Military Tambourines, Drum Heads, Reeds, Music Stands, Music Paper, and every requisite for a Reed, Brass, or String Band.—DRUMS (BASS), Boosé's Improved, of Brass. The advantages in these over Wooden Drums, are, an infinitely superior tone and great durability, without any increase in weight. Boosey & Sons have received the most flattering testimonials from the many Regiments they have supplied with these Drums, both at home and abroad. Tenor and Side Drums, also of Brass.—BASS DRUM STICKS. Boosey & Sons have succeeded in manufacturing a Drum Stick of an entirely New Material, which requires no covering, and will last for TEN OR TWENTY YEARS, and thus a remedy is provided for the constant expense of re-covering Drum Sticks. The Regimental Facings, and other colours, being tastefully introduced, render this Drum Stick an exceedingly handsome appendage to the Drum.

SKETCH OF MADAME MARA.

Gertrude Elizabeth Schmaling, afterwards Madame Mara, was born at Cassel, in the year 1749. Her early childhood was exceedingly confined and wretched. Her mother had died soon after her birth. Brothers or sisters she had none. The father, a poor town musician, could not pay a nurse, and had to spend the chief part of the day away from home in giving lessons. Then he would set the weakly child upon a little arm-chair, with a cramp in front to hold it up; and so left it alone, with closed doors, to itself and its own irksomeness. The child grew ricketty; but there was nothing to be done for it.

In this way Gertrude got to be four years old. The father procured a little extra occupation in the repairing of musical instruments. One day, being called away to give a lesson, he had left lying there a violin, upon which he had been at work. The little girl, tortured with ennui, tried to reach it. She succeeded; Gertrude brought out tones; she had found a pastime. The father caught her at it; she was punished; but the enjoyment had proved too sweet, and the fiddle was taken up repeatedly. In a little while the father again surprised her; and then with astonishment he heard that she produced the tones of the scale, all purely intonated and correct. Now he gave her a little instruction, and it soon went so far that she played little duets with him. The wonder spread abroad. Many persons wished to convince themselves of its reality; so the father carried the child, who, owing to that sickness, could not walk, into the houses of the music lovers and played the duets with her. There was no mistaking the extraordinary talent; some benevolent persons took compassion on the child and offered their support; one, whose business called him to the fair at Frankfort-on-the-Main, took father and daughter with him. Here they let themselves be heard in little circles; they excited astonishment and found reward; and some kind families subscribed enough to support the father and procure better instruction for the daughter. She made most rapid progress: her health, too, was improved, so that the father, after a residence of nearly two years, resolved to travel further.

Gertrude had come to Frankfort in her sixth year; in her ninth she gave a public concert in Vienna. Here the English minister advised the father to go with her to London; and upon the ready compliance of the latter, who had heard somewhat of English guineas, he furnished him with recommendations. Gertrude was in her tenth year, when they came to London. She played in the houses to which she had been commended, exciting great attention, so that there was even talk of her at court, and she was presented to the queen. She played in the royal Chamber Concerts; her virtuosity, which, if not brilliant in itself, was striking for a child so young, attracted; but the violent exercise of her body, small even for her age, in managing her instrument, excited partly laughter, and partly pity or aversion. An artist surely she is bound to be, they said to the father; but not to remain a violin player. What then? "Does she not sing?" That she had long done, and with a pleasing voice, but without any teaching, and even without any pieces for the voice; she had sung her violin solos, as far and as well as that was practicable. But now good songs were given her; she went through with them and delivered them not only with distinguished voice, but also not without some understanding and feeling of what she was singing. Several persons of rank assisted the father, under the condition that he would let her receive thorough instruction in singing. The father took her to a celebrated Italian singing-master, Paradisi; who benefitted her decidedly by systematic development of her tones, solfeggio practice, etc. After a while certain bad habits manifested themselves in the teacher, which induced the father to take the little girl away from him; and so she was again left to herself and her own industry. Finally, the queen desired once more to hear her. But where the child had produced excitement, where its helplessness and its droll ways had made people laugh, the performances of one just entering into maidenhood simply pleased, but were received quite calmly; and so her appearance at court, as in other distinguished circles, had no great influence upon her future.

So much, not more, and scarcely that, could Gertrude recal afterwards of this chapter of her life, down to her sixteenth year. And very naturally! Travelling, fiddling, and after that, singing, was about all of life that really interested her: how could she have cared enough about anything else, to have it remain in her memory? And now that she excited no more curiosity in London, now that the guineas ceased to flow in, the father returned with her to Germany, and at once to her native city. He hoped to see her presented at court. But the landgrave would only hear Italians. The public met her with attention and with sympathy; but that could not ensure her a subsistence, especially as the seven years' war, just then concluded, had exhausted the resources of the place.

The father now turned to Hiller, at Leipsic, who had established a series of winter concerts, over which he presided as director. Gertrude's father begged him, if she went there, to help to make her known and to procure her the opportunity of being heard in public. Hiller, always reasonable and obliging, allowed both father and daughter to come, and at the Easter fair in 1766 they met. Hiller heard, examined, heard again: the remarkable talent was gladly recognized by him, nor was he slow to perceive the unpropitious situation of the daughter dependent on a father, honourable indeed, but narrow-minded and morose. He took counsel for both. First he introduced the singer before the friends of his house and of music, and then before the public at large: she met with unanimous applause. He now offered the place of singer at the concerts, with respectable advantages; took her, when she joyfully embraced the proposition, into his house, and made a suitable arrangement with the father, whereby Gertrude secured to him a portion of her income through his lifetime.

To this provision for the outward, father Hiller added a much more careful provision for her inward wants. In the first place he taught her to understand herself. "You are a singer," he began, "of excellent voice and of much capability; moreover there is manifested in your delivery, though you may scarcely know it or intend it, something of soul and character. Cling to that: by so doing you are always sure of some sort of success, so long as you are young. But what then? See here: it is in you, you have the power, to become a great singer, a true artist, if you have the will and the persistency, and will enter the right path. Once become that, and the whole world will be open to you, and furthermore the coffers of the wealthy and the high-born; and that not merely for the few years of youth. To be sure, the place where the great singer chiefly shines, the theatre is perhaps not wholly closed against you; but you will hardly ever find there your peculiar place. You are not pretty; and you have neither command nor knowledge of all the other means of producing effect upon the stage; even your figure and bearing are not in the least properly developed. Now certainly we will gladly help in all that as far as may be; but in a maiden, who is already almost seventeen, it is too late to expect anything remarkable in that line. You must become a concert and chamber singer, and, so far as depends upon yourself, you must remain such; that is to say, a singer upon whom are made, and justly made, the greatest claims, and who must execute whatever she undertakes to deliver—seeing that her audience have no other source of diversion, but observe the least minutiæ—in the most perfect manner. Now an astonishing deal is required for that, and it is a long way; but you can achieve it, and I will lead you into the way. You can do it, for you show firmness and persistency; your father says you are a stubborn creature. Be so; but turn the peculiarity to good account." Gertrude comprehended, resolved, promised, and kept the promise.

Hiller's instruction, which she enjoyed from this time forward, was not only the most simple and most natural, but also the most suited to its purpose. So far as actual singing was concerned, it was as follows: Every day without exception, early in the morning, she had to sing scales, from the full chest, through the whole compass of her tones, with perfectly pure intonation, and with all the modifications from fortissimo to pianissimo, and the reverse. By this means not only her organs, but her tones themselves were enlarged and strengthened, so that each one, from the lowest to the highest, became fully equal to every other, and each so pure, that a wavering, or unequal, or impurely intonated tone seemed an impossibility with her. Then he taught her to enunciate distinctly and euphoniously; first mere vowels and then words. In the doctrine of harmony he carried her so far, that she felt every irregularity at once, so that afterwards she could yield herself to the suggestions of the moment without fear of mistakes. By the aid of a young musician he had her carried so far in piano-playing that she could accompany herself. If Hiller studied with her any larger vocal pieces, with a view to public performance, he first explained to her the sense of the text and the music; next he insisted that she should render it all note for note, strictly as it was written; but after that, in all that concerned expression or embellishment he left her to herself, and only gave advice when he was asked. Yet after the piece had been performed in public, he did not neglect, at the little oft-times frugal supper, to point out and explain both what had succeeded excellently well, and what had not gone wholly to his mind.

All this, with Gertrude's spirit, talent, and truly astonishing industry, produced the finest results. As to her industry, she sang unurged, for five or six hours every day; and frequently in these exercises it was only a single phrase or passage, which was not left until it would go perfectly. But as for all the other branches which Hiller and his friends endeavoured te teach Gertrude—whether scientific or practical, whether for general culture or for the world—including some indispensable knowledge of some of the modern languages—there was little progress. "Do not plague me," she would say: "I want to become a singer, and nothing more. What else do I need? And should I have use for it, it will easily be found."

Thus Gertrude's residence in Leipsic, in the house of Hiller, (from 1766 to 1771), was decisive of her destiny. She had opportunity enough to hear and study many of the most excellent and most various works of art, especially in church and concert music, under her master's conductorship, and even to shine in such herself. This raised, enriched, and formed her mind, expanded and ennobled her taste. Nor did she lack opportunities to become acquainted with foreign virtuosi, and, of those of her own country, especially with an amiable and extremely graceful rival, Corona Schröter;—nor of gratifying an odd enough caprice of her own, of entering into composition with excellent instrumental players: this stimulated to new efforts and increased her skill. It was especially the works of Hasse, Graun, Benda, Jomelli, and Pergolese, with which she here made herself acquainted, and in which she appeared; but Durante, too, and Sacchini, Porpora, Caldara and others, were no strangers to her. For Pergolese, on account of his tendency to sentimentality, for which the capacity was not yet developed in her, or perhaps did not exist in her, she had no partiality; like Hiller himself, she was most fond of Hasse. And this perhaps because Hasse—not to mention his well-known excellencies as an artist—sketched his arias, duets, etc., with a noble breadth, yet very simply, and with a still simpler accompaniment, so that to a clever singer there was a broad, free field left open to her own mode of treatment. This was favourable to Gertrude, since the spirit of original invention had begun to develop itself most strikingly in her under her master's guidance. Thus she has been heard to sing some of Hasse's principal airs, over and over, six or eight times publicly, and hence,—since these airs, after the custom of the time, consisted of two main divisions, of which the first was always repeated,—she sang these first divisions twelve or sixteen times; and yet never did she deviate in her embellishments from the expression and style of the piece;—and no wonder, with Hiller for a master! for such a liberty would have made the old man almost jump out of his skin.

In this way Gertrude, and in this way all great singers, formed their lofty school; and so they left the school to share the respect and attention of the world. If we dwell awhile in this contemplation of the past and compare the present with it, we can hardly help remarking, that singing then was really an art, but now (with scarcely a few exceptions) a means of astonishing; then the public sought an inward satisfaction in it, now it seeks only to be stimulated and amused.

In the manner just now indicated Gertrude rendered lofty and animated pieces; those of a gentler and more inward feeling at that time she sang less willingly and less well. These were the domain of the deep-souled, graceful Corona. To do that, she required, besides the qualities already mentioned, also the most transcendant organ and the greatest flexibility of voice. The first she had; the second she made her own. Organs like hers are among the rarest gifts of fate, and in our days we have only known the like thereof, although in a far smaller compass of tones, in Madame Catalani. Without being sharp or screaming in the least degree, Gertrude's voice was so powerful and full-toned, that one could distinguish it in the midst of the strongest chorus, with drums and trumpets accompanying. From this degree of strength she could diminish through all gradations to a tone so soft and yet so clear, that in passages for instance with an obbligato instrument, the player scarcely knew whence to procure a tone that should be distinguishable, and yet not drown hers. And this control she exercised over the wide regions of tones (to use the technical language of musicians), from G unmarked to the thrice-marked E.

To acquire that flexibility and fluency, she set to work now with her characteristic "stubbornness." Whatever difficulties she could conceive of, she practised all alone incessantly, till breast and throat could give the sounds out with the greatest certainty and ease, as if it were mere recreation; and what she could not herself conceive of, she would remark in the concert and other solos of the best instrumentalists, whom Leipsic then possessed; especially the flautist, Tromlitz, and the violinists, Göpfert and Berger. Thus have these three worthy men, by their prompt, neat, and elegant play, without their knowing or intending it, had a great influence in the developing of the singer into the virtuoso; for whatever cantabile passage came out finely on their instruments, Gertrude would imitate it in her singing, till she succeeded to the finest point.

SCARBOROUGH.—On Monday last, Mr. Henry Beverley, the stage-manager, took his annual benefit. The performances consisted of Time tries All, Nicholas Flam, Attorney-at-Law, and Victorine, the Orphan of Paris; or, I'll sleep upon it. The principal characters were exceedingly well sustained. Mrs. George Herbert, from the York and Hull circuits, made her first appearance at Scarborough, and was most favourably received.

SKETCH OF FARINELLI.

This renowned singer, whose voice and abilities surpassed the limits of all anterior vocal excellence, was born at Naples in 1705. He was instructed in the rudiments of music by his father, and in singing by Porpora. In 1722, at the age of seventeen, he went from Naples to Rome, with his master, then engaged to compose for the Alberti Theatre, where Farinelli contended with a famous performer on the trumpet. Every night, during the run of an opera, this struggle was repeated, which at first seemed amicable and sportive, until the audience began to interest themselves in the contest. After severally swelling out a note, in which each manifested the power of his lungs, and tried to rival the other in brilliancy and force, they had both a swell and a shake together, by thirds, which was continued so long, while the audience eagerly waited the event, that both seemed to be exhausted; and, in fact, the trumpeter, wholly spent, gave it up, supposing, however, his antagonist as much tired as himself, and that it would be a drawn battle; when Farinelli, with a smile on his countenance, showing he had only been sporting with him all this time, broke out, all at once, in the same breath, with fresh vigour, and not only swelled and shook upon the note, but ran the most rapid and difficult divisions, and was at last silenced only by the acclamations of the enraptured audience.

From this period of his life may be dated that superiority which he ever maintained over all his contemporaries. In the early part of his life, he was distinguished by the name of "Il Ragazzo" (the boy), as Homer was called "the Poet," and Swift "the Dean."

From Rome, Farinelli went to Bologna, where he had the advantage of hearing Bernacchi, a scholar of the famous Pistocchi, of that city, who was then the most scientific singer in Italy. Thence he went to Venice, and from Venice to Vienna; in both which cities his powers were considered as miraculous. Farinelli himself told Dr. Burney, that at Vienna, where he received great honours from the Emperor Charles VI. (and admonition from the Prince was of more service to him than all the precepts of his masters or the examples of his competitors), his Imperial Majesty condescended one day to tell him, with great mildness and affability, that in his singing he neither moved nor stood still like any other mortal; all was supernatural. "Those gigantic strides," said he, "those never-ending notes and passages (ces notes qui ne finissent jamais), only surprise, and it is now time for you to please. You are too lavish of the gifts with which nature has endowed you: if you wish to reach the heart, you must take a more plain and simple road."

These judicious remarks effected an entire change in his manner of singing; from this time he united pathos to spirit, simplicity was the sublime, and by these means delighted as well as astonished every hearer.

In the year 1734, he went to England, where the effects which his surprising talents had upon the audience were ecstasy! enchantment! In the famous air, "Son qual nave," which was composed for him by his brother, the first note he sang was taken with such delicacy, swelled by minute degrees to such an amazing volume, and afterwards diminished in the same manner to a mere point, that it was applauded for full five minutes. After this, he set off with such brilliancy and rapidity of execution, that it was difficult for the violins of those days to keep pace with him.

But it was not in speed only that he excelled, for he united the perfections of every celebrated singer. His voice was equally eminent for strength, sweetness, and compass; and his style equally excellent in the expression of tenderness, grace, and rapidity. In a word, he possessed such powers as were never before or since united in any one singer, powers that were irresistible, and which subdued every hearer, the learned and the ignorant, the friend and the foe.

With these talents, he went to Spain in the year 1737, intending to return to England, having entered into articles with the nobility, who had at that time the management of the opera, to perform during the ensuing season. In his way thither, he sang to the king of France, at Paris, where, according to Riccoboni he enchanted even the French themselves, who universally abhorred Italian music.

The very first day he performed before the queen of Spain, it was determined he should be taken into the service of the court, to which he was ever after wholly appropriated, not being once permitted to sing in public. A pension was then settled upon him for life, amounting to upwards of two thousand pounds sterling.

He told Dr. Burney, that, for the first ten years of his residence at the court of Spain during the reign of Philip V., he sang to that monarch, every night, the same four airs, two of which were "Pallido il sole," and "Per questo dolce Amplesso," both composed by Hasse. He was honoured also by his first royal master, Philip V., with the order of St. Jago, and by his successor, Ferdinand VI., under whom also he continued in favour, with that of Calatrava, in 1750. His duty now became less constant and fatiguing, as he persuaded this prince to patronise operas; which were a great relief to Farinelli, who was appointed sole director of these performances, and engaged the best Italian singers and composers, as also Metastatio as poet.

The goodness of Farinelli's heart, and the natural sweetness of his disposition, were not exceeded even by the unrivalled excellence of his vocal powers, as some of the following anecdotes will testify.

It has been often related, and generally believed, that Philip V., king of Spain, being seized with a total dejection of spirits, absolutely refused to be shaved, and was, in other respects, incapable of transacting the affairs of the state. The queen, who had in vain tried every common expedient that was likely to contribute to his recovery, determined that an experiment should be made of the effects of music upon the king, her husband, who was extremely sensible of its charms. Upon the arrival of Farinelli, of whose extraordinary performance an account had been transmitted to Madrid, her Majesty contrived that there should be a concert in the room adjoining the king's apartment, in which this singer executed one of his most captivating songs. Philip at first appeared surprised, then affected, and, at the conclusion of the second air, commanded the attendance of Farinelli. On his entering the royal apartment, the enraptured monarch overwhelmed him with compliments and caresses, demanding how he could sufficiently reward such talents, and declaring that he could refuse him nothing. Farinelli, previously instructed, only entreated that his Majesty would permit his attendants to shave and dress him, and that he would endeavour to appear in council as usual. From this moment the king's disease submitted to medicine, and the singer had the whole honour of the cure. By singing to his Majesty every evening, his favour increased to such a degree, that he was regarded as a prime minister; but what was still more extraordinary, and most highly indicative of a superior mind, Farinelli, never forgetting that he was only a musician, behaved to the Spanish nobles attendant upon the court with such unaffected humility and propriety, that instead of envying his good fortune, they honoured him with their esteem and confidence.

The true nobility of this extraordinary person's soul appears still more forcibly in the following rare instance of magnanimity. Going one day to the king's closet, to which he had at all times access, he heard an officer of the guard curse him, and say to another, "Honours can be heaped on such scoundrels as these, while a poor soldier, like myself, after thirty years' service, is unnoticed." Farinelli, without seeming to hear this reproach, complained to the king that he had neglected an old servant, and actually procured a regiment for the person who had spoken so harshly of him in the antechamber; and on quitting his majesty, he gave the commission to the officer, telling him he had heard him complain of having served thirty years, but added, "You did wrong to accuse the king of neglecting to reward your services." The following story, of a more ludicrous cast, was frequently told and believed at Madrid, during the first year of Farinelli's residence in Spain. This singer, having ordered a superb suit of clothes for a gala at court, when the tailor brought them home, he asked for his bill. "I have made no bill, sir," said the tailor, "nor never shall make one. Instead of money, I have a favour to beg. I know that what I want is inestimable, and only fit for monarchs; but since I have the honour to work for a person of whom every one speaks with rapture, all the payment I shall ever require, will be a song." Farinelli tried in vain to persuade the tailor to take his money. At length, after a long debate, giving way to the earnest entreaties of the humble tradesman, and perhaps more highly gratified by the singularity of the adventure than by all the applause which he had hitherto received, he took him into his music room, and sang to him some of his most brilliant airs, delighted with the astonishment of his ravished hearer; and the more he seemed surprised and affected, the more Farinelli exerted himself in every species of excellence. When he had concluded, the tailor, overcome with ecstasy, thanked him in the most rapturous and grateful manner, and prepared to retire. "No," said Farinelli, "I am a little proud, and it is perhaps from that circumstance, that I have acquired some little degree of superiority over other singers. I have given way to your weakness; it is but fair that, you in your turn, shauld give way to mine." Then taking out his purse, he insisted on his receiving a sum, amounting to nearly double the worth of the suit of clothes.

Farinelli, during two reigns, resided upwards of twenty years at the Spanish court, with a continual increase of royal favour, and the esteem of the principal nobility of the kingdom.

During his greatest favour at the court of Madrid, he is said to have been no more elated than with the acclamations which his extraordinary talents commanded whenever he sang in public. In the year 1759, Farinelli returned to Italy. After visiting Naples, the place of his nativity, he settled at Bologna in 1761, in the environs of which city he built himself a splendid mansion, which in Italy is called a palazzo. Here he resided for the remainder of his life, in the true enjoyment of affluent leisure. He was remarkably civil and attentive to the English nobility and gentry who visited him in his retreat, and appeared to remember the protection and favour of individuals more than the neglect of the public, during the last year of his residence in London. When the Marquis of Caermarthen honoured him with a visit at Bologna, upon being told that he was the son of his patron and friend, the Duke of Leeds, he threw his arms round his neck, and shed tears of joy in embracing him. This extraordinary musician, and blameless man, died in 1782, in the seventy-eighth year of his age.

ANECDOTES OF GLUCK.—J. J. Rousseau's admiration for the genius of Gluck, as soon as he became acquainted with his works, is well known. All Paris observed him frequenting the theatre at every representation of Gluck's Orpheus, although for some time previously he had absented himself from such entertainments. To one person he said on this subject, that Gluck had come to France to give the lie to a proposition which he had formerly defended, namely, that good music could never be set to French words. At another time he observed, that all the world blamed Gluck's want of melody; for himself, he thought it issued from all his pores. Gluck was one day playing on his piano the part in Iphigenia in Tauris, where Orestes, left alone in prison, after having experienced his accustomed agitation, throws himself on a bench, saying, Le calme rentre dans mon cœur. Some persons present thought they observed a contradiction in the bass, which prolonged the preceding agitation, after Orestes had declared that his heart was calm: they mentioned this to Gluck, adding, "but Orestes is calm, he says so." —"He lies," exclaimed Gluck, "he mistakes animal exhaustion for calmness of heart; the fury is always here (striking his breast): has he not killed his mother!" On the day appointed for the first representation of his Iphigenia in Aulis at Paris, Gluck was informed that the principal singer had been suddenly taken ill, but that another would perform his part that evening. Gluck, who suspected cabal, immediately replied, "No; the performance must be postponed." That was declared impossible, the piece having been already advertised and announced to the royal family, under which circumstances there was no precedent of a postponement. "I will sooner," replied Gluck, "throw the piece into the fire, than submit to its being murdered in the way proposed." The performances had to be altered.

PROVINCIAL.

MANCHESTER.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Beethoven's Fidelio—the third opera given by the company at our Theatre Royal—was produced with great success on Wednesday evening in last week. The audience was much more numerous than on either of the first two nights, the pit being well filled, and the other parts of the house better attended. We still have to regret the shortcomings in the dress circle, which ought to have been filled, or nearly so, every night, as on the support of the upper classes greatly depends the success of the establishment of a regular opera season in Manchester. Let us hope that the representations, se excellent in many respects, given of some of the operas, will induce those who can best afford to do so, eventually to come forward more numerously than they have done.

It is indeed cheering to observe the growing taste for really good music evinced by the middle and lower orders of society here, as demonstrated by the fact, that, of the seven performances given by the Italian company from Covent Garden some five or six weeks ago, Fidelio drew by far the largest audience; and of the present series of performances by the Royal Opera troupe, Fidelio has been by far the best attended.

Of the performance of Beethoven's only opera on this occasion, I can speak in very high terms. Madame Caradori and Herr Reichardt, as the heroic devoted wife, and the afflicted noble husband, were both unexceptionably good; and Formes, as the kind-hearted old jailer, was hearty and earnest as ever. If I might be allowed to hint a fault in so masterly a performance, it was a tendency to loudness in his singing in the digging duet with Fidelio, whereby Madame Caradori's voice, though sufficiently strong, was scarcely heard—a mistake we should have scarcely expected from the great basso. M. Charles Hallé was the conductor, and the overture went so well under his batôn as to be unanimously encored. Mdlle. Sedlatzek acquitted herself very well as Marcellina, as did Herr Tapf as Jacquino. Herr Formes was encored in his "Gold" song. The canon quartet was well and carefully given by all four, and Madame Caradori was loudly applauded for her delivery of the grand scena "Abscheulicher." The only real failure of the night was the Pizarro, a part too often allotted to a singer inadequate to its performance. It was assigned to Herr Hubert Formes, brother of the renowned basso, of whom no mean expectations were formed. He is, however, entirely unfitted for the part, either in figure or voice—to say nothing of his want of talent and experience as an actor. I felt sorry for the elder Formes, when hisses were too audibly and generally heard after the close of their duet. In the tremendous vengeance song, the voice of Hubert Formes was not heard at all through the orchestra. He is evidently a young man, and may possess qualifications to pursue the career of an artist, but it is equally evident that it was very premature to put him in such a part as Pizarro. M. Zelger or Signor Fortini ought to have sustained it. The prisoners' chorus, which is often so unfortunate, was more carefully given, and with better effect than usual. Still the first act almost invariably closes flatly—why should it be so?

The second act went well from beginning to end. I have rarely heard the prisoners' dream of hope, and the superb trio, where Fidelio gives the bread to Florestan, sung with more effect. The exquisite scene when the wife and the restored husband break out in their impassioned and loving duet created a real excitement in the audience, who tumultously encored it. After the duet Mad. Caradori and Herr Reichardt were recalled. The whole house fairly cheered them. The great and unrivalled finale went famously. The principals in the soli sestet bits were all up to the mark, but the chorus was now and then a little unsteady. M. Chas. Hallé did not seem to have them quite under his command as one could have wished. The finale, nevertheless, was received with thunders of applause, and the audience would fain have had it all repeated, but in place of a repetition the six principals appeared before the curtain. I Puritani, Norma, and La Sonnambula were the operas which followed Fidelio last week, with but moderate houses. This week Der Freischütz has proved rather more attractive. Last night the upper circle was better filled than it has yet been since the opera season commenced.

Of Herr Formes's Caspar, and Madame Caradori's Agatha, I have before spoken. It is unnecessary to speak of them again—one was as great as ever, the other as good. Herr Reichardt, I was sorry to find, was unwell; his loss was seriously felt in Weber's opera. Signor Gregorio had to appear before the curtain to bespeak the indulgence of the audience for him, and he had to omit both the arias allotted to Max. Mdlle. Rudersdorff made a successful debut as Annchen. All her songs were liberally applauded. Mdlle. Rudersdorff acquitted herself especially well in the duet, "Schelno, halt fest," and in the trio, "Wie? was? entsetzen." Herr Hubert Formes was far from being at home in the small part of Prince Ottocar, although it was more successful than Pizarro. The choruses were excellently sung, and the opera well put on the stage. The band was again in capital order under the bâton of M. Charles Hallé. The overture was encored both on Monday and Tuesday night. Allow me to make particular mention of the clarionet playing of Herr Grosse, and the tenor obbligato accompaniment to Annchen's song, by Mr. Baetens.

Lucia di Lammermoor is the next opera to be produced, and Mozart's Il Seraglio is in rehearsal.

We are informed by the Manchester Courier of October the 7th, that the members of the Manchester and Salford Harmonic Society have recently made arrangements for bringing out Händel's oratorio Judas Maccabæus, with a chorus of sixty voices, and Mrs. Sunderland, Mrs. Winterbottom, Mr. Perring, and Mr. Delavanti, as principal singers—Mr. H. Walter, as conductor, presiding at the organ.—The same paper also states that a society has been organised at Manchester, under the name of the Manchester Glee and Choral Society, by the professional singers, to the number of seventy or eighty. They have already had several rehearsals. We observe that Mr. Loder is the conductor, and under his able guidance we have no doubt as to the efficiency of the proposed performances.—The first concert of the Gentlemen's Glee Club, the twenty-fifth session, took place at Hayward's Hotel, Bridge-street, on Thursday last. Mr. Barlow was at his old post, as conductor. The selection consisted of "The chough and crow," by Bishop, a glee by Mr. T. Cooke, and another by Webbe, the first part concluding with Cherubini's beautiful round, "Lo, morn is breaking." In the second part, two pieces were encored, the first being Beale's popular madrigal, "Come, let us join the roundelay," and Webbe's "Discord, dire sister." Several songs were also sung after supper, by Messrs. Perring and Delavanti.—The following extract is from the Manchester Examiner and Times:

"Iron Theatre for the Town of Melbourne.—We have seen the theatre built of iron by Messrs. E. T. Bellhouse and Co., of Granby Row, for Mr. Coppin, the Australian manager, who is going to leave this country on the 15th inst., and will carry his theatre with him in the ship Melbourne, from London. This structure, of which some account has already been published, has an area of 3,200 square feet, being 80 feet long by 40 feet wide. It will be sunk in the ground about six feet deep, and its height externally, up to the eaves, will be sixteen feet above the ground, the roof rising six feet above the eaves, so that, internally, there is an elevation of twenty-eight feet in the centre of the roof. The stage is twenty-four feet wide by thirty feet deep, and all the remainder of the floor, excepting a space of four feet allowed for passage all round, constitutes the pit. There is a gallery, or rather a tier of boxes, twenty-four feet deep, at the end opposite the stage, and a gallery eight feet deep along each of the sides, so that the conventional form of a theatre, the semicircle, is not preserved in this instance, but the arrangement exactly resembles that of the galleries of a chapel, the "dress-boxes" occupying the place usually assigned to the organ loft, and confronting the stage as the organ generally confronts the pulpit. There are three windows above each of the side galleries, and ventilators in the roof. A detached front stands outside the building, eight feet advanced before the real front; the intervening space will be available, partly as a saloon for refreshments, and partly as a box-office. The front is open and glazed, like a shop front, and surmounted with cast-iron ornaments, the royal arms, and a tablet bearing the inscription, 'Coppin's Theatre.' There are two doors in front, one to the pit, and the other to the boxes and galleries. Everything is very strong but very light, the weight of the whole building not being more than thirty or forty tons. The material, being galvanised iron, will not require to be painted; wherever wooden beams are introduced, they are strengthened by iron trusses, three-quarters of an inch thick. The principals of the roof are composed of T iron, with the rods of flat iron. We believe it does not rain so often at Melbourne as it does here, but when it does come down, it falls very heavily, and it will be carried off the roof of the theatre by cast-iron ornamental gutters, and thence discharged through hollow pilasters."

Margate.—The theatrical season has now come to a close, the entertainments during the last week having been for the benefit of the various actors. On Monday there was a juvenile night for the benefit of Miss H. Saville, whose dancing during the season has been greatly admired. On Wednesday Mr. Byefield took his benefit, and the house was well attended. On Friday last, the season, which we fear has not been a very profitable one to Mr. Saville, came to a close with his benefit. The house was crowded. This company is the best that has performed here for many years. The directress, Mrs. Saville, has been indefatigable in her endeavours to please.

Scarborough. Oct. 12.—(From a Correspondent.)—The Collins Family are giving concerts at the Town-Hall, with moderate success. The season is nearly over, and the concerts in the Spa Saloon will terminate next week. These concerts have been under the management of Mr. J. Bentinck Wilson, "first-class man at the Royal Academy of Music," in place of Mr. R. W. Kohler, who originated the concerts, and had for six years conducted them with considerable ability, and to the universal satisfaction of the visitors of Scarborough. Mr. Wilson's band consists of sixteen good performers, but, nevertheless, the concerts have been most uninteresting. There have been some attempts at classical music, which, from being carelessly played, has not been worth listening to; and is inappropriate in the Saloon concerts. The lighter music has been equally ineffective. No pains have been taken to render the saloon performances attractive to the crowds of ladies and gentlemen who are too much occupied in mutual admiration to give any attention to badly-played symphonies or worn-out old waltzes. M. Kohler understood his audience better, and being a master of instrumentation, and a disciple of M. Jullien, he knew how to invent many little devices to give piquancy and effect to waltzes and overtures. His band was always surrounded by a galaxy of listening ladies and gentlemen. It is therefore inexplicable why Mr. J. B. Wilson, who understands no instrument but the piano (and promenades among the visitors with a white hat and gloves while his band is playing), should be substituted for M. Kohler, who is a capital performer on several instruments, and was always at his post leading or conducting his band.

York.—The York Institute.—The winter session of 1854-55 of this institution was opened on Tuesday evening last, by a concert of vocal and instrumental music. The entertainment was of an excellent character, and was listened to with evident satisfaction, by a crowded auditory—in fact, the room was crammed to excess, and many parties were obliged to go away, being unable to obtain admission. The various songs, glees, and instrumental pieces which were given in the course of the evening, reflected credit on all who took part in their execution. Mr. Kohler, the well-known and talented musician, being in York, volunteered his professional services on the occasion; the other instrumental performers were Mr. Shaw (who presided at the pianoforte), Mr. T. Smith, Mr. Hunt, Mr. Arundel, Mr. Groves, and Mr. Mackereth. The vocalists were Messrs. Nightingale, Bell, Coultas, Jennings, and Todd. The programme was well selected.

Bristol and Bath.—On Saturday, Mr. Melville made his first appearance for the season, having been engaged in the room of Mr. Walter Shelley. He was received with loud and long-continued plaudits, and is evidently a great favourite with the majority of those who frequent the theatre. The character he appeared in was Rolla in Pizarro, perhaps one of the best which he could have chosen; and Mr. Melville acted with his accustomed talent. Mr. Silver's Pizarro and Mr. Sinclair's Alonzo are also well worthy of commendation. The manager has made a great accession to his resources by the engagement of Miss Featherstone, of the Haymarket Theatre, who first appeared on Wednesday as Apollo in Midas. She sang with her usual effect, not merely the music of the piece, but the famous contralto aria from Lucrezia Borgia, "Il Segreto," in which she was enthusiastically encored twice. The effect of these new engagements was evident in the greatly-increased attendance on Saturday evening.—On Monday, at the Assembly Rooms, Mr. Mark, a German professor of music, gave two concerts, having for their object to illustrate his system of teaching. The orchestra was filled with an assemblage of juveniles, apparently from twelve to sixteen years of age, Mr. Mark leading and directing. These small musicians played several concerted pieces, and some solos, with an accuracy and spirit which are quite surprising. Of course, it would be absurd to measure the performances of these youths by the usual standard of criticism. Mr. Mark's object has been to demonstrate the practicability of teaching music to the mass of the juvenile population, as a means of elevating and refining the people of this country. He is not desirous of making professors of the art. And, with the demonstration of Monday before us, we certainly think that he has shown cause why his efforts should be applauded and his views promoted. Judging from the remarks on his system of tuition, offered by Mr. Mark to the audience, we should say, that it appears to be founded on correct and natural principles. At all events, no one can fail to applaud his efforts, which have for their object the creation of a generally-diffused love for and practice of that most elevating and charming science of which he is a professor.

LINCOLN.—A concert was given in the Corn Exchange, on Tuesday week, under the auspices of Mr. C. F. Willey, professor of music of this town, and Mr. Buck, of Boston, for which they engaged Mr. and Mrs. Sims Reeves, Mr. Farquharson, Mr. Sharp, and Mr. Clementi. The concert was attended by all the principal families in the town and neighbourhood. The programme commenced with Pauers' pianoforte solo, "La Cascade," played by Mr. Sharp. The duet "My sufferings and sorrow," from the Bride of Lammermoor, introduced Mrs. Sims Reeves and Mr. Farquharson, and the scena "All is lost," from Sonnambula, brought forward Mr. Sims Reeves, who sang magnificently, and at once impressed on the minds of the audience his title to that renown which he so justly enjoys. Mrs. Sims Reeves in the Scotch ballad "There's nae luck," gave unbounded satisfaction and received great applause, and an encore being demanded, she gave the old Scotch song, "Within a mile o' Edinboro'." The gem of the evening, however, was Mr. Frank Mori's new song, "England and Victory," sung by Mr. Sims Reeves. The last notes of the first verse had not had time to die away before it was received with such uproarious applause that it was some short time before Mr. Reeves could proceed with the next verse. When the song was finished, nothing could exceed the enthusiastic delight of the audience, thunders of applause rapidly following each other. The immense number of people rose en masse, and Mr. Reeves had to repeat the song amid a hurricane of applause.

FOREIGN.

PARIS.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Mad. Stolz has taken her leave of the Grand Opéra for a short time and set out for London. Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli was to have made her rentrée as Alice in Robert le Diable. Owing to a slight indisposition, however, she was prevented from doing so, and appeared, for the first time this season, two days later, as Valentine in Les Huguenots. Her reception was enthusiastic, and, both by her singing and acting, she richly merited all the applause lavished upon her. The part of the Queen was sung by Mad. Charles Ponchard, who undertook it at a very short notice.—There is some talk of an arrangement by which Mad. Bosio, of the Théâtre-Italien, will be enabled to sing at the Grand Opéra three times a week.—M. Gounod's opera, La Nonne Sanglante, will be produced very shortly.—Mad. Rosati, who is still too ill to resume her professional duties, has signed a fresh engagement, which is said to be much more advantageous than her previous one.

At the Théâtre-Italien, Il Barbiere di Seviglia is announced for the début of Mad. Gassier. M. Gassier will sing the part of Figaro, and Sig. Luchesi that of Count Almaviva.

M. Ernest Boulanger's pleasing opera, Les Sabots de la Marquise, continues to attract the public to the Opéra-Comique. Le Pré-aux-Clercs still maintains its place in the bills.—L'Étoile du Nord will shortly be revived.—The rehearsals of Miss Fauvette, the new opera by MM. Victor Massé and Michel Carré, have been suspended, and it is not known when they will be resumed.

The first representation of Le Billet de Marguérite, by M. Gevaërt, will, in all probability, have taken place, at the Théâtre-Lyrique, before you receive this letter.

A kind of proverbe, entitled La Maîtresse du Mari, by MM. Duflot and Desarbres, has been produced with success at the Vaudeville. The two principal parts, and there are only three altogether, were well sustained by M. Brindeau and Mdlle. Saint-Marc.

There have been two novelties, this week, at the Variétés, Une Sangsue, by MM. Villeneuve and Langlé, and La Maison Geindoré.

M. Ravel has made a hit, at the Palais-Royal, in a trifle, by M. T. Barrière, entitled Les Bâtons dans les Roues.

The management of the Porte-Saint-Martin announces the revival of the celebrated drama of La Chambre Ardente, for the rentrée of Mdlle. George, in the character of Mad. de Brinvilliers.

A new drama, by M. Ferdinand Dugué, called Les Amours Maudits, is in rehearsal at the Ambigu-Comique, and will shortly be produced. M. Meyerbeer has returned to Paris. The two sisters, Mademoiselles Sophia and Isabella Dulcken are also stopping here for the present. They will again proceed to Germany in about a week. They will first proceed to the Palatinate, and thence to Vienna, returning to Paris in time for the end of the concert season.—The forty Chanteurs Montagnards Français, of the Conservatory of Bagnères, had the honour of singing, last week, before the Emperor and Empress, who complimented their director, M. A. Roland, very highly on their performance. Their Majesties likewise made a very handsome present to the funds of the charitable institution to which these artists are attached.

BERLIN.—(From our own Correspondent).—Mdlle. Johanna Wagner has appeared at the Royal Opera House as Romeo in I Montecchi e Capuletti, and as Lucrezia Borgia in the opera of the same name. She was ably supported by Mad. Herrenburg-Tuczek, Herren Pfister, and Saloman. The performance of the Messiah, in the Garnisonkirche, last week, under the direction of Herr Grell, was admirable. Full justice was rendered to the immortal chef-d'œuvre. The soprano solos were sung by Mesdemoiselles von Borcke and Geisler, Herr Küster presiding at the organ. A matinée musicale has been given in the Englisches Haus, for the purpose of introducing a young bassist, Herr Hahnemann, to the public. This gentleman sang the grand bass aria from Haydn's Creation, and several Lieder, besides taking part in one or two duets. He promises well, although he has yet much to learn. The brothers Lotze and Herr Radeke played Beethoven's trio in G major in a masterly manner, after which the last-named gentleman performed a very difficult Scherzo of Chopin most efficiently. The members of the Singacademie have given a performance of Radziwill's music to Faust. The choruses were especially good. The proceeds of the concert, which were considerable, were devoted to the benefit of the late sufferers by the flood in Silesia. Mad. Köster has returned from her congé, and resumed her professional duties at the opera-house.

MUNICH.—Madmoiselle Rettich, of the Royal Opera-house, died of cholera on the 14th of September. She had been a member of the establishment for thirteen years, and was aged 37 at the time of her decease. Madlle. Schwarsbach returned from Hanover on the 24th of September.

ST. PETERSBURGH.—It is reported that the Italian opera will be opened as usual, in spite of the war. Signor Tamberlik, Mesdames Lagrange and Tedesco are engaged.

MILAN.—(From our own Correspondent.)—At the Canobbiana, Lucia di Lammermoor, sustained by Signora Almonti, the tenor Armandi, and the barytone Della Santa, has had but a cold reception. The public was in one of its severest moods, which rendered the artists almost incapable of doing justice to themselves, yet each one obtained occasional applause. The young danzatrice, Signora Caterina Beretta, has made her début, and created quite a furore in a divertissement composed by her preceptor, Sig. Hus. On the 3rd. inst., the ballet Djema of Sig. Rota was reproduced, and had the same brilliant reception which it obtained last spring in the same theatre.

This evening, Oct. 7, we have had Il Barbiere di Seviglia; La Signora Viola, in the part of Rosina, was much applauded; she possesses a mezzo-soprano voice, not very powerful, and apparently rather fatigued; in the second act, she introduced the rondo from Cenerentola, "Non più mesta," executed with taste, and for which she obtained a recal. The tenor Carrion, being an old favourite, was warmly received; the superiority of the style of this popular artist is too well known to need much comment; the artistic manner in which he executed the florid passages obtained him much applause, but we regret to observe that the exertion consequent upon the brilliant reputation which he has been making during the last two years in Italy, is producing its effects upon his voice. The Signor Luigi Della-Santa (Figaro), the buffo Zucchini (Don Bartolo), and the basso profondo Segri (Don Basilio) were deservedly applauded, and contributed much to the satisfactory manner in which the opera was executed. The names of the artists engaged for the grand opening of the Scala in December have been published. The following are the principal artists d'obligo (those engaged by the direction): Signora Augusta Albertini, and the Signori Raffaele Mirate (tenor), Gaetano Ferri (barytone), Guiseppe Echeveria (basso profondo); other prime donne assolute, Signore Giulia Sanchioli, Maria de Gianni Vives, and Elisa Hensley; contralto, Signora Giuseppina Bregazzi; primo tenore, Giuseppe Sinico; primi baritoni, Luigi Valli and Domenico Mattioli; basso profondo, Lauro Benedetto; primo basso comico, Rafaele Scalese; other basso comico, Demi Stanislao; maestri composers, Signor Francesco Chiaromonte and Emanuele Muzio. The chorus will consist of one hundred including the students of the school established a few months ago by the directors of the I. R. Theatres for the purpose of teaching and training chorus singers. The orchestra will be composed of ninety-four performers, directed by Signor Cavallini. Ten operas are promised; there will also be a numerous ballet company, including the Signore Olimpia Priora and Rosina Scotti, and the Signori Gustavo Carey and Alberto Mochon, with two coreografi, the Signori Egidio Priora and Giovanni Casati. The first ballet will be Olema la Schiava of Signor Priora, the second, La Figlie della Guerra, of Signor Casati; two others are also promised, one of which will be La Tempestà.

IBID—Mr. Charles Braham leaves Milan on the first of November for Bari, where he is engaged for the Carnival, at the opening the new grand theatre there. Mr. Charles Braham's first opera will be Verdi's Rigoletto, the second, the same composer's I Due Foscari, and the third, an opera written expressly for the Theatre Bari, by Maestro De Giosa, who is a native of that town. A fourth opera for the English tenor is spoken of, but not yet determined. The opening of a new theatre is always inaugurated by artisti di cartello—a high compliment to Mr. Charles Braham.

LUGO.—I Puritani has been given for the second opera of the season. Elvira, Signora Cecilia Cremont; Arturo, Signor Cecchi; Riccardo, Signor Delle-Sédie; Georgio, Signor Biacchi. The execution was satisfactory, and the artists obtained several recals.

VENICE.—At the Teatro Apollo, Verdi's Trovatore has had most brilliant success. Leonora, Signora Orecchia; Adzucena, Signora Corvetti; Maurico, Signor Liverani; Il Conte, Signor Mazzanti; and the basso profondo, Signor Latry.

TURIN.—At the Teatro Carignano, Saffo of Pacini has pleased immensely, sustained by the prima donna Signora Katinka Evers, the contralto Signora Ghedini, the tenore Pasi, and barytone Olivari. Sig. Pasi was somewhat indisposed, yet, notwithstanding, his sympathetic voice was appreciated.

VARESE.—I Lombardi of Verdi has been produced, with good effect for the artists, interpreted by the Signora Vigliardi, and the Signori Devoti and Bartolucci.

LECCO.—The season of the fair has been opened with Linda di Chamounix. The execution was satisfactory, sustained by the prima donna Signora Rebussini, the contralto Signora Ajroldi, the tenore Mora, the buffo Rocca, the barytone Ferrario, and the basso Mirandola.

FLORENCE.—At the Teatro Pergola, Poliuto has been a semi-fiasco, executed by the prima donna Signora Cortesi (who it is reported was indisposed), and the Signori Fraschini and Beraldi.—At the Teatro Pagliano, Verdi's Trovatore has been received with enthusiasm, especially the fourth act, sang by the Signore Alajmo and Abbadia; and the Signori Landi, Morelli, and the basso Domenechi.

NAPLES.—The artists engaged for the forthcoming season at the Theatre San Carlo have arrived. Madame Medori and Madame Massimiliani will appear in Norma, the second taking the part of Adalgisa. Signor Nandin and Colletti will make their début in I Lombardi. The début of Madame Goggi will take place either in the part of Arsace in Rossini's Semiramide, or in that of Azucena in Verdi's Trovatore. Our news is dated the 1st of October, and the opening day was fixed for the 4th instant. The artists engaged for the opera at Trieste are Signore Salvini, Vives, and Sistinus; Signori Mirate, Ferri, Remorini, Benedetti, Della-Costa, Cerapia, and Fortunato. The principal operas will be Il Trovatore, Marco-Visconti, D. Sebastiano, and Il Principe Pittore, the latter by Balfe.

LUBECK.—The great organ in the St. Marienkirche, built by Schutze and Son, is now completed, and was inaugurated on the 3rd of September. The church was illuminated on the occasion, and Herr Zimmerthal played the following pieces: a double fugue in E flat, by John Sebastian Bach; an adagio, by Mozart, from that great composer's fantaisie in F minor; variations on Mendelssohn's organ sonata; the adagio from Beethoven's symphony in C minor, arranged for the organ by Zimmerthal; and Mendelssohn's grand sonata for the organ.

LEIPSIC.—Mad. Schütz-Witt, the wife of the newly-engaged Capellmeister, has appeared as Julia in I Montecchi e Capuletti, and Elisabeth in Die Tannhäuser. — M. Adam's Giralda is in rehearsal.—Miss Georgina Stabbach, from London, is engaged to sing at the next Gewandhaus concerts. By the way, great alterations are to be made in the Gewandhaus itself.—Herr Joachim, from Hanover, is at present here. He will proceed, in a few weeks, to Pesth, to pay a visit to his relations there.—Mad. Clara Schumann has accepted an engagement to sing at concerts here, towards the end of the present month.

POSEN.—Herr Wallner has engaged Kroll's opera company in Berlin for twelve representations, from the end of October to the end of November.

HAMBURGH.—According to report, Herr Hoffmann, of Frankfort-on-the-Maine, Herr Engelken, of Augsburg, and Herr Woltersdorf, of Königsberg, are candidates for the management of the Stadttheater.

KONIGSBERG.—A so-called "monster concert" was lately given for the sufferers in Silesia. The proceeds amounted to eighty thalers!

STETTIN.—The theatre opened with Bellini's Montecchi e Capuletti. The performance was far from giving general satisfaction.

COLOGNE.—A concert has been given by the Männergesangverein for the benefit of the sufferers by the inundations in Silesia. It was most numerously attended.—The performances during the first week of the season at the Stadttheater consisted of M. Meyerbeer's Huguenots, Rossini's Barbiere, and Mozart's Don Juan. All these operas were got up in great haste, and put upon the stage in a most slovenly manner, reflecting but small credit upon the management. We may, however, add that Mdlle. Bertha Johansen, as Valentine and Donna Anna, and Mdlle. Westerstraud, as Rosina, Lucia, and the Queen, produced a favourable impression, and fulfilled all the expectations formed of them.—Herr Carl Formes is announced for a series of representations, the first to begin on the 25th of this month.

NEW YORK.—Madame Grisi and Signor Mario continue to be suffering from the bad management by which they have been victimized since their first appearance. Whether they will ever recover from it, seems to be a matter of some doubt and of a rather violent polemique between the musical critics. There is some talk of transferring them to the new theatre, which would be a decided amelioration—the present theatre of their triumph being at a very inconvenient distance from the fashionable part of the town. It must not be understood that there has been any want of success, or of appreciation on the part of the public; but they have turned sulky over the high prices, and refuse to pay them, after having been indisposed against Mr. Hackett by the absurd auction system. Every part undertaken by the great artistes has, on the contrary, been a complete triumph. I Puritani was the last opera. The papers speak in the most enthusiastic terms of both Grisi and Mario in this opera, and the whole performance went off pretty well with the exception of the orchestra, which continues to be most superlatively execrable. After this week we understand there will be a short season at Boston and Philadelphia, and then they will return to New York and give concerts at Niblo's, unless an arrangement be made for their appearance at the new theatre.—Mr. Vincent Wallace has arrived in the Arabia, after a flying visit to Europe.—At Boston preparations are being made for the opening of the new theatre and opera house, which will be principally devoted to dramatic uses, although it is reported to be admirably adapted to musical purposes. There is a great extent of stage-room, excellent scenery, and every sort of machinery to give the greatest possible effect to operas. The acoustic qualities of the house are said to be excellent. As regards the orchestra, we are assured no pains have been spared to make it as efficient as possible. It is composed of twenty-five performers, under the direction of Mr. Delang. Mr. Comer is actively at work training the chorus for the English opera, which will be produced next month, supported by Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. Harrison. Our informant tells us that due attention has been paid to good looks in the selection of chorus singers—we advise the manager to pay due attention to good voices and knowledge of music. The Handel and Haydn Society is prospering under the management of its president, Mr. J. Fairbanks. Rehearsals were commenced on Sunday evening last, and it is intended to practise the choruses of all the principal oratorios, so as to be ready with them at the shortest notice. The concerts will be given at the Music Hall, and will commence towards the end of November. We find in the New York Musical World that our correspondent at Milan has mistaken the country of Miss Adelaide Phillips—the above paper claims her as American. We hasten to correct our mistake, and congratulate our friends over the water on the promising talents of their young and fair countrywoman.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, October 14th, 1854.

All prospect of a solid establishment of English Opera in the metropolis seems, for the present, at an end. The experiment has been tried over and over again with an invariable routine of circumstances. Magnificent announcements, performances in a constant state of languishing from bad to worse, and total failure by way of termination. We are tired of failures. The public is tired of failures; it has lost all faith in English Opera. The very title itself has become a laughing-stock to the jokers, and a suggestion for buttoning up the breeches-pockets of the cautious. It is impossible for any pet notion, especially one in which so much artistic interest is involved, to have fallen further into disrepute, or be more hopelessly at a discount with the public. We, however, have not utterly abandoned hope of it. We can perceive the causes of failure and the means of remedy. Meanwhile, without going into a profitless discussion of what might and should be done—it is absolutely certain that the embarkation of large capital in the enterprise must be the chief element of success. The finding of the adventurous millionaire, who, after the experience of the last dozen years, will tempt the chance of sacrifice, is quite another matter. We trust it may occur before the discovery of the missing Arctic expedition; though, for aught that now appears to the contrary, the dates are as likely to be coeval as otherwise. For all practical purposes, then, the establishment of English Opera, on a scale to do credit to the nation and service to its composers, may be regarded as an event, probable, indeed, but too distant to be worth waiting for. Meanwhile, there is no need that English music should go to sleep. If the avenues to distinction be closed against the native composer in one direction, he must turn his steps towards another. If he have a dozen operas lying idle and profitless in his portfolio, there is no reason that his symphonies, overtures, and oratorios should share a like fate. Concerts, and of the greatest magnitude, are, fortunately, popular among us. Not alone did Handel leave us his immortal works; he left us a still more valuable bequest—the tradition, which has never departed, that such music is for ever worth hearing, and cannot be heard without adequate means of execution. He set the fashion, in short, of great concert-performances; and, since his time, these have continued, with chequered success it may be, but with unflagging spirit, with constantly increasing excellence and widening field of application, until at last almost settled among the institutions of the country, and thoroughly in unison with the feelings of the people, we may boast of our provincial festivals and London regular concerts as unequalled in the world. Let us keep them so, say we. The French, Germans, and Italians may vaunt the excellence of their lyric theatres, and laugh at our bungling attempts to commence that which they have long enjoyed in perfection. While we can sustain our concert societies and country festivals at even their present point of efficiency, our composers need never want a battle-field nor their music a fair trial of its strength. It is, doubtless, very mortifying to the aspiring musician, who, with all the strong faith of paternity, believes himself prepared with another Fidelio or Guillaume Tell, and yet can find no chance of bringing the public to his way of thinking. But, courage! say we; there is as much genius and art required for a symphony or oratorio as for an opera—perhaps even more; and the man who succeeds in the first will hardly fail in the last, whenever the opportunity presents itself.

Music, however, is not a thing that can be advantageously centralised or confined to one district or city of a kingdom. To do its work efficiently, to give all a chance of doing and hearing alike, it must spread, and this in force, over the whole country. What with the two Philharmonic Societies, the three monster gatherings at Exeter Hall, Mr. Hullah's singing-schools, and no end of Cecilian, Seraphic, and Apollonic, and other small fry scattered over the metropolis, London may be considered to be pretty well supplied. When once the "season" sets matters going, the public here may hear, if it chooses, any imaginable quantity of fine music under every conceivable style of performance, according to the price paid for it. To the provinces, however, we look with more anxiety and interest. Throughout the north of England the means of educating the public taste are precious and abundant, yet scarcely more than half developed. To say nothing of the cities, the smaller towns throughout Lancashire and Yorkshire have, almost invariably, their choral societies—each a strong and good phalanx of singers, with, generally and unfortunately, a very indifferent band. In these places Handel and Haydn are known by heart; while Mozart, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn, are steadily making way with their elder competitors. Here are, then, the elements of a pretty extensive school wherein to train the public mind to a recognition of music under its higher aspects. But we have to complain that these elements are as yet neither sufficiently used, nor sufficiently valued, when called into operation. We would have a choral and instrumental society in every large town in the kingdom. We have would concerts given—not one of those "grand" concerts, consisting wholly of the singing of a few "stars," to the jingling accompaniment of a pianoforte—but concerts in which people like Handel and Mendelssohn might appear, with a goodly staff of choir and orchestra to execute their behests. To be sure, there might be difficulties at first. Doubtless, at the commencement, many things would go considerably awry. There would be voices out of tune, bows unresined, clarinets in difficulties, horns fitter for the hounds than for ears polite, and sackbuts that even Nebuchadnezzar himself might have coveted. But time works wonders; all these roughnesses will wear away. Let it ever be borne in mind that while practice and intelligent direction will at last perfect any performance, an eternity of rehearsal, and Mr. Costa to boot, cannot make bad music into good. It is fashionable to suppose that the parties of foreign artists who periodically scour the country—doubtless much to their own amusement, and the profit of the speculators who employ them—do good to music in the provinces. Our opinion, however, is very much to the contrary. We cannot see what educative power on public taste can be exercised by these repetitions of thrice-told tales—these re-productions of worn-out Italian cavatinas which must, long ere this, have been ground to death on every boarding-school pianoforte in the kingdom. It may, perhaps, be instructive to hear, viva voce, the precise style in which "Com' e gentil," or "Io l'udia" should be sung; but we cannot help thinking that any provincial audience would have a much more legitimate occasion for applause if they could boast of a resident choir capable of singing "The people shall hear," thoroughly in tune—(which, by the way, has never yet been done at Exeter Hall)—or a band which could give some proper account of the Eroica symphony. As a matter of amusement, these "touring" parties are well enough; furthermore, they serve to give an idea of refinement in solo performance, which is at all times valuable; but they should be kept strictly subordinate to the progress of music itself.

After all, the strongholds of large music in the provinces are the festivals; and these, whether as refuges for the public taste against the deluge of nonsense with which it is assailed, or as opportunities to our composers for the production of important works, should be sustained at every cost of money and influence. It is gratifying to know that, in most cases, this has been, and will be, done; and as gratifying to reflect that wherever there has been a suspension of these triennial celebrations, the cause has been altogether exterior to, and distinct from, public appreciation of their object. At York, at Chester, at Liverpool, the same story is told. The clergy denied the use of their churches to these musical and charitable gatherings; and none of these cities having any fitting music-hall for the purpose, the festivals were necessarily discontinued. To a lay and ordinary apprehension it certainly seems odd that deans and chapters should have such tender consciences in the matter of permitting the receipt of money at their doors for charitable purposes, while it is notorious that they sanction its acceptance by their servants for the meaner purpose of exhibiting their churches. But this is one of those little points which, if unadjusted by capitular discretion, will probably be taken out of their hands by a certain government commission, at present, we suspect, more free than welcome in its dealings with Cathedral affairs. Good, however, may come out of evil. Liverpool has built a magnificent Hall for its festivals—(perhaps, by decent arrangement, it may gain instead of lose five hundred pounds on the next occasion)—Chester is, we hear, about to follow the example, and York may, and ought to do the like.

In all points of view the regularity and efficiency of these country performances, be they festivals, choral concerts, or the like, are of the utmost importance; and should be supported with heart and hand by every one who values the progress of English musical art.

THE Citizens of London have signed a requisition to Mr. G. V. Brooke to play at the City of London Theatre. This is the history of the requisition, as stated in the Times advertisement of Thursday:

"Messrs. J. Johnson and Nelson Lee, joint proprietors of the City of London Theatre, being most anxious to provide an entertainment of a superior cast (Query, kind—ED.), wrote to the above distinguished artiste, expressing a desire to treat with him on terms of unprecedented liberality (the italics are ours—ED.), to which communication they received the following reply:—

"3, Marine Terrace,
"Kingstown, Dublin.

"Gentlemen,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your favour, inquiring my terms for a few nights at your theatre, and in reply I beg to state, that I shall embark, in November, for Australia."

The above paragraph proves, indisputably, Mr. G. V. Brooke's title to the name of "Irishman." Messrs. J. Johnson and Nelson Lee write to him in September, offering him an engagement, and he begs to state, in reply, that he shall embark, in November, for Australia. But an Irishman is allowed to speak twice, and so Mr. G. V. Brooke explains. He goes on:—

"Having, for the last thirteen months, been constantly engaged (although, thank God, I never was so well in health as I am at present), I feel I should like a few days on the Continent, and purpose going thither, after the 14th of October, for about three weeks, at the conclusion of my Cambridge engagement, or I should be tempted to visit you, as I have had so many solicitations to do so, and really feel awkward in my incessant refusals; but my every hour that could be rendered available for professional services has been seized upon, and I am at this moment thronged with applications for even a single night in the towns surrounding; but being under contract to sail for Australia, I am reluctantly compelled to decline. I am, dear Sir,

"Yours very truly,
"G. V. BROOKE."

Messrs. J. Johnson and Nelson Lee, however, were not to be deterred by positive refusals or contracts for Australia. Had Mr. G. V. Brooke been in London, doubtless a deputation would have waited on him to play at the City of London Theatre, as deputations have waited on Lords John Russell and Dudley Stuart to stand for the City of London. The parallel is worthy in every respect. Messrs. J. Johnson and Nelson Lee, sorely disappointed, took counsel from each other, and submitted Mr. G. V. Brooke's note to "several influential patrons, who had frequently expressed a wish to them to endeavour to obtain the services of one so celebrated," not meaning the note, of course, though the text evidently alludes to it, but Mr. G. V. Brooke himself. Why the influential patrons should prefer seeing Mr. G. V. Brooke at the City of London Theatre to seeing him at Drury Lane, is not easy to surmise.

The next step in this momentous affair was appointing the committee; this was accordingly done. We should like to know exactly of what stuff the committee was made, but their names do not appear. The committee prepared the requisition, and sent it round the neighbourhood to procure signatures; here is a copy of the requisition:—

"CITY OF LONDON, Sept., 1854.

"To Gustavus Vaughan Brooke, Esq., Tragedian, etc.

"DEAR SIR.—Thousands of our fellow-citizens at the east end of this metropolis having, owing to the distance, business hours, and other circumstances, been debarred the pleasure of witnessing your masterly impersonations—but are most desirous to do so—and learning your contemplated journey to Australia, we, the undersigned, are induced to request that you will favour us with that delight and satisfaction at one of our theatres, if only for a few nights.

"We need scarcely add that, should you acquiesce, your visit will not only be highly appreciated, but the histrionic fame you have so nobly won will receive additional lustre, as well as add another proof of the urbanity so identified with your reputation.

"In the hope, therefore, that you will accede, we beg to subscribe ourselves, "Yours very truly."

Digitized by Google

Hereafter follow the signatures, amounting to upwards of four hundred names, which, in double rows, occupy one mortal column of the Times newspaper. The gentlemen who have subscribed to the requisition are mostly vintners and licensed victuallers—vulgarly called "publicans"—from the neighbourhood and purlieus of Shoreditch, Norton Folgate, Bishopsgate, Hoxton, Dalston, Stepney, and the Commercial-road far as Poplar; drapers and toymen from the Minories; fishmongers from Billingsgate; dairymen from Mile-end; pickle-merchants from Dunning's-alley and Widegate-street; tobacconists from Kingsland-road and the vicinity of Aldgate pump; hatters from London-wall; horse-dealers from Little Britain; with a stray stock-broker from Bartholomew-lane, a silk-merchant from Spitalfields, a Hebrew solicitor from Homerton, and two ladies from Houndsditch—a Mrs. and a Miss—to sweeten the request.

"No method," declares the advertisement, "could possibly have been adopted more calculated to ascertain the true feelings of the citizens of London; for, in the brief space of four days, the names of the principal bankers, merchants, and tradesmen were found attached to the requisition. By "bankers" no doubt the committee intends to convey the betting confraternity.

We are happy to add that the requisition so numerously and illustriously signed has not been without effect. Mr. G. V. Brooke could not resist so powerful an appeal. His answer to the requisition, is as follows:—

"Gentlemen,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of the flattering requisition forwarded to me this day from merchants, bankers (! ! !), and tradesmen of the city of London, to me one of the most gratifying testimonials I have ever received during a most successful professional career (this is the puff-subtle with a vengeance—Ed.), requesting me to forego a visit to the continent, for the purpose of performing a few nights at the City of London Theatre.

"Were I to refuse so marked a token of respect, I should feel myself unworthy the unparalleled (! ! !) encouragement (this is the puff preposterous.—Ed.) bestowed on my humble efforts in this country. I, therefore, cheerfully relinquish my premeditated trip, and have instructed my agent to close with your liberal offer, and will perform at your establishment for a limited number of nights.

"Yours truly and obliged,
"Gustavus Vaughan Brooke.

"To Messrs. J. Johnson and Nelson Lee, Oct. 9, 1854."

Mr, G. V. Brooke has an eye to business. Although by no means modest, and never allowing an opportunity of aggrandizing himself to escape him, money appears to be the true object of his desire. He complies cheerfully with the wishes of his bankers, merchants and traders, and condescends to close with the "liberal offer," etc.? What if Messrs. J. Johnson and Nelson Lee hinted at an abatement of terms? Would the much-sifted actor have responded kindly, or proved restive?

Some men have greatness thrust upon them. Never was there a grander exemplification of this undeniable axiom than Mr. G. V. Brooke. With the most moderate abilities, without one spark of genius, with few stage qualifications, deficient in art, wanting in judgment, feeble in conception, with energy misapplied, and powers misdirected, he has, nevertheless, attained a position on the modern stage beyond that of all his contemporaries, many of whom are infinitely his superiors. Were we called upon to assign to Mr. G. V. Brooke his true theatrical station, without mentioning Mr. Charles Kean, we should place him below Messrs. Phelps and James Anderson, and allow him to stand in the same rank with Mr. Howe and Mr. Hicks—neither of which actors, we are confident, will feel flattered by the comparison.

Were it worth while to inquire into the causes of the undue prominence into which Mr. G. V. Brooke has been forced, we might point particularly to the system of exorbitant puffing pursued by certain managers of certain theatres, and to the unaccountable support given to the actor by certain journalists. It is easy to understand why managers should endeavour to make a trump card out of a losing one; but by what means Mr. G. V. Brooke, or his impresario, could have won over the critics of the press to write him up, in violence to their best convictions, must ever remain a profound secret—except to ——.

We have done with the subject. The requisition is a disgrace to all who signed it; or, more properly, it is not a disgrace, seeing that the actor and his subscribers are birds of a feather, and should flock together. Mr. G. V. Brooke and his manager have most cunningly prepared the road to Australia. It is already densely strewn with puffs and hyperboles, which, no doubt, will produce their due effect on Australian audiences. It will be well for Mr. G. V. Brooke if the congregations which flock to him in the Land of Gold will prove as ignorant of everything connected with the art of acting as the visitors to Drury Lane. A few of the dilettanti in California would turn the tables on the reputation of Mr. G. V. Brooke.

Miss Arabella Goddard at Wiesbaden.—(From a Correspondent, Oct. 4.)—On Saturday last, an immense fire broke out at the Government-house, Wiesbaden, whereby six unfortunate men, who assisted in endeavouring to extinguish the flames, lost their lives, most of them leaving widows and orphans to deplore their loss. In consequence of this calamity, a concert was proposed on behalf of the sufferers, and Dr. Bögler, president of the Cecilian Society at Wiesbaden, wrote to Miss Arabella Goddard, at Frankfort, where she was then staying, to play at the concert. The fair pianist signified her assent at once, and the benefit came off on Monday. Miss Goddard's first piece was Mendelssohn's concerto in G minor. When she entered the room and seated herself at the piano, there was literally not one hand of welcome held out to her. The audience either never heard of Miss Arabella Goddard, or put no faith in the reports circulated about her. Nevertheless, the artist did not seem to lose heart. It may be, that pique steeled her, and enabled her more to do her best than if she had met with the most flattering reception. Miss Goddard took the most signal revenge she could have taken for the cold welcome she got. At the end of the concert—which had been listened to throughout with rapt attention—a burst of applause broke from the audience, who continued cheering the pianist for nearly a minute. At her return to the piano, to perform the second piece, she was received with a perfect furore, unmistakeably demonstrating the real impression she had made. She was encored in Weber's "Invitation to the waltz," when she played Mayer's "La Fontaine," and left the room amidst a storm of applause. No success was ever more sudden and more decided than that of Miss Arabella Goddard at her first concert at Wiesbaden. But the sensation Miss Goddard created did not rest in the concert-room. About forty choristers of the Cecilian Society proceeded with lighted candles in their hands from the concert-room to the hotel, where Miss Goddard was staying, and serenaded her for nearly an hour. This is a compliment which I understand never was paid to an artist before in Wiesbaden. I am pleased to add—which is the gist of my notice—that the receipts of the concert were excellent, and that the poor sufferers reaped a harvest.

Mr. Wright.—This favourite comedian joined the Haymarket troupe on Monday night, and appeared in Paul Pry. He has also played during the week in Sweethearts and Wives.

REVIEWS.

"England and Victory"—National Song—Words by Desmond Ryan—Music by Frank Mori. (Cramer, Beale and Co.)

This song has lately been sung in the provinces by Mr. Sims Reeves with unparallelled effect. Indeed, on every occasion it has produced a perfect furore, and at Lincoln and Boston, more especially, the enthusiasm ran to such a height, that the audience were quite beside themselves. Mr. Sims Reeves' singing is pronounced "electrical." The melody is broad and striking, has a decided national flavour, and cannot escape the dullest ear. To hear it once is to remember it per force. It is in the key of D, common time; tempo, allegro marziale. The accompaniments for the pianoforte, though skilful and musicianlike, are by no means puzzling. In short, "England and Victory" is a genuine inspiration, and cannot fail to become one of the most popular of the popular Frank Mori's ballads. Of the words we shall say nothing, but quote them, and allow the reader to adjudicate as to their merit or demerits.

On the Danube's banks
Swell the northern ranks,
And flames the sword afar;
But the Moslem might Scares the Muscovite
In his ruthless deeds of war!
Soon Freedom, at Honour's call,
Shall make oppression flee;
And Glory shall hallow all
Who strike for Liberty.
In peace or war
Who heeds the Czar,
While France is our ally?
Let's on and sound the battle cry,
"For England and victory!"

Give our hearts and hands
To the gallant bands
Who join us in the cause,
To protect the brave
Who their homes would save,
Their country, creed, and laws.
The tyrant may mock at fears,
And scorn a people's right;
But orphans' and widows' tears
His slumbers shall affright.
By sea and land,
At Heaven's command,
We come—fly, Russia, fly!
Let's on and sound the battle-cry,
"For England and victory!"

DRAMATIC.

Princess's.—This theatre re-opened for the season on Monday night with two new pieces—a comedietta in one act, Living Too Fast; or, A Twelvemonth's Honeymoon; and an original drama in three acts, by Mr. Douglas Jerrold, called A Heart of Gold.

The one-act piece is a very plain affair; but, relating to a home truth, and being simply told and capitally acted, it passed off with entire success. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Prudent are a young married couple, who have gone so far beyond their means of living in a few months as to be reduced to the brink of ruin. Mr. Cotton, a wealthy Manchester manufacturer, and uncle to Mrs. Charles Prudent, has learned of the extravagance of the pair, and, coming to London, calls upon them, and pretends that he has met with severe losses, and that he requires immediately seven hundred pounds, which he demands as a loan from Mr. Prudent. This demand comes most unseasonably, since, at that moment, Mr. Prudent was about to ask Mr. Cotton for a loan. Mr. Prudent, however, with the consent of his wife, determines to sell his house, furniture, fixtures, etc., to relieve his uncle's necessities; whereupon the uncle, touched with the generosity and disinterestedness of the offer, declares his embarrassment was only a pretence, and assumed to teach the young married couple a lesson in economy; and, with a hope that they will do better for the future, gives them money to pay their debts, and enables them to begin the world again. The episode of the attempt of the Hon. Captain Craven Plausible on Mrs. Prudent's virtue is feeble, and was not wanted. Nothing could be better than the acting of Mr. Walter Lacy and Miss Murray as Mr. and Mrs. Prudent; and certainly to their individual exertions was mainly attributable the success of the little drama. At the fall of the curtain loud applause ensued, and continued until Mr. Walter Lacy and Miss Murray appeared. Living Too Fast; or, A Twelvemonth's Honeymoon, has been repeated during the week.

The Heart of Gold is written in Mr. Douglas Jerrold's happiest vein; and, although deficient on the whole in construction and characterization, is so full of poetry, so rich in wit, so highly dramatic, and so irresistible in humour, that it becomes an impossibility to peck at faults, and we think only of its excellencies. The story is original and thoroughly English. Mr. Douglas Jerrold is one of our very few dramatic writers who disdain borrowing from the French or German, or to owe their invention to any foreign source. His subjects are all his own—or his country's—good, bad, and indifferent; and he would rather be indebted for the origin of his story to a common broadside ballad, or an old crone's fire-side narrative, than to the most thrilling romance of Alexandre Dumas, or the brightest creations of Eugène Sue, or Scribe. The Heart of Gold is a genuine English drama, and has the pure native flavour about it, like Bishop's music. Its success, on Monday night, was never one moment in doubt. Though one or two of the scenes evidently did not please the audience; though an occasional prolixity in the serious parts of the piece was manifested; though, at times, the progress of the story was not clearly made out; yet the pungency of the dialogue, its point, sparkle and brilliancy; the quaintness of the humour; the home-thrusts at human foibles; and the fine and healthy sentiment that runs through the play like a thread of gold winding through frieze cloth, appealed irresistibly to the heart, took judgment by surprise, and left no room for animadversion.

The story of A Heart of Gold can, with difficulty, be made apparent to the reader. On the stage it is not satisfactory; nor can the spectators be persuaded to what purpose the author has always made up his mind. The scene is laid in 1750. The first act takes place in London at an inn, yclept "The Bear." John Dymond (Mr. Ryder), a wealthy yeoman in the country, has fallen in love with Maude Nutbrown (Miss Heath), who does not reciprocate his passion, but loves Pierce Thanet (Mr. J. F. Cathcart), a younger, and, as, it would seem, a better-favoured lover, whose father was friend from boyhood to John Dymond himself. Dymond is passionately attached to Maude, and her rejection of him drives him to absolute distraction. He arrives at the inn in almost a dying state, and learning that Maude has arrived from the country with her father, determines to tempt her with gold and jewels, since other means are of no avail. Maude rejects his offer, and declares her affections are wedded to another. This blow is too great for Dymond. He feels he is dying, and sends for Pierce Thanet, the son of his boyhood's friend. In presence of Maude and her father, the landlady of the inn, the tapster, the housemaid, and his own steward, he bequeaths all his wealth, amounting to one thousand pounds, contained in a box, to Pierce. He orders him to place his hand on the box, and earnestly and solemnly he prays him to hold fast by its contents, to make it his only friend, to trust his all in life to it, and make it his very heart's idolatry. Strange advice, when it is considered how valueless and worthless gold had so lately proved to himself, when he tempted Maude with it! Too truly does Pierce follow Dymond's counsel, as we shall presently find. The act closes with the seeming death scene of John Dymond. But John Dymond is not dead; he has only been in a trance, and has quietly, and unknown to any one, come to life again—unknown to any one, save Molly Dindle (Miss Murray), the housemaid of the Bear Inn, who accompanies him into the country, whither he goes again in search of Maude. He little guesses the surprise that awaits him. His first sight of Maude is finding her in the arms of Pierce Thanet, to whom she is just about to be married. The surprise of Maude and Pierce is even greater than that of Dymond. They seem to look upon a ghost come back from the grave. Stung to madness, Dymond, when left alone with Pierce, taunts him with his standing between him and happiness, and demands the surrender of his thousand pounds. Pierce refuses, and flings his own counsel in the teeth of Dymond, to which Dymond has nothing to respond. When about to be married, Maude learns that Pierce had refused to return the money bestowed on him by Dymond, and, in a fit of virtuous indignation, spurns Pierce, and proffers her hand to Dymond, which he receives with ecstatic delight; and so ends act the second. Now, those who are interested in the drama, must doubtless be gratified with the termination of this act; since it cannot be denied that Pierce Thanet has acted most scurvily in denying his benefactor his own gold, merely on the grounds that he himself had advised him to hold it as the apple of his eye. Pierce, in fact, looks very like a swindler in the eyes of those who have been watching his progress on the stage; and who must feel surprised, not to say indignant, when they find the author attempting to bring him out of the ordeal with flying colours, and making him at last his hero. This is a violation not to be endured; and few of the audience, we are convinced, rise from their seats satisfied that Maude is bestowed upon Pierce Thanet, and that poor John Dymond—the real heart of gold—is again sent back to, this time, a living grave. If anything could reconcile the spectator to this violent disposal, it would be the appearance of Mr. Ryder, which, gaunt, strange, and graceless, is singularly unsuited to that of a lover. Indeed, we feel assured, that many who would have showered indiscriminate censure on the head of Mr. Douglas Jerrold for his undue preference of Pierce Thanet, departed pleased that so sweet a thing as Maude was not given to such an unloveable creature as John Dymond. And so felt we ourselves. The acting of Miss Heath and Miss Murray was excellent. From the lips of the latter not one tittle of the point in the dialogue was lost; she literally spoke it in italics. Mr. Fisher's comedy is heavy; and the acting of Mr. Ryder has the serious drawback of being anti-pathetic. Mr. Addison secured applause in the part of Old Nut-brown.

Olympic.—This theatre opened for the winter season on Monday, with three of the stock pieces. Mr. Robson played in Hush Money and Perfect Confidence, and achieved his usual brilliant success.

Surrey.—On Monday, the dramatic and winter season commenced with a new drama, in four acts, entitled The Avalanche. In the first act, which is introductory, we behold Francois Marcel (Mr. Creswick), a young mountaineer of the Alps, who, in conducting a French officer across the mountains, is overwhelmed by an avalanche, leaving a wife and infant daughter to lament his loss. Eighteen years elapse, and Francois' widow is married to Count Vincenzo, an intriguing politician and refined villain, who has not scrupled to farther his interests by secret murder. Francois' daughter, now grown up, is attached to a young French officer; but her father-in-law designs her for another. To avoid the match, she elopes, is pursued by the Count's emissaries, from whom she is unexpectedly rescued by a coachman, who is no other than Francois, her father, who, having escaped from his danger in the mountains, has become, along with an old comrade, Pierre (Mr. Widdicomb), a wanderer for subsistence. An éclaircissement, of course, takes place. The Count, discovering Marcel with his wife, is about to have him violently ejected from his house, when he is shot in a scuffle with Pierre, and Francois is restored to his wife and daughter.

The drama, in its main incident, resembles one (taken from a French piece) produced here a year or two ago. The introductory portion hangs fire, and might, by means of a little narrative dialogue, have been omitted altogether. The fall of the avalanche is a failure. The interest, however, when it begins, is well maintained to the end, and the piece, aided by Messrs. Creswick, Widdicomb, and the youthful and promising Clara Grosvenor, was decidedly successful. There is some excellent scenery. The count's conservatory is unique in design and execution.

The drama was followed by another new piece, called The Magic of Life, taken from a novel of Paul de Kock. A lady of rank and fortune becomes attached to a man in humble life, through having received from him an act of generosity and courage. Having gained his affections in return, she finally bestows her hand upon him. The young mechanic, by the refining process of the lady's affections, becomes a gentleman in habits and manners. The subject, though old, is inexhaustible. In the present case, the weight of the business falls almost exclusively on Mr. Shepherd (the lover). Mr. Widdicomb, as a dancing-master, is as amusing as ever as the lively caricaturist; with the other characters but little is done by the author. Among the new faces here, we were glad to see Miss Emily Sanders, an actress of genuine native humour.

Strand.—The performers here change as often as the moon. This week we have had Mr. G. Honey, who has been eliciting his usual amount of fun as Bowbell, in the Illustrious Stranger. Then, Miss Rebecca Isaacs has returned to her post, to which, of course, she was heartily welcomed; but as she has, as yet, played only in the well-known little vaudeville, 'Twas I, we must reserve further comment until we have seen more of her. The house has been well attended. Since writing the above, another popular favourite has re-appeared in the person of Miss Marshall, who, on Thursday, attracted a crowded audience to witness her fun and humour in The Unprotected Female.

M. VOGT, THE ORGANIST.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

Gloucester, Oct. 12th.

Sir,—A paragraph having appeared some two or three years ago in your journal, announcing the death of M. Vogt, the organist of St. Nicholas's Church, Freiburg, Switzerland, I think the same authority which gave circulation to the statement should correct it, being one which may have an injurious influence on a highly respected man and deserving artist, and possibly to the town in which he resides.

When at Freiburg, about three weeks since, I was happy to find that M. Vogt is still living there, in excellent health, and that he continues to exhibit to strangers and all amateurs of the organ, the extraordinary powers of Mooser's famous instrument, of which he is so complete a master. To foreigners he is most affable and obliging, and ready to afford every information respecting the noble instrument of which he is justly proud, however much more recent works may have surpassed it in magnitude. I am, Sir, yours obediently, A. P.

P.S. Aloys Mooser, the builder, died about seven years ago; this may, perhaps, have occasioned the error.

THE HARMONIC UNION.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

Sir,—Since reading your article on the Harmonic Union, which appeared in the number dated August 26th, I have been apprehensive that something was really wrong in the working of the Society, and I had determined to avail myself of every opportunity to discover, by all prudent observations, what the real state of the case was. I should, perhaps, have discovered, long ere this, by my attendance at the rehearsals, but found, that when the rehearsal was advertised, and the chorus met to rehearse, there was no one to conduct, consequently my fears were confirmed that great doubt existed about the Society's future operations, and more so, when I read in the Athenæum of Saturday last, a note from a correspondent, saying:—"The future existence of the Harmonic Union as a Society is now very doubtful, and I have come to this conclusion from the fact, that two-thirds of the directors, together with the superintendants of the different departments, have resolved to discontinue their services in connexion with the Harmonic Union, and join the New Philharmonic Society, taking with them the whole of their friends. One of the principal reasons which induced the gentlemen to resign their different offices was the great improbability of Mr. Benedict again accepting the office of conductor." I then determined further to inquire into the facts of the case by going to the office, 5, Exeter Hall, which I found was closed, but a notice was on the board to the effect that there would be a rehearsal on Tuesday October 10th, which rehearsal I attended, when an announcement was made by the honorary secretary, Mr. Lias, junior, to the effect that subscriptions would be received in the office, and the chorus, as a body, were urged to join the Society as subscribers, and, if they could not afford the sum of one guinea, they should be received as "complimentary subscribers" for the sum of ten shillings and sixpence. It was also stated "that there were four or six gentlemen who did not mind losing the sum of twenty pounds each, if the chorus would support them in the manner proposed. The question was then asked by a gentleman in the tenor department, whether or no Mr. Benedict would be the conductor? The answer given was, "I am not in a position to answer that question, as all the officers are chosen annually, and the conductor being one of the officers of the Society, that officer would be elected by the board" (which I suppose to mean the four or six gentlemen spoken of). Now, I can clearly see that it is a matter of the greatest uncertainty respecting Mr. Benedict's future connection with the Society; and I think it is but an act of justice to the members of the chorus, who are all so much attached to Mr. Benedict, that it should be immediately known whether or no it is his intention to again accept the office of conductor to the Harmonic Union, that they, with the public, may know the exact state of things before they tender their subscriptions. For my own part, I think the effort to carry on the concerts of the Society without Mr. Benedict would be utterly hopeless, and I am sure, from what I know of the general feeling among the chorus, that it will be impossible to keep them together without that gentleman as their conductor. I shall hope, if you will favour me with the insertion of this letter, that something may be brought to light respecting the present position and future prospects of the Harmonic Union, and if they are as I have every reason to fear, I shall follow my much respected superintendant, and enrol my name on the list of subscribers to the New Philharmonic Society.

I am, Sir, yours obediently,

ONE OF THE MEMBERS OF THE CHORUS.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE NOSE IN CONNEXION WITH THE PRACTICE OF SINGING, AND PLAYING WIND INSTRUMENTS.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—The importance of a thorough mastery in the art of taking breath, not only with regard to singing and playing wind instruments, but also in speaking, as far as is conducive to health, is a subject entirely worthy of notice. In the acquirement of this art, I would ask, is sufficient importance attached to that honourable appendage, "the nose?" or rather has there been any understanding respecting it? for I believe the generality of singers and wind-instrument performers inspire and expire through the mouth. If this be true, can as much be said in favour of the mouth in the operation of breathing as it can of the nose? The art of taking breath is more important than is generally thought, for apart from its being the foundation-stone of singing, and playing wind instruments, and obtaining a distinct pronunciation in speaking, it is also highly beneficial to health. Dr. J. J. Garth Wilkinson, in his work on "The Human Body," says, "The nose is the real opening into the lungs, for it is always open for breath. We can breath by the mouth, but it is not the proper organ of breathing. The nose is the true representative of the door of life, for life is breath, or a habit of breathing. The ears may be shut, and the eyes may be shut, but the door of life must ever be open, whether we sleep or wake. It is not the lungs of man alone that breathe; the whole body breathes along with them. The brain breathes at every inspiration; that is to say, it heaves—it rises and falls with the inspiration and expiration of air. Motion is thus communicated to it, and every other part of the body moves in a similar manner. Nor is it motion only that is communicated to the body. It really breathes; it drinks in the fragrance of the air that enters the lungs. It is that finer air that purifies the blood in the air-cells* of the lungs, and the whole blood of the human body makes the entire circuit of the veins and arteries in two minutes, or three at most."

By exercising the respiration in holding notes, the chest becomes expanded, and that it is greatly affected is evident from the pain which is there felt after a lengthened exercise. This seems to prove that simple as it may appear to "take breath," it cannot be fully and freely performed unless well and carefully practised. As "life is breath," it is therefore difficult to understand how singing or playing a wind instrument can be injurious, when the practice of either has a direct tendency to improve this principle of life.

By inspiring through the nose, health can be taken in in much less time than it can through the mouth; this is, perhaps, owing to there being two openings in the nose to breathe through which open into the windpipe. Besides the advantage of taking a full breath almost instantaneously, the mouth and throat are not then likely to become dry by the passage of the breath.

Much is written in works on singing, on the "cultivation of the voice," the "Italian method of vocalising," etc., etc. It is, perhaps, better to state at once, and in distinct terms, what is to be practised, or, in other words, to give "the golden rule" for maturing the voice, viz., sustained notes. This exercise gives freedom of respiration, firmness of voice, correct intonation, and flexibility to "a cartilaginous box, curiously constructed and fitted with muscles for producing sound; it is called the larynx."

In practising the flute, oboe, clarionet, and bassoon, sustained notes, besides opening the chest and giving a freer respiration than would result from any other method of practice, forms the embouchure, by drawing into action the muscles of the neck and face, which cause a pressure of the interior or soft parts of the mouth and lips, and the fingers, by remaining firmly pressed in the different positions, gain an elasticity which insures the execution, and gives an energetic and steady hold of the instrument.

On stringed instruments, as the violin, tenor, and bass, sustained notes give the command of the bow, and a firmness and certainty in all the various positions of the hand on the finger-board.

On the pianoforte, tone is improved by slow practice, and by attention to the weak fingers having an equal pressure with the strong.

Singers and instrumentalists alike should never forget that Mozart, when asked respecting some singers whom he heard for the first time perform his music, replied, "They cannot sustain a note."

When at Naples, I was informed that singers at the Conservatorio are kept for the first six months entirely at the sustained notes. I cannot vouch for the fact, but it must be confessed, that however disagreeable such a practice may be, it is a very good foundation. There are many, I believe, who think this all-important exercise may be entirely discontinued as soon as they begin songs, etc. Nothing can be more fatal to a great and permanent success. Many instances could be given of eminent singers who, it is said, never neglected the practice of the scales. The most remarkable I can call to mind are Braham and Sontag—Braham, having preserved his voice longer than any singer on record, and Sontag having re-appeared as a brilliant star after a retirement of twenty years. A friend of mine, who had known Sontag when previously in England, informed me that shortly before her re-appearance he met her at a party at Frankfort, and being astonished, as he said, to find her powers undiminished after an absence from the public of twenty years, which led him to expect to hear something passé, he asked her how it was that she had, after so long a retirement, preserved the full power of her voice, to which she replied that she had never omitted to practise the scales.

It may, perhaps, be a further encouragement to persevere in, and almost to continue, this most necessary of all exercises, to know something of the practice of the greatest wonder of all instrumentalists. At the time Paganini was playing at his concerts at Covent Garden Theatre, I called on him to accompany him to one of the concerts, and heard him practising just before going to the theatre. After going over parts of the pieces he was to perform, and some detached passages, he played for some time, legato and moderately quick, the chromatic scale, and then he commenced holding notes on the fourth string, each note of which approached to roughness. My father had previously heard him practise and perform the same exercise, which he termed "roaring like a lion," and which, he told me, Paganini called "taming his instrument."

As I have here given such an example of "roaring," it is necessary to impress upon those who may be desirous of cultivating and maturing their voice or tone, that, at first, there must be no effort to increase the note—they have simply to hold the notes firmly and steadily, and as long as possible, after carefully and deliberately taking breath; but this must not be done in excess, which would prevent the freedom of action of the lungs while sustaining each note; and, finally, the student will do well sometimes to rest, for to overwork either the voice or the tone is very hurtful. In confirmation of this, it may be stated that, when Jenny Lind was thirteen years of age, she lost the quality of her voice, but yet unremittingly pursued her practice. Garcia, on hearing her, addressed her in the following terms, "My dear child, you have no voice, or, rather, you have one you labour with your whole strength to ruin. Perhaps you sang when too young, for your voice is fatigued, or, rather, used up. My only recommendation at present is, that you do not articulate a note for three months. You will then call again upon me." At the expiration of that period, Garcia commenced giving her lessons. The rest is well known.—Yours ever,

"IL FLAUTO MAGICO."

* It is said, in Dr. Carpenter's "Physiology," that the air-cells in the lungs amount to about six hundred millions.

QUEEN ELIZABETH'S VIOLIN.—A violin of singular construction, with the arms of England, and the crest of Dudley, Earl of Leicester, Queen Elizabeth's favourite, engraved upon it, was purchased at the sale of the Duke of Dorset's effects many years since. From the date of its make, 1678, and from the arms and crest engraved upon it, it has been conjectured that Queen Elizabeth was its original possessor. It is very curiously carved; but the several parts are so thick, and loaded with ornaments, that it has no more tone than a mute, or violin with a sordine; and the neck which is too thick for the grasp of the hand, has a hole cut in it for the thumb of the player, by which the hand is so confined as to be rendered incapable of shifting, so that nothing can be performed on this instrument but what lies within the reach of the hand in its first position.

MUSICIANS' RELIGION.—Burney says that the musicians, through all the changes of religion, turned their consciences to the court pitch, that is, in unison with the orders of their sovereign, the supreme head of the church. But let us see if they had not reason on their side. In the reign of Henry VIII., Testwood, one of the choir at Windsor, was burned for being a Protestant, and another musician only escaped the same fate through the interference of a friend, who obtained his pardon on the ground that it was not worth while to burn him, "as he was only a musician;" and Marbeck was condemned, and saved "because he was a musician."

MILITARY BAND INSTRUMENTS.—Messrs. BOOSEY and SONS respectfully solicit Officers and Band-masters to call and inspect their stock of C. Boosé's unrivalled Military Musical Instruments, combining all the newest improvements, with every requisite an artist or amateur could desire. The high standing of these instruments in Her Majesty's Army and Navy, and Hon. East India Company's Service, is Messrs. Boosey and Sons' object to retain, by the most careful attention, both to the quality and price of every instrument that proceeds from their manufactory. C. Boosé's Journal for a Reed and Brass Band continues to be published monthly, on the 15th. Boosey and Sons, Military Musical Instrument Manufacturers, Holles-street, London.

CHAPPELL'S FOREIGN MODEL PIANOFORTE.—PRICE FIFTY GUINEAS.—This instrument has (unlike the ordinary cottage pianoforte) THREE STRINGS, and the fullest grand compass of SEVEN OCTAVES. It is strengthened by every possible means to endure the greatest amount of wear, and to stand perfectly in any climate. The workmanship is of the best description, the tone is round, full, and rich, and the power equal to that of a Bichord Grand. The Case is of the most elegant construction in Rosewood, (vide the sketch), the touch elastic, and the repetition very rapid. Every possible precaution has been taken to insure its standing well in tune. Mr. Chappell especially invites the attention of the public, the profession, and merchants to the FOREIGN MODEL, feeling assured that no pianoforte, in all respects comparable, has hitherto been made in England at the same price. Every instrument will be warranted, and (if desired) exchanged within twelve months of the purchase. 50, New Bond-street, London.

MENDELSSOHN'S COMPOSITIONS.—EWER & Co.'s Editions at the Reduced Rate of Sixpence per sheet. New and complete Catalogues are now ready, and to be had, gratis and postage free, on application. Ewer and Co, 390, Oxford-street.

MISS FANNY HUDDART begs respectfully to announce that she has removed to No. 6, Bessborough-street, Pimlico.

THE BRIDESMAIDS' DUET, by DONIZETTI, the Poetry by DESMOND RYAN.—This is one of the most charming chamber duets in English that have ever been composed. It is written for Mezzo Soprano and Contralto. Price 2s. 6d. Boosey and Sons, 28, Holles-street.

THE NUNEHAM PARK WALTZES, by EDWARD L. SHEPHERD (of Abingdon), are published this day, price 3s., by Boosey and Sons, 28, Holles-street, London.

SIGNOR CAMPANA'S NEW VOCAL MUSIC.—Il Marinaro Barcarolle, 2s. 6d. Amani, Romanza, 2s. 6d. Io t'Amero, 2s. Una sera d'Amore, Duetto, 2s. 6d. Boosey and Sons, 28, Holles-street.

MILITARY BANDS—REED AND BRASS.

C. BOOSÉ'S MILITARY MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—MESSRS. BOOSEY & SONS, in submitting to the Army and the Musical Public a few of the latest improvements in the above CELEBRATED MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, beg to return their sincere thanks for the patronage so liberally bestowed on their establishment; and to assure those who have not hitherto honoured them with their commands, that their undeviating principle of business is to manufacture instruments of the very best description only. By this means, Boosey and Sons trust to ensure the permanent patronage of their friends. A fair and moderate price is fixed on every Instrument. CLARIONETS.—Either of Cocoa-wood or Grenadille, with 13 German Silver Keys; of Box-wood, with 13 Brass ditto; or of German Silver, with 13 Keys of the same metal. The whole of these comprise every new improvement. FLUTES AND PICCOLOS.—In the usual keys, for Amateurs or Military purposes, either of Cocoa or Box-wood, with German Silver or Brass Keys, and every new improvement. FIFES (Boosé's Improved).—Either of Cocoa or Box-wood, with 4 German Silver or Brass Keys. BASSOONS.—The new French Model, of Maple-wood, with 16 Brass, or German Silver Keys. BOOSÉ'S UNRIVALLED CORNET-A-PISTONS.—The great success that has attended the introduction of Boosé's new patent Cornet, and the many flattering testimonials the beauty of the model and the exceeding richness of its tone have called forth, have induced the manufacturers to extend the improvements still further, and they have now the pleasure of announcing, that they have succeeded in adjusting to the same model, the Rotary Cylinder Action. By means of this beautiful and light action, the most rapid passages can be executed with marvellous quickness and dexterity. Price, with Valves, 7 Guineas, with the new Rotary Cylinder Action, 9 Guineas. Either instrument strongly Electro-plated (equal to Silver), 2 Guineas extra. CORNETTO SOPRANO, in D or E flat (for Brass Band); VALVE TRUMPETS, Althorns (Barytone), with Three Valves in B Flat, E Flat, or F. EUPHONIONS (Bass), in B Flat or C, with Four Valves. BOMBARDONS (Bass) in E Flat, or F, with Four Valves. All these Instruments can be had either with Valves or the new Rotary Cylinder Action. The Althorns are made on two models—either with Bell up or forward. The Euphonion is a new Valve Instrument, infinitely superior to, and rapidly superseding the Ophicleide. FRENCH HORNS either with Three Valves, or on an entirely new model, with the Rotary Cylinder Action. These Horns, Boosey & Sons can with confidence recommend as superior to any yet supplied to the Profession. Better cannot be made.—TROMBONES, Alto, Tenor, and Bass. In the usual Keys, either with Slides, Valves, or the new Rotary Cylinder Action. The Valve Trombone may be had either with the Bell up or forward.—THE NEW ROTARY CYLINDER ACTION. With this action, which is exceedingly light, the most rapid passage may be executed with marvellous dexterity and quickness. It is, further, more simple and much stronger than any patent actions that have hitherto been made.—VALVE, OR FIELD BUGLE, in B flat or C. By a simple contrivance, the valves of this instrument may be detached at pleasure, and placed in a small leather case, and the instrument remains an ordinary Field Bugle.—OPHICLEIDES, in B flat or C, with 10 or 11 Keys. Cavalry Trumpets, Turkish Crescents, Triangles, Military Tambourines, Drum Heads, Reeds, Music Stands, Music Paper, and every requisite for a Reed, Brass, or String Band.—DRUMS (BASS), Boosé's Improved, of Brass. The advantages in these over Wooden Drums, are, an infinitely superior tone and great durability, without any increase in weight. Boosey & Sons have received the most flattering testimonials from the many Regiments they have supplied with these Drums, both at home and abroad. Tenor and Side Drums, also of Brass.—BASS DRUM STICKS. Boosey & Sons have succeeded in manufacturing a Drum Stick of an entirely New Material, which requires no covering, and will last for TEN OR TWENTY YEARS, and thus a remedy is provided for the constant expense of re-covering Drum Sticks. The Regimental Facings, and other colours, being tastefully introduced, render this Drum Stick an exceedingly handsome appendage to the Drum.

SKETCH OF MADAME MARA.

GERTRUDE, inspired with a new sense of freedom, soon grew cheerful, hopeful, and well again. She travelled with her husband through most of the larger cities of Germany. Unbounded applause and rich gains flowed in upon all sides. She took the first, but Mara looked out for the second; she had few wants and needed little for herself, so she left the whole to her husband, and was content as long as he was. But he was seldom so; the more he had, the more he spent, and there was usually nothing in the box. Then he grew morose and harsh towards his lady, to the extent finally of maltreatment; and she bore all. Plethory of money plunged him back into his old bad habits; she bore this also.

In the year 1780, they went to Vienna, where they stayed some time. The emperor Joseph occupied his leisure hours at that time with his darling hobby, the theatre of the Italian Comic Opera, and this toy (with Signora Storace at its head) was just then extremely fascinating. But Gertrude was in no way fitted for this opera, and accordingly she found small support with Joseph; but Maria Theresa, though advanced in years and withdrawn from the world and nearly all things worldly, took a more gracious interest in her, and gave her, as she desired to visit France, a letter to her royal daughter there.

In 1782, Gertrude went to Paris; with such a letter, she was at once presented to the queen, and Marie Antoinette, gracious and always attached to the German music, received her with the friendliest condescension, notwithstanding she lacked everything besides her art that gave a lady currency at so highly cultivated a court. After she had sung before the queen at Versailles, and had been largely applauded and remunerated, she announced a public concert in Paris. The great fame that had flown before her, her gracious reception by the still deified queen, and the presence of TODI, put all on tiptoe with expectation. The Todi passed universally, at least in France, for the first singer of the age; and as she added to her (in certain departments really enchanting) art the charms of beauty, grace, and the finest social culture, which were all wanting in the German singer, she proved for her, especially in Paris, all the more dangerous a rival. Gertrude herself, after she had seen and heard the Todi, was, for perhaps the first time, full of apprehension. However, the day came: she collected herself, summoned up all her powers, sang, and all were in raptures. Gertrude became the topic of the town and of the journals; Paris was divided into two parties, the Todists and Maratists. "Well," asked the queen at Versailles of two courtiers, who, as she knew, had been present at the concert, "which of the two is the greatest singer?" "Undoubtedly the Mara," answered the first. "C'est bientôt dit (c'est bien Todi)," said the second, wittily enough. Could parties but discriminate, they would easily have found that the two artists—like a thousand things in the arts as in life—were not to be placed above or below, but beside each other; and that then they would both prevail without any mutual injury. In the sublimely simple and in brilliant bravura Gertrude surpassed the Todi as greatly as she was surpassed by her in heartfelt, tender, love-inspiring songs.

Gertrude remained through this and the following year in Paris; but as the French were never great friends to concerts, and least of all to serious songs in them—nor are they so to-day; and as Gertrude's proper place was not, as Hiller said, upon the theatre, she resolved to travel farther, and, in fact, to England. Here all was different; here the grand oratorio and great concert music—partly through the decided preference of the king and royal family—had stood in the highest esteem and been most richly supported since the time of Händel. Gertrude, judging herself and her talents now more calmly, found that for just this kind of music she was suited, as no other one beside herself.

But before we accompany her to England, it may be advisable to glance once more at her domestic and affectional relations, and then close this mournful chapter as briefly as possible, once for all, although we may have to anticipate the course of her life somewhat.

Mara had brought things to so bad a pass in Paris, and again in London with his vicious habits, and even in his own house with his wife, that her attachment to him could not but grow cold at last. She separated from him, and, as she settled a not inconsiderable support on him for life, peaceably. He started off with his violoncello and his bad tricks, and roved about through Germany, where finally, though somewhat late, he came to a melancholy end. Thus Gertrude had come to see that this man was good for nothing and entirely unworthy of the great sacrifice which she had made to him; she had learned wisdom, but only for this special case. Even when I met her personally in 1802, consequently in her fifty-third year, she had a good-looking friend and companion of about four and twenty with her. He was named Signor Florio, and of his merits there was absolutely nothing visible to others, except that he played the flute indifferently well. We leave this connection, with all the curious stories which the Berliners knew how to tell at that time; we leave earlier matters connected with it, letting them all rest, and merely single out two brief remarks, which appear necessary to complete the picture of this remarkable woman.

Gertrude, when she was once won by a man, gave him unconditionally and unreservedly her all—her money-chest included. The consequence was, that when she came to look into it, in spite of the sums upon sums that had kept flowing in, she found it empty; that of the hundreds of thousands which she had cleared in England alone, there was absolutely nothing left when she again stepped upon the German soil; that even in places like Berlin, where her two concerts yielded her a clear gain of between three and four thousand thalers, at her departure she possessed less than nothing; and that now, in her old age, especially since an accident has befallen her, which we shall mention in due time, she possesses scarcely anything. Intimacy with a certain class of men, with all that it involved, as well as the withdrawal of better persons of both sexes, who could not and might not sustain any relation with such men: to these two causes it was owing that Gertrude, in all that good society teaches or compels, in all that one unconsciously derives from it, was so utterly deficient, that those who had not been informed of it beforehand must have found it altogether strange. Besides her art, there was nothing in her to interest but a certain true-heartedness and good nature, unless, indeed, one should be interested in the very union in one and the same person of such extremely narrow culture with such deep sense and high conception of her art.

Let this close this whole chapter of her life, and we will now resume the thread of her history where we let it drop.

In 1784 she went to London. Her fame had long preceded her, she was received with the greatest honour. She possessed the advantage, no where more necessary than in England, of speaking the language of the country with considerable fluency; she had learned it while a child, and still practised it industriously. The Prince of Wales, afterwards king, became her protector, and every one knows what such protection can do even in England. Since the king kept no private music of any consequence, but only supported the public oratorios, especially those which had been so dear to him through his whole life, Gertrude made her first appearance in the Pantheon, and gained, besides the most brilliant reception, in two weeks 15,000 thalers. There was now no success for any concert in which Gertrude did not sing; so, too, her singing had to lend lustre to the great social parties of the nobility, and as the Englishman generally covets nothing, as he does nothing, in vain, she had followed the counsel of her friends and fixed the price for every piece she sang at three hundred thalers; this was paid, and often more than this. Far greater was the fame and popular sympathy which she acquired, however, by assisting in the colossal concerts, founded and for some time kept up annually by Salomon and Cramer (both Germans) in celebration of the memory of Händel in the immense interior of Westminster Abbey. Here the religious oratorios exclusively of that great master, never and nowhere surpassed in that form of composition, were produced, under the patronage of the monarch and the entire royal family, by an assemblage of at first more than two hundred singers and three hundred and fifty instrumentalists (?)—afterwards increased to a thousand—with an effect of which no one can have an adequate conception if he was not there to feel it. Händel, though a German, was regarded as the national composer, and accordingly this whole enterprise was considered a national one, and, since the entire proceeds were destined for the widows and orphans of deceased musicians, it became an obligatory act of benevolence. Certainly most worthy, as well as genuine old English views; and they inspired a brilliant welcome and a universal esteem towards the members who bore prominent parts in the performance. Among these participants was by all means Gertrude—nay, at the head of the singers and delivering the principal parts, which Händel usually gave to the first soprano, she was, next to the projectors, the most shining member of them all. For here first, here, as no where before or since, she found the place where she could exhibit her most peculiar excellence in all its power, and fulness, and effectiveness. In that vast place she could display her extraordinary organ; in the simplicity and grandeur of the composition, her simple and grandiose style of singing; in the expressive, the supremely true inventions of the master, how thoroughly she comprehended him and had become imbued with his spirit, his intentions, and his style. Here, too, she could try her capacity upon thousands of hearers; she could not only render the ever significant words intelligible to every mind, but she could convey each syllable, each accent with the most vital, penetrating power to every heart. Even to this day, men, whose opinion is the best authority, remember with what astonishment and joyful enthusiasm, with what power, what grand expression of the firmest and most unqualified confidence she sang the oft-returning, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," in that celebrated air of Händel's Messiah, and singing spake, and speaking emphasized, attuning every hearer to the same feeling, and wafting all their souls aloft with her's. This, just this, was what no other singer but the Mara ever did or could do, and here was the culminating point of her art, as here too was its most brilliant triumph.

By these productions, as we have said, she kindled the enthusiasm even of the multitude toward her; and as this festival was annually repeated, and she stood at the head of the singers with the same ascendancy each time, she could rekindle the enthusiasm, and keep it fresh. Hence it came, that scarcely any public concert met with favour in which Gertrude did not appear; accordingly the managers had to solicit her assistance, and she, or rather her purse-bearer, used to grant it at the highest prices. Even the Italian theatre had to conform to the one wish of the public, and the other of the singer.

Meanwhile she soon had occasion to taste, together with the richest rewards and greatest distinctions, certain old, well-known Anglicisms of a wholly different sort, and she had to put up with them for better or for worse. Everybody knows the marvellously strict distinction made in England in the general opinion and treatment of things in the abstract and things in the concrete. The Court, or the persons who compose it, even the highest—what a difference it makes! The government, the administration, or the persons of whom it consists—what a difference! So too, and far more so, in the case of less exalted objects; here, briefly speaking, in the opinion of the multitude everything is—merchandise; for all merchandise, money; for good merchandise, much money: the receiver and the giver—they are nothing. Accordingly the singer, as a personified singing voice, deserves to be highly prized and richly paid: further than that, considered as a person, she is nought. We will cite a single example.*

Gertrude's fame had spread from the metropolis into the other great cities of England; these also wished to hear her, for a rich remuneration. This was the case with Oxford. She arrived there. In the concert, that had been prepared for her with all possible splendour, she appeared in one of her greatest, but at the same time most exhausting pieces: a long recitative; the aria, first adagio in long sustained notes, and then the grand allegro, in the most difficult bravura style. The audience were enraptured, Gertrude had finished, and "Da capo!" was the cry. That is too much for human strength: do no such thing! Gertrude comes forward to excuse herself: she is not heard! She bows, expresses by gestures a request that she may say a word: it is not suffered! You get money—a great deal of money: now you must do our pleasure. She does not do it: they hiss, they thump, they scream: then she turns round, and goes. How? Does she show her back to the audience—a thing which the actor on the stage may never do, but make his exit backwards, in the best way he can? The tumult grows more fearful: she waits it through, the whiles an instrumental piece is played, which they let pass in quiet. But now she must come on with her second aria. The instant she appears the tumult breaks out anew, and will not end. This time it costs her more exertion to control her sensibility: meanwhile she lets the orchestra play the ritornel to the aria. As soon as she commences, all is still: when she has ended, the storm breaks out anew. Now, from suppressed excitement and from exhaustion, she can no longer sustain herself upon her feet; to turn round and go off she dares not venture: a stool stands near—she seats herself. But that was a new offence: what serves must stand. So now she is solemnly hissed off. Nor was that enough; but the next day she gets from the Chancellor of the University, Dr. Chapman a formal warning never again to brighten the University of Oxford with her singing; and the newspaper contains the following article: "There have already been repeated complaints of the unmannerliness of Madame Mara; but since the Oxford men have become her teachers, she is on the point of putting the finishing touch to her education." Gertrude had inserted, by way of answer (for the newspapers, of course, are free!): "An attack of pleurisy, under which I was already suffering in Berlin, forbids my singing or standing too long at a time. And as no positive order with regard to standing or sitting has ever fallen under my observation, I am sure that I have not deserved such unfeeling and unjust treatment as I have experienced here. The Herr Doctor Chapman has my sympathy."

(To be concluded in our next.)

* Even Joseph Haydn, although world-renowned and honoured and especially in England, had there to taste the same experience. It is well known that Salomon had invited him to London to his grand concerts, under the condition that he would write something new for every concert, and conduct the work himself. To this we owe twelve of his finest symphonies. When the great master made his first appearance in the orchestra, to commence his direction, all the members, without previous concert, rose from an instinctive feeling of respect and love. This was a thing that had only wont to occur when the king or some one of the royal family entered the boxes: how was it to be suffered here? The public hissed and thumped, and screamed out, "Fiddlers! Fiddlers!" till the men, terrified, had resumed their seats and Haydn had caused the first chord to be sounded.

HARMONY AND MELODY.

HARMONY is the heart, the mainspring and origin of music. Harmony is the elder sister, rather say the parent of Melody. Harmony is first, as Love is; Melody is derived from it, as Intelligence is derived from Love. Harmony is founded purely in nature, her immediate offspring. The vibrations of a tone generate first the tones which harmonize with it. Each sound naturally accompanies itself with the other notes of its accord. You have but to listen to the sound of a bell, or the string of an instrument tuned to any note, to become aware of its Third and Fifth in higher octaves, forming the perfect Common Chord. Above that, the Perfect Seventh, and so on.

In horns and trumpets these harmonic intervals yield themselves spontaneously as you blow harder. They are the natural scale of all such instruments. This natural or harmonic scale of notes, produced in this way, is very different from the melodic scale. It ascends by Thirds, the most pleasing consonant intervals. Melody results from dissonance, from the introduction or interpolation between these harmonic Thirds of the notes which do not accord with them, simply because they differ less in pitch. Melody deals with smaller intervals, and constructs its scale in a more finely graduated ascending progression, wherein each sound is succeeded by the one whose pitch is least above its own. Now the concord between two notes is (to a certain point) inversely as their distances; those which are immediately contiguous to each other will not harmonize.

Harmony, therefore, classes by agreement and affinity; Melody classes by differences and antipathies, which it arranges into beautiful and complete series. Harmony is the expansion of the ONE; Melody is the escape from unity, the tendency to individuality and variety. Harmony is fixed and constant; Melody is discursive. Harmony gives all in One; Melody gives one after another, and would straightway run off into utter forgetfulness of its first starting-point, did not the centripetal law of Harmony, lurking behind, though unperceived, recall its steps and round its course into a graceful orbit. So all thought is prompted by a sentiment and must be true to that, or what consistency is there after all in all its logic?—Harmony, then, is the combining, unitary tendency in music; it constitutes the atmosphere of the picture, and determines its whole sphere of sentiment. It is the pervading spirit of the composition, whether song, or symphony or chorus. If it is not expressed in the way of an actual accompaniment, still the truly musical hearer feels it to be understood and implied, as the invisible ground-work of the air or tune.

Melody, on the contrary, (which of course implies Rhythm) is the unfolding and spreading out of harmonies or chords into orderly sequence, connecting the wide consonant intervals by intermediate notes, which can only bear to be heard in succession, (excepting of course those cases in which discord is desirable as preparation for harmony.) It is the restless and progressive tendency, which wearies of the richest, grandest and the most complete effect of simultaneous concord, and stimulates each part or voice to detach itself and move along. It would be taking steps continually; it denies or qualifies what was last asserted and takes a new position, passes into a tone that bears no necessary affinity to the first, and through this to another equally discordant with the second, but agreeing with the first.

Her first work, therefore, is to construct a scale of tones through which she may range. Remember, Harmony is secretly at the bottom of this scale, though Melody seems to make it of herself. She (Melody) graduates the sounds into a regular series of Seven, corresponding to the seven colours of the rainbow; and through the whole range of audible sounds this peculiar series of Seven repeats itself, higher or lower, in such wise that the same degrees or steps in these series correspond and form an accord of perfect identity. Each of the seven notes derives its character from its relation to the Key-note or Tonic of the Scale or Series; and the Diatonic scale itself, so called, is but the unfolding in gradual sequence of what is implied in one tone. Presently it appears that each of these seven may become in turn a Key-note and may be unfolded into its Scale or Series of Seven in a similar manner. But the intervals between the seven notes are not of equal lengths; two of them are only half-steps: to form a new scale, therefore, based on a new tone, new notes must be introduced. Hence the origin of the Five Semi-tones, the Flats and Sharps, which are the transitional element, by whose mediation only can there be any modulation into new keys or scales. These, ranged in gradual progression amongst the original Seven, give us a new Series of Twelve, or what is termed the Chromatic Scale.

Harmony creates combinations, therefore, while Melody creates series. Harmony attracts, melts, blends into one; Melody distributes, bound, however, in her distributions by the nature of Harmony, which generates all her tones, and which says: "Of the infinitely various shades of tone imaginable between any two given degrees of pitch, thou shalt use only these tones and no others, these which are of such fixed proportionate distances from each other, that their very differences may help to enrich my harmony."

Now mark the intimate connection between Melody and Discord. Discords (so long as no sounds enter which do not belong to the true scale) are not only tolerable in composition, but they even enrich and enliven the effects of Harmony. The discordant element always is thrust in by the movements of Melody. When what should be successive becomes simultaneous, there is temporary discord. Hold back a note that should move on, so that it finds itself in the midst of a new chord, and a certain jar of dissonance ensues. So if a note of a coming chord is anticipated, while the last chord continues to sound. In fact discord, (such as is legitimate in music, that is, such as does not borrow any sounds out of the prescribed scale or series,) is merely the confounding of tenses, Present, Past and Future. As the full ranks advance, a member of one falls back into the rank behind his own, or overtakes the one before. Have we not states of feeling much analogous to this, and is not the momentary dissonance of the co-presence of two states of consciousness, the meeting but not blending of a past state with the present, followed as it always soon is by a happy resolution, one of the richest experiences? Our passions have their laws of Concord, Discord, and Modulation, too, by which their music grows so rich and complex.

M. FÉTIS.

THE following sketch is abridged from the French and German:—

François Joseph Fétis, the learned musical theorist, critic, and journalist, known also as an industrious composer, was born at Mons, in Belgium, in 1784. He manifested a passion and talent for music at a very early age, and had his instruction from his father, who was organist at the Cathedral and conductor of the concerts in that city. He entered the Conservatory at Paris, in the year 1800, where he became the pupil of Rey in harmony. In 1804, he studied under Albrechtsberger, in Vienna. He tried his fortunes in many branches of musical composition, not excepting symphonies and the larger forms of church music, but his true vocation more and more developed itself in the sphere of musical learning and criticism. He published first, in 1823, his "Traité élémentaire d' harmonie et accompagnement," (Elementary Treatise on Harmony and Accompaniment); afterwards, in 1824, a valuable treatise on counterpoint and fugue ("Traité du contrepoint et de la fugue"), which was adopted as the basis of instruction at the Conservatory. His next work was a memoir on the question; "What was the merit of the Flemish musicians in the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries?" which received a prize from the Royal Institute of the Netherlands. In 1829, he published his "Traité de l'accompagnement de la partition" (Treatise on the Accompaniment of a Score), and in 1830 his popular little work, which has been translated into English and German, "La musique mise à la portée de tout le monde" (Music made plain to all the world).

In 1827 Fétis commenced the publication of his very valuable musical journal, "La Revue Musicale," which he continued without interruption till November 1835, nearly nine years. Of the labours and responsibility of this task we may form some idea from his own description of it in his "Biographie Universelle:" "With the exception of ten or twelve articles, Fétis edited the first five years alone, making an amount of matter equal to about 8000 octavo pages. During the first three years he gave every week twenty-four pages of small, close type, and in the fourth year thirty-two pages of a larger size. During this time he had to be present at all representations of new operas or revivals of old ones, and the débuts of singers, at all kinds of concerts; to visit the schools of music; inquire into new systems of teaching; visit the workshops of musical instrument makers to render account of new inventions or improvements: analyze what appeared most important in the new music; read what was published, in France or foreign countries, upon the theory, didactics, or history of music; take cognizance of the journals relating to this art, published in Germany, in Italy, and in England; and even consult a great many scientific Reviews, for facts neglected in these journals; and finally keep up an active correspondence;—and all this without neglecting his duties as professor of composition in the Conservatory, or interrupting other serious labours." At the same time M. Fétis edited the musical "Feuilleton" in the newspaper "Le Temps," and says that several times he has written the following articles upon a new opera on the same day, amounting in all to about twenty-five octavo pages—one for his own Revue, one for the Temps, and one for the National; each article considered the opera under a different point of view, and all three appeared the day but one after the performance.

Fétis commenced the collection of materials for his great biographical dictionary of musicians as early as 1806. The first volume appeared in 1837 (Brussels: Meline, Cans, and Co.), and the continuation in 1844 (Mayence: Schott and Sons). It is the most complete work of the kind in existence, filling eight large octavo volumes, under the title of Biographie Universelle des Musiciens, et Bibliographie Générale de la Musique. It is a work valuable for reference, though the Germans complain—doubtless with some justice—of the partiality displayed in this and other writings of Fétis.

In the year 1833, Fétis was appointed director of the newly-established Belgian Conservatoire at Brussels, which position he still holds. His musical journal has also been revived for some years past, under the title of Revue et Gazette Musicale, and principally edited by himself and his son. He has also continued to compose music, to write and publish books and treatises, theoretic, critical, philosophical, and didactic, and to give historical concerts and lectures upon music. For a fuller catalogue of his works, see article Fétis in his Biog. Universelle.

PROVINCIAL.

MANCHESTER.—GERMAN AND ITALIAN OPERAS.—(From our own Correspondent).—Mr. Knowles is a very Lumley for perseverance under difficulties. Herr Reichardt's illness still continues—a most awkward affair for the management, which has disturbed all the arrangements for the season. La Favorita was changed on Thursday week for Lucia di Lammermoor, and on the Friday following, when Il Seraglio was promised, a selection from Die Zauberflöte had to be given in the form of a concert, eked out with the first, and a (so-called) third act of Fidelio, which was anything but satisfactory to the subscribers. Nevertheless, what could Mr. Knowles do, while one half of his company were giving the Favorita at Liverpool that night? Under these discouraging circumstances, there was a better house and a better performance than might have been anticipated. The dress circle was fairly attended, the pit ditto, upper circle and galleries much as usual. Mozart's noble music, well performed by principals, chorus, and band, alone saved the concert from being a fiasco. It doubtless did seem a flat affair to see Formes come on dressed like an undertaker, with the male chorus as his attendant mutes; but, when they gave the grand aria, with chorus, "O Isis und Osiris," they proved anything but mutes. Mdlle. Agnes Büry gave the celebrated song of the Queen of Night, with brilliancy, but it is somewhat beyond her means. Mdlle. Rudersdorff sang with much feeling and expression—too much, perhaps—'Ach ich fuhl' es ist verschwunden." Formes then gave a grand and impressive reading of the magnificent aria allotted to Sarastro, "In diesen Heiligen Hallen," which was rapturously encored. The chorus, "O Isis," followed, with its lovely termination, Formes assisting in it; then the trio, by Madame Rudersdorff, and Herren Zapf and Formes, "Sol ich dich," wound up by the final chorus to the Zauberflote in a most satisfactory manner. The glorious overture, we should have stated, preceded the concert, and after the selection the overture to Fidelio was given in good style, and the first act of Beethoven's work passed off with éclat. The only change from its first performance was the appearance of Mdlle. Rudersdorff in the part of Fidelio in place of Madame Caradori. Suffice it to say of this lady, that she acquitted herself so well in the character of Leonora, that a general desire has been expressed amongst the habitués to hear her in the part through the entire opera on some one occasion before the season closes. Madame Rudersdorff does not make such good points as Madame Caradori, neither has she her energy; but she is more careful, and less seldom disappoints, if not offends. Mdlle. Sedlatzek and Herr Zapf again filled the part of Marcellina and Jacquino, and again satisfactorily; while the younger Formes (Herr Hubert) did a little better than before as Pizarro. Herr Formes himself, however, made multitudinous amends for all fraternal drawbacks. He was as glorious as ever in Rocco, again being encored in the "Song of Gold." Madame Rudersdorff obtained great applause through the first act, and displayed no lack of feeling in her delivery of the grand aria, "Abscheulischen." The prisoner's chorus went indifferently—how rarely it satisfies—then came a gap, until the grand finale, which suffered infinitely from Herr Zapf having to attempt the high and difficult music of Florestan. Prior to the finale being given—here designated a third act, why, I know not—the audience had a rich treat in hearing an admirable performance of Beethoven's wonderful overture to Leonora. Altogether, the visitors must have left the theatre well gratified, and I myself was really pleased in spite of my extreme repugnance to selections in general, and mutilations of any opera in particular, preferring, under all circumstances, to hear any one opera entire and in its integrity, to portions or selections from half-a-dozen chefs-d'œuvre.

On Saturday we had a very creditable performance of Lucrezia Borgia, for the first time, being the eighth opera produced this season. Again does Mr. Knowles deserve a word of praise for the highly effective scenery and the rich appropriate dresses. The representation of Venice, in the prologue, with the grand canal and the passing gondolas, lighted up, was most admirable. The music in the prologue I have not heard better given in Manchester. The charming aria, "Come e' bello," and Gennaro's narrative air, of course, won the most applause. In the great scene of the first act, the acting of the three principals was striking and powerful. Herr Formes and Madame Caradori were especially applauded, as the jealous husband and distracted mother. Alfonso is not one of Herr Formes' best achievements, however. Modern Italian music is not congenial to his style and voice, both of which are ponderous as powerful. In fact, there is neither metal enough nor weight enough in the character of Duke Alfonso for Herr Formes. Madame Caradori's Lucrezia, on the other hand, is one of her very best parts. A little occasional coarseness is its principal drawback. Both artistes were admirably dressed. I must convey a strong word of praise to Mdlle. Sedlatzek for her judicious performance of Orsini—a part intended for a contralto (which she is not). The celebrated drinking song, "Il segreto per esser felice," of course, had to be transposed, but this made but little difference to the audience, who cared not what key it was sung in, so it was sung well, and encored it with bravos. Another word of praise is due to Signor Octave Benedetti, who dressed, acted and sung the part of Gennaro, considering all things, capitally. I missed Herr Reichardt, however, on more than one occasion.

On Monday Fidelio was again performed to a much thinner house, we are sorry to say,—Mesdames Caradori and Sedlatzek, and Herr Formes and his brother resuming their parts as before. Still no Herr Reichardt, I regret very much to add. Herr Zapf attempted Florestan; but it was only an attempt—the less said about it the better. The second act, so great with Reichardt, failed of its effect without him,—utterly, and was but slightly redeemed by the singing of the principals and chorus in the glorious finale—because even here, Herr Reichardt was greatly missed. The prolonged illness of the admirable tenor, is much to be regretted on every account.

On Tuesday there were more mishaps, changes, and disappointments. In the first place, Il Barbiere was announced to be given—being the ninth opera produced since the season commenced. The cast, however, did not tempt "your own correspondent" to be present. Mdlle. Agnes Büry's Rosina might do very well; but we had no very great curiosity to see or hear Signor Fortini in Figaro, Herr Zelger in Bartolo, or Signor Grégorio—alias Mr. Gregory—in Basilio. It appears, however, that Signor Fortini either was really ill, or felt his own incompetency; at any rate, his indisposition was assigned as a reason for the opera being changed to Lucrezia Borgia; at the last moment, this again had to be changed. Madame Caradori, not expecting to be wanted, was not to be found when wanted; and, in due haste Fidelio was finally substituted, Mdlle. Rudersdorff—who is always ready to do every thing at any notice—being suddenly called upon to undertake that which her admirers had so much desired to see and hear her in—viz., the part of Fidelio through the entire opera. The Manchester Guardian speaks in high terms, not only of Madame Rudersdorff's readiness in thus meeting the exigencies of the management, but of her acting and singing throughout the opera. These repeated and sudden changes are very disastrous to the speculation, and can hardly be amended. No one can tell what he may see and hear until the overture is played, and the curtain rises. The remaining operas promised to be done the week out were—Wednesday, Lucrezia Borgia; Thursday, Fidelio; Friday, Il Barbiere; and Saturday, Les Huguenots; and on Friday, I see Fidelio was to be performed at Liverpool.

Ibid.—The Lancashire Choral Union, of whose performance we spoke last week, made their second appearance on Saturday evening last, and were encored in their different pieces. A Miss Megson made her first appearance on the occasion. She is, we understand, a resident of Manchester, and a pupil of Mrs. Wood (formerly the celebrated Miss Paton), who is at present giving vocal instruction in Manchester. Miss Megson possesses a mezzo soprano voice, and appears to have followed studiously the advice of one whose experience gives her the best means of conveying correct principles in this particular branch of her art. There was a finish about the style of the young débutante that we do not meet with generally in one so young. She had no less than three encores during the evening, and evidently gave much satisfaction. Mrs. Brooke sang; and Mr. H. Walker's concertina solo, with variations, on a Swiss air, was encored. The concert went off well.—Mr. J. Angus Fairbairn, assisted by the Misses Bennett, has been reviving the late Mr. Wilson's Scotch entertainment, entitled "A Night wi' Burns." On Tuesday last it came off at the Mechanics' Institution, and was well received by a numerous audience.—The Classical Chamber Music Society held a meeting on Monday last, preparatory to the commencement of the third season, at the Town Hall. A committee for the ensuing year was appointed, and vacancies in the list of subscribers were filled up from the list of candidates. From the announcement recently put forth, fixing the dates of the concerts (the first of which takes place on the 16th of November), we find that Mr. Hallé has engaged for the coming season Ernst, Molique, and Piatti.—The American Amphitheatre for equestrian performances has been converted into a Philharmonic Hall, which, it is said, will be fitted up so as to contain three thousand five hundred persons. An orchestra is being erected for one hundred performers, and arrangements are made to render the acoustic qualities of the building as perfect as possible. The interior will be divided into dress circle, stalls, pit, and gallery, and when completed will present a very elegant appearance.

Leeds.—Concerts for the People.—(From a Correspondent). The first of the fourth series of these popular concerts took place on Saturday last, at the Stock Exchange; there was an overflowing audience, hundreds being disappointed at not being able to gain admission. The principals consisted of Mrs. Sunderland, Mrs. Gill, Messrs. Dyson, Delavanti, and Pew, with Mr. Jabez Pool as pianist. Among the effective morceaux I would name the new song by Mr. Hime: "Napier's address to the Fleet," sung by Mr. Delavanti, which was received with enthusiasm. Mrs. Sunderland's indisposition was manifested in her performances throughout the evening. Mr. Pew executed two airs with variations on the violin, accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Pool. Macfarren's pleasing duet, "Two merry gipsies," was well given by Mesdames Sunderland and Gill. Mr. Dyson, one of our promising tenors, was encored in "Annie Laurie," when he gave Hobbs' new song, "What will they say in England?" The rest of the programme was creditably performed, including "Jenny Lind's singing lesson," "Our opening day," by Bishop, "Throughout the world," by Balfe," "What is the old man thinking," etc., etc. Mr. Delavanti amused the audience by singing, "I'm not myself at all," also with the "Old Irish gintleman." Mr. Delavanti would be more successful if he did not endeavour so much to conciliate the vulgar taste. The National Anthem, in which the audience heartily joined, concluded this excellent cheap concert. The second concert will be given in the Music Hall.

Ibid.—The Theatre Royal was opened for the season on Monday night last, when Mr. Wild, the low comedian, and Miss F. Williams appeared in a round of their characters. Last evening they took their benefit. On Monday next, Mr. and Miss Vandenhoff will appear on a short engagement.

Bradford.—Mr. William Jackson delivered a lecture in the theatre of the Mechanics' Institute, on Monday evening last, on the music of Händel. The lecture was illustrated vocally and instrumentally by the members of the Bradford Choral Society. Mr. Winn was the solo vocalist; Mr. Scholey was the leader; and Mr. Priestly played the violoncello. The lecture consisted of an interesting biographical sketch of the great composer, with a description of his voluminous works, and an able analysis of his genius and characteristics. The attendance was good. At the end of the lecture a vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Jackson, with unanimous acclamation.

Brighton.—The Orchestral Union Concerts are announced to be continued for another week, but the attendance has not been such as to encourage the director to any further extension of time. We are sorry for Mr. Mellon, as well as for the visitors and residents, who apparently fail to appreciate the high order of music presented to them, and the superior manner in which it has been executed. Musical taste must indeed be at a very low ebb when the works of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Haydn, and others of the giants of music, interpreted by an able and practised body of instrumentalists, cannot command an audience. During the last week the overture to Oberon has been played nightly, as well as the overtures to Der Freischutz and Figaro. Mr. Reed's obligato accompaniment on the violoncello, to "Batti, batti," sung by Mrs. Newton Frodsham, was highly creditable to his talent, and the lady's version of the song was in her very best style. At the theatre the Sea of Ice, and The Rivals, have been played during the week by Mrs. Elmore, Miss Castleton, and Messrs. Elmore, Nye, and Parke. The houses have been very good.

Bath.—Mr. H. Simms's concert took place on Saturday morning at the Assembly-rooms, and was well attended. Mrs. Endersohn, Mrs. Lockey, Mr. Lockey, Mr. Hobbs, and Mr. H. Phillips, Madame Clara Novello, and Mr. Sims Reeves were the vocalists. Madame Clara Novello sang Verdi's "Ernani, Ernani involami," with an ease that quite electrified the audience. Mr. Sims Reeves's chef d'œuvre on this occasion was Beethoven's "Adelaida." He sang it with a finished excellence of tone and manner that might, indeed, be called "perfect." Every note proclaimed him an artist in the highest sense of the word. In Frank Mori's new National Song, "England and Victory," Mr. Sims Reeves elicited thunders of applause. Some favourite glees, etc., were admirably sung by Mesdames Endersohn and Lockey, and Messrs. Lockey, Hobbs, and H. Phillips.

Liverpool.—Mr. Copeland has produced Sheridan Knowles' play of William Tell, at the Theatre Royal, having taken advantage of the connection of an operatic band and chorus with the company, to give a portion of the vocal and ballet music of Rossini's Gillaume Tell. The result, though witnessed by very thin audiences, was highly satisfactory, for in addition to Mr. Barry Sullivan's impersonation of the Swiss hero, the chorus, to whom Rossini's magnificent and spirit-stirring strains were evidently familiar, sang with much vigour, while the exertions of Miss Rosina Wright and the corps de ballet rendered the whole performance pleasing as it was novel.

BIRKENHEAD.—The second of the series of subscription concerts took place at the Craven Rooms, on Thursday last, under the direction of Mr. Percival. The attendance was good. A leading feature was the playing of Master Radcliffe on the flute, highly promising for one so young. Mr. Percival executed Henselt's piece, "Un chant d'amour" and Doehler's Tarantella.

BRISTOL.—Miss Rainforth is about to visit this town with an entertainment comprising a sketch of Prince Charles Edward, by Professor Aytoun, and a selection of Jacobite and national songs.

READING.—Mesdames Clara Novello and Lockey, and Mrs. Endersohn, and Messrs. Sims Reeves, Hatton, Henry Phillips and party have been giving concerts here. The attraction was great, and the proceeds must have satisfied the highest anticipations. Madame Clara Novello was well received, and was very successful in her well-known chef-d'œuvre "Lidi amati." Mr. Sims Reeves, was, as usual, magnificent both in his solo and concerted pieces; and in Hatton's ballad, "Good-bye, sweetheart," he was rapturously encored. Mr. Hatton gave the "Harmonious blacksmith" as a pianoforte solo, and sang the "Little fat, grey man."

FOREIGN.

PARIS.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The sudden departure of Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli from the Opera having completely deranged all the plans for the production of the new opera by MM. Scribe and Verdi, which was put in rehearsal on the first of this month, M. Verdi has officially informed the management that he withdraws his score. M. Néri-Baraldi, who, as I announced last-week, is engaged, will make his début as Masaniello, in La Muette de Portici, early next month. The dispute between M. Roqueplan and Mad. Guy-Stephan having been terminated by the Government's assuming the management of the Opera, Mad. Guy-Stephan will make her re-appearance this winter. At the Théâtre-Italien, Matilda di Shabran will be revived after the three representations of Otello. The principal parts will be sustained by Mdmes. Bosio, Borghi-Mamo, MM. Luchesi, Gassier, Rossi, and Ardavani. M. Ragani does not intend producing any of his promised novelties before December. Mdmes. Bosio and Borghi-Mamo and M. Gassier have appeared together in Semiramide, and been very favourably received. Two novelties are in rehearsal at the Opéra-Comique; the first is in one act by MM. Lockroy and Grisar, the authors of Bonsoir, Monsieur Pantalon, and is intended for Mdlles. Lefebre, Lemercier, MM. Jourdan, and Faure; the second, in two acts, is from the pen of M. F. Bazin, the author of Madelon. At the Théâtre-Lyrique there is nothing new, La Promise, with Mad. Marie Cabel, and Le Billet de Marguerite, with Mad. Deligne-Lauters, M. and Mad. Meillet, having lost none of their attraction. The four imperial theatres: the Grand Opéra, the Opéra-Comique, the Théâtre-Français, and the Odéon were closed on the day of Marshal de St. Arnaud's funeral as a mark of respect.

VIENNA.—(From our own Correspondent).—There is little doing here in musical matters, and my communication will, consequently, be somewhat short. The only event worth noticing is the appearance, at the Imperial Opera-house, of Mad. Herrmann as Lucrezia, in Lucrezia Borgia. This lady sings tolerably, but acts indifferently.—On account of the sudden indisposition of Madlle. La Grua, Mad. Herrmann undertook the character of Valentine, the last time Les Huguenots was represented, although she had never played it before. She acquitted herself creditably.—Madlle. Marie Taglioni is the great attraction in the ballet.—The Emperor has, by a decree, dated Schönbrunn, October 7th, been pleased to continue to the Academie der Tonkunst, for a period of three years from the 1st January, 1855, the subsidy granted by him, out of his private purse, up to the above-named period, from the 29th December, 1851.—The number of the Oestreiche Illustrirte Zeitung, of the 15th of this month, publishes Chopin's portrait and fac-simile, accompanied by the following notice:—

"Chopin ranks very high among the first celebrities of the world of art in modern times, for he belongs to the most genial composers and talented musicians. He may reckon with certainty upon a brilliant Future. We, therefore, beg to present our readers with a very successful portrait of him, together with his fac-simile."

Upon this, the Neue Wiener Musik-Zeitung makes the following remarks:—

"Poor Chopin will, no doubt, at some future period, return the writer of the above article his sincere thanks; in the mean time, we beg to inform the gentleman that Chopin died at Paris, in 1850, and that his musical reputation was established long before the Oestreiche Illustrirte Zeitung was ever thought of."

The Academie der Tonkunst have elected Herr Heinrich Proch president.

BERLIN.—(From our own Correspondent).—A grand performance took place on the King's birthday, when Gluck's Orpheus and Eurydice was given. The entertainments commenced with Weber's Jubel-Ouvertüre, followed by a prologue, spoken by Herr Hendrichs. The National Anthem (the music of which, by the way, is that of our "God save the Queen") was vociferously demanded, the audience joining in it, and afterwards giving three thundering cheers for his Majesty. The execution of the opera was satisfactory. Madlle. Johanna Wagner was much applauded in the character of Orpheus, as were also Mad. Köster (Eurydice), and Mad. Herrenburger (Amor).—On the same evening, a grand concert took place in the Palace of Sans-Souci, at Potsdam. Among the guests invited, were the members of the Royal Family, a number of other Royal personages, and several of the principal inhabitants of the town. The Königlicher Domchor, under the direction of Herr Neithardt, sang a "Kyrie" by Franz, a "Graduale" by Shüttky, various Lieder by Mendelssohn, Esser, and Taubert, and also one for male voices by Herr Abt. Dr. Kullack, pianist to the King, accompanied on the pianoforte. Among the instrumentalists were Signor Bazzini, and M. Vivier, who literally electrified his hearers.—M. Bazzini has concluded his series of concerts with much success.—The Königliche Capelle have given a concert for the sufferers by the inundations in Silesia. Mad. Herrenburger sang an air by Mozart, with obbligato pianoforte accompaniment. The second part of the programme comprised the music of Beethoven's Egmont, Herr Hendrichs speaking the words and Mad. Herrenburger singing the vocal music.—The Vaterländischer Verein gave a concert on the 14th inst. A young lady from Stockholm, Mdlle. Löogren, sang two airs and several Swedish songs, with a success which promises well, although the songs, popularities of Jenny Lind, are at present beyond her powers. Herr Julius Stern, Kammer-Virtuose of his Highness the Prince of Hohenzollern-Hechingen, played two violin solos. Theodore Formes also assisted.

COLOGNE.—Il Barbiere von Siviglia has proved most attractive, Herr Becker sustains the part of Figaro, and Mdlle. Westerstrand that of Rosina.

HALLE.—A grand concert was given on the 7th inst. in the theatre, by Herr Thieme, assisted by all the local Männergesangvereine, and the two Musikchöre of Herren John and Tittmann. The first part included a symphonic fantasia for full orchestra, by Herr W. Tschirsch, as well as a dramatic cantata, "Der Sängerkampf," by the same composer, who conducted his works himself. The second part consisted of Weber's pianoforte concerto in F minor, performed by Madame Tischner, and a grand double chorus for male voices from Herr Wagner's Lohengrin.

MEMEL.—The theatre was one of the buildings burnt down in the late terrible fire.

DANZIG.—Herr Genée has opened the season with Tannhäuser.

HANOVER.—Herr Nicolai's Lustigen Weiber von Windsor has proved very successful. The singers exert themselves to the utmost, and the stage-carpenter and scene-painter have achieved wonders.

ULM.—A performance of Handel's oratorio of Sampson has been given in aid of the funds of the Thomaskirche, by the Association for the Furtherance of Classical Sacred Music, under the direction of Herr Speidel. The solos were sung by Mesdames Marlow, Marschalk, Herren Rauscher and Pischeck.

ITALY.—At the Pergola, at Florence, Verdi's Violetta, or, rather, La Traviata, as it was first called, has improved in public favour. The drinking song in the first act is encored every evening. Mad. Cortesi has highly distinguished herself in her part, and produces a powerful sensation in the grand scena of the third act. Signor Fraschini has a good rôle, and endeavours to make the most of it. His voice is as powerful as ever. The part of the barytone is well filled by Signor Baraldi. On the 18th inst. Mdlle. Sophie Fuoco made her début, and was enthusiastically received, although the new ballet seems to be but a poor affair, and the music poorer still.—At the Pagliano, Verdi's Il Trovatore is drawing good houses. The company is liked by the public, especially Signor Landi, the new tenor, who is said to have a good voice, an excellent method, and a fair knowledge of dramatic effect. The orchestra is not as good as might be desired; although it has a fair proportion of clever musicians, there is a want of ensemble, which mars the effect, and not unfrequently leads to confusion.—At Naples, the theatre of San Carlo seems to be in a fair way of doing well, although as yet there has been no novelty excepting the ballo department. We have already spoken of the first night of the season, when I Lombardi was performed. This opera has since been repeated several times, and Mad. De Roissi and Sig. Colletti seem to have established their supremacy with the Neapolitan public. The next opera given was Norma, with Mad. Medori and Signori Pancani and Arati. The opera seems to have gone flatly, owing to the inefficiency of the Adalgisa, played by Mad. Maximiliani. In a few days Ernani will be brought out, in which Mad. Medori will play the principal part. The new grand ballet is entitled Parisne in Persia, and was extremely successful. The scenery, painted by Sig. Venier, is described as magnificent; the music, by Sig. Giaquinto, as lively and well written; and among the dancers, Mdlle. Taglioni and Sig. Meramte were highly distinguished and loudly applauded. The ballet is in five acts, so that we most positively decline to enter into the argument.—A new opera house was inaugurated at Bari on the 4th of October.

Rome.—It is reported that the Impresarii in this city will not have permission to open their theatres during the current autumn, as the Pope has announced his intention of holding a Jubilee!

Milan, 21st Oct., 1854.—(From our own Correspondent.)—At the I. R. Teatro-Canobbiana, La Fiorina and Il Barbiere have been given alternately for the last fortnight. There have also been two other representations of the Saracena. The whole three operas have been received with about the same success as upon the former occasions. Lucia di Lammermoor will be re-produced in a few days, with the prima donna, Maretta Marinangelli, as the Protagonista. Don Bucefalo, for the appearance of Madame Vetturi-Olivi (expressly engaged), and Il Pirata, with Signora Viola, and Signori Carrion and Della-Santa, are both in rehearsal. Afterwards the new opera of the maestro Torriani is expected. The long-promised new ballet, Ida Badoer, by the coreografo Signor Rota, is to be produced this evening. The favourite danseuse Signora Cucchi, has just been engaged, and will make her appearance in November.

Alessandria (Piedmont.)—The opening of the New-Theatre has been inaugurated with Rigoletto. Gilda, Signora Beltramelli; Maddalena, Signora P. Duclout; Il Duca, Signor Agresti; Rigoletto, Signor D. Mattioli; Sparafucile, Signor Pons. Both the music and the artists have given great satisfaction.

Trieste.—At the Teatro-Grande, Marco Visconti, by Signor E. Petrella was represented on the 11th current. It has had good success, and obtained many re-calls for its composer. The following played principal parts:—Madame Salvini-Donatelli, Signora Borghi-Vietti, the tenore Signor Mirate, the barytone Signor Ferri, the basso Signor Benedetti. The pieces most admired and approved of have been the cavatina of Bice, the terzetto between the prima donna, the tenore, and the basso in the first act; the aria of Marco-Visconti, and the grand finale of the second act; also the aria of the tenore in the third act.

Varese.—The second opera, the Brewer of Preston, has been a "fiasco." The Barbiere di Siviglia was given on the 17th inst., with the prima donna Signora Corbetta; the tenore, Devoti; the barytone, Bartolucci; and the bassi, Favretto and Maccani.

Bologna.—The Gran-Teatro Comunale was opened for the autumn season on the 4th current, with La Zingara of Balfe, interpreted by the prime donne, Signore Piccolomini and Lorenzetti; the tenore, Signor Negrini; the basso, Signor Giacomelli; and the basso-profondo, Signor Nerini. Several representations have been given with the most decided success; the prima donna and the tenore have had numerous re-calls. On the 11th inst., Lucia di Lammermoor was given for the appearance of Madame Persiani, who was enthusiastically received. Edgardo was sustained by Signor Galvani, and Arturo by Signor Corsi.

Ibid.—(From a Correspondent.)—Madame Persiani made her rentrée at the Grand Theatre on the 14th instant, in the part of Lucia, in Lucia di Lammermoor. Her appearance was the signal for a burst of welcome, in the shape of three distinct rounds of applause, from the whole house, which was a most brilliant one, and shewed the estimation in which the Bolognese hold this accomplished vocalist. It is not long since I heard her, but never in my recollection did the extraordinary facility of her execution astonish and delight me more than on this occasion. The enthusiasm of the audience knew no bounds, and the celebrated cantatrice, who for so long was the the delight of the dilettanti both of Paris and London, made an impression, and was received with a welcome, that will long remain in the recollection of the inhabitants of Bologna.

Pavia.—The season commenced on the 14th current with Crispino e la Comare, by the brothers Ricci; the principal parts were sustained by the prima donna, Signora Luigia Vaschetti, the tenore, Signor D'Apice, the buffo, Signor Manari, the barytone, Signor Mazzoni, and the basso, Signor Cervini. The execution was praiseworthy, the prima donna obtaining the first honours.

Sorbsina.—Norma was given on the 15th current for the first opera during the present season, executed by the Signore Rota-Galli (Norma), and A. Fumagelli (Adalgisa); Signor Piccinini (Pollio), and Signor Padovani-Polli (Oroveso.)

Rovigo.—La Traviata, of Verdi, was produced on the 17th inst. with success, interpreted by the prima donna V. Boccabadati, and the Signori Giuglini and Ottaviani.

Genoa.—At the Teatro Carlo Felice the successive representations of Cenerentola have been enthusiastically received. The artists were, Signora Borsi-Deleurie, and the Signori Frizzi, Stocchi-Bottardi, and Bonofos. Le Prigioni d'Edimburgo, of F. Ricci, will be represented in a few days.—The Teatro Apollo is also open, with the dramatic company of Signor F. Livini.

THEATRICAL SPECULATION—HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

(From Bentley's Miscellany.)

It is pleasant to listen to the "gems of the opera," and to applaud the "pets of the ballet;" but this is the bright side of a picture, the darker portion of which is to be found in the account-book of the treasurer. The sums lavished upon foreign art are immense, and the result has too often been, as remarked by a popular writer, that at the end of the season the prima donna retires to her palace on the Lake of Como, whilst the manager adjourns to Basinghall-street. Owen Swiney, it has been stated, encountered ruin at this house early in the past century; and Time, that impartial functionary, has made little distinction in this respect, between the manager of that period and of the present. With the exception of a few seasons—such, for instance, as 1828 and 1829, when Sontag and Malibran were both engaged—the speculation has proved a losing one.

In 1828, Mr. Ebers, the bookseller, published his "Seven Years of the Opera." During that period he had rented and managed the theatre, at an annual average loss of £6,000. This lessee was succeeded by Laporte and Laurent.

Without referring to the reckless expenditure of the rival establishment, where, in 1848, £78,765 were disposed of in little more than sixty nights, incurring a loss of £34,756, we will open a quiet page of the ledger of Her Majesty's Theatre, showing the receipts and expenditure of the house for the season 1834:

Receipts.—Amount of subscriptions, £26,000; taken at the doors, £15,000; M. Laporte's (manager) benefit, £1,000. Total receipts, £42,000.

Expenses.—Principal singers and chorus singers, £10,000: dancers, including corps de ballet, £3,000; rent of theatre, £11,000; orchestra, £7,200; lighting theatre, £1,500; warming ditto, £200; military and police service, £200; bills for posting, £200; advertisements, £120; stage management, £600: figurantes, £200; copying music, £300; legal expenses, £200; box-keepers and check-takers, £200; dresses and dressers, £560; scenery and decorations, £650; washing, £60; sweeping theatre and similar expenses, £100; machinists, £120; door-keepers, £30; servants, etc., £70; sundry expenses, taxes, insurance, repairs, etc., about £1,000; total expenses, £42,510.

By these items it will be seen that, after months of excitement and petty jealousies, the season closed with a loss of only £510—fortunate manager!

Mr. Lumley, the latest conductor of the Opera House, has been added to the list of those who have wielded its managerial bâton and have failed. The year 1853 witnessed the partial dismemberment of this beautiful structure, when some of its properties were scattered by the hammer of the auctioneer, and the house for two seasons has remained with closed doors.—Article: The Theatres of London.

Value of Land in the Eastern Districts of London.—The banks of the Thames above and below the East and West India Docks being nearly exhausted for wharfage purposes, the increase of new wharfs on the River Lee for some miles up has been of late years very remarkable, and land that was only a marsh cannot now be bought under a thousand pounds an acre. New towns are springing up in the direction of Stratford and Bow, every available field being eagerly sought for for building operations. The Conservative Land Society has just acquired a valuable estate at Old Ford, in the parish of St. Mary, Stratford-le-Bow, within the borough of the Tower Hamlets. The land is within 200 yards of Victoria Park and Sir Geo. Duckett's canal, and about a quarter of a mile from the Bow station of the Eastern Counties Railroad.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

E. H. T., Nottingham.—We can hardly give Correspondent the required information. The customary mode to pursue would be for the young lady to come to London and give a concert on her own account, having previously well advertised it in all the leading journals. This is very expensive. If the young lady would place herself for instruction under a first-rate master, if she had great talent, her master would soon make it known for his own sake. The simplest and most obvious way is to play at a concert for nothing, in order to be heard; but even this cannot be always accomplished with satisfaction. In short, as we said at starting, we know not what to advise. There are plenty of young classical pianoforte players in London.

E. A.—The extract sent to us by correspondent had no locality appended to it; so, not knowing whence it came, we could not insert it.

A. G.—Signor Fossi is still in England, we believe.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, October 28th, 1854.

In some of the late leading articles of the Musical World, the proceedings of the different musical societies in London were reviewed and discussed, and occasion was taken to remark that if there were fewer societies in the metropolis there would be a better chance for the principal ones to flourish and support the art with more advantage than at present.

It was suggested, that, as the Harmonic Union followed so often in the path of the New Philharmonic Society, there was no express necessity for the existence of the former, which would do well to unite its forces with the New Philharmonic; which, if it were not benefitted by the combination in the instrumental force, would receive a strong and desirable reinforcement in the choral department; thus enabling the Society with still more powerful effect and completeness than before to render some of the most elaborate and largest works of the great masters.

The idea thrown out has been acted upon by a large number of the members of the Harmonic Union, who have made a proposal to the New Philharmonic Society, which has been agreed to.

The Harmonic Union, therefore, as a society at present no longer exists; and, although we hear that some few of its original members, who refuse to unite with the majority and amalgamate with the New Philharmonic, are endeavouring to form a "Board," their chances of succeeding to renovate their shattered strength are, we are inclined to imagine, not very promising; inasmuch as all the superintendants of the various departments, together with the majority of its former members, have already joined the New Philharmonic.

The New Philharmonic Society has now been in existence three years, and—in spite of several "short-comings," which we have felt it our duty to point out and animadvert upon—it cannot be denied that it has given an impetus to musical art in this country, which merits for it the support of the public, and that it has encouraged native talent, and presented some of the works of the great masters in a style of completeness never before attempted in this country.

The number of subscribers to the New Philharmonic has, it appears, more than doubled since its commencement, and, although it suffered great pecuniary loss for the first two seasons, it may safely be affirmed that few societies—if any—have in so short a time acquired so large a number of subscribers, or have benefited so largely in a pecuniary sense.

By the "Report," drawn up for the Directors, it appears that the loss of the first season was nearly £2000. In the second season the loss was comparatively small, and last season the receipts nearly covered the expenses. The Report is confident in affirming that the receipts of another season will not only cover the expenses, but leave a balance to liquidate the previous losses.

From the Report we gather information about the Society, some of which is entirely new to us. For instance it appears that the management has been vested with a committee of gentlemen, who, jointly with the founder, Dr. Wylde, have borne in equal shares the loss that has accrued up to the present time. As most of these gentlemen are men of known wealth, the loss which they have suffered will not be felt severely, being divided; and, furthermore, it appears that they have cheerfully supplied the loss, knowing that the art has been benefited thereby. It is not for us to cry up individual sacrifices. We cannot, however, but think that Dr. Wyle, in bearing his share of the pecuniary responsibility, must, as a professional man, have felt the burden heavily. Few there are in any profession who would exhibit such real disinterestedness, or, indeed, who could afford to do so. The seed is now sown, and there is little doubt but that, with proper working and tending, the future of the New Philharmonic Society will prove a harvest likely to repay all the labour that has been expended. Let the Society display the spirit and enterprise it has hitherto shown, and endeavour to effect the reforms pointed out to it by its well-wishers, and success is insured.

It may be of little consolation to the unsuccessful litigants in the case of Boosey v. Jefferys, or to others affected in the same way as they, to be told that gross injustice has been done to them; and we should not therefore again draw attention to this case, but for some better purpose than to lament or to censure the decision of the House of Lords, which is now irrevocable. But it is already proved that this judgment does not affect music or books which have been published since July 1st, 1842. We make this statement on good authority, and we beg to refer those of our readers, who may be sceptical, to a very clever article which has been reprinted from the Jurist, shewing clearly the extent of the mischief which the House of Lords has rendered to literature and music. The grounds on which this assertion is made are as follows:—The Copyright Act of Queen Anne's reign, on which the Messrs. Boosey relied for protection for La Sonnambula, was repealed July 1, 1842, on which day Serjeant Talfourd's Act became law. In this new statute, it is admitted that every author is entitled by common law to the exclusive right of printing his book. Now, this is the point which the House of Lords disputed, and it was because there was no proof that an author possessed a copyright without a statute in Queen Anne's time, that they decided against a foreigner's right, remarking that a special Act would have to be introduced, conferring on him a copyright, if it were the intention of the country to bestow the privilege. But, then, Talfourd's Act was not considered. As we stated before, this Act admits every author's right by common law; and it therefore stands to reason that a foreigner can justly claim the peculiar advantages which an Englishman derives from the statute, unless a special provision be made to exclude him. No such exception is mentioned, and his right is therefore incontestable since July 1, 1842.

What strengthens this view of the law is the language used in two subsequent international acts, wherein it is expressly stated that no foreign book first published abroad can be protected here, which is a direct inference that the copyright of a foreign book first published in this country is secured.

The Jurist asserts positively that any work published since the date quoted can be successfully defended by law; and further, that the highest court of appeal, whatever may be its sentiment or motives, cannot possibly construe the Act of Queen Victoria in the same manner as the Act of Queen Anne. We are of the same opinion, and we hope to hear of some publisher who has sufficient spirit to proceed manfully against the horde of pirates who are now infesting the musical world.

Catherine Hayes, en route to Australia from San Francisco paid a vist to Honolulu (capital of the Sandwich Islands) during the time our Pacific Squadron was there. The fair vocalist was received with great delight by our "jolly tars" as well as by King Kamehameha the third, his Queen and the Princess Royal, Victoria, who with the court went out for a cruise in the Virago. The fleet fired a royal salute and manned the yards as they passed through it, and the naval band on board played our national airs and other tunes much to the delight of the royal party.

Lola Montes.—The eccentre ex-danseuse has become a bonâ fide California settler, and seems as contented in Grass Valley as if she had lived there her lifetime. She has become quite an explorer, forming parties, and penetrating through the prairies and over the mountains hundreds of miles. She returned a few weeks since from an excursion to the Truckee Meadow, and had a narrow escape from being captured by the Indians.

The Band of the Guides arrived in London from Paris, on Thursday evening, at half-past seven o'clock. They immediately found their way to St. George's Barracks, where they were received with the greatest enthusiasm by the Fusilier Guards. The Parisian bandsmen seemed quite overwhelmed with the warm reception of their English cousins, and expressed, in the best language they could, their satisfaction at fraternising with Englishmen. They are located at the Hôtel Sablonnière, in Leicester-square, where instructions have been received, from high authority, to treat them with every respect and attention. On Friday morning, the Guides had a rehearsal in St. George's Barracks. They played the Overture to l'Etoile du Nord, and the Marche des Flambeaux, with great effect, and to the universal admiration of the Guards. M. Mohr, the condutor of the band, is an officer of rank in the regiment. The band of the Guides is the favourite with the Emperor, and is only employed in public on State occasions. Their ordinary duty consists in playing at the Tuileries and at the officers' mess. It is understood that Louis Napoleon is very much gratified with the warm reception his Guides met with, a message having been forwarded to him immediately on their arrival, to which it is said he returned a very gracious answer by telegraph. In addition to the performance this day at the Crystal Palace, for which they have expressly made the visit, the Guides are announced to appear at six evening concerts, under the management of Mr. E. T. Smith.

DRAMATIC.

Sadler's Wells.—The production of Pericles has caused a real excitement among the visitors to Sadler's Wells. The Islingtonian audiences are, or pretend to be, real lovers of Shakspere, and boast of their renown on this point; so that any new play, with Shakspere's name to it, and with the addition of such scenery, dresses, and decorations as Mr. Phelps, in his taste, judgment, and liberality, was certain to supply, could not fail to prove highly attractive. Boots it not with the play-goers of Islington whether Shakspere truly wrought Pericles or no. Has not the common edition of Shakspere given it among his works? and has not Mr. Samuel Phelps laid the drama out in his bills as the veritable offspring of Shakspere's muse? What more was wanted? Were the audience to put no faith in their manager, who never told them false, and to side with Rowe, Steevens, Hallam, and others, against Langbaine, Gildon, Dryden, Dr. Drake, and a multitudinous host, who all hold that Pericles is undoubtedly Shakspere's; that it was written at a very early age, about the same period as Titus Andronicus, and received alterations and corrections from the author in later years. For our own parts, we say with Dr. Johnson, if we do not ascribe the authorship of Pericles to Shakspere, to whom shall we assign it? Coleridge himself, or Schleger would have been puzzled to answer that query. Were it worth while—which it is—and had we time and space—which we have not—we would undertake to prove in the most satisfactory manner to the unprejudiced reader, that Pericles was as surely the work of Shakspere as All's Well that Ends Well, The Winter's Tale, and Cymbeline. Let us quote the passage, where Leonine is about to kill Marina, and ask any honest heart, is not the same hand unmistakeably apparent that penned the dialogue between Hubert and Arthur, in a like situation in King John. Is not one, in fact, a forerunner of the other. Here is the passage. Peruse it not lightly.

Mar. Is this wind westerly that blows?
Leon. South-west.
Mar. When I was born the wind was north.
Leon. Was 't so?
Mar. My father, as nurse said, did never fear,
But cried, 'good seamen,' to the sailors, galling
His kingly hands with hauling of the ropes;
And, clasping to the mast, endur'd a sea
That almost burst the deck.
Leon. When was this?
Mar. When I was born.
Never was waves nor wind more violent;
And from the ladder-tackle washes off
A canvass-climber: 'Ha!' says one, 'wilt out?'
And with a dropping industry they skip
From stem to stern; the boatswain whistles, and
The master calls, and trebles their confusion.
Leon. Come, say your prayers.
Mar. What mean you?
Leon. If you require a little space for prayer,
I grant it: pray; but be not tedious,
For the gods are quick of ear, and I am sworn
To do my work with haste.
Mar. Why will you kill me?
Leon. To satisfy my lady.
Mar. Why would she have me kill'd?
Now, as I can remember, by my troth,
I never did her hurt in all my life;
I never spake bad word, nor did ill turn,
To any living creature: believe me, la!
I never kill'd a mouse, nor hurt a fly;
I trod upon a worm against my will,
But I wept for it. How have I offended,
Wherein my death might yield her any profit,
Or my life imply any danger?
Leon. My commission
Is not to reason of the deed, but do it.
Mar. You will not do't for all the world, I hope.
You are well favor'd, and your looks foreshow
You have a gentle heart. I saw you lately,
When you caught hurt in parting two that fought:
Good sooth, it show'd well in you: do so now.

Your lady seeks my life; come you between,
And save poor me, the weaker.
Leon. I am sworn,
And will despatch.

So, too, in the comic portion of the dialogue we find the very humour, conceits, and pun loving of Shakspere. Vide the scene, in the room at Mitylene, in Act IV., Scene III., especially the dialogue between Pander and Old Woman, of which the following is a part:

Pander. Three or four thousand chequins were as pretty a proportion to live quietly, and so give over.
Old Woman. Why to give over, I pray you? Is it a shame to get when we are old?
Pan. Oh, our credit comes not in like the commodity; nor the commodity wayes not with the danger: therefore, if in our youths we could pick up some pretty estate, 'twere not amiss to keep our door latched. Besides, the sore terms we stand upon with the gods, will be strong with us for giving over.
Old W. Come, other sorts offend as well as we.
Pan. As well as we! Ay, and better too; we offend worse.

If this be not downright Shakespere, we know nothing that is. But enough of the authenticity of the play, of which only those of little faith can entertain a doubt. We are of great faith, and entertain no doubt that Pericles is entirely Shakspere's.

In the production of Pericles, Mr. Phelps has judiciously placed his best chance of success on turning the piece into a spectacle, and in this he has been even more successful than on any former occasion. As a drama, Pericles, it must be owned, is sadly deficient; the only really effective scene is that of the mutual recognition between Pericles and his daughter. In the last act we are reminded, in Thaisa and Marina, of Hermione and Perdita; and in the last scene we have, unquestionably, the original of that of The Winter's Tale. Mr. Phelps, with the exception of the above scene, and perhaps the short one on shipboard in the storm, when he hears of the death of his wife and birth of his child, had nothing to call forth his talent. Among the other characters in the written play Marina is by far the best drawn; but she is reduced to insipidity on the stage from the necessity of omitting the scenes in the "spotted house," in which the author, with some of his usual graphic painting, has contrasted the purity of the young girl with the grossness of her assailants.

Pericles, although a play of inferior note, is likely to have as fair a run of public favour as any of its predecessors here. So much for the prestige which this little establishment has obtained by sound management and ceaseless diligence. It was reported that the rehearsal, for which the theatre was closed on the previous evening, did not terminate until half-past one in the morning.

Olympic.—The Blighted Being—the farce in which Mr. Robson has achieved his last eminent success—is taken from a French vaudeville, and is a mere slight sketch. The character of the principal personage—Job Wort, as he is dubbed in the vernacular—is remarkably well chosen to exhibit Mr. Robson's inimitable tragic-comic powers to the best advantage. Job Wort is a most susceptible person, who fancies the world is in league against him. He commences his man-life as a poet, is rejected by the publishers, and prints his first epic on his own account. Job is in utter despair at his misfortunes, and determines to commit suicide. For this purpose he bribes an Irish apothecary to poison him without apprising him of the moment when the poison would be administered. So far he is contented, and felicitates himself on a quiet removal from an ungrateful world. But all at once his prospects brighten, and sunshine bursts upon him. He is heir to £800 a-year, and the lady of his heart loves him. He cares not now to die in his happiness, and sends to the apothecary to countermand the poisoning, but is informed the dose is already administered. The terror and despair of poor Job may be imagined; but after awhile his correct senses are restored by being told the dose was a harmless one. The acting of Mr. Robson was in his very best style of the pathetic-humourous. Never was despair more dolefully depicted; never was terror more ludicrously made manifest. The scene where Job is informed that he is already under the influence of the poison, when he desires to live and be jolly, was excruciatingly funny, and the audience literally shed tears with laughter. The Blighted Being is played every night, and promises to hold its place for some time in the bills.

A new two-act drama, entitled The Trustee, was produced on Monday night. It is taken from an old French piece, Le Dépositaire. The subject is commonplace. A merchant is entrusted with a large sum of money by a friend, which he puts away in a strong box. His friend dies, and no one comes to claim the money for a long time. At length the nephew of his friend comes to the merchant and does so. The merchant, too well pleased to get rid of a trust which had been so long a weight upon his mind, goes to his strong box to procure the money, and discovers it is gone. His horror and agonies constitute the gist of the piece. In the end, the merchant, in a fit of sleep-walking, to which he is accustomed, finds the money concealed somewhere else, he himself in one of his somnambulist fits being the hider. Mr. A. Wigan played the old Trustee with great tact and discrimination. The part suits him admirably.

Marylebone.—A new tragedy, called Videna; or, the Mother's Tragedy, was produced on Monday at this theatre, the principal characters being sustained by Mr. and Mrs. W. Wallack. It is written by Mr. J. Heraud, who proves himself a better poet than playwright. The language is generally lofty, the thoughts are sometimes profound, and the characters are occasionally drawn with power; but the story is ill chosen, the construction feeble, and the plot is unskilfully developed. We have no doubt that Videna would please the reader infinitely more than the spectator.

The play was well played, and Mrs. W. Wallack especially distinguished herself by her fine conception and artistic elaboration of the character of Videna. The piece has been put upon the stage regardless of expense; and, notwithstanding its numerous disappointments, the new tragedy is well worth a visit to the pretty and now well-conducted theatre in Church-street.

Musical and Dramatic Novelties.—A new drama, in three acts, entitled Honour before Titles, will be produced at the St. James's on Monday night; and a new farce, called Bond Fide Travellers will be brought out at the Adelphi the same evening. —Last, not least, M. Jullien's concerts at Drury Lane commence on Monday.—Handel's Judas Maccabæus is announced for performance on the 15th proximo, at St. Martin's Hall, under the direction of Mr. John Hullah.

THE FIRST PERMANENT GERMAN OPERA.*

(From the Revue et Gazette Musicals.)

"Italian opera made its appearance at an early period in the countries on the other side of the Rhine; as far back as the commencement of the seventeenth century we find it installed with all its train of mythological divinities and magnificence of costumes and scenery in some of the princely residences of the south of Germany.

"But it is to a city of the north, to Hamburgh, that the honour of having possessed the first company that sang in the German language is due. This fact may appear strange, but it admits of easy explanation. The rich merchants of Hamburgh, incessantly travelling all over Europe on business matters, had an opportunity of being present at this kind of amusement, then in all its freshness and in all the splendour of novelty. We can easily conceive their thinking about the means of procuring at home that theatrical amusement which, when abroad, they were able to enjoy only for a very short period.

"However this may be, an opera-house was built at Hamburgh in the year 1678, in the Gänsemarkt near the Allster, under the care, and at the expense, of Schott, a doctor of civil law, another gentleman of the same rank, and the organist Reinike. Of these three persons who advanced the funds, Schott was, at the same time, the richest, the most zealous, and the

* Die erste stehende deutsche Oper, by M. E. O. Lindner, Doctor of Philosophy, Berlin, Schlesinger.

most capable; he may, therefore, very properly be considered as the founder of German opera.

"As for Reinike, the organist of Saint Catherine's Church, Hamburgh, he was a native of the province of Over-Yssel, in Holland. 'He was a first-rate performer upon his instrument, which he always kept perfectly in tune, but,' adds his biographer, 'Reinike had sometimes disputes with the gentlemen of the church.' He was reproached—and the reproach appears to have been well founded—with being a great lover of the fair sex and of the Rathskeller.† At his death, it was found that he had divided his property, which was rather considerable, between Saint Catherine's Church, his daughter's children, and the foreign ladies stopping at his house. He had a collection of sonatas for the violin printed, and this is his only published work.

"The new theatre in the Gänsemarket was inaugurated with a Biblical opera: Man created, fallen and raised-up; in other words: The Creation, Fall, and Redemption of Man, by a poet laureate of the name of Richter. The music was due to the pen of the composer Theile. The ballet-master's name was M. de la Feuillade.

"The production of this opera must have necessitated very extensive scenery, and it would appear that the art of the stage-carpenter was, at that period, tolerably advanced. In the prologue, Chaos was seen to open, while the four elements which issued from it, entered into a mutual agreement to exert themselves conjointly for the prosperity of the city of Hamburgh. In the first act, an angel flies across the sky, in pursuit of Lucifer, whom he overthrows and hurls into the abyss. Jehovah enters, accompanied by the heavenly army, to whom he remarks: that pride has been justly punished, and, like true courtiers, the angels reply that it is justly done. After enumerating the marvels of Creation, Jehovah resolves on forming man.

"While Jehovah is engaged in his task, the chorus sing:

"'Oh! how miraculous is the power which creates everything by mere will! God has but to speak, and immediately all that should be made is made!'

"The opera then goes on as follows:

"'Jehovah: Receive, then, the divine spirit which snatches you from death, and gives you life and reason.

"'Adam: Oh! heaven and earth! living creatures! and thou, immense army of God. What sight meets my gaze! Am I alive or no?

"'Jehovah: Live, in future, an image made after my will.'

"Jehovah then leaves, after enjoining Adam to devote himself to the cultivation of the garden of Paradise. When he is left alone, Adam begins singing an air, and falls off to sleep at the fifth verse. Jehovah descends in a cloud and creates woman. On opening her eyes to life, Eve sings exactly the same air as Adam has just sung: "Oh! heaven and earth!" etc. The act terminates with the following duet:

"'Adam: Come, then, my other self; my all-in-all.

"'Eve: I follow you with all my heart, and consent willingly.

"'Both together: Let us walk through the roses, where the winds scatter perfumes, and where the sweet fruits of the orchards delight the eye; when we have reached the end of the meadows, the gentle shade will refresh us.'

"We will pass over the second and third acts, which contain nothing very remarkable.

"In the fourth act, sin has entered the world. Adam and Eve have tasted the Forbidden Fruit. Jehovah enters, having Justitia on his right, and Miserecordia on his left. The latter is triumphant in the supreme council. Jehovah asks the angels:

"'Who will give us some one who will satisfy justice, in the place of mankind?

"'The Angels. We cannot find such a person.

"'Jehovah. Well, then, I will find one who shall redeem them from the torments of Hell.'

"In the fifth act, Adam is cited before Jehovah, who asks him:

"'What has rendered thee so sad and depressed?

"'Adam. The woman, the woman that thou gavest me.

"'Eve. I am greatly afflicted at it, my Adam! Alas! thy sufferings augment my grief.

"'Thy grief does not alleviate mine, that is to say, I do not suffer the less for it.'

"Jehovah curses the serpent, and condemns Eve to the pains of childbirth. The two offenders are driven out of Paradise. Adam never leaves off lamenting, and Eve does her best to console him. Suddenly, Salvator appears in a cloud, saying:

"'I will wipe out your sins! Through me, shall ye find grace. Bind yourself to me with a firm belief, and do not allow it to be torn from you. By my death, and by cruel torments, I will conquer for you the joys of Heaven.'

"This is followed by a final chorus, sung by the angels, Justitia, Miserecordia, Adam and Eve.

"This mystery was represented a very great number of times, and at last found its way to the Marionette Theatre. To the personages we have already enumerated was now added that of Hanswurst, who played the first men all sorts of malicious tricks. Richter's opera had degenerated into a piece of buffoonery fitted only for a fair.

"In the same year, they played also in Hamburgh, Oronte, imitated from the Italian, the music by Theile, and The Greatness and Fall of Sejanus, from the Italian, the music by Strungk or Strunk.

"Among the pieces given the following year, we remark, Innocence saved; or, Andromeda and Perseus, imitated from Corneille, music by Franck; The Mother of the Macchabees, music by Franck—in the prologue, the Church appears with a crown of twelve stars on her head and the moon at her feet; a dragon with seven heads and ten horns rushes upon her to destroy her, but the Archangel Michael comes to her succour and precipitates the dragon into the infernal regions; and Don Pedro, or Jealousy punished, from the Italian, music by Franck; this was the first comic opera represented in Germany.

"In 1680, were produced The arrival of Æneas in Italy, evidently from the Italian, the music by Franck. M. de Feuillade is replaced by M. Baptiste; Alcestis, an imitation of M. Quinault's work, music by Franck; and Jodelet, an imitation from the French, music by Franck.

"These pieces, imitated from the Italian, are extremely weak. There is no development—no connection between the scenes. To make up for this, however, there are plenty of coarse jokes. In Oronte we meet a madman, Gorgalio, who stammers and is hunchbacked. Addressing old Falsirena, he sings as follows:

"'When I look at you, on one side and the other, it makes me burst with laughter; you smell of musk like those druggists' shops, where, etc.'

"I can not finish the sentence.

"The author of Sejanus aims at tragedy. In the very first scene, the thunder growls and the thunder bolt shatters the statue of Sejanus, and, at the moment the minister of Tiberius is about to give Lavinia his hand, a phantom (Drusus) appears between the two personages.

"In 1681, The Birth of Jesus Christ, music by Theile (to which we shall presently return); Semele and Hannibal, music by Franck; and Charitine; or, the divine well-beloved (Göttlich-Geliebte) by Elmenhardt, music by Franck, were represented."

We have taken the preceding details from the curious and learned work of Dr. E. Otto Lindner, which deserves to be recommended as much for the elegant clearness of the style as by the profundity of the researches. Our conscience requires us, however, to add that previous to the year 1678, the company at the theatre in Dresden had represented Daphne, an opera imitated from the Italian of Rinuccini, by Martin Opitz, the celebrated poet of Bunzlau, on the occasion of the marriage of the Elector's sister with the Landgraf of Hesse, in 1627. It is Ovid who recites the prologue. The score which, as the poet himself tells us, is the work of a composer named Schütz, is, it appears, lost.

Let us now proceed to the analysis of the Birth of Jesus Christ, which is well worthy our attention.

The prologue is not without a certain grandeur. The stage represents the Temple of Apollo at Delphi. By the order of the Emperor Augustus, Servilius has come to consult the oracle. The Pythoness rushes on with dishevelled hair, flaming eye, and foaming mouth, and exclaims:

"A god come from Judah has conquered the old gods. I am, in consequence, compelled to descend again to the infernal regions; let no one, therefore, come in future to consult the oracle."

Through the opening in the cavern, Apollo rises in a cloud of fire and disappears in the air. The priestess shuts the gates of the temple, and resumes her lamentations:

"Great Jupiter is no longer master of Heaven; Juno and Venus are no longer anything, and Mars himself requires some one to defend him. Pallas and Diana have fled, and events will prove that from to-day the Majesty of the Gods is annihilated."

Servilius makes a very judicious aside remark:

"Augustus no longer can have any hope, since the gods themselves do not live in security

A priest of Apollo sings:

"Grand divinity of the earth, if the designs thou hast resolved upon are to be carried out, if the prince of the starry lights" (the Grand-duc des Chandelles of Dubartas), "is doomed to be extinguished in darkness, cause the visions to pass before our eyes, according to their true origin."

The curtain then rises, and the piece begins.

THE REGISTRATIONS.—THE CONSERVATIVE LAND SOCIETY.—The following are the results of the claims in the Registration Court for this year:—

* In Middlesex, the Revising Barrister, Mr. Launcelot Shadwell, and in Herts, Mr. Fisk, held that a purchase of a piece of land for £50 is, at least, a primâ facie case of right to vote.

† In West Kent, the Revising Barrister, Mr. Ogle, laid down the rule that he would not admit the right to vote in any case where the consideration-money was not more than £50; but he admitted the £75 lots as sufficient.

‡ In East Surrey, the Revising Barrister, Sir Walter Riddell, held that unless the land was actually let, the owner had no right to the franchise, and seventeen claims were disallowed on this ground; but an appeal to the Court of Common Pleas was granted, which the Conservative Land Society will prosecute.

‖ Four allottees lost their right because they had neglected to forward their conveyances for the inspection of the Court. Five on the same estate lost their privilege because they had not paid up the purchase-money in full.

THE NORWICH FESTIVAL.—It is but due to the singers at this Festival to state that several of those who received the most exorbitant fees, have voluntarily returned a portion of them to the committee. This was in consequence of the report that the Festival, which was given for the benefit of a charity, was a considerable loss to the principal parties engaged in its management.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MISS MANNING begs to announce to her Friends and Pupils that she will return to Town on Monday, October 30th, and Re-commence her LESSONS in SINGING and the PIANO. 17, St. George's-terrace, Kensington-gate.

SIGNOR and MADAME F. LABLACHE beg to acquaint their friends and pupils that they have returned to town to resume their professional avocations. The Fourth Series of Vocal Classes is forming for the winter months. 149, Albany-street, Regent's-park.

A FIRST CLASS VIOLINIST (Pupil of ERNST and SIVORI) would be happy to give instruction or accompanying lessons at a moderate rate. Apply by letter addressed to N. X., Office of the MUSICAL WORLD, Holles-street.

MR. and MRS. T. H. SEVERN'S VOCAL SOIREES for the practice of CLASSICAL CHORAL MUSIC will commence on Monday, October 30. Particulars may be obtained by applying to Mr. and Mrs. T. H. Severn, professors of the pianoforte and singing, 24, Albert-street, Camden-road.

TO CONCERT GIVERS, INSTITUTIONS, &c.—Mr. GEORGE LAKE is prepared to accept engagements for the ensuing season (conductor, or solo concertina) or to undertake the management of concerts in town or the suburbs. 11, Porchester-place, Norfolk-crescent, Hyde-park.

MUSIC TRADE.—An experienced hand, who has for many years been Warehouseman at one of the principal Music Publishers at the west-end of the town, is desirous of engaging himself in a similar capacity, either in London or the country. He is thoroughly acquainted with the leading catalogues and the music trade generally, and can give undeniable references. Address A. Z., post-paid, at the Office of the Musical World.

BACH SOCIETY.—Members and assistants are informed that an Orchestral Rehearsal of the Passions-Musik, preparatory to a second public performance, will take place at the Queen's Concert Room, Hanover Square, on Monday evening next, October 30th, to commence at 8 o'clock. Conductor, Mr. Sterndale Bennett. Persons desiring to assist in the Orchestra or Choir, are requested to signify the same in writing to the Secretary. Charles Steggall, Mus. Doc., Hon. Sec. 36, North Audley Street.

ST. MARTIN'S HALL.—Mr. HENRY C. BANISTER has the honour to announce a CONCERT of CLASSICAL PIANOFORTE MUSIC, to take place at the above Hall, on Monday Evening, November 20th, 1854, commencing at Eight o'clock, when he will be assisted by Miss Dolby, Mr. Cipriani Potter, Mr. J. Banister, and Mr. Lucas. Tickets, 1s.; Reserved Seats, 3s.; Family Tickets, to admit four to the Reserved Seats, 10s. 6d. Tickets may be obtained of Mr. Henry C. Banister, 2, Brunswick-row, Queen-square, Bloomsbury; of Messrs. Leader and Cock, 63, New Bond-street; and at St. Martin's-hall.

CHAPPELL'S FOREIGN MODEL PIANOFORTE.—PRICE FIFTY GUINEAS.—This instrument has (unlike the ordinary cottage pianoforte) THREE STRINGS, and the fullest grand compass of SEVEN OCTAVES. It is strengthened by every possible means to endure the greatest amount of wear, and to stand perfectly in any climate. The workmanship is of the best description, the tone is round, full, and rich, and the power equal to that of a Bichord Grand. The Case is of the most elegant construction in Rosewood, (vide the sketch), the touch elastic, and the repetition very rapid. Every possible precaution has been taken to insure its standing well in tune. Mr. Chappell especially invites the attention of the public, the profession, and merchants to the FOREIGN MODEL, feeling assured that no pianoforte, in all respects comparable, has hitherto been made in England at the same price. Every instrument will be warranted, and (if desired) exchanged within twelve months of the purchase. 50, New Bond-street, London.

THE CONSERVATIVE LAND SOCIETY.—Success of the Society:—Total number of shares issued up to the 29th of September, 1854, 10,312. Total cash receipts up to the same date, £139,303. Amount of land sold to the same period, £98,515. Amount of reserve fund to the same date, £8,095. Shares on the order of rights, by completion, by public drawings, and by seniority, to the same date, 3,529. Last share number on the order of rights by seniority, 1,228. Bonus realised on shares during the first year, 6 per cent. Interest now allowed on completed shares, and on payments of a year's subscription in advance, and upwards, such interest being payable half-yearly, one month after Lady Day and Michaelmas, 5 per cent. Estates purchased in various counties, nineteen; allotted, or partly distributed amongst the members, twelve; to be allotted, seven.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

M. JULLIEN'S CONCERTS.

(FOR ONE MONTH ONLY.)

M. JULLIEN begs most respectfully to announce that his Concerts will commence on Monday next, October 30th, 1854, on which occasion he will have the honour of making his first appearance in England since his return from America.

M. Jullien cannot refrain from expressing his great gratification at being able, after an absence of nearly two years, once more to appear before those kind and indulgent patrons who during so long a period have extended to him their unremitting countenance and support. In the Prospectus of his last series of Concerts, in the year 1852, M. Jullien expressed a hope that his then projected journey might furnish him with many materials which might hereafter serve to entertain his English audiences, and he is most happy to have found that those anticipations are not likely to be disappointed. During his late journey in the United States, M. Jullien has found that while the Arts of Literature, Sculpture, and Painting have been well cared for in that great country, the Science of Music has also received its share of encouragement and support, and has been fostered by the establishment of Musical Institutions, which do not yield even to those of Europe, either in the excellence of their arrangements or the magnitude of their operations. In these Institutions every advantage has been taken of the talents of that vast influx of Italian, German, French, and English Professors who constantly visit the United States; but at the same time M. Jullien has found many instances of rare musical genius among native artists, while a vast amount of pure and charming melodies exist, springing from sources entirely American. M. Jullien has lost no opportunity of collecting these most interesting native melodies, but at the same time has not failed to possess himself of several truly classical works by native American composers. In fact, M. Jullien trusts that his anticipations of 1852 will be realized, and that his American Tour will not only have proved a source of profit and gratification to himself, but a means of providing some future Entertainment for his kind and liberal patrons in this country.

During the Series of Concerts, will be performed the following new pieces of Music:

THE AMERICAN QUADRILLE,

Composed on National American Melodies.

THE SLEDGE POLKA,

Descriptive of the Winter amusement of Sledging in North America.

THE KATTY DID POLKA.

Descriptive of the various Musical sounds produced by the myriads of insects on a tropical night.

THE MISSISSIPPI GALOP.

THE NEW YORK FIREMEN'S QUADRILLE.

As performed at M. JULLIEN'S last Concert in America, given at the Crystal Palace Exhibition, amidst the plaudits of an audience of 35,000 persons. A Selection arranged for full Orchestra from Rossini's Opera, "Le Comte Ory." A Selection arranged for full Orchestra, from Verdi's new Opera, "Rigoletto." A Selection arranged for full Orchestra, from Spohr's new Opera, "Jessonda." Several classical works by native American composers. Also, every evening, at least two works selected from the classical composers.

In addition to the above, M. JULLIEN has in preparation, a New Quadrille, to be entitled

THE ALLIED ARMIES QUADRILLE,

Composed for Double Orchestra and Two Military Bands, on English, French, and Turkish Melodies.

Among the Artists engaged are—the celebrated Prima Donna, from the Imperial Opera Comique, at Paris—her First Appearance at these Concerts.

Madame ANNA THILLON,

Signor ROBBIO,

the extraordinary performer on the Violin—Pupil of the late Signor PAGANINI—his First Appearance at these Concerts.

Herr KŒNIG—his First Appearance in England since his return from America.

Signor BOTTESINI,—his First Appearance these Two Years.

RUBINI.

(From La Revue des Deux Mondes.)

Rubini, one of the most popular and admired Italian singers in Europe, died at a village near Bergamo, on the 2nd March, 1854. He had retired from the stage in 1845, and was reposing after his long fatigues in a sumptuous villa, which he had built with the sounds of his lyre—as Amphion, son of Jupiter, did Thebes—when death overtook him, just as he had attained his 61st year. Like all great artists who have excited public enthusiasm, in a high degree, Rubini was the subject of a vast number of stories and apocryphal anecdotes, from which it is very difficult to cull the truth, alone worthy to interest cultivated minds. We will, however, attempt to select a few genuine facts from the life of this celebrated virtuoso, who has left behind him an ineffaceable mark in the art of singing of the nineteenth century.

Giam-Battista Rubini was born in May, 1793, in the village of Romano, near Bergamo. The son of a poor commissionaire, burthened with a family, Rubini was at first destined to be a tailor. Having been apprenticed to the proprietor of a shop at Bergamo, he was squatted one day upon his board, singing away as merrily as possible, when a dilettante, passing by, stopped and listened with astonishment to the youthful voice which was already so full of quality and charm. The dilettante approached the young workman, interrogated him as to his family, proceeded to his father, and persuaded the latter to place his son under a master, with whom he stopped until the age of eighteen.

We pass over a multitude of episodes, more or less probable and exciting, and which appear to have allowed full scope for the fancy of biographers, and content ourselves by simply stating, that the admirable artist who astonished all Europe began his dramatic career in the chorus. In an old bill of the theatre of La Scala, at Milan, dated 1812, and which Rubini preserved, splendidly framed, his name figures among the second tenors of the chorus. His salary was then 1*s.* 8*d.* a-night. How could he ever think he would one day leave behind him a fortune of more than 3,000,000 francs? Two years subsequent to this obscure employment at La Scala, Rubini was engaged in one of those companies of strolling vocalists so plentiful in Italy, and made his début as Argirio, in Rossini's Tancredi, which had just been represented at Venice with immense success. Rubini was then twenty-one, while the lady who sang the part of Amenaida, daughter of Argirio, King of Syracuse, was, at least, fifty. As Fortune did not reward the efforts of the impresario, he conceived the strange idea of changing his company of singers into a company of dancers. He made them study, as well as they could, a ballet then very much in vogue: I Molinari (The Millers). The rehearsals were held in a meadow on the skirts of a wood. At the representation, which came off at some little town, the name of which is not preserved in history, the audience rose en masse against the wretched extemporised ballerini, who were under the necessity of passing the night in the theatre in order to escape being stoned. Rubini used to take a pleasure in relating this burlesque episode in his brilliant career.

After some other attempts, more or less successful, Rubini was engaged at Brescia for the Carnival of the year 1815. Owing to his success in this tolerably important city, he was summonsed to the San-Mosè Theatre at Venice, and, afterwards, to Naples, where he made his first appearance at the Teatro de' Fiorentini. It was in this great city that Rubini, under the direction of his compatriot Nozzari, who gave him such good advice, attracted the attention of Italy, and saw the beginning of his great fame. Having been engaged by Barbaja for a great number of years, he was compelled to remain for a long time under the guardianship of that mercenary trader, who only lent him to the cities desirous of possessing him, for good hard cash, paid down. It was thus that, after having been successively to Palermo, and Rome, where he created a furore in La Gazza Ladra, Rubini proceeded to Venice, in 1824. Beethoven, who heard him at that period, had Italian words written for him to his admirable elegy of Adelaide, which Rubini rendered popular throughout Europe.*

It was in 1825 that this great singer went to Paris for the first time. He made his début at the Théâtre-Italien, on the 6th October, in the character of Ramiro in La Cenerentola, with immense success. On his return to Italy, whither Barbaja had recalled him, he was obliged to remain there until 1831, when he entirely recovered his independence. Upon this, he returned to Paris, which he did not leave again before 1842, alternating between that capital and London, where he used to sing during the summer season. In 1842, Rubini, then at the summit of his glory, quitted Paris and London, and, as we should say at the present time, the western world, for the purpose of proceeding to St. Petersburgh, where he remained until 1845. Being then fifty-seven years old, and loaded with honours and riches, he retired to the magnificent villa he had built on the spot where he was born, and it was there that he died, leaving behind him a fortune of more than 3,000,000 francs.

Rubini was a simple-minded, gentle, and good man, whose modest general education scarcely rose above the first elements; his musical education was not more advanced, for he required the assistance of an accompanyist to read the most trifling canzonetta. Endowed with exquisite sensitiveness, a great memory, and that marvellous instinct which makes up for the want of acquired knowledge, but which acquired knowledge can never replace, Rubini was one of the most admirable singers of our time; a mixture of the improviser and the patient imitator, whose physiognomy it is very important that we should catch with accuracy.

The tenors who have acquired sufficient celebrity to leave behind them a name in history are not very numerous. Before the birth of the lyric drama, and until the end of the seventeenth century, it was the "sopranos" and prime donne who exercised almost undisputed sway in Italian opera, as well as in the chapels of princes and religious communities. Composers did not begin to write for tenor voices until more recently; and the first person to signalise himself as a tenor of merit was an artist named Buzzolini, who was chamber-singer to the Duke of Mantua, about the end of the seventeenth century. In the following century, we find the tenors beginning to figure with advantage beside the most famous "sopranos," while composers assigned them pretty important parts, particularly in buffo operas. Among the celebrated tenors of the eighteenth century, we may mention Ettori, who was long in the service of the Prince-Palatine, and sang at Padua, in 1770, with great success; Balino, a pupil of Pastocchi, and who died at Lisbon, in 1760; Rauzzini, at the same period, a celebrated singer and composer, who died at Bath, in England, in 1810; Raff, born at Gelsdorff, in the Duchy of Juliers, a pupil of Pistocchi, and the greatest singer Germany produced in the eighteenth century; Davide senior, who possessed one of the most astonishing voices that ever existed, an admirable and powerful singer, who shared with his contemporary, Ansani, the admiration of Italy; Mandini, an exquisite singer, belonging to the Italian company which came to the Théâtre de Monsieur at Paris, in 1789; Viganoni, who created the part of Paolino, in Cimarosa's Matrimonio Segreto; Crivelli, who sang a long time at the Théâtre-Italien, Paris, and in Paolino's Pirro and Nina produced an effect which veteran amateurs still remember; and, lastly, Babbini, one of the most delicious tenors of the old Italian school, and who had the honour of giving Rossini some hints on the art of singing. The appearance of this illustrious master produced a great revolution in the economy of dramatic music. The characterising feature of this revolution was that the natural voices of soprano, mezzo-soprano, contralto, tenor, and bass, assumed in harmony the place they occupy in the scale of sound. Thanks to this happy reform, which, however, was more the result of necessity than a voluntary act of the master, and which, too, had been attempted before Rossini's time, first by Mozart, and then by Cimarosa and Paisiello, the tenors replaced the castratos in the mind of the composer, who assigned them the preponderating part in almost all his works.

Among the remarkable tenors conjured up by the genius of Rossini, and forming a part of the escort of virtuosi who interpreted his works and will be handed down with them in History, we must first mention Garcia, who created the part of Count Almaviva in Il Barbiere di Siviglia—a consummate artist, whose powerful and supple voice knew no difficulty. Davide, the illegitimate son of the great tenor of the end of the eighteenth century, whom we have mentioned above, was a singer of genius, for whom Rossini composed a great many works. He appeared successively in Il Turco in Italia, Otello, Ricciardo e Zoraïde, La Donna del Lago, Zelmira, etc. When Davide junior went to Paris in 1829, his voice, fatigued by excesses of every description, had become unequal and capricious in tone. In the midst of, many traits in rather bad taste, and ridiculous mannerisms and vezzi, this great artist sometimes, however, manifested himself and transported the public with admiration, as, for instance, in the duet of the second act of La Gazza Ladra, which he used to sing with Mad. Malibran. Nozzari, an accomplished singer, of perfect good taste, was, in Rossini's operas, the inseparable companion of Davide, to whom he gave some excellent advice. Nor must we forget Mombelli, the father of the prima donna whom we heard at Paris, in 1823, when she made so grand an effect in the first finale of La Cenerentola. Rossini met Mombelli, at the commencement of his career, at Rome, in 1812, and wrote a character for him in his first opera, Demetrio e Polibio. We must, likewise, mention Bianchi, Bonaldi, and Serafino, for the last of whom was composed the tenor part in L'Italiana in Algieri; Donzelli, who possessed a powerful and sonorous but cumbersome voice, and, lastly, Rubini, for whom Rossini wrote only a single cantata, "La Riconoscenza," a sort of pastoral for four voices, performed at the Teatro San Carlo, at Naples, on the 27th December, 1821, for the benefit of the immortal maestro. Although, by the suppleness, brilliancy, and bravura style of his talent, Rubini evidently belongs to the school of singers formed by the author of Il Barbiere, Otello, and Semiramide, it is certain that the composer who understood best how to utilize and bring out his inmost qualities was Bellini.

As we have very often said, between the dramatic composer and the known interpreters of his thoughts, there exists a secret and reciprocal influence, which the critic ought to take into account. For one or two sublime musicians, who, like Mozart, and Rosini, in the best of his operas, know how to "create" chefs-d'œuvre without going beyond the limits of ordinary voices, there are a great number of composers eager to seize on the smallest natural idiosyncracy, and mould their ideas to the requirements of exceptional voices. Nowhere has this pernicious system been practised more than in Italy. In France, too, half the répertoire of the Opéra-Comique owed a part of its success to Martin's extraordinary voice. Between the touching and melancholy genius of Bellini, and the penetrating organ and deep feeling of Rubini, the points of analogy were so numerous and so natural, that the two must have felt attracted to each other, like parts of one and the same being which meet again after having been separated, and blend together in some one conception of art. It was at Milan, in 1827, that the lucky meeting of the composer and the virtuoso took place, and the opera, Il Pirata, represented at the theatre of La Scala, was the first battle they gained together. This opera, which laid the foundations for the fame of the young maestro of Catana, increased, also, the reputation of his admirable interpreter. La Sonnambula was the second opera Bellini composed for his favourite singer. This was also represented at Milan, at the theatre De la Canobiana in 1831. Then came I Puritani, performed in 1834, at the Théâtre-Italien, Paris, where Bellini died six months after the production of his masterpiece, like Hérold after that of his Pré aux Clercs. Donizetti, too, composed for Rubini the part of Percy, in his opera of Anna Bolena, represented at Milan in 1831, a short time after La Sonnambula, and by the same virtuosi.

Rubini's voice was that of a high tenor, with a register of more than two octaves from the lower E to the F in alt, which he reached in certain passages by an heroic sbalzo that always excited the admiration of the audience. The flexibility of his voice was prodigious, but its quality was not homogeneous. In fact, it was only in the upper part of the scale, beginning from the E between the fourth and fifth lines of the stave, that Rubini's voice warmed, vibrated, and threw out sounds that intoxicated the ear. He was able to go as high as B in alt, giving each sound that powerful and manly vibration, designated in the schools by the name of chest notes, because the notes appear actually to proceed from the seat of life. On reaching this extreme limit, his voice melted into a luminous falsetto, forming a magic contrast with the preceding chords. This abrupt opposition of shade and light, in which the opaque and sweet clearness of the head notes caused the vigorous sonority of the natural tones to stand out in bold relief, was one of the effects most frequently employed by Rubini. The astonished ear followed the singer, in his triumphal ascent, to the highest limit of the tenor register, without perceiving any interruption of continuity in this long spiral of notes, variously lighted up, and glittering upon an even and substantial melodic tissue.

To this almost inherent power of passing, without a break, from the register of the chest voice to that of the head notes, Rubini added another no less important—namely, a long respiration, the force of which he had learnt to economise. Gifted with a broad chest, where his lungs could dilate at their ease, he took a high note, filled it successively with light and warmth, and, when it was completely expanded, threw it forward into the house, where it burst like a Bengal rocket in a thousand colours. This artifice, the effect of which was irresistible, was borrowed by Rubini from the old Italian school, where it was frequently employed, especially by the male soprani, who were particularly endowed with a long breath.

Rubini's voice, the delicious and penetrating tone of which had only to be heard to charm the hearer, was, as we have said, prodigiously flexible. Simple and double scales, arpeggios, trills taken upon the highest chords, grupetti, appogiature, and the richest and most ingenious combinations of vocalisation, were accomplished with a boldness and rapidity which scarcely gave the astounded ear time enough to appreciate their difficulty. The texture of these marvellous gorgheggi, or, to adopt the term still used in the schools, the tessitura of this sparkling vocalisation, was not always irreproachable in quality, and often wanted substance. The notes were poured forth too quickly, and crowded too much upon one another, so that the singer was not always able, like an intrepid cavalier who reins-in his steed with an all-powerful hand, to moderate his flight or stop in his career. In addition to this, a faulty movement of the lips, which Rubini was never able to correct, showed a certain degree of effort, and proved pretty clearly that the virtuoso had been educated in rather a hap-hazard kind of manner. This defect, extremely common at the present day, and which M. Mario has eagerly exaggerated, like a scholar who at first imitates only the imperfections of his master, was strictly prohibited in the old Italian school. The singer's face was then not allowed to express anything but the sentiment he experienced, and the mysteries of vocalisation and mechanism remained for ever hidden from the eyes of the public; a grand rule for every branch of art, but one too much disregarded at the present day.

THE BAND OF THE GUIDES.

The style of performance and general effect of this fine band are so superior and dissimilar to anything professedly of the same nature found in this country, that we think a few remarks, in addition to the mere notice space permitted us last week, will be acceptable to our readers. The composition of the Guides' band is as follows:—2 flutes or piccolos, 4 E flat clarinets, 8 B flat clarinets, 2 oboes, 2 soprano, 2 alto, 2 tenor, and 2 bass saxophones; 2 cornet-à-pistons, 4 trumpets, 4 trombones, 2 soprano saxhorns in E flat, and 2 contralto saxhorns in B flat, 3 saxtrombas in E flat, 2 baritone, and 4 bass saxhorns in B flat, 2 contra-bass saxhorns in E flat, and 2 in B flat, with the usual instruments of percussion. This is certainly a very fine combination of instruments for the purposes of what the Germans call "harmony-music;" although the amount of brass may seem, to our notions, something in excess. So admirably, however, is the music arranged, and so perfectly in command are the volume and quality of tone from every part of the band, that, at the utmost stretch of forte even, we are offended by no symptom of harshness, nor are aware of any unbalanced quality in combination, save what the purposes of colour demand. The two first remarkable features which impress a listener to this great wind-orchestra, are, its exceeding suavity and richness of general tone, and its very remarkable power of light and shade. A mistake, we think, has been generally committed in attributing much, if not everything, of these desirable excellencies to the peculiar nature and unequalled perfection of the instruments employed. Doubtless, the instruments are of the very first class. It is unreasonable to suppose the Emperor would permit his own special band to be supplied with other than the best of everything his ingenious subjects could produce; or that artists such as those composing this orchestra would be content to play on any but the best instruments they had the opportunity of selecting. Anything beyond this, however, is, to our mind, giving an unwarranted importance to the worker in wood and metal, and, to the same extent, discrediting the skill, taste, and feeling of the executive musician. Without doubt, the instruments manufactured for the Guides by M. Sax are excellent; but we think it highly improbable, either that as good instruments do not elsewhere exist, or that the same instruments in inferior hands would produce an equal result. The striking excellencies displayed in the performance of the Guides—as in every other orchestra—must be all but wholly attributable to the qualities of the performers and the skill of their conductor. M. Mohr is a musician of great experience, a talented composer, and thoroughly master of all the technics of his present occupation. Not merely is he a time-beater or drill-serjeant, severe in the exaction of all the minutiæ of discipline. He thinks as a musician, and has the art of communicating his spirit to his troops. His arrangements for his band evince a perfect appreciation of the individualities of tone and effect placed at his command, and equal gracefulness and facility in their combination; while the execution of his music reflects credit equally on the materiel of his forces, and his own skill as their director. Of the performers themselves, it is but the barest justice to designate them an association of artists, in the best sense of the term. There is no appearance among them of vulgar contest for distinction, no jealousy of a neighbour's efforts or success, no sulky or slovenly filling up of even the most unimportant parts that may be cast to each in the general musical drama. Each takes his turn of display or subordination, as it may happen, with the same careful determination to do his best; be his share three notes or three hundred, they are executed, the most attractive and the least noticed alike, with a full conviction of their importance to the general effect. Over and above the exquisite ensemble thus attained, there are evidently individual members of this band who take rank in the very first class of executive accomplishment. The soli flute, clarinet, oboe, and cornet parts, are sustained by performers, who, for beauty of tone, mechanical adroitness, and grace and finish of style, need not fear the test of any concert-room in Europe. There are others, we are assured, of quite equal ability; although the music performed here did not afford them equal opportunities of display. Charming as it is to hear a solo delivered by one of these men, it is at least an equal gratification to notice the perfection of its accompaniment by his brethren;—subdued in tone to the point of being but just, and yet sufficiently, audible, and minutely watchful of all the tempi rubati of the soloist, there needs little else to prove, for these bandsmen, that truly artist-way of feeling, we have already asserted for them.

In every point of excellence of which wind instrument music seems capable, this French band approaches much closer to the idea of perfection than any other we have heard. Its grand quality of tone, and perfect command of light and shade, we have already mentioned; and to these it must be added that its intonation is universally irreproachable (at once a great difficulty and desideratum in these wind combinations), that its style is clean and precise without disagreeable hardness, and its small points of finesse and expression always appropriate and unaffected, and that, when needful, it accomplishes such a pianissimo as we recommend for imitation to all wind-bands both in and out of Her Majesty's service, to say nothing of some orchestras of higher pretensions, to boot. Finally, it does not annoy and disgust us with that perpetual drumming which so essentially vulgarises the effect of our military bands in general. The French band can use its drums, and that, too, with all desirable force, when needed; but it wisely abstains from reminding us of "Richardson's show," and "Bartelmy fair," by the abuse of a very useful item in its effects.

On the "great Saturday" at the Crystal Palace, we could not avoid comparison between the Guides and the various English bands present. By contrast, more especially, the effect of all the latter was coarse, unsatisfactory, and too often vulgar. Even the "Crystal Palace Band" itself shone not a whit more brightly than the rest, and was, in some respects, a vast deal more disagreeable. Its wholly brass composition imparts a wearisome monotony of quality which the presence of flutes, oboes, and clarinets would certainly mitigate. But this is by no means the total of its evils. Its style is pompous, vulgar, and exaggerated, and, above all, it is wholly guiltless of any approach to a piano. We listen with cracking ears to its blasts and uproar, until personal convenience can endure no more, and then rush precipitately from its neighbourhood in a condition that would gladly accept the scream of a locomotive whistle by way of relief.

The journey of the Guides' band to London has certainly produced much popular enjoyment; but, we imagine, it will not be without its use in a higher point of view. The Frenchmen have shown us what perfection is attainable with this kind of music, and it is much to be hoped our military bands and their masters will not prove too conceited or obtuse to avail themselves of the example thus set. The English are generally called an "imitative" people; here is a good opportunity for testing their faculty.

Haydn a Pianoforte Teacher.—When Haydn first visited England, a most exalted personage sent Salomon to the world-renowned composer, with the request that he would give him lessons on the piano. Haydn stared at his friend: "I? I am no piano player. Give lessons!" "I entreat you," replied Salomon, who was perfectly familiar with English ways, "do not refuse: else it will get out, and then it is all over with our whole enterprise, in fact with our entire existence here. Ask what compensation you please: put money in your pocket; go at the stated hours, and be quite sure there'll be nothing in it but the name of the thing." Haydn complied. The first time, he was introduced into the presence, graciously conversed with for a quarter of an hour, and then dismissed. As for the other hours, he was allowed to pass them in the ante-chamber, where he found himself not ill at ease, since nearly every person present was emulous to entertain him. On his departure he received, besides the stipulated rich remuneration, a fine present for his faithful services as pianoforte master.

M. JULLIEN'S CONCERTS.

With the exception of Tuesday evening, the second night of the concerts, when the numbers exhibited some falling off—no doubt caused by the apprehension of a crowd similar to that of Monday night—the theatre has been crammed to excess every evening. The performances have lost nothing of their attractions since the opening night, and to the well varied programmes and admirable solo playing of Messrs. Kœnig, Wuille, Lavigne, Duhêm, De Folly, Collinet, Baumann, and others, M. Jullien has added the vocal performances of Madame Anna Thillon, who nightly delights her auditors by her charming and piquant singing the "Bohémienne," from Meyerbeer's L'Etoile du Nord, Mr. George Linley's ballad, "Minnie," and an American ditty, "Old friends at home." Mr. Frisch, the flautist, also appeared on Thursday for the first time at M. Jullien's concerts, and won well-merited success in a solo fantasia on an air from M. Jullien's Pietro il Grande. The special performances during the week were Mozart's Jupiter Symphony, given entire, and movements from Mendelssohn's A minor, Haydn's Surprise, Beethoven's D, and other symphonies. A quadrille from Meyerbeer's new opera, L'Etoile du Nord, was played for the first time on Wednesday with distinguished success. It is written by M. Jullien, and cannot fail to become exceedingly popular. The melodies are full of life and vigour, and have been selected with great taste. The selection also from Rossini's Comte Ory is a highly effective pot pourri, and has been very popular with the audience. We must notice M. Jullien's "Moldavian Schottische" as a very characteristic and lively dance, and most likely to grow into favour with amateur terpsichoreans. The new "American Quadrille"—in which the tunes are spirited and well selected—is so excellently written and so well varied, and the solos so cleverly distributed, affording several of M. Jullien's leading instrumentalists an opportunity of exhibiting their talents, that it has been received nightly with distinguished applause, and is looked to as one of the features of the Concerts. Of course the "British Army Quadrille" is retained in the programme, and the performance of "God Save the Queen" at the conclusion, followed by "Partant pour la Syrie," constitutes the grand climax of the first part, night after night.

In short, M. Jullien's Concerts have proved more successful than on any former occasion, and his audiences appear to grow more and more into the liking and discrimination of good music—a fact entirely to be attributed to his indomitable perseverance and energy.

Death of a Veteran English Composer.—The veteran Tom Williams, the author and publisher of several popular compositions, including "Not a drum was heard," "Trim the lamp," "My native land, good night," "First vid de Grace," "Up Guards and at 'em," &c., &c., is no more. He died last week, in London, at an advanced age, and his remains were to be interred on Tuesday. Of late years, he has been in the habit of passing much of his time in Brighton; but it was evident to all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance, that an insidious disease had been for some time preying upon his constitution. It finally terminated in his death at the moment he was contemplating another visit to Brighton. The late John Reeves rendered his song of "First vid de grace" very popular by his humorous style of singing it; but since, the death of that celebrated comedian, no person seems to have attempted the song. Mr. Williams was very intimate with the members of several Glee and Madrigal Union, and took great pleasure in hearing them sing. Mr. Broadbridge has sung his song "Up guards and at 'em" with much éclat. The compositions of Mr. Williams were in what is termed the old style; but many of them were telling, and nothing ever gave the composer greater pleasure than to be complimented by the veteran Braham, of whose singing and style of composition he was a great admirer.

ORGAN.

THE "DIRECT-ACTION" SYSTEM OF ORGAN BUILDING.

A correspondent, referring to a notice which appeared some weeks back in our Provincial Intelligence of the re-building of the organ in the Mechanics' Hall at Nottingham, by Mr. Groves of London, wishes to know what is the "direct-action system" on which this organ has been rebuilt, and what, if any, are its advantages over its ordinary method of construction. We can easily satisfy our querist on both points. The "direct-action system" is merely such an arrangement of the internal parts of the instrument, that the communication between the keys and the palettes, or valves, by which the wind is admitted to the pipes, becomes as "direct" as possible. In order to accomplish this object, the sound-boards are so arranged that the notes, and, of course, the pipes which produce them, are stationed in regular order from left to right, or, in other words, from bass to treble, instead of going from "side to side," or by alternate notes—thus, C standing on the left side, C sharp on the right, and so on, as in the ordinary method. The mechanical connection which transmits the touch of the performer thus follows the regular order of the key-board, and those supposed abominations called "roller-boards," which, on the ordinary system, are required to spread the action alternately from side to side, are dispensed with. Another peculiarity of the "direct-action system," when carried out in its entirety, is, that all the pipes throughout the instrument are arranged to stand "on their own wind," or, in other words, are placed immediately over the valves by which they are supplied with air, and thus all "grooving" and "conveyancing" are rendered unnecessary, not to say forbidden; for the thorough adherents to this mode of structure wholly repudiate the use of speaking-pipes in the front of an organ-case.

Before we answer our correspondent's query as to the advantages of this method, it occurs to us to remark on the very odd claims to inventions that are constantly put forth by English organ-builders, and the extremely small amount of mechanical, or, indeed, of any sort of reading, which such claims reveal. This "Direct action system," it appears, is claimed as an invention by Mr. Groves, of London, is equally claimed by Messrs. Kirkland and Jardine, of Manchester, and has positively formed the subject of a newspaper controversy between them; whereas, in fact, the invention, if such it can be properly called, belongs to neither one nor the other. The first public announcement of this system in England—at least in modern times—occurred at the Great Exhibition of 1851, wherein an organ, having two rows of keys, and constructed after this manner, was shown by Schulze, a Prussian organ-builder; and which organ now stands in the Town-hall of Northampton. M. Schulze professed to have constructed his instrument according to the new system of a certain Professor Töpfer, whose "invention" included the mechanical features of the "Direct"-system, as well as some peculiarities of voicing. M. Schulze is the present, and only, advocate of this system on the Continent; and so zealously has he adopted its dogmas, that some few years since, when employed to reconstruct the interior of the large organ at Lubeck, he positively withdrew the wind-supply from the complete set of 32 and 16 feet pipes, which, formed of pure tin, adorn the fine case of this instrument, left them simply "dummies," and placed others of his own make in the interior! Were this fact not attested beyond doubt, such an instance of perversity of judgment and mechanical wrong-headedness in support of a childish theory, would be beyond the limits of belief. To return, however, to Messrs. Groves, and Kirkland and Jardine—these gentlemen must, surely, be aware of the existence of the Prussian organ in the Northampton Hall, and, as surely, must they be aware of Professor Töpfer's claim to the invention of its "system." How, then, can they, separately, put forth any claim to origination in such a stale matter? and, still more, how can they, unitedly, have the assurance to wrangle about it in private? But the best of the joke is, that the "Direct" system is no more Professor Töpfer's, than is it either of his English opponents; for in the writings of the Abbé Vogler we find a description of something nearly identical, and which he calls his "Simplification System." We need not tell our readers how long this must have preceded these fertile mechanical times, which produce such luminaries of invention as Messrs. Töpfer, Schulze, Groves, and Kirkland and Jardine; and, consequently, what may be the value of the inventive claims of the latter. Furthermore, there cannot be a doubt on the mind of any one acquainted with mechanical subjects, that this "Direct" system must have been the plan on which the very earliest organs were made. It is obviously the scheme that would be pursued in the first attempts to construct a complicated instrument of the organ-class, before any of the later refinements of mechanical arrangement had been discovered.

The advantages of the "Direct," over the ordinary, system, are absolutely none—the disadvantages are many. In the first place, the lateral extension of the pipes of an organ must be greater than that of the keys which command them; or, in other words, the sound-boards must be wider than the key-frames, and, consequently, the pallets, though following the same order of succession (under the "Direct" system, we mean) cannot, except in the case of a few of the middle notes, be opposite to the keys. The action, therefore, from the keys to the palates, must take a diagonal, or, rather, fan-like course; and, in so doing, create a greater amount of friction than can arise from any action proceeding in lines parallel with its exciting force, even with the intervention of a roller-board. This defect of the "direct" system is so obviously susceptible of demonstration, as to need no further remark. Two other serious defects of this plan are, the great waste of room occasioned by placing all the large pipes of the instrument at one side and all the small ones at the other; and the seriously unequal strain of weight thrown on the framing by the same arrangement. And all this, and a host of other disadvantages which any mechanic ought to perceive, are incurred merely for the sake of dispensing with roller-boards—about the use of which, when properly constructed, there is really no appreciable evil, either theoretical or practical!

We have only roughly indicated the mechanical considerations of the question; but, if our correspondent has not derived the satisfaction he desires, shall be happy to resume the subject at some future opportunity.

DRAMATIC.

PRINCESS'S.—A new melodramatic spectacle in three acts and eight scenes, entitled Schamyl, the Warrior-Prophet, was produced on Monday night with moderate success. The success was almost entirely owing to the scenery, dresses, and mise-en-scène, which are admirable and reflect great credit on the machinists, decorators, and costumiers. Mr. Oscar Byrne, too, the ballet-master, is deserving of praise for the incidental dances, which are novel and picturesque; and here all eulogium ceases. Schamyl, the Warrior-Prophet is taken from a French drama which, last season in Paris, had a successful run. The characters and incidents were happily suited to the times, and, in consequence, incongruities and absurdities were readily overlooked in the bustle, quick changes, stirring incidents, and hair-breadth escapes provided by the author. The piece will not bear dissection, nor can the plot be clearly evolved; everything is contradictory and impossible, and, although written about bonâ fide times and relating to a real living personage, never did tale of fairy make greater exactions on the imagination of the spectator than Schamyl, the Warrior-Prophet. Of course Schamyl is made a hero, but our first impressions of him are not very favourable; the first thing we learn of him is that he is young and wild, quarrels with everybody and runs in debt deeply. These characteristics may belong to a hero, but are not essentials to his constitution, and, unless with a distinct purpose, the dramatist, we fancy, should have eschewed their mention. However, having mentioned them, we are led to expect them, and on the entrance of Schamyl naturally anticipate a Circassian Rover or Wildrake—a very game bird caught wild in the Caucasian hills, half-tamed and pecking at every hand stretched out to it. Never was disappointment greater than when Mr. Ryder walked on the stage with long and measured strides, tall, muscular, middle-aged, looking much more like a well-reared stately barn-door cock than a juvenile haggard or ger-falcon, and seeming utterly incapable, in his placidity and respectability, of quarrelling with anybody or being indebted to any tradesman for a denier. As the piece progressed, we were enabled to make out that it commences in 1834, in which "anno domini" Schamyl is at Teflis, in the palace of Prince David Vassiloff, the Russian governor (Mr. James Vining), and under his protection,—how he came under his protection we are not told. Schamyl's mother, Zenda (Mrs. Phillips), and his half-brother, Halim (Mr. J. F. Cathcart), call upon him in the Russian palace, and rouse the Circassian lion in his breast. He deserts the Russians and succours his countrymen. His greatest exploits are going on a raft down an oblique waterfall and opening the dykes. By opening the dykes he saves Circassia and drowns his enemies. Schamyl is about to be elected Imaum of Circassia—since he is the accredited son of the prophet Khasi-Moullah—when Hasbeck, a Circassian chief in league with Russia, and father to Halim, denounces him as illegitimate; whereupon Zenda—who, believing her son Schamyl to be lost on the raft, has taken poison—appears suddenly, declares Schamyl to be the true and legitimate offspring of Khasi-Moullah, and expires on the spot. Schamyl is declared Imaum. He has now in his power Prince Vassiloff, to whom he proposes honourable terms of peace, which the Russian governor declines on the ground that, being a prisoner, the acceptation would be derogatory to him as a soldier. By the mediation, however, of Fedora (Miss Heath), daughter of Vassiloff, and beloved by and loving Schamyl, the Governor is set at liberty, and Schamyl follows him to Teflis to conclude the treaty. Of course, the Russian Governor plays the villain, and tries to arrest Schamyl, who is saved by a miraculous stratagem, in which Fedora is killed, and the piece concludes with an epilogue—supposed to take place twenty years later, in the present year, 1854—in which Schamyl receives the representatives of the English, French, and Turkish navy, all of whom unite in a pleasing fraternisation.

It is but justice to say that Mr. Palgrave Simpson, the translator, has vastly improved on the original, and has created one character—that of a travelling English doctor, admirably played by Mr. Walter Lacy—deprived of which, the new piece would have passed off heavily and without relief. The Doctor's smart and lively sayings told with much effect, and mainly conduced to the success of the drama on Monday night. As a first-class theatre, however, to the name of which the Princess's has undoubted pretensions, that establishment should have left Schamyl, the Warrior Prophet, to the consideration of such theatres as rejoice in the production of Melo-Dramatic Spectacles.

STRAND.—The performances at this theatre have exhibited a marked improvement lately, and the houses, as a natural consequence, have been well attended. The management displays much skill in seizing on the popular topics of the moment, and transferring them to the boards. As a general rule, pieces thus constructed do not possess any peculiar intrinsic worth, nor run for a lengthened period. But we do not look for the beauties of a Raphael nor the severe grandeur of a Michael Angelo in a political caricature. If it makes them laugh, although the drawing may be bad, and the engraving—as is usually the case, by the way—worse, it has served the purpose for which it was made. The same holds good of the kind of piece now playing at this theatre. In proof of our assertion, we may mention the New Wags of Windsor, which has now reached its fifty-fifth or fifty-sixth night, and Who's a Traveller? which bids fair to become almost as popular. In fact, if the management continues to pursue the same line of policy much longer, the répertoire of the Strand Theatre will become a kind of dramatic register for passing events of any importance, and future Macaulays will rank its playbills among the documents most precious for the purposes of history.

Where's Cruvelli? produced on Monday, is the last specimen of the style of writing to which we have alluded, and a very favourable specimen it is. The dialogue is neat and rattling, and altogether free from any personal allusions, which people might imagine, from the title, that it contained. The plot, of course, is exceedingly slight. A celebrated artist has suddenly quitted the Grand Opéra in Paris. The manager is in a frightful predicament; the house is full, and the audience impatient. At this crisis, Mr. George Honey and Miss Beaumont, from the Strand theatre, happening to have come on a trip to Paris, pay a visit to the manager. The latter hears that they are to sing the next day at the Strand in La Sonnambula, the very opera the fair fugitive was to have appeared in. Need we say that Mr. George Honey, transformed into Signora Onizetti, appears as Amina, and Miss Beaumont, dressed in a Swiss jacket and knee-breeches, and figuring as Signor Beaumonti, impersonates Elvino? Our readers may, perhaps, inquire why Mr. George Honey should play the female character, and Miss Beaumont the gentleman. To this we reply, that we do not know, unless it is because Mr. Bedford impersonated Norma at the Adelphi, and was supported by Miss Woolgar as Pollio.

However, the piece was entirely successful. Mr. G. Honey was exceedingly funny, and, what is more, never over-stepped the limits of propriety, in a costume that would provide many actors with opportunities for the exhibition of coarse vulgarities too tempting to be resisted. Mr. Honey achieved a legitimate success, and was loudly called for at the fall of the curtain. This gentleman is an actor of original talent, and, without a doubt, one of the principal attractions at this theatre.

We must not forget to mention Miss Beaumont for the becoming manner in which she played a trifling part; nor Mr. J. Howard, for the unobtrusive but telling style in which he delivered the smart dialogue, anent testimonials, silver tea-pots, requisitions, etc., etc., set down for him in his character of the manager. To sum up shortly, Where's Cruvelli? is a decided success.

MARYLEBONE.—Mr. Heraud's tragedy of Videna, has yielded its place in the bills, for a time at least, to Macbeth, Othello, and other standard works. On the re-production of Macbeth, last Monday night, Mr. and Mrs. W. Wallack played as well, and were received as heartily, as ever in the two principal characters. Mr. Edwards, who has already become a favourite here, sung the music of Hecate with great taste and effect. This gentleman is a valuable addition to the establishment. A new drama, entitled Love and Loyalty, will shortly be produced.

THE PANOPTICON.

A FEW months since, our colossal contemporary the Times, published a long article upon the cheap literature of the day, with more especial reference to the works issued by Mr. Routledge of Farringdon-street. In that article, the writer went into some very interesting details concerning the wonderful circulation obtained by books and the vast amount of information and amusement spread throughout the length and breadth of this kingdom, not to mention our Indian possessions and immense colonies, from the simple fact of Mr. Routledge having adopted the modest shilling as the standard price of his publications. The effects of the "shilling," it appears, are wonderful. At this price, works, previously scarcely heard of at a higher price, obtained a respectable circulation, and amply remunerate the publisher, as soon as they are reduced to a shilling, while the sale of those already popular increase a hundred, and, in some cases, a thousand fold. Now this great principle of cheapness is not successful in the case of literature alone. Experience has already proved that its results are equally favourable in other instances. Need we point to the penny stamp and cheap excursion-trains? Why should the same not hold good of science and art? We feel convinced that it will, and the Royal Panopticon is a glorious example of the truth of our assertion. A few years ago, before people had discovered that it was more profitable to cater for the amusement and instruction of the masses at moderate prices than for the pleasure of a select few possessed of well-filled purses, the admission to the Panopticon would, doubtless, have been five shillings, or, at the least, half-a-crown. If we recollect aright, it cost five shillings to see the Panorama of London, at the Colosseum, when that building was first opened to the public. The managers of the Panopticon, however, are men of the present day. Although the edifice must have cost a very large sum to erect, and the other expenses connected with the institution have been very large, they did not for one moment endeavour to recover the outlay by high prices of admission. Nay; they did not even adopt a sort of sliding scale, like that at another large public building. There are no five-shilling days, at the Panopticon, for a select few to wander through deserted galleries and desolate corridors. The directors appreciated, no doubt, the humanising effects of art. They felt that the thirst for knowledge and innocent amusement was a kind of link uniting the peer and the peasant, and that there was little fear that the poor mechanic, although, perhaps, in a fustian jacket, who had so strong a desire for instruction as to hoard up his pence for the purpose of gratifying that desire;—they felt, we repeat, that such a man would not misbehave himself, or prove in any way offensive or disagreeable to his more fortunate brother, who might, perhaps, wear a better coat and possess more ample means, but who could not feel greater admiration or enthusiasm for the triumphs of human intellect set before his wondering eyes. The directors adopted, therefore—how wisely we need not say—the modest shilling as the "open Sesame," to all the marvels collected beneath their lofty dome. What all those marvels are who shall attempt to say, What writer, with only a column or two of print at his disposal would be rash enough to endeavour to describe them at full? If there be such a man—if there exist such a daring individual, we should like to make his acquaintance; we would instantly—had we sufficient influence—get him appointed to the command of the Baltic fleet, or dispatched to Sebastopol. No; it is useless to attempt describing the thousand attractions of the Royal Panopticon, or even, indeed, what may be deemed the mere accessaries, such as the structure itself, with its Moorish turrets and Alhambra-like embellishments; the wonderful and gigantic electric machine, without an equal in the world; the large Leyden battery; the Magneto-Electric Machine; the diving apparatus, by means of which a muscular gentleman descends into the water, and walks about in that element with a degree of ease and unconcern that must put the fishes to shame; the Chrysalis Life Preserver; and the various fairylike models, not to mention other subjects of startling effect, on a smaller scale, such as the ascending and descending carriages, by which the adventurous visitor is conveyed to and from the lower and upper parts of the building, seated (generally) in solitary glory, and looking, in spite of all his efforts to appear unconcerned, singularly ill at ease, under the gaze of the many faces directed in silent astonishment towards him.

But although, as we have said, it is impossible to describe all the wonders contained in the Panopticon, we may call our readers' attention to some of the principal ones. In the first place we have the moving panorama of Verona, which, with the dioramic views accompanying it, is one of the leading attractions. It is produced by Messrs. Carpenter and Westley, who are the painters likewise of the closing dioramic view—the interior of the Church of San Zenone—while the four first views are from the hand of Mr. Thomas Clare. These views present in succession the magnificent Porch of the Duomo, a Cathedral structure of great antiquity, some portions being anterior to the reign of Charlemagne; the Piazza delle Erbe, once the Forum of Verona, and surrounded by monuments of its former greatness: the tomb of the Scaligers, in the old Cemetery of Santa Maria l'Antica; and, lastly, the exterior of the Church of San Zenone, an architectural celebrity, dear to the historian and the artist.

The panoramic series of objects preceding these views includes the Church of San Vatale; the Orphan Asylum, near which is the tomb still shown as that of Romeo and Juliet; the Ponte Navi, and behind it, on the opposite side of the river, the Church of the Holy Trinity; San Fermo Maggiore, with its three gables; the Amphitheatre, and, beyond it, the Philharmonic Theatre; the Church of St. Luke; the Church of San Giovannie in Valle, seen in the foreground; Castel Vecchio, in the distance, with the Palazzo Canossa in front; the Ponte Nuovo and Ponte Vecchio, with the Tower of the Church of the Holy Apostles; the Campanile and Palazzo Maffei, both which are also shown in the dioramic view of the Piazza delle Erbe; the Church of San Zenone, seen also, both externally and internally, in the two concluding dioramic views, the Churches of Santa Anastasia, Saint Thomas of Canterbury, and Santa Maria Matricolare, which is the ancient Duomo or Cathedral of Verona; the Ponte Pietra; St. George's Church; the Castle of St. Peter, on its eminence, with the ruins of the Palace of Theodoric; beneath it, the Church of St. Peter; and, lastly, on the farthest hill in the distance, to the right, the Castle of St. Felix. We have named these principal objects of interest as they succeed each other in the moving chain of tableaux, but an account of Verona, embracing a notice of all the most important scenes displayed in the panorama, will be found in the catalogue. The dioramic views, already enumerated, follow the exhibition of the panorama; and these in turn are succeeded by a dioramic miscellany, consisting of the prismatic disc, which is designed to illustrate certain optical phenomena; a succession of chromatropic effects; and an allegory in which the Queen appears enthroned as the patroness of the arts and sciences, typified by figures grouped around her. This final view is preceded by the display of the central fountain, at high pressure, and rendered beautifully luminous and chromatic by scientific appliances.

The sculpture in the Rotunda, and the paintings in the north Lecture-room, are an ever-new source of pleasure to visitors. Their attraction is not of a kind that diminishes very readily; but, to those who possess a true appreciation of the excellent in art, will rather increase with familiarity.

In the Photographic department there have been some important steps made towards rendering this feature a distinct and prominent attraction. The experienced and able superintendent of the operations, Mr. Spencer, is now supported by several distinguished colourists of high standing, among them Mr. Lock, whose highly-finished and delicate miniatures form one of the annual attractions at the Royal Academy.

The galleries contain many and various expositions of industrial art; and the entire process of several branches of manufacture may here be gathered from practical illustrations. Amongst the productive machinery in operation, may be noticed Morgan's Jacquard-loom, for figured silks: Dart and Son's printing-loom; the glass-blowing apparatus; and the vertical machinery for cutting out patterns, in wood or metal, for inlaid or carved wood, such as parquetry floors, mosaic boxes, desks, bookshelves, brackets, and ladies' work-tables.

In the first gallery there is a porch well worth the attention of the connoisseur. The objects exhibited consist of bronzed statuettes and imitations of china; but the specimens are far superior to the ordinary productions, or, indeed, to anything we have ever seen. The deceptive surface of the bronze work is so marvellously perfect as to baffle the closest scrutiny of accustomed eyes. Not only is the smooth surface of new bronze imitated to perfection, but we have every stage of time's handiwork copied with the fidelity of a loving pupil. The beautiful torso of the Venus of Milo has been selected by the artist for a triumphant display of his skill; and the only regret which we feel on looking at it is that the original, in the Louvre, being of warmly-tinted marble, the association is incomplete—unless, indeed, we may imagine a contemporary work in bronze. But there are little antique cups and figures, the veritable originals of which are in bronze, a fact giving to the copies more interest and value in the eyes of dilettanti. Although this curious exhibition of skill in the production of fac-simile may not pretend to equal importance with the higher branches of art exemplified at the Royal Panopticon, we advise no one to terminate a visit without glancing at the specimens we have alluded to.

REVIEWS.

"Tarentelle." Pour le Piano. Par Réné Favarger. Cramer, Beale, and Co.

This tarantelle is in D minor, correctly written and animated enough, but in parts somewhat common-place, and in no respect denoting the slightest amount of originality. It is very easy, and that alone will be recommendation to school girls, and masters who object to give their pupils difficult music for fear they may be asked to play it over themselves. Of these last there are a good number about. N'importe.

"Près du Lac." Idylle Pour le Piano. Par Sigismond Lehmeyer. Ewer and Co.

This "Idylle," (fantastic title!) belongs to a class of music which is beginning to be obtrusive. Every foreign pianist who enjoys a summer holiday, and smokes a cigar on the edge of a lake, or pond, in the country, straightway imagines himself a poet, and inflicts his reflections upon the musical public on his return home, in the shape of a notturno, or something of the sort. M. Lehmeyer is like a hundred others, and has not been able to fish up anything like a new idea from "the lake" of his predilection. Let him try a hill next time and he may be more fortunate. The Idylle is in C sharp minor, with an episode in A flat, which said, all is said.

"Sérénade Mauresque." Pour le Piano. Composée par Albert Jungmann. Ewer and Co.

A "characteristic" movement with very little character, and not a bit more mauresque than arabesque or grotesque. The second part, where the subject is given to the left hand, is needlessly difficult for so trifling an affair. We may advise Herr Jungmann, who is probably a young man, that it is not enough to assume the minor key and 3-4 measure, with the second quaver of the bar split into semi-quavers, to be entitled to the reputation of having composed a good serenade in the Moorish or Spanish manner. "First find your tune."

"Barcarolle." Pour le Piano. Par W. Vincent Wallace. Cramer, Beale, and Co.

Here is another "morçeau caractéristique," and this time really characteristic, and charmingly melodious in the bargain. Mr. Wallace has composed few pieces more elegant or better calculated to show off the capabilities of a pianist of taste and feeling, combined with tolerable powers of execution, than this barcarole, which is in A flat, graceful throughout, a new interest attached to the theme on each time of its recurrence, and without one commonplace thought or passage from the first page to the last. Our countryman is certainly a better hand at the more refined class of musique de salon than one half of his foreign competitors and rivals.

"Beaumont Polka." Pour le Piano. Composée par Elisabeth St.-Marc. Robert W. Ollivier.

The trio or second part of this polka is pleasant and lively. The whole is easy, without pretence, and can offend no one, while it may amuse many. It serves its purpose thoroughly, a quality to be recommended in polkas.

"Chansons d'Amour." Par Charles Evers. Ewer and Co.

Four light, well-written, and very graceful bagatelles, neither easy nor difficult, but something conveniently between the two. The only fault we can find is, that there is not sufficient of what is termed couleur locale, by fiddlers as well as limners, to distinguish them from each other. The Turkish chanson d'amour (in A minor), for example, has no decided character, although the muezzin calls to mosque every now and then, and there are occasional glimpses of wild melody. Any other name would suit it as well. Nor do we find anything Russian in the Russian love-song (in G minor), which in places (instance the whole of Page 3) is much more like the French style of tune than anything. This is, however, the best-written of the four chansons, and is altogether an attractive piece of music, the variations and ornaments being quite as agreeable as the theme itself, which is quaint, and pretty, if not absolutely Muscovite. No. 4, the Swiss love-song (in C), has more of evident character than any of the others; and yet, without knowing why, we like it the least of the set. No. 2, "Provence" (in A), is flowing and tuneful, but the episode, which extends from page 7 to 10 inclusive, is commonplace, and written with less musical finish than the rest. As for national character, we really can see none in it. There is not a trace of the Provençal tune from beginning to end.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, November 11th, 1854.

The paper headed "Rubini," in another part of this day's impression, is a translation of some passages from a long and elaborate essay upon that celebrated singer, which M. Scudo, the well-known musical critic, has contributed to the Revue des Deux Mondes. As whatever relates to Rubini must interest the majority of our readers, and as the translation has been sent us by a contributor of long standing, we have inserted it. At the same time we feel it our duty to disavow any absolute participation in the opinions of M. Scudo, and any sympathy with the extravagant tone of his appreciations. That Rubini was a great vocalist is patent to all the world, and that Bellini was in his way a charming and attractive composer. But we really cannot understand why either the man who sang "Vivi tu," however well, or the man who composed I Puritani, should be written about in a strain that would be hyperbolical even if applied in the one case to Mdlle. Rachel, and in the other to Rossini himself. We wish somebody would supply our literary friends over the water with an index expurgatorium of adjectives, figures, and comparisons, which belong more strictly to the domain of rhodomontade than to that of pure art-criticism. In reading the Parisian feuilletons we are struck with the fact that every singer, dancer, actor, and composer is possessed of qualities that invite excessive admiration and ensure a lasting celebrity. If a paragraph records the important fact that M. Goria, the pianist, has left Vichy, for some other spot, it is always in this strain:—

"M. Goria, after a series of brilliant concerts in the delightful watering-place of Vichy, has set out for Pau, where the most flattering ovations await the celebrated pianist."

Or if M. Sowinski, the composer, has organised a concert at Abbeville:—

"The inhabitants of Abbeville are on the alert for a musical treat of an extraordinary nature. M. Sowinski has made all the necessary preparations for a grand concert in that city, at which the learned and admirable artist promises to introduce some of his latest compositions."

Or if M. Panseron, the singing-master, is about to bring out a new treatise, with a title page containing the names of all his productions, and a portrait of himself, suggesting the idea of M. Panseron sauté dans ses œuvres, a dainty dish for the practisers of solfeggi:—

"The announcement of a new elementary treatise by M. Panseron, will be read with avidity by the whole of the world of music. The illustrious professor, in a series of exercises, has progressively developed the whole of his recent discoveries in the beautiful art of vocalization."

Or if M. Adolphe Adam has composed his fifty-fifth mass for some particular occasion:—

"The new missa just finished by M. Adam of the Institute, will be performed, for the first time, to-day, by a competent body of singers, and played at the church of St. Eustache. The musical world is in raptures with this fresh inspiration of the piquant and spirituel composer of the Postillon de Longjumeau, who has displayed a profound knowledge of the resources of vocal counterpoint, and, amidst startling originality, a deep and varied acquaintance with the colossal works of Cherubini and the gravest of the church composers."

Thus we find, much to our surprise, that M. Goria, the pianist, is "celebrated;" M. Sowinski, the composer, "learned and admirable;" M. Panseron, the singing master, "illustrious," and a "discoverer;" and M. Adolphe Adam of the Institute, "piquant," "spirituel," "profound," "original," "well read," and a contrapuntist. We could cite a thousand instances of such misapplication of terms, of unbounded eulogy thus absurdly applied. What compliment, under the circumstances, can it be to style M. Meyerbeer "illustrious," M. Auber "piquant and spirituel," Signor Rossini "immortal," and Herr Liszt "eccentric." We should really be gratified to be able to peruse the name of one given artist—singer, dancer, actor, or composer—without an adjective or adjectives prefixed. Is it not enough to say even of Rossini—"Rossini is getting better;" or of Meyerbeer—"Meyerbeer is at Spa, with Jules Janin;" or of Auber—"Auber has just finished a new work for the Opéra Comique;" or of Liszt—"Liszt is writing an essay upon Wagner and the Music of the Future," without swelling out the news by a preposterous overlaying of epithets? All the world knows that Rossini is "immortal," Meyerbeer "illustrious," Auber "piquant and spirituel," and Liszt "eccentric;" and it is therefore a simple platitude or truism to place a series of stereotyped adjectives before their names. How much better, in alluding to men of such universally acknowledged merit, if prefix or affix be indispensable, to place before or after their familiar and world-accepted titles, their simple noms de baptême. For our own parts, like all readers, we would fain enjoy the privilege of adding something ourselves, of having something left for our own imagination to supply, supposing we possess any. When we read that Giacchino Rossini is getting better, we inwardly ejaculate—"Ah! the immortal author of Il Barbiere is recovering—we are glad to hear it." Or that Giacomo Meyerbeer is at Spa, with Jules Janin:—"What, the illustrious author of the Huguenots and L'Etoile du Nord again at his favorite Spa, with his witty, vivacious, and ancient friend J. J.?—we should like to be with them—Et tu Brute! is a saying of the Latins." Or that Daniel Auber has finished a new opera:—"Bravo! piquant and spirituel we are sure it will be, like the Crown Diamonds." Or that Franz Liszt is analysing the music of the future:—"It's no use, eccentric fellow! you can never make the world swallow Lohengrin;"—and so on.

When, however, from great men we descend to little, from immensities to nonentities, from giants to dwarfs, the case is different. A. Goria and Albert Sowinski may give concerts at Vichy and Abbeville; Adolphe Adam of the Institute may have completed his fifty-fifth mass; and Gustave Panseron may have issued an announcement of a new elementary treatise; it is all one and the same thing to us. But if the publication of these facts be accompanied with the various epithets of "celebrated," "learned and admirable," "piquant and spirituel," "illustrious," "profound," and what not—we are simply inclined to laugh.

Let it not be imagined that we have any idea of confounding Rubini and Bellini with the catalogue of mediocrities and nobodies. We only wish to suggest that fewer expletives would serve the turn of either, and that an adjective or so the less would not abate the well-earned reputation of singer or composer one tittle. A hint for M. Scudo.

It will be seen by the letter of our correspondent in Paris that the Grand Opéra is likely to get over its difficulties, at least for the present. Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli has returned to her post, and, as we anticipated in our last, all is forgiven and forgotten. Whether the resignation of M. Nestor Roqueplan, who for so many years has been associated with the management of the first lyric theatre of the French metropolis, may be regarded as an episode connected with the temporary absence of Mademoiselle Cruvelli, we are unable to say. The position of that gentleman under the control of his ministerial directors was so inconsistent with independent action, and even with personal dignity, that we are hardly surprised at receiving the news of his having abandoned it. Whether another manager, more pliable, may be found to take his place, or whether M. Fould and his satraps will assume the sole responsibility for the future, remains to be seen. For our own parts, we have little confidence in a system which makes the French Opéra a mere pocket-theatre of the Court, from which the public can be virtually excluded at will. The finance of a government is one thing, that of a theatre another. M. Fould has proved himself an adept at the first; but hitherto his administration of the last has not been successful.

Meanwhile, we await some fuller details about the Cruvelli affair, the explanation of which our intelligence has not depth of line enough to fathom. That the result will be satisfactory we entirely believe, and we have little doubt that the ministerial indulgence in favour of the erring prima donna will be emulated by the public, and that the reception given to Mdlle. Cruvelli will be a pledge of a new and closer alliance between herself and her Parisian admirers. Had she been less indispensable to the interests of the establishment, however, it is extremely doubtful whether she would have escaped so easily. At the same time, we cannot hold with those among her aspersers who condemn her recent conduct as part of a regular system which has characterised her public career since she first appeared upon the stage in Italy. Her disappearance from London towards the end of her second year's engagement with Her Majesty's Theatre (in 1852) bears no resemblance whatever to her recent eclipse. It is quite enough to insist upon this, without ripping up old wounds. The circumstances are known to all our readers and to the public, and whoever pleases may draw conclusions without our assistance. On the other hand the exhibition of feeling on the boards of the Opera at Genoa was the result of a political demonstration of which, being a German, Mdlle. Cruvelli (whom the Genoese people supposed to be an Austrian) was on more than one occasion an innocent victim. That she should, under a moment's excitement, have manifested her independence in a marked manner, cannot astonish and ought not to displease anyone who knows the young lady's impulsive character, or who is willing to admit that to be a German born and not to be ashamed of it, but, on the contrary, to be proud of it, is hardly to be accounted an error of judgment, much less a sin to be visited with condign punishment. Instead of being a notorious and habitual defaulter, as her unreflecting and not very charitable enemies would insinuate, the connection which Mdlle. Cruvelli has had from time to time with the principal theatres of Italy, France, and England, has been marked by a zealous and undeviating attention to her duties, which, without reference to her artistic capabilities, has won for her the esteem of every manager under whom she has served. As an instance, we would cite the year of the Great Exhibition in London (1851), when she stood so valiantly to her colours, and, with unabated energy and good will, continued the main support of Mr. Lumley's theatre until the middle of October, during two months of extra nights, at reduced prices, over and above the regular season, which she had seen through to the last—and this, as our readers will not have forgotten, under circumstances by no means calculated to sustain the professional ardour of a singer. When attacked for insubordination, therefore, or want of heart in the performance of her duties to her employers, Mdlle. Cruvelli has good grounds of defence, and her friends may espouse her cause under the shield of irrefutable arguments. What may have been the real cause of dissension between herself and the management of the Grand Opéra has yet to be explained. Perhaps, however, the matter may be hushed up, and the public be left unacquainted with the particulars. This can be effected in France, where the minister can command the silence of the press; and if, at the will of government, at the order of Manager Fould, the secret be withheld, those who know enough of Madlle. Cruvelli, to esteem her highly, will draw all the conclusions in her favour, and, until persuaded to the contrary by facts that cannot be disputed, will persist in believing her innocent of any breach of faith, mistake of judgment, or fault of conduct, in the whole affair.

Mr. W. V. Wallace did not travel by the Arctic to America, but by the Arabia, which started a few days later. He has arrived safely in New York.

The late Madame Sontag.—Extract from a private letter:—"Vera Cruz, Oct. 4.—One great subject of conversation here for the last week has been Madame Sontag. Her husband departed from Mexico immediately after her death, leaving her remains behind. The coffin containing them has been brought to this place by one of the ordinary carrier's carts, like any common package, having been valued in the carrier's invoice at 200 dollars. On its arrival here, it was first placed in the church of St. Augustine, but, being found offensive, was taken without any ceremony, religious or other, to a deserted church outside the town, to await the consent of some ship's captain to convey it to Europe; as yet none has been found who would admit it into his vessel. Assuredly if this poor lady did not anticipate in her childhood that she should become one day une grande dame of world-wide celebrity, she could have dreamt still less of the indignities her remains have been subjected to, such as the poorest peasant would sacrifice everything to spare any member of his family."—Evening Paper.

PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

While London is enveloped in the mist and fog and smoke of dull November; while asthmatic gentlemen cough in dismal chorus, as they unhappily traverse the dreary streets; while hoarse conductor shouts to hoarser cabby, and endeavours to avoid inevitable collision; while link-boys, torch in hand, threaten destruction to all they encounter, and while no sound of music is heard, save the strains of Jullien's splendid orchestra, here is Paris, bright and gay and fresh, with clear sky overhead, with a clear river joyously rushing through many bridges, with an air so mild that you take your demi-tasse, "al fresco," on the Boulevards, and refresh yourself after the opera under the fair canopy of Heaven. All the world is returning from the country, and the Paris season is about to commence. Drama and vaudeville, stately tragedy and genteel comedy, bleeding nuns and joyous ballets, broad farces and broader pantomimes à propos of the war, and lively operettas, follow each other in rapid succession.

In this embarras de richesses I know not where to begin. Shall I describe the brilliant vocalisation of Mad. Bosio in Matilda di Shabran, or paint the charms of Rosati in her new creation of Jovita?—shall I touch on the graceful singing of Caroline Duprez in Meyerbeer's admirable Etoile du Nord, or give some faint idea of the leaden heaviness of La Nonne Sanglante?—or, deserting the fashionable precincts of the Boulevard des Italiens, shall I take your readers on a pilgrimage to the Boulevard du Temple and join the crowd at the doors of the Théâtre-Lyrique? The eastern question carries the day, so walk in for the first representation of Schahabaham II. at the gay and pretty Théâtre-Lyrique.

Schahabaham II. is the son and successor of Schahabaham I., of glorious memory. His harem is well filled with fair Circassians, and one lively Frenchwoman has become its inmate—Mdlle. Olivette, formerly Columbine at the Théâtre-Lyrique of the fair of St. Laurent, whose career of success was cut short by flight, and who finds herself a prisoner in the Pasha's keeping. Pursued by Valentine, her lover, the Leander of the troupe, who follows her with dancing master's fiddle in hand, they meet in the harem, the walls whereof are scaled by the adventurous Valentine, and Olivette has just recounted her adventures to her lover in a long aria, when they are surprised by the Pasha and his prime minister. What shall be done with the Christian dog—what new and refined punishment shall be invented for him who has invaded the harem of Schahabaham II.? The Pasha and his minister Agobar (worthy minister of so great a chief) are not of an inventive genius, and after much research, in an amusing duet, they determine to hold to the ancient ways, to impale the lover and drown the fair one.

Happily for the fond lovers, the whole troupe from St. Laurent has followed them to Morocco; and the old père noble has become an astrologer, whose fame has reached the ears of the Pasha. Before carrying his decree into effect, the latter determines to consult the astrologer, who, recognising Valentine as an old companion, informs the Pasha that his fate is linked with that of another. The same planet, Venus, who presided at the Pasha's birth, filled the same office forty years later for another. That other is Valentine. If he be happy, so are you. If he be hungry, you will starve. If he be rich, gold and diamonds will abound with you. If you wish for a happy home, marry Valentine to Olivette. The Pasha is but too anxious to comply with the destinies of Providence; he follows out the orders of the astrologer, and as Valentine and Olivette can only be happy at Paris, he loads them with presents, and sends them to the Théâtre-Lyrique.

Such is the theme of Schahabaham II., most neatly written by Messrs. de Leuven and Michel Carré, and to which Mons. Eugène Gautier has set some pretty music. Mons. E. Gautier, though a young composer, has already written several operettas, of which one, Flore et Zephyr, was played at the Théâtre-Lyrique more than one hundred nights. In Schahabaham II. he has made great and evident improvement. The music throughout is lively, spontaneous, and natural, the melody abundant, the inspiration fresh. The overture is short, rattling, and gay. On the rising of the curtain, Valentine is discovered under the walls of the Pasha's harem, and sings a romance, accompanied by his dancing master's small-fiddle or pochette. The pochette keeps up a dialogue with the voice in a manner equally absurd and amusing, and the romance was encored amid peals of laughter. Arrived inside, Olivette recounts her adventures in a long aria, the details of which are worked out with skill. This is succeeded by a duet between the Pasha and his minister, full of spirit and absurdity, and the astrologer follows with an air which merits particular notice both for the melody, which is replete with sentiment, and for the orchestral accompaniment. A trio, "A Paris, à Paris," was deservedly encored; and the finale, a burlesque in the Italian school, with a tremendous crescendo, brought down the curtain amid roars of genuine applause. Mons. Allais, who made his first appearance as Valentine, has a small tenor voice, agreeable enough, but wanting in power and quality; he was very nervous at the outset, but gained confidence as he proceeded. Mdlle. Girard was superbly "got up" as Olivette; her voice is fresh, and she is seemingly a good musician; she was, however, very imperfect in her part, a fault which will no doubt be cured during the long course of success which I think awaits the opera. Junca is a magnificent Pasha, and Leroy (he with the nose) as his minister, proved himself an original comedian as well as a careful singer. Ribes displayed a voice of pleasing quality, sang with facility, vocalised well, and looked the astrologer to perfection. In short, Schahabaham II. is a great success for composer, authors, and singers, and worthily fills the place formerly occupied by L'Ours et le Pacha, La Maîtresse de Langues, and the Cäid.

Now that we are at the Théâtre-Lyrique, I must pay the meed of praise and admiration to Madame Deligne-Lauters, who, in a new opera entitled Le Billet de Marguerite, has produced a sensation as legitimate as any I remember. Madame Lauters is a pupil of the Academy at Brussels, and has appeared on the stage rather by accident than vocation. She is not more than nineteen, but her appearance is so excessively youthful that, when on the stage, she looks like a girl of fourteen, trying to assume the airs and graces of a fine lady. Her voice is a soprano of wide compass and agreeable quality. The freshness of her middle tones and purity of the upper are equally remarkable. She sings with sentiment, and acts with intelligence and vivacity. Though guilty occasionally of exaggeration in style, she shows such an evident determination to succeed, and has been so favoured by nature as to voice, that, when time shall have cured her defects, there will remain what is not common in these days—the instinct and feelings of a true artist. She appeared at the Théâtre-Lyrique unheralded by preliminary flourish of trumpets; she is unspoiled by critical adulation, and has made a sensation on the public which fills the theatre each night she plays. The piece is unworthy of her, the plot involved, the music frivolous; but notwithstanding all this, her talent asserted its right, and her début has thus far been a real event in the musical season. If Madame Lauters studies with care and perseverance, I hesitate not to say that she is destined to occupy one of the foremost places on the French lyric stage.

Rosati at the opera has made a triumphant rentrée in the new ballet of Jovita. She is a gipsy, whose lover and father have been carried off by brigands. She boldly enters the robbers' cave, enchants them with a pas de tambour, and a pas de fusil, and eventually releases the objects of her affection. With head proudly thrown back, and those exquisitely supple movements which have made her so great a reputation, the fair danseuse bounded on the stage, and into the affections of all beholders, at one swoop. When before the bandits, nothing can be imagined more graceful or elegant than her pas de fusil, more exciting and fascinating than her pas de tambour. The music, by Labarre, is very pretty, and report speaks well of that which he is writing for a new ballet, the principal part in which will also be filled by Rosati.

At the Italian Opera, Rossini holds undisputed sway. Semiramide, Il Barbiere, and Otello have followed in rapid succession, and, this week, Matilda di Shabran has been added to the list. The cast is strong, and comprises Mesdames Bosio and Borghi-Mamo, Signori Luchesi, Rossi, and Gassier. Madame Bosio has enchanted her audience by her wonderful vocalisation, her rapid and daring flights, and her elaborate fioriture. Madame Borghi-Mamo is by no means young, and her personal appearance is against her. She is, however, an accomplished musician, and her voice, though deficient in volume, is pure, fresh, and sympathetic. She obtained a great success in the duet with Madame Bosio, and M. Ragani has already re-engaged her for next season. Luchesi sang the music of Corradino with remarkable fluency; but, alas for Isidore! where was Ronconi, the king of wandering minstrels—the Robson of the opera buffa! Meanwhile, Mercadante's Leonora is in rehearsal, and will be produced in a fortnight.

And now for the great news of the week, the anticipation of which has fairly divided attention with the siege of Sebastopol—Sophie Cruvelli has returned, the administration of the Opéra has forgotten and forgiven the past, the law-suit is dropped, the fatted calf is killed, and the child on whom Providence has been so prodigal of its gifts is welcomed back to her residence at the Rue Tronchet. Scandal, which had been so busy with her name, is completely crestfallen, and M. Fould has caused the following paragraph to be inserted in the journals of the day:—"Mdlle. Cruvelli's non-appearance at the Opéra was caused by an unfortunate misunderstanding. The person commissioned to inform the administration of her departure not having fulfilled his mission, Mdlle. Cruvelli, alarmed at the serious consequences of his neglect, has been afraid up to the present time to appear before the public. Seeing, however, that a prolonged absence would only aggravate these involuntary wrongs, she has demanded and obtained permission to recommence her duties at the Opéra immediately." Thus ends this much talked of escapade. Signor Verdi's new opera will be restored to the administration, and Meyerbeer's Africaine will once more be on the tapis. Meanwhile, the consequences of Cruvelli's flight have been most serious, and the state of the house has shown how indispensable were her services. M. Roqueplan, unable to agree with the government directors, has tendered his resignation as representative manager, and it has been accepted. I hope in my next to give you an account of Cruvelli's rentrée. I can assure you that the directors of the Opéra have displayed feelings of kindness and sympathy for this gifted but wayward artist, which cannot be too highly commended, and for which I sincerely hope she may know how to prove her gratitude.

PROVINCIAL.

MANCHESTER.—GERMAN, ITALIAN, AND ENGLISH OPERA.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Since my last notice in the Musical World of the 28th ult., I have but once been to the theatre—viz., on Friday, the 3rd inst., when I went to hear Semiramide. On arriving, I saw a placard posted up, announcing that Madame Caradori solicited the indulgence of the audience. The brilliant overture was done justice to by the band, under M. C. Hallé's direction: it was the most satisfactory performance of the night. The opera went lamely and tamely. M. Zelger, as the Ghost of Ninus, was the only artist that thoroughly satisfied the audience. After him, Miss Fanny Huddart came next. She looked and acted the part of Arsace really well; but, unfortunately, her voice lacks flexibility, and is deficient in power in the upper part of her register. Signor Fortini took great pains with the part of Assur, and looked fierce enough to murder anything; but he is not made of the stuff to give weight to the acting and singing. Poor Madame Caradori was so ill, that it is not fair to pass a word of comment on her performance. The entire of the scene of the Babylonian Queen in the hanging gardens with her maidens, in which she sings the celebrated "Bell raggio," had to be cut out; also the first duet betwixt Arsace and Semiramide. No wonder, therefore, that the opera was the least successful of any yet attempted. The opening scene commenced very fairly, and the groups of satraps, Indians, Egyptians, priests, maidens, &c., formed a most imposing ensemble. The choruses were respectably done. The well-known quartet, "Di tanti rege e popoli," and, indeed, the whole of the remaining portion of this great scene, suffered from Madame Caradori's indisposition. The "Giuro ai Numi" went smoothly enough, also the Ghost sentences, so sonorously delivered by M. Zelger; but the finale to the first act was very bad. Semiramide was again performed on Monday last—the papers say more successfully—Mad. Caradori being restored to health and voice. Two performances of the Huguenots have been given—Saturday, 28th ult., and Wednesday, the 1st inst.—and have both been highly spoken of, with one serious drawback, viz., that portions of it were done in French, German, and Italian! Signor Octave Benedetti was the Raoul; Madame Rudersdorff, Valentine; Mdlle. Büry, Marguerite; and Herr Formes, Marcel. Il Barbiere was given on Tuesday, the 31st ult. (in lieu of Semiramide, first announced); on Thursday, the 2nd inst., portions of Acis and Galatea (in English), Zauberflöte, and Fidelio (in German) were given; and, on Saturday last, Fidelio entire. The houses have been as indifferent as ever, the only exception being on the Huguenots night, when the theatre was moderately filled. M. Zelger, it is said, made a capital Dr. Bartolo, in Il Barbiere; Mdlle. Agnes Büry was good as Rosina; and Signor Fortini, somewhat out of his element, had too much lead about him for the light-heeled mercurial Figaro; Signor Gregory made up well as Basilio; and some of the concerted music did not go amiss. On Tuesday, I had promised myself a treat in witnessing the performance of Il Seraglio, for the first time, Herr Reichardt, at last, being fully restored to health and voice. Mdlle. Agnes Büry, however, who was to have taken the part of Blonda, was seriously ill, and could not appear; the consequence was, a Madame Heinrich had to take the part without rehearsal, and a very imperfect representation of Il Seraglio was given. Herr Formes as Osmin, Herr Reichardt as Belmont, Madame Rudersdorff as Constance, and even Herr Zapf as Pedrillo, are all good, but it requires a lady well up in the sprightly part of Blonda to make the opera complete. On Wednesday, Lucrezia Borgia was represented, cast as before; on Thursday, Die Zauberflöte was put up for Herr Formes' benefit, being its first performance this season entire; but, at this present writing, I cannot say if it was done or not, or if Mdlle. Agnes Büry was sufficiently recovered to take the part of the Queen of Night. In my next, I hope to send you a report of a successful performance of Il Seraglio—better houses I begin to despair of, although Herr Formes should draw a good house at his benefit.

A Mr. Tonks, of Birmingham, has been making a vain and unwise attempt to convert a temporary building, erected as an American circus, into a Philharmonic Hall. In it he gave three concerts, on the 26th, 27th, and 28th ult, with Mr. A. Mellon and the excellent band of "The Orchestral Union," and Mr. and Mrs. Weiss, and Mrs. Newton Frodsham as vocalists. The place is neither fit to play or sing in, and in spite of the talent announced all three concerts were signal failures. A fourth concert was tried on Saturday last, when the Madrigal and Glee Union, consisting of Mrs. Enderssohn, Mr. and Mrs. Lockey, Hobbs, H. Phillips, and Hatton—were engaged, with Madame Clara Novello and Mr. Sims Reeves to add to the attraction. The consequence was that, despite a very miserably wet night, the place was literally besieged by such a crowd, that the whole was crammed almost to suffocation, hundreds being turned away from the doors, many of whom had secured tickets, but could not get inside the building. Those inside were little better off, as the place was so utterly unsuited for a music hall, that neither pianoforte nor voices could be properly heard. Sims Reeves made his clarion tone tell sufficiently to be encored, first, in "Adelaida," when he substituted "My Pretty Jane," and next in F. Mori's new war song, both of which he sang superbly. Mr. Hatton, of course, got encored in his comic song, but the fine glee singing was entirely lost in such a building, and the uproarious audience were very wrath and discontented, because every piece they encored was not immediately given, and because some had to be omitted in consequence of Mrs. Lockey being taken unwell—no wonder, in such a crowded place, without any efficient ventilation.

Ibid.—Mr. C. F. Anthony's choral concert came off at the Mechanics' Institute, on Wednesday evening, when Miss Shaw, Mrs. Winterbottom, Mrs. Brooke, Mrs. Tomkins, and Mrs. Thomas, were the principal vocalists. The members of the Manchester Glee and Choral Society, comprising upwards of seventy voices, also gave their gratuitous services. Everything went off exceedingly well; the choruses, however, sadly suffered from the unfortunate necessity of singing as it were at the bottom of a well, on account of the miserably contracted dimensions of the room. Mr. E. J. Loder, the conductor of the Manchester Glee and Choral Society, wielded the bâton, and such a body of vocalists under his efficient guidance, could not fail to produce most satisfactory results. We were glad to see the room so well filled, and hope the result will be remunerative to the gentleman for whose benefit the performance was given.

Liverpool.—The Collegiate Choral Union is a society of young amateurs, formerly pupils in the schools of the Collegiate Institution. The union was established in April last, under high patronage, and the first private concert took place on Thursday evening. Mr. Crowe conducted; Miss Whitham, of Huddersfield, and Mrs. M'Dougall, of Birkenhead, fulfilled an engagement as the principal sopranos; and Mr. T. Radcliffe, organist of the society, and of St. John's Church, Fairfield, presided at the organ and pianoforte. The programme contained a selection from the compositions of Händel, Haydn, Dr. Croft, Mendelssohn, Donizetti, Horsley, Balfe, Purcell, Bishop, J. S. Bach, Stevens, and others. The concert, which opened with the National Anthem, and closed with "Rule Britannia," went off in a manner creditable to the society, and calculated to create high expectations.

Music and the Drama in Liverpool.—(From our own Correspondent).—Fidelio attracted a numerous audience on its first performance, with Madame Rudersdorff in the part of Leonora. The Rocco of Herr Formes was inimitable; and the music was sung with much care and finish. Herr Zapf was "not strong enough for the place" of Florestan, in which Herr Reichardt was sadly missed; but Miss Chambers made an interesting Marcellina. The prisoners' chorus was better done than we have heard it before in Liverpool. On Monday, Semiramide was given, with Madame Caradori as Semiramis, Miss Fanny Huddart as Arsace, Signor Fortini as Assur, and M. Zelger as the Shade of Ninus. The production of this opera was a grand mistake. Handel's Acis and Galatea is to be given to-morrow (Friday) night.

Madame Clara Novello and Mr. Sims Reeves, with Mrs. Lockey, Mrs. Enderssohn, Mr. Lockey, Mr. Hobbs, Mr. Henry Phillips, and Mr. J. L. Hatton, who form the English Glee and Madrigal Union, sang at the seventh subscription concert of our Philharmonic Society, which took place before a numerous and fashionable audience, on Tuesday evening. The programme consisted principally of a selection of glees and madrigals, to which full justice was done by the accomplished vocalists to whom they were entrusted. Madame Clara Novello sang a poor but difficult composition of Schimon's, and the grand scena from Oberon, "Ocean! thou mighty monster!" which was encored. She sang also two duets with Mr. Sims Reeves, who sang the air from the Prophète, "Un impero più soave," and, when encored, Mr. Hatton's "Good-bye, sweetheart," to the composer's accompaniment. In singing a ballad by Wallace, Mr. Reeves was again encored, and raised the audience to a pitch of wild delight by singing a patriotic song apropos to our national position, ending in "Sebastopol and Liberty." A hurricane of plaudits called the tenor forth again to repeat the sentiments which electrified the crowd, and the musical meeting for a few minutes was transformed into a patriotic body burning with ardour in a righteous cause. The sestet from Don Giovanni, "Sola, sola," was given by the vocalists, but the concert was too far advanced for its due appreciation. The band played an overture by Mendelssohn, "Meerstille und Glückliche Fahrt"—(Calm Sea and Safe Voyage). It is one of the finest pieces of descriptive writing ever heard in its form; in fact, it is an elaborated "song without words," but so minute and expressive the poorest imagination could fill the gap. Mr. Herrman and his talented troupe evinced complete appreciation of the gem, and gave it con amore. The band also played Weber's overture to Preciosa, and Haydn's symphony in E flat.—Mr. Buckstone's engagement at the Royal Amphitheatre terminated on Friday last, and on Monday he was succeeded by Mr. G. V. Brooke, who will give six farewell performances, previous to his departure for Australia.—At the Theatre-Royal, on Tuesday, Mr. Barry Sullivan appeared in William Tell, and on Wednesday night took his benefit, when he appeared in Macbeth. On Monday, Mr. and Miss Vandenhoff will appear in Antigone, when Mendelssohn's magnificent music will be sung by the operatic chorus.—Haydn's Creation will be performed at the next Philharmonic shilling concerts.—Mr. E. L. Hime gives his "Songs and Sayings of Samuel Lover" at the next Saturday Evening Concert.—Mr. B. R. Isaac is to give a classical concert, at the Music-hall, Bold-street, on the evening of the 29th inst.

Clifton.—Miss Rainforth's "Scottish Entertainment" was given on Monday evening, with complete success, at the new Athenæum-hall. The first part of the entertainment consisted entirely of Jacobite songs, and one, "Will ye no' come back again?" was encored. The second part was more general in its character; the airs were many of them old favourites, and, being tastefully sung by the talented vocalist, were warmly appreciated and some of them encored, among which was "Up in the mornin' early.". Miss Rainforth introduced each song with some few remarks as to its author and history, which, both from the usefulness and point of the information itself and the ease and emphasis with which it was conveyed, contributed greatly to the pleasure experienced. Miss Rainforth is well known as a pleasing singer and a clever and intelligent actress, and the union of these two talents well qualified their fortunate owner for doing justice to such an entertainment as that of Monday. She sang throughout with taste, intelligence, and spirit.

Birmingham.—Mr. Stimpson's benefit concert took place on Thursday, and attracted a large and fashionable audience, nearly every corner of the Hall being filled. The list of engagements embraced Mrs. Enderssohn, Mrs. Lockey, Messrs. Lockey, Hobbs, H. Phillips, and Land, Madame Clara Novello, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Hatton. The principal pieces were the "Come per sereno" by Madame Novello, and the new war song by Mr. Reeves. In the first, the clear flexible voice and artistic training of the lady were shown to great advantage. She was loudly encored, and showed the versatility of her style by substituting a naïve Scotch ballad, "Somebody," which she sang with expressive grace. She also sang "With verdure clad" very successfully. Mr. Reeves created quite a furore by his vigorous interpretation of Frank Mori's war song, "On the Danube's banks," a composition of great merit. The applause was tremendous, and to an encore he replied, raising the war fever still higher by the apt substitution of the words "Sebastopol and Liberty," for the printed phrase "England and Victory." The words were dashed out as if they had been sounded by a trumpet, and peal upon peal of applause followed, until he came forward for the third time, and delivered the stirring sentiment. We have rarely seen a more excited audience. Mrs. Lockey sang a song by Hatton, the theme, a prayer for the brave. Mrs. Endersohn gave a piece by Meyerbeer. Mr. Lockey sang "Nina," and Mr. Hatton assisted with his comic sayings. The concerted music was well sung, and notwithstanding the number of the pieces the concert terminated early.—Birmingham Journal.

York.—Mr. Willy's concert took place on Wednesday evening last, and was attended by a select audience. Mr. Willy's reception was highly flattering, and he was ably supported by the local talent. The selection of music was excellent, and consisted of Haydn's quartet in D, No. 63; a fantasia on national airs; a quintet in G minor, by Mozart; Beethoven's trio in G major; Beethoven's quartet in G major; and Paganini's "Perpetual Motion," played by Mr. Willy. The execution of the programme was highly satisfactory, and the announcement of another concert for next week, with a complete change of programme, was received with unanimous applause.

Leeds.—The second of the People's Concerts was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening last, the vocalists being Miss Whitham, Miss Megson, Mr. Dyson, and Mr. Winn, with Mr. John Pew as solo violinist, and Mr. Broughton as accompanyist. The attendance was not good, and it is but fair to say that the concert was not one of the best given by the Recreation Society. The omission of four pieces in the second part of the concert and the substitution of others, put the audience out of sorts, and must be carefully avoided on future occasions, otherwise the managers will peril the success of their undertaking.

Wakefield.—On Thursday evening last a concert was given in the Corn Exchange buildings, by the committee of the Church Institution. The vocalists were Miss Forsythe, of Leeds, Mr. Lambert, from the Cathedral Choir, York, and Mr. Thomas Dyson, tenor, from her Majesty's Chapel Royal, Windsor.

Newcastle Potteries Musical Festival.—This event came off during the present week. The success of this undertaking to provide musical entertainments of a high order for the people, and thus conduce to the improvement of taste in the provincial towns is highly laudable of itself; but when this appeal of musicians and discriminating amateurs is responded to by the people with a proper spirit of appreciation and support, the result is a feeling of unmixed gratification and delight that labour has not been spent in vain, and that the public are fully alive to the efforts made to contribute to their profit and amusement. The object of the festival was the benefit of the North Staffordshire Infirmary, but until the accounts have been made up, we have no means of knowing how far the Infirmary has benefitted; we may, however, presume that the receipts have been good from the fact that the attendance both at the oratorios and concerts has been very numerous. The collection at the doors of the church amounted to forty pounds. The artists engaged were the members of the Glee and Madrigal Union, comprising Mrs. Enderssohn, Mrs. Lockey, and Messrs. Phillips, Lockey, Land, and Hobbs; Madame Clara Novello, and Mr. Sims Reeves; together with the London Orchestral Union, conducted by Mr. Alfred Mellon. The choruses were composed of a large majority of the Birmingham Choral Society, with the Hanley and Shelton sacred Harmonic Society, and accessions from the various societies of Newcastle, Longton, and Burslem. The opening work on Tuesday was Händel's Coronation Anthem, which was followed by the Creation, or rather two parts of it; after which a selection was given from Mendelssohn's Elijah and St. Paul; the "Hallelujah Chorus" from The Mount of Olives, by Beethoven, closing the performance. On Wednesday morning the Messiah was produced, and in the evening there was a concert at the Town Hall. The attendance was numerous and highly respectable, comprising most of the leading families of the potteries, Newcastle, and the surrounding neighbourhood.

Bath.—By the kind invitation of Herr Roekel his numerous pupils and friends were present at a "Recital" of classical and modern pianoforte music, on Thursday morning last, at the Assembly-Rooms. Herr Roekel's performance might well be called a "Recital;" and, as he ranged through various styles, "from grave to gay, from lively to severe," every harmonious word was given with such "emphasis and discretion" that not a syllable failed of its full and due meaning. The programme comprised compositions of Haydn, Beethoven, J. N. Hummel, Weber, Esain, Chopin, Thalberg, E. Schulz, and Herr Roekel. Herr Roekel is himself an excellent composer, but it has always appeared to us the mark of a higher talent to give (as he does) a perfect interpretation of all the varied difficulties, thoughts, and beauties, originated by others, than to execute any music, however excellent, emanating from the pianist himself. The whole was charming, but we especially enjoyed the Andante in Haydn's Sonata, in E flat, Op. 70; Weber's "L'invitation a la Valse;" Esain's "Dolores Serenade Mélancolique;" Chopin's "La Consolazione;" Nocturne, Op. 32; and Herr Roekel's masterly compositions, "Mirth and Frolic," Bravura Galop, Op. 36, and his Grande Fantaisie on Meyerbeer's "Prophète," after which the party broke up, delighted with the gratification for which they had been indebted to Herr Roekel.—Bath Journal.

Cheltenham.—Dr. Mark, of Bristol, gave a concert with his young pupils at the Royal Old Wells on Wednesday last. The efforts of these incipient musicians were considered highly satisfactory, but the room was not well attended.

Dublin.—Miss P. Horton is now starring it at the Theatre Royal.

Birstal.—On the evening of Thursday week a miscellaneous concert was given, under the management of Mr. Bentley. The principal vocalists were Mr. and Mrs. Sellers, Miss Farrell, Mr. G. Kirk. Mr. Bradley presided at the pianoforte. The attendance was good, and the performance gave satisfaction.

FOREIGN.

Vienna.—(From our own Correspondent.)—There has been no novelty, since my last, at the Imperial Opera-house; indeed, almost the only circumstance worth mentioning is the appearance of Mdlle. La Grua as Alice, in Robert le Diable, and Donna Anna in Don Juan. M. Auber's opera, Le Dieu et la Bayadère, is in rehearsal for Herr Ander, and Donizetti's Don Sebastian will shortly be produced, with Herren Ander, Beck, and Mad. Hermann in the principal characters.—On the 17th December next, on which day 84 years ago Louis van Beethoven was born, the Academie der Tonkunst will give a grand concert, in memory of the illustrious composer.—The festival in honour of the foundation of the Männergesangverein came off on the 28th ult., in the Sofienbad-Saal, which was tastefully decorated for the occasion. The members sang eight pieces, of which Mendelssohn's magnificent choruses to Antigone, and Herr J. Otto's Tanzlied were encored. Herr Erl, of the Imperial Opera-house, sang three songs, Herr J. A. Pacher executed two original compositions on the piano, Herr Rörer played a solo on the violoncello, Herr Carl Treumann recited a poem, by Herr E. von Steinhauser, in praise of the German Lied (after which he was called on, as well as the author), and concluded with some comic verses, beginning, "Es kommt nur alle Jahr' einmal." The company did not separate till past midnight.

Berlin.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Herr Dorn's opera: Die Niebelungen, of the first production of which I sent you an account last season, has been repeated, at the Royal Opera-house to a very numerous audience. It was favourably received, Mdlle. Johanna Wagner, and the other artists who sustained the principal parts exerting themselves to the utmost, and being liberally applauded. The composer conducted in person. Méhul's operetta, Je toller, je besser, has also been revived, and proved as attractive as ever.

The second Sinfonie-Soirée has come off since my last. It commenced with one of Haydn's symphonies in D major. This was followed by a Lustspiel Overtüre, of Herr Julius Rietz, admirably performed. We then had Mendelssohn's magnificent overture to Athalie, and the concert wound up with Beethoven's symphony in B major.—Mad. Sophie Förster gave a concert, last Thursday, in the rooms of the Singacademie, for the benefit of the Gustav-Adolph-Stiftung, when she sang the air: "Nun schwinget sich der Adler stolz" from the Creation, M. Meyerbeer's Mailied, and several other well-known pieces. Herr Steifensand performed Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor, and a Ballade by Chopin.—Herr Bazzini is still playing at Kroll's establishment.—M. Meyerbeer has arrived, and Herr Joachim is shortly expected. It is the intention of the latter gentleman to give a series of concerts, in conjunction with Madame Clara Schumann.—Billert's Gesangverein gave a performance of sacred music, last Saturday, in the St. Nicolai-Kirche, for the benefit of the sufferers by the floods in Silesia.—The first subscription-concert of the Königliche-Singacademie is announced for Saturday, the 11th instant. The 103rd Psalm, by Herr Blumener, Mendelssohn's "Lauda, Sion," and Cherubini's Requiem, will form part of the programme.—Herr Joseph Gungl has returned, and will shortly recommence his concerts.

NEW YORK.—Among the drawbacks which Grisi and Mario have had to encounter, not the least is the serious indisposition of the latter, who has taken such a violent cold that he has not been able to sing for a week. On Mario's first appearance in La Sonnambula he was so hoarse that he could scarcely sing a note. This is the more annoying as Elvino is one of Mario's finest efforts, and a part in which he could not have failed to captivate his audience.—At the Broadway Theatre, English opera seems to be doing well. Since our last, The Bohemian Girl and Maritana have been brought out. Mr. Wallace, the composer of the latter opera, directed its performance in person. The American journals are shocked at the immorality of the libretto; but, on the other hand, they unite in praising the music. Où la vertu va-t-elle se nicher? said the witty French author. We suppose the New York Musical Review will answer the question. We request our puritanical contemporary to give us his opinion on Don Giovanni, Il Barbiere, Le Nozze di Figaro and many others of the grand school, before he condemns the witty libretto of M. de St. Georges. As we said, the opera was received with immense enthusiasm in spite of the libretto, and has been played every night with increasing success. All are agreed on the high merits of Miss Louisa Pyne. Mr. Harrison, too, and Mr. Borrani come in for a fair share of applause.

THE MUSIC PUBLISHER'S CIRCULAR.

IN this column it is the intention of the proprietors to publish, every week, the titles of all the new publications of the previous week. Music Publishers are requested to forward their lists, addressed to the Editor, at the office, 28, Holles-street, by Thursday evening.

LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, Exeter-hall.—On Monday, November 20, the season will commence with HANDEL'S ORATORIO, JUDAS MACCABÆUS. Principal vocalists:—Miss Birch, Miss Wells, Miss M. Wells, Mr. Augustus Braham, and Mr. Farquharson. The band and chorus will consist of nearly 800 performers. Conductor, Mr. Surman, who, during the performance, will be presented with a testimonial for valuable services rendered to the cause of sacred music. The subscription to the Society is one, two, or three guineas, two tickets to each concert, and a valuable musical present from the Conductor.—Only office, No. 9, Exeter-hall.

ORGAN PERFORMANCE.—G. M. HOLDICH, Organ Builder, has completed a very large and magnificent organ for the parish church at Henley-on-Thames; there will be PERFORMANCES upon the same at the Manufactory on Monday, the 13th inst., and Tuesday, the 14th inst., commencing each day at Three o'clock in the afternoon, and again at Seven in the evening. The organ contains nearly 50 stops, with a powerful pedal. Organ manufactory, 4, Judd-place east, King's-cross.

THE BACH SOCIETY.—The SECOND PERFORMANCE in this Country of JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH'S GROSSE PASSIONS-MUSIK is fixed for Tuesday evening, November the 28th, at the HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS; to commence at Eight o'clock. Conductor Mr. W. Sterndale Bennett. Tickets, 5s. each, to be had at the principal music shops. Members of the Society and assistants are informed that rehearsals will take place at the Hanover-square Rooms on Monday evenings November 13th, 20th, and 27th, at eight o'clock.

THE LONDON ORCHESTRA.—Conductor, Mr. FRANK MORI; Leader, Mr. THIRLWALL. Messrs. Barret, Lazarus, Baumann, Rémusat, Lovell Phillips, Mount, Tolbecque, Nadaud, Payton, Mann, Carrodus, Vogel, D. Godfrey, Cioffi, Prospère, Chipp, Zeiss, Antoine, Guest, Russell, Standen, N. Mori, W. Thirlwall, Crozier, F. Godfrey, Gleadow, Anderson. This celebrated Orchestra may be engaged to perform at Oratorios, Operas, and Concerts, either in London or the Provinces. Communications to be addressed to Mr. A. Guest, Hon. Sec., 1, Kingston Russell-place, Oakley-square, Camden-town, or to Messrs. Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street.

CHAPPELL'S FOREIGN MODEL PIANOFORTE.—PRICE FIFTY GUINEAS.—This instrument has (unlike the ordinary cottage pianoforte) THREE STRINGS, and the fullest grand compass of SEVEN OCTAVES. It is strengthened by every possible means to endure the greatest amount of wear, and to stand perfectly in any climate. The workmanship is of the best description, the tone is round, full, and rich, and the power equal to that of a Bichord Grand. The Case is of the most elegant construction in Rosewood, (vide the sketch), the touch elastic, and the repetition very rapid. Every possible precaution has been taken to insure its standing well in tune. Mr. Chappell especially invites the attention of the public, the profession, and merchants to the FOREIGN MODEL, feeling assured that no pianoforte, in all respects comparable, has hitherto been made in England at the same price. Every instrument will be warranted, and (if desired) exchanged within twelve months of the purchase. 50, New Bond-street, London.

ROMAN STRINGS.—EWER and Co. recommend their stock of Roman Strings, newly imported, being of superior quality. Ewer and Co., 390, Oxford-street.

BUST OF MENDELSSOHN.—A splendid Likeness of this celebrated Composer, 23 inches high, price 25s. Ewer & Co., 390, Oxford-street.

RUBINI.

To the physical qualities—which may be considered as the implements of a singer's mind—and intelligence, Rubini added a profound sensitiveness and great aptitude in making himself master of the different styles of music. He sang Beethoven's "Adelaida," the character of which is so eminently lyrical, as well as the music in Mozart's Don Juan, and Cimarosa's Matrimonio Segreto. Certainly, no artist of modern times imparted to the air, "Il mio tesoro," in Mozart's chef-d'œuvre, so much finish, ease, and perfect intonation combined, and we recollect with what daring Rubini, instead of executing the rather old trait in the twenty-sixth bar of the andante, took the part of the first violin, and executed upon A and B flat * a vigorous trill which hastened the cadence, and ensured the enthusiastic applause of the audience. Since the time of Viganoni, who created the part of Paolino in Il Matrimonio Segreto, no tenor ever sang so well as Rubini the air: "Pria che spunti." What suavity and what delicacy of accent! How well the singer had seized the meaning of this hymn of youth and chaste love, gushing forth, without an effort, like a perfume of the soul, and presenting us with a real picture of domestic happiness and peace. What has become of this style di mezzo carattere, so fine and so difficult, which is to music and the art of singing what, to ancient statuary and poetry, was the serene and restrained emotion which constituted their principal characteristics? Read an eclogue of Virgil, or an idyl of André Chénier, and compare them, for instance, with a piece of poetry by M. Victor Hugo; you will immediately perceive what distinguishes the beautiful from the picturesque—that is to say, Raphael from Rubens.

Although Rubini likewise sang with great effect in the operas of Rossini—a little of whose brio and passionate fervour he himself possessed—and though he was admirable in certain parts of the character of Count Almaviva in Il Barbiere di Siviglia, as well as that of Otello, and executed in a most extraordinary manner the tenor part of the famous duet in Mosè, "Parlar, spiegar," in which he disputed the palm for bravura and vocal dexterity with Tamburini; it was emphatically in the works of Bellini that he proved himself the grand master of song. It is necessary to have heard him sing the first air in Il Pirata, "Nel furor delle tempeste," and especially the second motive, "Come un'angelo celeste"—in which we already find the germ of that short and touching melopœia, constituting the prominent feature of Bellini's genius—to form an idea of the power of emotion possessed by this incomparable artist. He was no less remarkable in the duet in the second act of the same opera, and I can still hear the phrase, "Vieni, cerchiam pe' mare," still re-echoing in the inmost recesses of my heart. It was only surpassed by that which follows, and which was the complement of it:

"Per noi tranquillo un porto L'immenso mar avrà . . ."

There was, in Rubini's voice, when he sang this charming and expressive cantilena, a kind of melancholy which gradually evaporated into a magic horizon, and impressed you with the sentiment of Immensity.

In the part of Elvino, in La Sonnambula, Rubini's talent rose with the genius of his favourite composer. Every one at Paris remembers how he gave the phrase, "Prendi, l'anel ti dono," in the duet of the first act, and with what a mixture of grace and naïve emotion he sang the pleasing madrigal which forms the subject of the second duet, "Son geloso." In the quartet of the finale in the first act, Rubini displayed the most sublime pathos when singing the phrase so well known and so touching—

"Ah! tel mostri s'io t'amai Questo pianto del mio cor!"

Who, too, would not give ten five-act operas, as they are performed every day, to hear Rubini sing, only once a week, that cry of despairing love, in the duet in the second act of La Sonnambula—

"Pasci il guardo, e appaga l'alma
Dell' eccesso de' miei mali;
Il più tristo dei mortali
Sono, cruda, e il son per te!"

In the character of Arturo in I Puritani, which was his last creation, Rubini has left us such recollections of emotion and enchantment, that we can only recall them to the mind of those who heard them, without pretending to transmit an idea of them to the generations who were not so fortunate. Let us first quote the phrase of the quartet in the first act—

"A te, o cara, amor talora Mi guidò furtivo e in pianto,"

in which the artist's voice burst forth into bloom like a rose beneath the first beams of a morning in spring; while, to this phrase, serene and spianata, he vigorously opposed that accompanying the words, "Tra la gioja e l'esultar," by sending forth from his chest a magnificent la, which re-echoed to the clouds, and then bounded back again from the depths of harmony. In the finale of the first act he gave with prodigious power the passage, "Non parlar di Lei ch' adoro," where he made a most bold point-d'orgue. Lastly, we may mention the romance of the second act, "A una fonte afflitto e solo," which Rubini only murmured, and allowed to escape from his lips like a sigh. In the duet following this romance, the phrase, full of brilliancy, "Nel mirarti un solo istante," and, finally, the duet between Elvira and Arturo, where Rubini rose to great energy of expression in the memorable passage—

"Non mi sarai rapita
Fin che ti stringerò."

In the Anna Bolena and Lucia of Donizetti, Rubini was not less admirable than in the operas of Bellini. In the first of these works, in which he created the part of Percy, he sang, with profound emotion, the well-known air, "Vivi tu, te ne scongiuro," where Donizetti has evidently imitated the melodious manner of his young rival. As for the scene of the malediction, which forms the dramatic climax of the second finale of Lucia, no singer has ever been able to imitate the cry of anguish which escaped from Rubini's quivering lips.

Like a great number of Italian singers—of whom Garcia, Lablache, Tamburini, Pasta, Malibran, and Grisi, are re-marvellous exceptions—Rubini was not a finished actor. He did not trouble himself much about anything but the scena or morceau, the interpretation of which placed him in the foreground. When this was past, he voluntarily disappeared, and retired, like Achilles in his tent, without caring much for the story of the drama or the conduct of the other personages. In the air, the duet, or the finale, in which he had an active or preponderating part, Rubini would suddenly rouse himself and display all the energy and charm of his incomparable talent. His abrupt but earnest gestures, his expressive and picturesque pantomime, satisfactorily seconded and carried out his internal emotions, and appeared rather to assist the expansion of his lungs than to be the plastic manifestation of the personage he was representing.* It was in the tone and sonorousness of his organ, in the artistic management and accents of his voice, that all Rubini's dramatic power consisted. When he had to sing a quick air, like the "Pria che spunti," in Il Matrimonio Segreto, or a phrase palpitating with feeling like that of the quartet in I Puritani, he advanced to the front of the stage, and, standing perfectly motionless, with his hand naïvely placed upon his heart, exhaled i suoi dolci lamenti, which, like an electric shock, ran from one person to another, and spread sympathy and delight throughout the house. This was the method pursued by Rubini, who, nevertheless, when he pleased, proved himself no mean actor; and we have likewise seen Pasta, whose dramatic intelligence was never questioned, completely absorbed, like some chaste muse, while singing the air, "Di tanti palpiti," in which even Malibran, with all her voice and more acting, was never able to produce the same impression.

* A successful departure from the original score, and followed by most of the Italian tenors, who, however, wanted Rubini's shake to give it the greatest effect. In fact, without the shake, the violin passage is not imitated at all. For our own part, we prefer the passage being sung as it is written, especially if sung by a tenor like Donselli.—Ed. M. W.

It was not only in vocal combinations, in the variety of accent, colour, and melodious arabesques or ricami, that Rubini displayed a great fertility of imagination. His most usual ornaments were the double scale, ascending and descending, the shake perfectly and vigorously sustained upon the high notes of the chest register; a certain pathetic vibration which he imparted to one note, causing it to glitter as if progressively; a broad and powerful emission of his chest voice, from which he dashed, by means of a daring portamento, into the high regions of the head voice; and, lastly, that grand stratagem of chiaro-oscura, the abrupt transition from the full voice to the most imperceptible smorzato sound, a sort of dim twilight, in which it was sometimes difficult for the ear to find its way. By this method, which he constantly employed, and appears to have borrowed from Davide junior, as well as a great number of boldly conceived inflexions and gorgheggi, Rubini clearly proved himself to be a modern singer, sprung from the new school of dramatic music, which Rossini inaugurated in History. Were we required to characterise, in a few words, the tendencies of modern art, in music as well as in painting and literature, we should say that the prominent feature distinguishing the productions of the present age, is a noisinest† of colours, a tumultuous heaping-up of effects, violent peripetieie, and an abrupt juxtaposition of the lights and shades, rendering superfluous that supreme good taste which knows how to prepare and gradually lead up to emotion—in the same manner as rich fruit ripens slowly on the branch where God has placed it. In life, as well as in the works of the mind, nothing is more uncommon at the present day than a distant horizon, over which light distributes its tints equally, conducting the eye slowly towards a desired point. This ascending progression of sonorousness, increasing by movement, and suddenly bursting into a mass of electric light—in a word, the crescendo, which Rossini has so much abused—is found everywhere; in political events and moral life, quite as much as in matters of imagination. By his good qualities, as by his defects, Rubini belonged to his time and to the school of music which has expressed the tendencies of it.

Queen Marie Antoinette is reported to have one day asked Sacchini, whether Garat, the famous singer, was a good musician. "No," replied the maestro, "he is not a musician; but he is music itself." This happy remark of the author of Œdipus in Colonnos might have been applied to Rubini also. His instinct was so perfect and so sure; his ear so quick and so delicately susceptible of seizing the most fugitive tints as they swept past, that, in order to perceive the defects of his musical education, a person must have lived on terms of the most intimate friendship with him. Before the public, or in the most difficult concerted piece—such, for instance, as the sestet in Don Giovanni, Rubini never betrayed the slightest hesitation. He even manifested the docility of a child in following the movements any one was kind enough to point out to him; and would frequently say to his comrades and the conductor of the orchestra, if they appeared to consult him upon the propriety or suitableness of a rhythm: "Never mind me; go on, I will follow you." Such instances of artists of eminence scarcely able to decipher a few notes of music, but divining by instinct the most profound combinations of genius, is a phenomenon which has often been witnessed in Italy. Ansani, M. Lablache's master, at the Conservatory of Naples, did not literally understand a single note. His pupils were obliged to sing and teach him by heart the piece of music on which they wanted his advice. Davide junior, Mad. Pasta, and a great many other celebrated singers, were almost in as bad a position. We could cite far more remarkable instances of the power of intuition in the arts of Genius, as Voltaire terms them; and it would be an easy task to prove that the greatest things in this world are the result of instinctive perception. This is why poetry is the essence of all that is beautiful and durable.

Rubini was a man of simple and reserved manners, fond of living in the privacy of his home. In 1819, he married at Milan a French singer, Mdlle. Chomel, who was educated at the Conservatory in Paris, where she received lessons from Garat. This marriage, which appears to have been a happy one, so absorbed the affections of Rubini, that one of his greatest causes for fear was the dread of awaking his wife's jealousy. After singing one of his favourite airs, and exciting the transports of the public, he would, on going off at the wings, where all present crowded around him to express their admiration, quickly escape into his dressing-room, in order, as he used to say, laughingly, to avoid a family quarrel. The most rigid mother could not have given her own son better advice than that Rubini gave to the young tenors who meant to embrace the profession of the stage. And it is true that, in order to sing well and long, we must not forget the hidden sense of the verse in which Juvenal, speaking of a Greek singer, Thrysogonus, who had lost his voice, says:

Thrysogonum cantare vetent."

Rubini took great care of himself. Temperate and easily satisfied, he avoided all excess. The days on which he performed, he used to dine at two o'clock, and then, proceeding to the theatre, sleep till six, at which hour his servant woke him: he then dressed, and appeared fresh and in admirable condition before the public, and this was the means of his preserving the freshness and power of his voice up to the day of his death. We have been assured that, during the ten years he spent in St. Petersburgh, having no longer any care for the future, Rubini created effects unknown to his admirers in Paris, London, and Milan.

Rubini was of middling size, and rather stoutly built. His broad shoulders supported a head whose characteristic was not precisely nobleness; but when his face, seamed with the small-pox, once lighted up by the power of song, the somewhat vulgar man was suddenly changed into the sublime artist, whose affections the most beautiful women in Europe would have been glad to possess. Such is the marvellous force of inspiration and sentiment—

"Du moment qu'on aime
On devient si doux!"

Rubini had two brothers, one of whom obscurely pursued the same career as himself, while the other remained a singer in a church. As he has left no children, his immense fortune will, no doubt, go to enrich his nephews.

The part of the country where Rubini was born has produced, at different times, the most celebrated tenors of Italy. In wall from this province of the ancient Venetian Republic, in which Bergamo is situated, that Viganoni, Davide, father and son, Nozzari, Bianchi, Donzelli, and Bordogni sprang. The worthy successors of these great artists, Rubini, raised himself to the rank of the first dramatic singer of his day. Gifted with an admirable voice and superior instinct, he quickly guessed the secrets of his art, and astonished Europe by the splendour and fluidity of his vocalisation, and the charm, perfect intonation and great force of his tones. Understanding every style and every master, as familiar with the music of Mozart and Cimarosa as with that of Rossini and Donizetti, he was fortunate enough to meet, at the outset of his career, a young composer, whose melodic genius was eminently suited to the nature of his own talent and sensitive disposition. The author of Il Pirata and La Sonnambula, as inexperienced in the art of composing as Rubini in the faculty of reading music, found in his heart the new and touching melodies which established his own fame and that of his interpreter.

Bellini and Rubini, names so soft and charming to the ear, you will go down to future ages united by an indissoluble bond, as a double instance of the superiority of poetry and sentiment over the artifices of mere art and intention. Both were children of gracefulness and nature. Bellini, a pupil of genius, discovered by instinct harmonies as delicate and penetrating as his melodies, while Rubini, like an inspired singer, when rendering the music of his favourite composer, appeared to be expressing the naïve emotions of his own heart.

MENDELSSOHN'S ST. PAUL AT ERFURT.

(From a Correspondent.)

Berlin, Nov. 5th.

Your readers will be interested to know that Mendelssohn's oratorio, St. Paul, was lately given with brilliant success in the Kaufmannskirche, which was lighted up in honour of the occasion, on the king's birthday. A correspondent of the Berliner Musikzeitung writes of this event in the following terms:—

"This work had not been heard in Erfurt for several years, and the Erfurter Musikverein deserves the highest praise for having, by its performance, procured the public an evening's entertainment as delightful as it it was deeply impressive, and as artistically-instructive as it was moral, illustrative, and edifying. The reason that oratorios bear away the palm from all other musical creations is because, in them, art does not cease to delight us a single instant, although at the same time, enlisted in the service of those thoughts which we all obey. It never fails to set the soul in a condition of pleasing excitement, although, with elevated earnestness, and blended with sacred ideas, it speaks, in wonderful accents, not for itself but for the sake of truth and admonition. In Mendelssohn's oratorio, this peculiar quality of the sacred works under consideration stands forth more boldly than in the compositions of any other composer. In the same manner that he so beautifully blends the fugue with his choruses, does he subdue the powers of art, and lead them in all their magnificence and fulness, in humble strains, to the altar of the Lord. This entrancing nature of his sacred works finds its way to our inmost souls. Mendelssohn is the great sacred psalmist of the age, and the swelling fullness of the spiritual and sacred life contained in it. It is our own inward excited feeling to which he lends utterance in the midst of the hurry and turmoil of earthly things; the voices which would fain wing their flight to God, but die away in the tumult of worldliness, he frees, to the astonishment of the latter, from their bondage, and bears upwards.

In his works he causes, with prophetic strains, the believing heart of the Present, so sorely pressed by almost heathen influences, to awake to a consciousness of itself and assume its rightful position. It is the influences of the great system of modern life, in its arrogance and obstinacy, and in its idolatry of worldly things, which he exhibits to us, bowed down beneath awakening and suffering Truth. We feel that our own being, woes, and life have been taken by the artist as the chords on which to sound his strains. This is the reason why his works are so profound, moving us deeply, and carrying us away with them. There are some particular choruses (for instance, No. 16) and airs ("Paul," No. 18), as well as the cavatina No. 40, that both heart and ear are unwilling should die away; they feel raised upon their tones from this world to another and a higher one. The Erfurter Musikverein never achieved a greater or more noble triumph than when it undertook this performance on its own resources. Everyone concerned displayed enthusiastic zeal, impressive seriousness, and, in some of the recitatives, a captivating charm. The king's birthday could not have been celebrated in a more worthy manner. "Sei getreu bis in den Tod" is the noble injunction addressed to all mortals for the present and the future, towards the kings of this world and towards the King of Eternity."

According to report, a new association, to extend over the whole world, will shortly be formed at Erfurt, for the propagation of sacred music. A Herr G. W. Körner is named as the person by whose instrumentality the scheme is to be carried out

REVIEWS.

"Boosey's Opera Journal," for the Pianoforte. Books 1 to 12. Boosey and Sons.

There is surely no reason now why the miners of Cornwall, or the mechanics of Birmingham, or the weavers of Yorkshire, should not recreate their leisure hours with music from the modern Italian opera. We meet with it in every shape, with words and without words; in large books for the piano, and in small books for the flute; at high prices for the rich and learned, and at low prices for the poor and ignorant. Messrs. Boosey, among others, are favouring the extreme circulation of popular music, by presenting it to the public at a price which the neediest enthusiast cannot cavil at. The works before us are samples of the class of publications which in music correspond to the "Travellers' Library" in literature. They consist of twelve operas reduced for the pianoforte by well-known manipulators of the instrument; among others, Rudolph, Nordmann, and W. Hutchins Callcott. The arrangements are both for one or two performers, and thus the fair recluse, or two sisters, may seek and cannot fail to derive every amusement from the Opera Journals. We observe there are similar works for the flute and violin. They will, no doubt, reach the hands of amateurs of those instruments.

"The Duke of Cambridge's March." By H. Schallehn. Distin.

Herr Schallehn was one day inspired to dedicate a March to His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge. As soon as his imagination had developed the title-page, he was again inspired to seize the fourth figure of a very pretty quadrille, by Bilse, known as the "Frederick William," and convert it into the "Cambridge March." This saved Herr Schallehn the pains of composition, and we congratulate him on his excellent taste and judgment. How much better, and more profitable it was for Herr Schallehn to borrow Herr Bilse's "Trenise," than to attempt to compose a March himself! The only fault we find with the Director of the Crystal Palace Band, in the aforesaid "Duke of Cambridge's March," is, in allowing a typographical error to escape on his title-page, which states the March to be composed by Herr Schallehn, whereas it should have been by B. Bilse.

Vincent Wallace.—Private advices from New York, of date October 20, mention the arrival of Mr. Vincent Wallace in that city. This intelligence will dispel the anxiety of his numerous friends and admirers in this country, as there was too much reason to fear that he was involved in the fearful catastrophe of the "Arctic." It is also stated that Mr. Wallace's opera, Maritana, was performed, for the first time in America, on the 19th ult.

The Conservative Land Society.—The twenty-third public drawing for rights of choice on the Society's estates, took place in the offices in Norfolk-street, on Saturday, the 11th inst., in the presence of the Rev. Dr. Worthington and Mr. Cribb, members of the executive committee, the Rev. Mr. Goodchild, and other shareholders. The Rev. Mr. Goodchild and Mr. Troughton were nominated scrutineers. The rev. chairman, at the conclusion of the drawing, stated that the East Retford Estate, in Nottinghamshire, would be distributed amongst the members on the 11th of January, and that allotments of other estates would speedily follow. The twenty-fourth public drawing would be held at Exeter Hall, on Tuesday, the 12th of December, at the annual general meeting of the shareholders, on which occasion one hundred rights of choice would be drawn, and fifty shares added by seniority. The holders of shares who had been placed on the order of rights for the last four months would have the opportunity of selecting the remaining lots on estates in various counties on the 29th inst., without any increase of the prices marked on the plans. The rev. chairman concluded by announcing that the balance-sheet for the close of the financial year would exhibit the most satisfactory evidence of the continued prosperity of the Society.

ORGAN.

ORGAN FOR THE PARISH CHURCH AT HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

As Mr. George Maydwell Holdich, the builder of this instrument, informs the public, by circular-letter, that "He has completed a very large and magnificent organ," and—a few lines further—that "this is really a large organ, and persons will be able to judge what G. M. Holdich can do with great instruments," it may, perhaps, be only doing justice to his opinions on these points to print the list of its registers;—

The compass of the keys are of the German scale, namely, from CC to F in alt. The great organ contains the following stops:—

8 feet large front open diapason, 8 feet open diapason, 16 feet stopped diapason, with clarabella in the treble part, 4 feet flute, 4 feet principal, 2⅔ feet twelfth, 2 feet fifteenth, 1⅓ feet tierce, 1⅓ feet sesquialtera, mixture, 8 feet trumpet, 4 feet clarion.

The Choir Organ contains—8 feet dulcina, 8 feet clarabella, 8 feet stopped diapason bass, 4 feet principal, 4 feet flute, 2 feet fifteenth, 2 feet piccolo, 8 feet cremona.

The Swelling Organ contains—8 feet open diapason, 8 feet stopped diapason, 16 feet double diapason, 16 feet bourdon CCC, 8 feet viol di gamba, 4 feet principal, 2 feet fifteenth, 1⅓ feet tierce, 1⅓ feet sesquialtera, 16 feet double trumpet, 8 feet cornopean, 8 feet hautboy diaocton.

The Pedal Organ contains—16 feet grand double diapason, 16 feet grand bourdon, 8 feet grand principal, 16 feet grand trombone.

About the "largeness" of this instrument our readers are now able to judge for themselves;—as to its "magnificence," we can inform them in very few words. It is a fair instrument; but certainly nothing more. It has considerable strength of tone, but its quality is by no means unmixed with coarseness. The reeds are the most questionable parts of the work; there is one highly respectable reed in the swell, but those in the Great and Pedal Organs are very deficient in quality and finish.

Mr. Holdich is evidently a good hand at "blowing his own trumpet"—somewhat, perhaps, of a desirable capability in an organ-builder—though the amount of his self-esteem and his felicity in expressing it are not altogether as nicely balanced as they might be. Thus he tells us,—"The whole of the movements are exceedingly simple in contrivance, and work well. A new flute stop is introduced in the Great Organ, which has a beautiful quality of tone. The touch is by no means heavy for so large an instrument, there being no artificial means used to make the same light; altogether the organ is a good specimen of a large instrument. The stops of pipes mix well together; the varieties of tones are very numerous; and the whole combined makes a grand concert of music." After this, what need we say?

These organ-builders are certainly funny people about inventions. The "Diaocton," which figures in the list of the swell registers, is claimed by Mr. Holdich as an "invention." Our readers will be surprised to learn that this sounding Hellecism is made to imply simply an octave-copula!—not an octave copula between two manuals, but a copula which affects the upward octaves of every note on the same key-board. The propriety of this contrivance we do not, at present, mean to discuss, although we highly disapprove of it, for many reasons. Our object is merely to settle the claim to "invention" here put forth; and, when we say that precisely this octave-coupling was done fully five-and-twenty years ago by Flight and Robson, and has been repeated multitudinously since, both here and abroad, it will, perhaps, be unnecessary to further agitate Mr. Holdich's claim to parentage in the matter.

Public performances on this organ took place on Monday and Tuesday last; but as the name of the player was not announced, we are unable to render him, personally, justice.

MR. GROVES has sent us a long letter in defence of his "direct-action system of organ-building," which we must decline to print for several reasons. Firstly, for his own sake; we do not think the appearance of a production in which the principles of mechanics and the laws of English composition are treated with equal disrespect, would do him much good. Secondly, on our own account; did we insert a letter which is one continuous advertisement of Mr. Groves' performances, past, present, and to come, we should manifestly neglect the duty we owe to the concluding columns of our journal. And, lastly, Mr. Groves' communication neither invalidates any of our statements nor throws the smallest light on the question. Everybody knows the old objections urged against the use of rollers—that they are liable to twist, work loose at the centres, etc.; but these vices, in every case, are due, not to the principle, but to its faulty execution. We expressly stated that, "when properly constructed," there was no theoretical or practical evil in the use of roller-boards.

On the other hand, it is notorious enough that, in many cases,—and a reference to two or three would, perhaps, surprise Mr. Groves himself—where materials have been injudiciously selected, dimensions ignorantly proportioned, and workmanship performed in the cheap and slovenly fashion which the competition-system is so apt to engender, every possible mischief to which machinery is liable, has occurred. But, we can take no account of such a condition of things in discussing a principle. While our judgment is fortified by the practice of such men as Cavaillé and Ducroquet in France, and Hill in England, we do not apprehend being made seriously uneasy by the fact of Mr. Groves's dissent. To the German builders we do not refer, since they have seldom been remarkable for refined contrivance in these matters. Walkier is, perhaps, the best of them; but his mechanism is in no degree comparable with that of the great French and English makers.

We are obliged to Mr. Groves for his polite offer of furnishing our correspondents with every information on the "Direct" and other systems; yet, strange as it may seem to him, and notwithstanding his "ten years' experience with the late and eminent John Gray, and about six years in his own establishment," we really feel quite competent to deal with all these matters without any assistance.

ERRATUM.—In the article on the "Direct Action System of Organ-building," in our last Number, for "wrangle in private," read "wrangle in print."

HERR JANSA has been appointed organist to the Rolls Chapel.

BAD COPY FOR PRINTERS.—The worst case on record of bad copy for compositors will be found in the following paragraph, which we take from the Oxford Herald: "The late Sharon Turner, author of the History of the Anglo Saxons, who received three hundred a year from government as a literary pension, wrote the third volume of his 'Sacred History of the World' upon paper which did not cost him a farthing. The copy consisted of torn and angular fragments of letters and notes, of covers of periodicals, grey, drab, or green, written in thick round hand over a small print; of shreds of curling paper, unctuous with pomatum or bear's grease, and of the white wrappers in which his proofs were sent from the printers. The paper, sometimes as thin as a bank-note, was written on both sides, and was so sodden with ink, plastered on with a pen worn to a stump, that hours were frequently wasted in discovering on which side of it certain sentences were written. Men condemned to work on it saw their dinner vanishing in illimitable perspective, and first-rate hands groaned over it a whole day for tenpence. One poor fellow assures the writer of this paper that he could not earn enough upon it to pay his rent, and that he had seven mouths to fill besides his own. In the hope of mending matters in some degree, slips of stout white paper were sent frequently with the proofs: but the good gentleman could not afford to use hem, and they never came back as copy."

MEXICO—(From a Correspondent).—Madame Fiorentini has been creating a furore at the Opera. Her beautiful voice, charming style, and splendid person, have turned the heads of all the Mexicans, young and old. She has appeared in Norma, Maria di Rohan, Roberto Devereux, Clara di Rosenberg, etc. The theatre is crowded every night in every part, and the places are taken days before each performance. There has not been so great a success in Mexico for a long time as that of Mad. Fiorentini.

VARESE.—The last opera of the season was I Falsi Monetari of Rossi, with Signora Vigliardi, Signora Corbetta, the tenore Devoti, the baritone Bartoluca, and the buffo Favretti. The execution was satisfactory.

PROVINCIAL.

MANCHESTER.—GERMAN AND ITALIAN OPERAS.—(From our own Correspondent.)—This has been a busy week in Manchester, in regard to musical and operatic doings. To begin where we left off—Herr Formes' benefit on the 9th, with Die Zauberflöte, attracted a better audience to the Theatre Royal, and the performance on the whole was satisfactory. Friday, the 10th, La Favorita was repeated to a very thin house. Saturday last, I assisted at the best performance of the Huguenots ever yet given in Manchester. It was the third performance this season (but the first I had been able to hear), and, doubtless, went all the better for being rehearsed. This time, too, it was done entirely in Italian. Herr Reichardt also resumed the part of Raoul, into which he throws so much tenderness and pathos, as well as power and force. Herr Formes, of course, was the Marcel; Madame Caradori, Valentine; Madame Rudersdorff, Marguerite. The subordinate characters were not ably filled; still they sang sufficiently well to make the opera go smoothly. M. Charles Hallé was again the conductor, and the band under him were very efficient. Several of the instrumental performances were applauded during the evening, more especially Mr. Baetens' admirable viola obbligato to Raoul's aria "Ah! più bianca," and the succeeding movement, "Vergin divina." The opening drinking chorus, "Piacer della mensa," went firmly and well. Herr Hubert Formes, as Nevers, though still wanting in self-possession and confidence, evidently improves. His voice is of fair quality; with experience, he may become both a singer and actor. Herr Reichardt, as Raoul, was all that could be desired. He seems fully restored to health, and gave the romance above alluded to most charmingly, and with infinite taste and expression. Herr Formes delivered the corale, "O tu che ognor," with all the fervour of a zealous Huguenot; and his "Piff-paff" song was vociferously encored. Miss Fanny Huddart played the part of the page, Urbain, well, and sang the popular "Nobil donna" with decided effect. The difficult music allotted to Marguerite was somewhat high for Mad. Rudersdorff's voice, but the lady acquitted herself well, nevertheless. Mad. Caradori did not appear in her best force in this scene. The chorus of maidens and the incidental dance were well performed. Urbain's second song was omitted. After the finale the principals were recalled before the curtain. The Rataplan chorus was done more correctly than I have yet heard it, and produced a great effect. The fine duet between Valentine and Marcel, beginning "O terror!" was, perhaps, the best thing of the night. The celebrated conspiration scene was satisfactorily given, and Mad. Caradori and Herr Reichardt were enthusiastically recalled after the duet, "O ciel, dova vei tu!" The opera was brought to an impressive termination by the acting and singing of Herr Reichardt, Mad. Caradori, and Herr Formes On Monday, Il Seraglio was given (again without Mdlle. Agnes Bury, whose indisposition still continues). Mad. Heinrich had not this time to take her place at a moment's notice, but had rehearsed the part of Blonda, so that the opera was much better done. Herr Reichardt is admirably suited to the part of Belmont, in which he has a good deal to do in the tender, pathetic, and sentimental line. Mad. Rudersdorff made an excellent Constance. Herr Formes, in his Osmin, added another picture to the gallery of characters he sustains and embodies so powerfully—Caspar, Rocco, Marcel, Sarastro, and Oroveso. The disguise was complete. We should hardly have known him as the jealous old Turk, but for the unmistakeable quality and power of his voice. He and Herr Zapf, as Pedrillo, kept up the fun of the opera. The only piece left out was Blonda's song, "Welche Wonne, welche Lust." The double duet or quartet of Lovers, "Ach Belmonte! ach mein Lieber!" was well done. Herr Formes gave all he had to do with great gusto, as though it was easy to him—yet as though it was music he liked—but there was nothing to compare with his triumph song at last, when he has captured the two pairs of Christian lovers—it was glorious. The mournful yet loving duet of Constance and Belmont, and the more happy finale, brought the opera to a close with such spirit as to occasion the recall of the principal artists. We are sorry to add that there was a very indifferent house. Tuesday, Norma was repeated as before. Tuesday, also, there was a grand military concert at the Concert Hall, for the Patriotic Fund, with two military bands: Tickets, gentlemen, 10s. 6d.; ladies, 7s. 6d. We are sorry to learn the hall was not nearly filled. The other operatic doings announced for the week were, Wednesday, Zauberflöte; Thursday (for Reichardt's benefit), Der Freischütz; Friday, Il Barbiere. Robert le Diable was announced for this (Saturday) evening, but we question if it will be done before Monday next.

Thursday was the first Classical Chamber Concert of M. Charles Hallé's series, of which I trust to be enabled to send you a good report in my next. Ernst and Piatti have been engaged.

IBID.—A concert was given on Saturday, at the Philharmonic Hall. The performers were the same who appeared on Friday week, and the selections were similar. In the course of the evening considerable uproar was occasioned by the refusal of Madame Clara Novello to repeat "With verdure clad;" she at last came forward and gave a favourite Scotch song.

LIVERPOOL.—The Creation was produced on Tuesday evening, at the Philharmonic Hall, the solos taken by Miss Stott, Mr B. Robinson, and Mr. Armstrong. Mr. Sudlow was conductor, and Mr. Hirst presided at the organ.

BRIGHTON.—The amateur concert in aid of the Patriotic Fund, at the Town Hall, was numerously attended. The whole of the workmen employed by Baron Goldsmid at Wick, have contributed a day's pay towards the fund, which is still being rapidly augmented, and will probably exceed £2,000 in the course of a few days.

IBID.—(From a Correspondent).—The intense sympathy evinced throughout the country in behalf of the suffering soldiers in the East, has given rise to several musical and dramatic entertainments for their benefit; among others, to a concert last Thursday here, in which the following amateur singers and musicians lent their valuable aid:—Sir Edward Deering, Bart., M.P., Sir M. Farquhar, Bart., Captain Thelluson, Harry Les Carter, Esq., and Walter Maynard, Esq., with Mesdames Newton Frodsham and C. Oury, Messrs. Oury, Grattan Cooke, Herr Kuhe, etc. Mr. Carter's performances on the flute were much admired, as was also Captain Thelluson on the cornet-à-piston. All the amateurs met with a hearty success, and great praise is due to Mr. W. Maynard for his effective delivery of Balfe's song, "I would be a soldier still," the words being well adapted to the occasion. He has undertaken to play the part of Hecate, in Macbeth, which is to be performed, in aid of the "Patriotic Fund," by a company of musical and literary amateurs, at the St. James's Theatre, on Monday, Dec. 11th. The Macbeth of the evening will be Dr. John Joy (a name well known in Dublin private theatricals); Macduff, Mr. W. R. Markwell (the "Don Cæsar" of the New York Herald, and author of Schamyl, Faust and Marguerite, Louis XI., etc.); Rosse and Malcolm, the Messrs. Wilkinson; Banquo, Mr. C. Viner; Siward and the Doctor, Messrs. Hogarth and Benedict; the Witches, Messrs. John Messent, Morris, and Kean; Singing Witches, Messrs. Tennant and Messent, and Mrs. Tennant; Lady Macbeth, Miss Glyn, who has given her valuable services. The orchestra will consist of the Musical Amateur Society, conducted by Mr. Henry Leslie, and the chorus will be complete, under the direction of Mr. Frank Mori.

YORK.—Mr. Willy gave his second concert of classical music, in the De Grey Rooms, on Thursday evening last. Mr. Willy secured the services of Miss Senior, who sung, "Let me wander not unseen," and "I am alone," in a pleasing manner. Mr. Willy's two solos on the violin were executed with skill and brilliancy.

MARGATE.—The first Catch Club of the season took place on Friday evening, at the Royal Hotel. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Pillow, of Canterbury, and Mr. W. C. Gough, of the same city. The band executed the overtures and lighter music in a spirited manner.

ROCHESTER.—The committee of the Mechanics' Institution gave a concert at the Corn Exchange on Wednesday. The vocalists were Miss Cox, and Messrs. Stourbridge, Harcourt, and Armes.

BATH.—The first concert of the present series took place at the Pump Room on Saturday last.

LEEDS.—Miss Cushman appeared on Monday at the theatre, as Meg Merrilies, in Guy Mannering; on Tuesday as Queen Catharine.

SHEFFIELD.—The second subscription concert of the Choral Society was given at the Music Hall on the 2nd inst., with Miss Megson, Mrs. Sanderson, and Mr. Harper, as vocalists; Mr. G. Haddock, first violin; and Mr. Priestley, violoncello. The principal solos were taken by Miss Megson and Mrs. Sanderson.

BRADFORD.—A performance of Elijah will take place on the 20th inst. Mesdames Clara Novello, Weiss, Lockey, and Messrs. Sims Reeves and Weiss are engaged.

OLDHAM.—On Wednesday evening, a concert was given in the Lyceum Exhibition, by the Lancashire Choral Union and Mr. Mellor, assisted by the Quintett Party, under the leadership of Mr. James Taylor.

CHESTER.—The lay clerks of Chester Cathedral gave their benefit concert at the Royal Assembly Room, on Tuesday evening. They were assisted by Miss Shaw; and Mr. H. V. Lewis presided at the pianoforte.

BELFAST.—(From a Correspondent.)—The Belfast Anacreontic Society commenced their forty-first season on Monday night. The vocalists were the English Glee and Madrigal Union, with Madame Clara Novello and Mr. Sims Reeves. The two last were, of course, the Lancaster guns of the evening. The lady sang the opening cavatina from La Sonnambula and a romanza of which I forget the name. Both produced a great effect, the last especially. Mr. Sims Reeves sang Beethoven's "Adelaide" divinely, and infused infinite tenderness and expression into the romance, "Un Impero," from Le Prophète. The grand effect, however, was produced in a new song, by Frank Mori, entitled "England and Victory," which was given with prodigious power and entrain, and literally electrified the audience. The song was vociferously encored.

FOREIGN.

VIENNA.—(From our own Correspondent).—At the Imperial Opera House, Mad. Hermann has appeared as Elvira, in Verdi's Ernani, and produced a more favourable impression than as Valentine, in the Huguenots.—Herren Beck and Campe distinguished themselves in Guillaume Tell.—Ferdinand Cortez has been revived, and well received.—Herr Wasche's annual concert, in the Imperial Opera House, for the benefit of the Barmherzige Schwestern (Sisters of Mercy), has been put off.—On Sunday, the 5th instant, Righini's mass in B was performed, in the parish church of the Piaristæ, in the Josefstadt. The soprano-solos were sung by Mad. Betti Ruder, a pupil of the Academie der Tonkunst. Mozart's Requiem was also performed, in the same church, a short time since, the principal parts being sung by Herren Erl and Staudigl.—Mad. Marlow will appear in a round of characters, at the Imperial Opera House, in December, on the first of which month Mdlle. La Grua will leave.

BERLIN.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The only novelties, if so they may be called, at the Royal Opera-house, since my last, have been a repetition of Die Niebelungen and Fidelio. On the birthday of her Majesty the Queen, Tancredi will be performed; and, on the occasion of the marriage of His Royal Highness Prince Friederich Carl with the Princess of Anhalt-Dessau, Oberon, with new dresses, scenery, and appointments.—The Quartett-Soirées of Herren Zimmermann, Ronneburger, Richter, and Espenhahn, commenced last week. As I have already informed you, we have another similar series, the Quartett-Versammlung of Herren Oertling, Rehbann, Wendt, and Birnbach, in Sommer's Rooms. Both are attended by all lovers of classical music; but I am sorry to say that these latter are not as numerous as could be wished.—Mad. Förster gave a second concert in the rooms of the Singacademie. She sang the grand air from Flotow's Stradella, Donna Anna's air, "Ich grausam," from Don Juan, and one from Semiramide. The orchestra played the overtures to Prometheus and Titus, and Herr Steffensand, Mendelssohn's rondo brillant in E flat (with orchestra), and, assisted by a gentleman whose name I could not catch, Beethoven's Sonata in A.—The brothers Stalknecht and Herr Löschhorn gave a Trio-Soirée last week. Among other pieces, they played a trio by Marschner, Op. 138. They were very successful in the scherzo, but less happy in the andante.—At his tenth concert, Herr Bazzini performed an original concerto in E. Madlle. Hugot was the vocalist, and sang two romances.—On the 2nd inst., Wendel's Gesangverein performed Handel's Judas Maccabeus. The execution was, in general, highly satisfactory, although in some places—for instance, in the chorus, "Nein, niemals beugten wir das Knie"—rather too great an amount of indecision was manifested. The solo parts were sung by Herren von den Osten and Krause.

COLOGNE.—M. Roger still continues his engagement with great success. He is very popular.—The first Gesellschafts-Concert, under the direction of Herr Ferdinand Hiller, went off admirably. Haydn, Gluck, and Beethoven were the representatives of the old, R. Schumann, Ferdinand Hiller, and Verdi of the modern school. Mad. Nissen sang the grand air from Ernani. M. Vieuxtemps will play at the second concert.—The opera company will, this week, give four performances in Amsterdam, while the French opera company, under the direction of Herr Naej, from the latter city, will come to the Stadttheater here. They will play Le Songe d'une Nuit d'Été, by M. Ambroise Thomas, Les Mousquetaires de la Reine, by M. Halévy, and Les Diamants de la Couronne, and Haydée, by Auber.

POSEN.—The operatic company from Berlin have given great satisfaction by their performance of Martha and Lucrezia Borgia. The chorus and orchestra, under the direction of Herr Conradi, were very good.—A concert has been given by the Princess Czartoryska, in the Djalynski Palace, for the benefit of the poor of the town. It was most numerously and fashionably attended. Her Highness played several of Chopin's pieces, and, among others, (with Herr O. Greulich) the larghetto and rondo from the concerto in F minor, for two pianos, as well as a nocturno and Mazurka. Of course, the distinguished pianist was loudly applauded.

ERFURT.—Although the manager has engaged an excellent operatic as well as a very good dramatic company, theatrical affairs are far from flourishing here.

COBLENZ.—The Männergesangverein "Concordia," in conjunction with the band of the 39th Regiment of the Line, lately gave a concert for the benefit of the sufferers by the inundations in Silesia.—The theatrical season is unexpectedly good. The manager, supported by the Prince of Prussia and his Court as well as by the general public, displays laudable activity, having already produced Martha, Belisarius, I Montecchi e Capuletti, Das Nachtlager von Granada, Le Nozze di Figaro, and La Muette de Portici.

BONN.—M. Roger has appeared here with the same success as at Cologne.

DANZIG.—There was a "grand night" at the theatre on the 15th ult., the King's birthday. The performances commenced with a prologue, written for the occasion by Dr. Denecke, and spoken by Herr Wenzel. Previously to this, Herr von Lindpaintner's Jubel-Ouverture had been played. Then came Herr von Flotow's opera of Indra, for the first time.—Tannhäuser has been brought out.

LEIPSIC.—Madame Clara Schumann played last week in two concerts, with great success. She has since gone, for a few days, to Weimar, where she will play at Court, and also at a concert got up for her benefit, in the theatre, by Dr. Franz Liszt.

MUNICH.—Three remarkable works: Antigone, Ein Sommernachtstraum, and Wilhelm Tell, have been revived in the course of a week. The next opera will be Herr Nicolai's Lustige Weiber von Windsor.

HAMBURGH.—Mr. Balfe's opera, Les Quatre Fils d'Aymon, was given for the benefit of Herr Haimer.—It is now almost certain that the Thalia Theatre will re-open under the previous management.

ULM.—A grand event took place on the 13th ult. Händel's oratorio of Sampson was performed in the splendid cathedral, which was lighted up for the occasion. There must have been almost four thousand persons present. Some of the principal members of the Stuttgardt and Munich orchestras, as well as Mesdames Marlow, Marschalk, Herren Pischeck, and Rauscher, lent their aid. The whole affair was under the guidance of Herr W. Speidel, director of the Verein für Classische Kirchenmusik (Association for Classical Church Music.)

BUCKEBURG.—At a concert, under the direction of Herr Goulomy, the overture to Euryanthe, by Weber, the symphony in A major, by Beethoven, and Die Walpurgisnacht, by Mendelssohn, were performed in good style. The vocal music, too, included the air "Jerusalem," from the St Paul of the last mentioned great composer.

CASSEL.—Herr Bott's opera, Der Unbekannte, has now been performed six times.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—The receipts of the monster-concert, given on the 8th inst., for the benefit of the Silesian sufferers, by the united Männergesangverein, assisted by the bands of the five battalions (the Austrian excepted) in garrison here, amounted to the sum of 2,300 guldens.

BRESLAU.—The management has displayed very laudable activity lately, having given Maurer und Schlosser, Oberon, Norma, Robert le Diable, Figaro, and Der Wildschütz, in a very short period. Lohengrin has been produced.

STOCKHOLM.—Mozart's Die Zauberflöte, with new scenery, dresses, and appointments, has proved a great hit. It has attracted crowded houses all through the autumn. Donizetti's Fille du Régiment is also very popular. Meyerbeer's Prophète was produced on the 9th Oct., with great success. The parts of Jean de Leyden and Fides were sung respectively by two German artists, Herr Rademacher and Madame Romani, in their mother tongue. In spite of this little drawback, however, the audience were delighted.

ST. PETERSBURGH.—The opera season is in full swing. Madame Lagrange had a great reception in Lucia di Lammermoor. Sig. Lablache has appeared in Il Barbiere, and Sig. Tamberlik in Otello. Madlle. Yella has also appeared in M. Perrot's ballet of Katharina. The second part, selected by Mad. Tedesco, was Fides. She was called on at least twenty times in the course of the evening. There were also loud shouts of Vive Meyerbeer! Mad. Tedesco will sing next in Lucrezia Borgia.

AGRAM.—The first operatic representation having proved an utter failure, the committee of management have determined to dismiss the operatic company, and limit the performances, for the present, to plays and farces, the latter in the national tongue, though there is some talk of an Italian Opera Company being engaged for a limited number of performances, in a month or two.

HEIDELBERG.—Herr Schatterer, formerly Musikdirector in Zweibrücken, has been appointed Universitäts-Musikdirector.

POSEN.—The band of the 11th Regiment have commenced their series of subscription concerts for the season, under the direction of the bandmaster, Herr Wendel. The first concert took place on Wednesday last, on which occasion Beethoven's Symphony in A major was the principal attraction. The Gesangverein, under the direction of Herr Voigt, will perform Mendelssohn's Antigone and Spohr's Symphony in D minor, next week. M. Auber's three-act opera, Der Schwur, oder die Falschmünzer (Le Serment), was given last week for the first time in this town. It pleased greatly.

COLOGNE.—M. Roger, the French tenor, was announced to appear on the 20th ult., as George Brown (La Dame Blanche), and, on the Saturday following, in Le Prophète, as Jean of Leyden. M. Vieuxtemps will play at the Subscription Concerts this season.

DARMSTADT.—Weigl's Schweizer-Familie has been revived, after a lapse of sixteen years, but did not produce a very favourable impression. Among other operas lately produced have been Le Prophète, Wagner's Lohengrin—the King of Bavaria being present at the performance of the latter—and Flotow's Martha and Indra. Herr Ander, brother of the tenor of the same name, has made his first appearance on the stage, as Fischer, in Guillaume Tell. The members of the orchestra of the Hof-Theater will give four Philharmonic Concerts, this winter, under high patronage.

HANOVER.—Mad. Nottes has re-appeared, after her late severe illness, as Valentine in Les Huguenots. Das Nachtlager in Granada, Catharina Cornaro, and Robert le Diable, will be the next operas produced.

AMSTERDAM.—The German Opera Company, under the direction of Herr Vries, have commenced a series of performances in the Dutch National Theatre, with Der Freischütz. Herr D'Alle Aste, who is here on a starring engagement, sang the two airs from Mozart's Die Entführung, before the curtain rose for the opera.

MUNICH.—In consequence of the death of her Majesty Queen Theresa of Bavaria, the Theatre Royal was shut on the 26th of October for a fortnight.

BRUSSELS.—Mr. Henry Litolff will shortly visit this city, in obedience to an invitation he has received, to play some of his compositions in the Conservatory.

BUCHAREST.—The theatre was opened on the 21st ult., with Ernani; the principal parts sustained by Signora Benedetti, Signori Erfiè, Mancusi, and Bremond. The whole of the artists were well received, and re-called. Rigoletto and Otello are both in preparation.

STUTTGART.—(From a Correspondent.)—The first "Musée" Concert was given at the theatre on the 7th inst. The King and Queen and all the Royal Family were present. Herr Lindpaintner's new overture, Der Standhafte Prinz, began the concert; an aria from Il Pirata was then sung by Herr Schutky, followed by a violin fantasia on Don Juan, composed by Alard, and performed by Herr Barnbel. Madame Palm sang an aria from the Marriage of Figaro. The gem of the concert, however, was Mendelssohn's concerto in G minor, magnificently played by Miss Arabella Goddard, who created so profound an impression here at a concert given by her a short time since. So great was the sensation the young English pianiste made on the present occasion, that the King and Queen applauded her several times, and, at the conclusion, she was recalled with the utmost enthusiasm to receive the homage of the audience, whose exclamations of "Wunderschön, wunderschön!" were repeatedly heard during the performance. One of the royal suite was specially sent to express the great pleasure his Majesty and royal consort had experienced in listening to her splendid performance of the concerto, which, by the bye, was included in the programme by command of his Majesty, with whom it is an especial favourite, and who particularly desired that Miss Arabella Goddard should play it. The Princess Augusta and the Prince of Saxe Weimar also sent their congratulations to the fair pianiste on her success: so that altogether Miss Arabella Goddard may be proud of the sensation she has made in the capital of Wurtemberg. A Stuttgart journal (the Neues Tagblatt), after eulogising the performance of Miss Arabella Goddard, goes on to say:—"She is a pianiste of the first rank (Pianistin vom besten Wasser), with a pearly touch and a perfection of scale playing both in forte and piano passages we never heard equalled. Her tone is remarkably full and resonant, and her command over the piano so extraordinary, that she overcomes the greatest difficulties without any apparent effort." Two "Gesänge," by Schubert, concluded the concert, sung by Madame Palm and Herr Schutky—viz., "Der Erlkönig" and "Der Wanderer," both of which had full orchestral accompaniments, specially arranged by Herr Lindpaintner, and admirably instrumented. Altogether, the concert gave the greatest satisfaction to the dilettanti of Stuttgart.

IBID.—Nebucadnezar, Martha, Joseph und Seine Brüder, and Wilhelm Tell, have been the last operas produced. Wilhelm Tell had not been performed for five years: it had a tremendous success.

MILAN, 4th Nov, 1854.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The Maestro E. Petrella has arrived to superintend the rehearsals of his opera, Marco-Visconti. At the Teatro Canobbiana, Sig. Rota's new ballet, Ida Badoe, has had but moderate success; it has, however, had about ten representations during the last fortnight. Lucia di Lammermoor was reproduced on the 24th ult., with Signora Marinangelli as the heroine. This artist possesses a pure and flexible soprano voice, but it is sadly fatigued. Her impersonation of Lucia was indifferent. The cavatina, "Regnava nel Silenzio," and the duet with the tenor, were sung almost without either expression or accent. The second act passed off better. The Signori Armandi, and Della-Santa, resumed their parts of Edgardo and Enrico. There have also been several other representations of Il Barbiere and La Fiorina. This evening we have had quite a commotion amongst the musical circles, on account of the first representation of Il Pirata of Bellini, which, I believe, has not been played for nearly twenty years at Milan. Since the time of Rubini, scarcely any tenor has been found willing to risk his reputation in this most trying part. Sig. Carrion has succeeded beyond the expectation of all present: his first aria, and the duet with Imogene, were splendidly executed. The finale of the first act, and the trio with the Duca and Imogene, went rather coldly. Some of the difficulties which followed seemed almost insurmountable, the music for the tenor being written so exceedingly high, with occasional low notes, that the music scarcely admitted of transposition. We have certainly never heard this tenor display his decided abilities to such advantage; he obtained several recalls during the evening, although the audience are strangely severe. Signora Viola (Imogene), and Signor L. Della-Santa (Il Duca), were applauded in their respective parts.

NAPLES.—Verdi's Ernani, which followed upon Norma, drew very good houses for two or three nights; the attraction then fell off, and the directors of San Carlo could only boast of a miserable show of empty benches. Madame Medori's singing, at first lauded to the skies, is now severely criticised, and Coletti also comes in for a share of criticism. His voice is said to be fatigued, and it is only by the superiority of his artistic talent that he manages to get through an opera. The tenor (Naudin) is spoken of as a superior artist, and as possessing a good method; but the Neapolitan journals strongly advise him to cut Verdi's music, if he have any regard for his voice. The advice of the Neapolitan journals is full of meaning, and Sig. Naudin would act wisely in profiting by it. It is said Il Trovatore will soon be brought out, with Madame Goggi, for whom the part of Azucena was originally written. Signor Pacini is about to start for Paris, to superintend the rehearsals of his opera, Gli Arabi nelle Gallie, to be produced at the Italian opera.

FLORENCE.—Signor Capecelatro's new opera, Gastone Chanley, will be produced in a few days. This opera was originally written by order of the administration of the theatre of the Porta Carinzia at Vienna, in 1852, and has since been altered and arranged to suit the exigencies of the Italian stage, and the company now engaged at the Pergola.

SORRENTO.—The second opera was I Due Foscari, the execution of which was praiseworthy; sustained by Signora Rota-Galli, Signori Piccinini, and A. Grandi.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 18TH, 1854.

AN appeal is made to us, in our columns to-day, which we cannot resist. A German artist, of the name of Manns, was engaged by Herr Schallehn as sub-director of the Crystal Palace Band; possessing the quality of a musician, which the director himself so much needed, Herr Manns soon made himself very useful as composer and arranger for the orchestra. On the occasion of the performance for the benefit of the Patriotic Fund, at which "Les Guides" and several military bands assisted, the sub-director composed a quadrille on national melodies, at the request of his superior in office, Herr Schallehn. The director was so well pleased with the performance, that he immediately published the quadrille under his own name; and, according to Herr Manns, sold the copyright to a publisher for ten guineas. These unusual proceedings were protested against by the composer, but the only compensation which the director offered him in return was a pound for his time, which he said was ample compensation. However, Herr Manns did not feel disposed to give up so easily his reputation and profits to another, and continued his expostulations, which the director at last silenced emphatically by discharging the refractory composer from the orchestra.

Thus the poor musician is suddenly deprived of his means of subsistence, and for no other reason but that he is talented, and will not quietly allow another man to appropriate the fruits of his brains.

The tale requires no comment; every Englishman will burn with indignation at such an act of injustice, and will watch with eagerness the result of the injured artist's appeal to the managers of the Crystal Palace Company. There is but one step to take, and we trust the directors will take that step. It is to restore Herr Manns to his place in the orchestra, and to discharge the man who, without talent and character, acts the part of tyrant over the unfortunate men who are his superiors in everything but salary.

CHARLES KEMBLE expired on Sunday last, at his residence in London, in the 79th year of his age. He had been for many years afflicted with an internal complaint, by which his life was frequently endangered, and from the sudden attacks of which he suffered great agony. Latterly, too, he became so deaf, that he was compelled to use an ear-trumpet, which he carried everywhere with him. Still his constitution was good, and his frame powerful; and so, even against the fearful odds of an insidious disease and intense suffering, he carried himself bravely on, and lasted to a goodly green old age.

As an actor, Charles Kemble "flowered late." It was not until he was past forty that his excellence was acknowledged. The discriminating few could not fail, indeed, to detect the artist when he played; but with the public he passed by, not totally unregarded, but producing little or no impression. It is possible, nay probable, the public were right. Charles Kemble for many years was completely obnubilated in the splendour of his brother's name. Attached to John Kemble's company for a long period, he had little or no opportunity of appearing in those parts which subsequently made his reputation;—such as Benedict, Mercutio, Romeo, and Hamlet; since the first four had seldom an opportunity of being represented under John Kemble's management, and the last was of course reserved for the manager himself. It was unfortunate also for Charles Kemble that his brother on all occasions avoided playing in Othello—neither the character of the Moor nor that of Iago at all suiting him. He was thereby deprived of appearing in Cassio, one of his most finished and masterly performances. It seems, moreover, that Charles Kemble was no very eager student in his early days, and that he followed the profession of the stage rather from necessity than liking. Perhaps from all these causes combined a reason might be made out, why, until after the retirement of John Kemble from the stage, Charles was received as the mere walking gentleman, to whose fine face and gentlemanly appearance the little success he obtained was in no small part owing. When John Kemble quitted Covent Garden, the drama of Shakespere was for a while absorbed by Edmund Kean. In fact, the London public would identify no other actor besides Edmund Kean with the name of Shakspere. Young made a feeble stand in the legitimate drama for a while at Covent Garden against the idol of the other house, and Macready had only just stepped upon the stage. Shakspere at Covent Garden, in consequence, was forced to give place to less popular writers; and several new plays were written, by Barry Cornwall, Milman, Shiel, Sheridan Knowles, and others, which, with the powerful assistance of Young, Macready, Charles Kemble, and Miss Kelly, came into vogue. Miss O'Neill, in addition, soon after John Kemble's secession, appeared in London at Covent Garden and fairly divided the general enthusiasm with Edmund Kean. The result of all this was to bring Charles Kemble more frequently before the public, and to place him in parts more fitted to his powers and genius. Mercutio was the first character, we believe, in which Charles Kemble made a profound impression on his audience—so profound indeed, as to divide the palm with Miss O'Neill's Juliet. He had at first played Romeo; but resigned the part, after one season, to Abbott, who was a good, sensible actor, but of the mouthing George Bennett-Diddear school. Charles Kemble also played Jaffier to Miss O'Neill's Belvidera, Cassio to her Desdemona, and, generally, all the lovers' parts with the great actress. His reputation was soon made, and his superiority acknowledged. One of his most remarkable performances—and one in which he literally took the town by storm—was Falconbridge, which he played to Macready's King John. He had previously played the part with his brother, but, strange to say, with little effect. Hardly less fine, as a piece of acting, was his Young Mirabel, in the Inconstant, which was revived for him at Covent Garden, and in the last scene of which he was eminently great.

Charles Kemble had qualities which distinguished him essentially from all contemporary actors. Without possessing the dignity and grandeur of his brother John, the electric fire and impetuosity of Kean, or the romantic sensibility and abstract passion of Macready, he had yet a grace beyond them all, and could shine in a heaven in which their lustre would flicker and grow pale. No actor of his day—most probably, no actor who preceded him—possessed that true nobility of humour which gave an importance to the most trivial utterance, and constituted him the veritable exponent of the higher comic characters of Shakspere. There was a weight in his sprightliness, a gravity in his mirth, which was absolutely Shaksperian. Had he made Falstaff his study, it would have been one of the greatest performances ever chronicled on the stage. We believe he performed Falstaff occasionally, but he had not mastered it. His Mercutio and Benedict, on the contrary, were elaborated to an extreme degree, and perfected with consummate art. There was hardly a flaw in these two glorious realizations, from the performance of which, the critic mut have been sour indeed, and difficult to please, who did not rise delighted and thoroughly satisfied. Charles Kemble's manly grace and elegance were proverbial, and, although his walk was perhaps too measured and stately for comedy, his deportment on the stage was singularly easy and natural. He was, moreover, finely formed, and, take him all in all, one of the handsomest men in Europe.

As a tragedian, we think Charles Kemble was overrated. In the lighter parts of Hamlet, his suavity and gentlemanly bearing set him off to immense advantage; but, in the tragic scenes, his want of power and energy were sufficiently evident. He copied Young in this character, and reached him—perhaps surpassed him—in all but force and passion.

Every artist has his specialty. Taking Charles Kemble as the representative of some of the loftiest and most subtle characters drawn by the poet of nature, he was beyond a doubt one of the greatest Shaksperian actors who ever lived. Those who have seen his Mercutio, Benedict, Prince Hal, Cassio, Falconbridge, and other parts, will sigh over their recollection, and vainly hope to look upon their like again. Charles Kemble has passed away from the stage of life, but has left behind him a name that will endure with the dramatic annals of his country.

Vivier, the incomparable and eccentric, is at Weimar, where he is specially retained to play at several concerts and private soirées. Thence he proceeds to Hanover, where various engagements await him. In consequence of the great impression his performance made at the Court Concerts in Berlin, last month, handsome offers have been made to him for those fixed for the 19th and 29th instant, under the direction of M. Meyerbeer. It is uncertain, however, whether this "erratic virtuoso" will be able to accept them. Vivier is expected in Paris the beginning of December, where he will, no doubt, be welcomed with open arms.

PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

November 16th.

There has been very little stirring since my last, and the clouds and rain and dirt that have invaded the city have not added much to the gaiety of Paris or the vivacity of its inhabitants. The theatres have been dull, and except Marie Cabel at the Théâtre-Lyrique, and the Etoile du Nord at the Opéra-Comique, nothing can be said to have excited any particular degree of attention on the part of the public.

For those who are fond of operatic music it is worth a month's sojourn in Paris, if only for the sake of the Opéra-Comique, which is open every night, Sundays and all, where the best works of the French school may be repeatedly heard, and where the ensemble is really superior to that of any other theatre—although there is not one first-rate singer in the company. Besides the Etoile of Meyerbeer, which, in spite of the indisposition of M. Bataille, who, pro tem. is inefficiently replaced by M. Faure, continues to fill the theatre three times a week, an evening may be profitably and agreeably spent in hearing that charming opera of Herold, Le Pré aux Clercs, which has been revived with extraordinary success, and is played on the "off-nights." In this the singing of Mad. Miolan-Carvalho, a lady of small stature and smaller voice, but a vocalist of singular accomplishments, has created a sensation unparalelled at this theatre since the best days of Mad. Ugalde, who now in vain seeks for an engagement at one of the lyric establishments of the metropolis. On Sunday, an immense audience was attracted by a monster performance, consisting of one of Auber's best works—L'Ambassadrice—and of Boieldieu's masterpiece—La Dame Blanche. Here was enough for a very cormorant in musical sounds. The part of Henriette in the first, which, it is well authenticated, was originally intended by M. Scribe for the late unfortunate and admirable Madame Sontag, was sustained by Madame Miolan-Carvalho, with remarkable ability. The other parts were allotted to MM. Jourdan, Ponchard, Carvalho (husband of Mad. Miolan), Mdlles. Félix and Decroix. The cast of La Dame Blanche was not so strong. M. Puget, as Georges Brown, only made us regret M. Roger, who, had he been well advised, would never have quitted the Opéra-Comique, where he was everything, for the Grand Opéra, where he was comparatively lost. Nor is Mdlle. Rey—who has made a very agreeable impression in the second rôle de femme in L'Etoile du Nord—quite equal to the music of the "White Lady" of Avenel. Mdlle. Decroix, who played in both pieces on Sunday, is a very pretty woman and a lively actress. You should see her as one of the vivandières in L'Etoile du Nord—it would be difficult to dream of anything more fascinating.

At the Italiens, Ernani has been received with success. I need not describe to you how brilliantly Madlle. Bosio vocalises the music of Elvira. But that said, all is said that can be fairly said in favour of the chief performers. Sig. Bettini is a very loud singer (Ernani); Sig. Graziani (Carlos), is, after all, but a second-rate barytone; and, M. Gassier is a Don Silva of the Borrani school, a little refined. If you want an amusing and spirituel description of how these artists roared and screamed against one another, in the true Verdian style, in ord r to satisfy the composer, who assisted at the rehearsal, and was present at the performance, read the feuilleton of M. Fiorentino in Tuesday's Constitutionel. The orchestra, under Sig. Bonetti, an energetic and able conductor, out-bellowed the singers; and the general effect was vociferous enough to have deprived Sig. Verdi himself of the faculty of hearing for at least a month. The chorus was not good by any means. However, the audience were pleased, and the manager, Sig. Ragani (the uncle of Giulia Grisi), is justified in keeping Ernani in the bills. Rigoletto will shortly be produced, for Mdlle. Bosio, who is quite as great a favourite in Paris as in London, and who is really singing better than ever.

Some important changes have taken place at the Grand-Opéra. By an Imperial decree, dated Nov. 11, M. Crosnier (formerly director of the Opéra-Comique) a deputy in the Corps Législatif, has been charged with the administration of the first lyric theatre, in place of M. Roqueplan, whose resignation, as you were informed, has been accepted. M. Crosnier was officially installed in his functions, as general administrator of the affairs of the Imperial Theatre, on Tuesday (the day before yesterday). M. Certain, who served under M. Crosnier at the Opéra-Comique, has been appointed inspector-general of the greater establishment. These decisions have given satisfaction —M. Crosnier especially being generally popular. To this gentleman, and not to M. Basset, his successor, or to M. Perrin, the present manager, must be attributed the great prosperity which for many years has been enjoyed by the Opéra-Comique. Under his rule were produced most of the chefs-d'œuvre of Auber, which, after all, have been the main support of that popular and delightful theatre.

The rentrée of Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli is to take place on Monday, in the Huguenots. The greatest excitement prevails on her account, and the scene of her re-apparition will be well worth witnessing. She will probably be received in silence by the audience, and no manifestation of any sort will take place until after she has sung her first important morceau. If she sings it well—good; if ill ——— ! ! Meanwhile, the new opera of Verdi has again been put in rehearsal, and every day the "illustrious" composer of Ernani rehearses his music, at the piano, with the prima donna, whom, to his credit be it said, he declared "indispensable." The opera is to be brought out with extraordinary splendour, and if Verdi—whose Jerusalem-Lombardi was a dead failure in 1847-48—does not this time win back his laurels, it will be his own fault, not that of the manager, the scene painter, or the prima donna. With regard to the tenor—I pity Sig. Verdi. The Nonne Sanglante has given the last stroke to M. Gueymard, who was never very great, and is now essoufflé. M. Roger has quitted the Opéra in dudgeon, and unless Sig. Gardoni, whose re-engagement has been the first act of M. Crosnier's administration, be induced to accept the principal tenor part, it will be disastrous to the composer. Of course, Gardoni will look to his voice, which continues to be fresh, and which he will not lightly peril for Signor Verdi or anybody else. On the other hand, we have M. Boulo, the Belgian; but he is of small account, and was foolish to leave the Opéra-Comique, where he was respectable, though not Roger or Couderc. We have M. Admès, who is on the wrong side of mediocrity; and we have M. Poultier, who never could do anything except sing, half in falsetto (which spoiled it), the "Sommeil," song of La Muette, and whose re-engagement—to judge by his feeble efforts as Edgard, in Lucie, and Fernand in La Favorite—has been little fructuous. We have them, it is true; but I doubt greatly whether Sig. Verdi would be satisfied with the three of them rolled into one. He requires a pendant to Sophie Cruvelli, and that can only be recognised in Gardoni. What would not M. Crosnier give for Tamberlik or Sims Reeves! They are wise enough, however, to keep aloof. I have just heard that the first act of M. Crosnier's administration was not the engagement of Gardoni, but the dismissal of his mother, Madame Crosnier—who, for many years, although in prosperous circumstances, had obstinately persisted in guarding the seemingly (but not really, according to her system), humble and unprofitable post of concierge at the stage-door, or porte des artistes. He has done well. There is a talk of reviving Auber's delicious opera, Le Cheval de Bronze, with some new ballet-music by the great composer himself. This would be wise and give a little relief to M. Meyerbeer, whose operas are played so often that it is marvellous how they preserve their attraction. It is lamentable in such a theatre as the Opéra to witness performances like the Favorite, with Mdlle. Wertheimber and M. Poultier; and Lucie de Lammermoor, with Mdlle. Dussy and M. Poultier. The first theatre in France is literally disgraced by them. Meanwhile La Muette de Portici is to be revived —for whom ?—for Mad. Fanny Cerito ! The idea is not happy. Fenella demands an intelligent pantomimic actress, with an expressive countenance—not a mere dancer, however skilful. Cerito is neither an intelligent pantomimic actress, nor has she an expressive countenance; she is a mere dancer, however skilful. Rosati, who is a vast favourite, would be better; but even Rosati is not enough. Mdlle. Robert, as a mime, is worth them both together; and Mdlle. Robert belongs to the Opéra.

I have little more to add. The Cruvelli affair—in all its phases—has been arranged, to the honour and satisfaction of every one. I expected just as much: and so did you. Everybody asks—Where is Mad. Stoltz ? Can you inform us over here ? The Opera is absolutely in want of her—if, on the non-Cruvelli nights, it is not intended to adhere strictly to mediocrity, or worse.

At the Théâtre-Lyrique, you will be intoxicated to hear, the Bijou Perdu has been revived, and a new opera of M. Adolphe Adam, of the Institute, is in rehearsal, for poor Mad. Cabel—pauvre Marie ! M. Perrin must take care not to lose himself in the conceit of his infallibility. He has the direction of two theatres, at the two extremities of the Boulevards, the Italiens and the Temple; but he is not infallible—far from it. At the Français, Rachel, the incomparable and much calumniated, fills the theatre to the walls, in modern melodrama, like Adrienne, or in ancient "classic," like Les Horaces. So much the better; it shows the taste of the French bourgeois to be correct and fine. I will tell you something of the other theatres—non-musical—in my next.

Hector Berlioz has announced a grand concert for the 10th of December, when his new oratorio, or trilogie, as he terms it, of The Birth of Christ, will be given, with a pianoforte trio of Mendelssohn. The Société St.-Cecile has given up the ghost, I hear: so much the worse. M. Seghers was an innovator of the boldest, and gave a good lesson to the Conservatoire or Société des Concerts, with its apathetic chief, M. Girard, by which it was slow, but sure, to profit.

ST. MARTIN'S HALL.

HANDEL'S oratorio, Judas Maccabæus, was performed, on Wednesday evening, under the direction of Mr. John Hullah. On the whole we may, perhaps, be justified in saying it was the best performance of one of the great composer's masterpieces yet given by Mr. Hullah. The principal vocal performers were Mrs. Sims Reeves, Miss Julia Bleaden, Miss Huddart, Mr. Augustus Braham, and Mr. Weiss. The chorus consisted of the members of Mr. Hullah's first upper singing school. The excision of some of the airs and several of the recitatives was, as usual, resorted to, a circumstance that must not be regretted, as the great length of the oratorio, owing to the interminable length of many of the recitatives, and the want of anything particularly striking in the omitted airs, would have wearied the audience unnecessarily. The choruses went surprisingly well—for instance "Oh! wretched Israel," "Oh, never bow we down," "Fallen is the Foe," and the popular "See the conquering Hero comes" (encored). The solo singers acquitted themselves evidently to the complete satisfaction of the audience, who were often more boisterous than judicious in their applause. Several of the favourite songs were encored, a practice, however, which would be more honoured in the breach than the observance. Mr. Augustus Braham's force and distinct articulation must be commended in "Sound an Alarm," and Mr. Weiss's vocalisation in "The Lord worketh wonders," merits eulogy. Miss Huddart, in the recitative "From Capharsalama," betokened improvement since we last heard her. Mrs. Sims Reeves was deservedly applauded throughout the evening for her extremely artistic singing, especially in the airs "O liberty" (the violoncello accompaniment admirably played by Mr. Lucas), and "From mighty kings," as well as in the duet "O lovely peace," with Miss Huddart. Miss Julia Bleaden had not much to do, yet did it well. This lady is making steady progress in her profession. The orchestra was under very good control, and did its duty in a praiseworthy manner. The horns, perhaps, might have been better; we must not, however, be hypercritical, considering the almost impossible difficulties allotted to them in certain parts of the score of Judas Maccabæus. Mr. Hullah has cause for congratulation in the improvement of his pupils, and in the patronage bestowed upon him. The Hall was crowded.

THE RE-UNION DES ARTS.

On Wednesday evening, the second soirée musicale of the winter season took place. The principal feature of the evening was a new pianoforte quartet by Herr Golmick, which was executed by the composer, assisted by Herr Goffrie, and Messrs. Ries and Hancock. Our impression of the quartett, after one hearing, is very agreeable. It is remarkable for clearness of treatment, and simplicity of style. The andante movement, especially, is a charming specimen of unaffected melody distributed with striking effect, between the violin and piano. We were almost as much pleased with the original and quaint scherzo which followed the andante, and which obtained an involuntary burst of applause from the audience. Mr. Gollmick's quartet is altogether a composition of decided merit, and will always be listened to with pleasure by audiences of all classes, not as most modern quartets are, for the sake of the skilful performance, or on account of the author's learned and elaborate instrumentation, but as a work full of pleasant subjects ingeniously treated. Herr Golmick's quartett was followed by several Italian pieces, of which Signor and Mad. Lorenzo, and M. Eustace took especial charge. We may notice, as worth a second hearing, a very pretty duet by Campana entitled "Una sera d'amore," which gave general satisfaction. Miss Sims Reeves (sister to the national tenor) took part in a duet by Verdi "Qual mare," and displayed a very agreeable quality of voice. The young Messrs. Holmes performed a duo concertante by Spohr, on two violins, with their usual ability and taste. An "Elégie," by Herr Ries, on the violoncello, made up the programme.

We have now a few words to say to the gentlemen who call themselves the directors of the "Ré-union des Arts," and who addressed their subscribers last year in a very pompous and self-laudatory circular. We have not a prospectus before us; but, if we mistake not, therein was contained a profession that new composers and new performers should, from time to time, be introduced to the world at 76, Harley-street. The Society purported to be established solely for the advancement of the interests of music, apart from all mercenary considerations. With so promising a prospectus before us, we naturally anticipated hearing the initiatory notes of a newly discovered nightingale at 76, Harley-street. We looked forward, too, with pleasing expectation and curiosity of listening to the fresh strains of some modern Orpheus, and discussing the merits of the successor to Mendelssohn. We were not quite so weak, however, as to expect that an institution of this kind would create talent, and so we were willing to waive our expectations for the first two seasons; but we certainly believed that the directors, who promised so much, would make some attempts to appear scrupulous and consistent. They have obtained the subscriptions of a large body of artists and their admirers, but the plea on which these were sought has, to all appearance, been thrown aside with contempt immediately on the receipt of the subscriptions. Where are the new singers? Where are the new composers? In the prospectus, and no where else. The directors have not introduced a single composer of any worth to secure audiences—not one solitary artist of any merit. The whole of the concerts have been characterised by the stalest music, and the most hacknied executants. Any one who desired to rehearse a song, or practice a trio, could do so in Harley-street. If anybody will take the trouble to put together the programmes of the two seasons, he will observe the elements of the concerts have been generally such as the iron-souled Lancashire audience would reject, and common-place and tedious. The result is demonstrating itself. Every artist of any reputation is keeping aloof. The "Ré-union des Arts" has lost its character as an art-institution, and, unless a speedy reformation takes place in its conduct, will fall to the level of the conciliatory subscription concerts which, in Hackney, Walworth, and Greenwich, are supported by the shopkeepers and others who are glad to fill up the evening with a cheap musical entertainment.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

THE PATRIOTIC FUND.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

21, Soho-square, November 6th, 1854.

DEAR SIR,—In the last number of the Musical World there is an able letter from the Rev. Thomas Lloyd Fowle, suggesting that all musicians and amateurs should give their mite towards the object which is at present absorbing all minds, that of contributing to the funds for relieving the wives and children of those brave men who fall during the present war in the East. I perfectly agree with Mr. Fowle's ideas, and would suggest that a committee of gentlemen be formed for giving a grand concert, and feel confident that there is not one member of the musical profession who would not willingly give his services gratuitously, for I am sure there is not a more loyal body of men in Her Majesty's dominions.—Apologising for this intrusion, I remain, yours obediently,

JOHN WEIPPERT.

N.B.—Should the committee think it preferable to give a grand ball, I would guarantee to provide "Weippert's Quadrille Band" gratis.

HARMONIC UNION, EXETER HALL.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—I did not reply to an anonymous letter, inserted in your Paper two or three weeks back, because I considered that such communications receive, as they are worth, but little attention. As, however, in your last number you have embodied in an editorial article some of the mis-statements contained in the letter referred to, I feel called upon to address you.

1. With reference to the assertion that the "Harmonic Union no longer exists," and is not likely to be revived, it will only be necessary for me to state that the Society never ceased to exist, and that the directors will issue their prospectus, in the course of a few days, with prospects of success much more favourable than at the commencement of either of the preceding seasons.

2. The assertion (made I find also by an anonymous writer in one of your contemporaries) that the whole of the superintendents of our Society have joined Dr. Wylde's Society, I beg unequivocally to deny; and I believe I shall be correct, if I add that Dr. Wylde's superintendents this year are precisely the same as last, so that no new strength has been obtained by him in this department.

3. The assertion that the majority of our members have gone over to Dr. Wylde is somewhat ambiguous. If subscribers are intended, it must unquestionably be at least premature, for, as the concerts of the New Philharmonic Society are announced not to commence till next March, the subscription list can scarcely be opened. If the members of our committee are intended, I simply give the statement a flat denial, and, as a proof, state that our committee last season consisted of twelve gentlemen, eight of whom I know have not the slightest connection with Dr. Wylde's Society. The friends of the Harmonic Union will be glad to learn that the directors who during the last season attended the Board most frequently, and who were by far the largest subscribers to its funds, are firm in their attachment to its interests, and unhesitating in their resolution to give it continued and increased support.

I have no ill-feeling towards Dr. Wylde or his Society, and I sincerely hope his friends will not provoke any, by resorting to unnecessary and unfair opposition. Honest rivalry I respect; malicious opposition I abhor, and this I am happy to know the public and the press will alike discountenance.

Whether the selection for Dr. Wylde's rehearsals of the evening appropriated to the rehearsals of the Harmonic Union is evidence of either good taste or a spirit of fair competition, I leave to the consideration of Dr. Wylde and your readers at large.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

HENRY JOHN LIAS, Jun.,

November 2nd, 1854. Hon. Sec.

THE HARMONIC UNION.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—On reading last Saturday's number of the Musical World, I found a note to the effect that Jules Benedict, Esq., had sent a request to the Secretary of the late Harmonic Union, Mr. H. J. Lias, jun., to have his name erased from all the notice-boards, etc., in Exeter-hall. Knowing myself that such an order had been given as long ago as the 3rd inst., I went to Exeter-hall this day (Nov. 10th) for the purpose of seeing whether or no the request of Mr. Benedict had been attended to; when I discovered that it had not, as the name appears on the notice-boards in the Strand and Exeter-street entrances, and on the office door No. 5, in the building. I will not trust myself to comment on the conduct of those gentlemen whose duty it is to attend to such an order, and also the impropriety of asking the public to enter their names as subscribers to a society on whose office-door the name of Mr. Benedict appears as conductor, precisely as it did from the commencement, but will leave it to them to explain why they still persist in an act which, to say the least of it, does not come within the bounds of propriety, and will prove a serious impediment to their imaginary prospects for the formation of another society bearing the same name, with a different conductor. I will not seek further means to reprove the parties concerned, for an act so unworthy of them towards a gentleman of such unblemished reputation; but should feel myself much wanting in gratitude if I did not seek to make the plain facts of the case known as widely as possible through the pages of your valuable journal.

I would, in conclusion, suggest that it may be some mistake has occurred as to who is the proper person to whom application should be made; and if the secretary is not, perhaps Mr. Benedict would do well to apply to the Reverend Gentleman advertised in the Times of Tuesday last as President, or the person who occupies the position of hall-porter to the building.

I am, Sir, yours obediently,
ONE OF THE FIRST SUBSCRIBERS TO THE LATE
Nov. 10, 1854. HARMONIC UNION.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE BAND.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

Sydenham, November 9th, 1854.

SIR,—You being the worthy exponent of the wrongs of artists, may I trouble you to inform the musical world, the treatment I have received at the hands of a person in "a little brief authority." I am certain that I have only to appeal for justice to Englishmen—that which I am denied by a countryman of my own—when I shall receive it, more especially from those who hate petty tyranny and counterfeitism, if I may so use the word, in that art which should be above anything mean or despicable. I was engaged last May to be sub-conductor of the band of the Crystal Palace—my duty was to play an E flat clarinet, and conduct the band when the conductor was not present—I have done so, and, besides, corrected the mistakes in all the music played, the palpable inefficiency of the proper party not being able to discern whether the parts were right or not. I have tried also to put into some correct shape, the collection of useless music, not suitable, nor ever will it be, for the said band, purchased at the expense of the Company. On the occasion of the fêtes in aid of the Patriotic Fund, I arranged a set of quadrilles suitable for the occasion, combining English, French, and Turkish melodies, together with some original matter added of my own, and christened them "The Alliance Quadrille." I had them well rehearsed for the occasion, and they were played with éclat. I arranged them for the pianoforte and gave them to Mr. Schallehn, the conductor, who said he could sell them for me. What was my surprise to perceive, in a day or two, my quadrille announced by a publisher in the City as "The Alliance Quadrille," composed by Henry Schallehn. I went to Mr. Schallehn and demanded his reason for so acting, when he coolly offered me one pound, stating that that even would pay me, and rudely informing me his name would sell them better than mine. I spurned his offer, when he stated, for my impudence, I should then and there be dismissed and leave the Crystal Palace band. I have served in some of the first orchestras in Europe, and I have never heard of such uncalled-for and futile vengeance from a party in power—whether the true artist could act so or not, I leave your readers to determine. I have made a full and true statement to the chairman of the directors of the whole circumstance, and it rests with them, whether artistes who join their band are to be thus treated for merely protesting against appropriation of their property by their conductor.

I have the honour to remain, Mr. Editor,
Yours respectfully, AUGUSTUS MANNS.

HARMONICS,

ITS REFERENCE TO THE CHORDS OF THE MINOR AND MAJOR 9th, THE 11th, AND THE MINOR AND MAJOR 13th.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—As, I believe, the greater part of the learned in the musical profession deny the existence of any harmonics beyond the minor seventh, and even laugh at the idea, I would ask, do the above harmonics exist, and if so, where can they be heard? If such harmonics exist, they can be heard, and if heard, they cannot be denied.

In Dr. Day's "Treatise on Harmony," the excellence of which is testified by Mr. G. A. Macfarren, a man universally admitted to be the most scientific musician and the cleverest musical thinker, perhaps, in Europe, it is stated, "The harmonics from any given note (without taking the order in which they arise, but their practical use), are, major third, perfect fifth, minor seventh, minor or major ninth, eleventh, and minor or major thirteenth." Mr. Macfarren, in a letter attached to Dr. Day's work, says, "Since I have become familiar with your system, feeling as I have done that it was true, and that as Truth is single, so none but your's could be true, I have taught upon it, and have found it most easily comprehended by pupils who had no foreknowledge of the subject." Mr. Macfarren ends by saying, "I firmly believe, that should your theory be generally read, it will greatly improve and facilitate the study of harmony." If, then, the ninth, eleventh, and thirteenth are only imaginary harmonics, is it possible that so able and truthful a musician as Mr. Macfarren would so emphatically have advocated Dr. Day's system by saying that "None but his could be true?"

Having questioned a most eminent musician as to whether he had ever heard these harmonics, I was answered, "No! but I know they are to be heard, although faintly." Another musician whom I asked, informed me that there was no doubt of their existence, and immediately taking off the top of a square pianoforte, he placed his finger lightly on one of the bass strings, and while forcibly striking the key, he moved his finger slowly and gradually up the string, when, to the best of my remembrance (it was my firm impression at the time that I did), I heard from the note he struck—the ninth minor and major, the eleventh and the thirteenth minor and major, but they were very faint, and not in the order I name them. I have not since been able further to investigate the matter. On my naming this to a professional friend, he smiled and said the sounds I heard were the vibrations of the other strings. If such was the case, which I am not willing to allow (the harmonics being too faint to cause any vibration of other strings), the vibrations of the other strings must have first been generated by the different harmonic sounds from the strings which were struck.

If this subject could once be set at rest, there could no longer be any diversity of opinion respecting the roots of chords.

You have said in your leading article on the Royal Academy of Music, "While, as to the grammar of music, we much doubt if six Academy lads could be found to parse a tolerably stiff sentence from one of Bach's five part preludes, and agree as to its particulars;" and also, "It should be impossible to find two harmony-scholars who would disagree as to the spelling of a dischord."

There is great carelessness or ignorance among musicians respecting musical orthography; some say they write so because it is easier to read. One eminent musician told me he had been advised by several music publishers not to write his chords correctly, as they had been objected to on account of their not being so easy to read. As well might one say that as such words as Warwick, Physiognomy, etc., might be pronounced incorrectly by the ignorant, it would be better to write them, Warrick and Fizzionnomy. But I deny that the incorrect way is easier; in writing words it would be so, but would it be tolerated? In the systems of harmony generally taught there are many inconsistencies which create difficulties—the fingering of chords is very complicated—the chromatic intervals are given in all sorts of keys, having no relation to the key in which the exercise may be in. If there are no difficulties in the way to a clear understanding of chords, how is it to be accounted for that the best Italian operas (twelve at least) I have examined, are filled with progressions of chords which, as they are written, have no relation one to the other, nor to the key?

I am prevented entering more fully upon this subject, as I had, at first, intended, and will, therefore, merely add a few words respecting the chromatic scale.

It is most clearly proved by Dr. Day that it would be wrong to write it in any other way than the one he has given. He proves that the intervals forming the chromatic scale are taken from the chords of the minor ninth on the tonic, the dominant, its first harmonic, and the supertonic, the first harmonic of the dominant and the first harmonic which is common to both, it being the fifth of the dominant and the major ninth of the tonic (A); and that if this chord be taken on any of the other notes of the diatonic scale of C, major and minor, they would give harmonics having no relation whatever with the key. It is an established law, that unless a change of key takes place no note can be introduced which is foreign to it. The chords of the seventh on the tonic and supertonic are considered as strictly belonging to the key, being the only two chords of the minor seventh which can be used in the key without modulation.

The following is a complete analysis of the chromatic scale, and it may be doubted if so consistent a one (if any) could be given of it, according to the old system, (B).

The harmonics of the tonic up to the minor ninth, and of the dominant with the ninth minor and major and thirteenth minor are equally consistent, and include every note, except the chromatic semitone, of the diatonic, minor, and chromatic scales (C).

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

Oct. 30th, 1854. INVESTIGATOR.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

MR. EDITOR,—In your number of the Musical World for 21st Oct. I read with pleasure a short article on "The equal temperament system of Organ Tuning," in which I fully concur, and trust to hear of its being adopted generally in Britain.

You mention several organs lately built which have been tuned on the equal temperament, among others the organ for the City Hall in Glasgow. Now, as I happened to be consulted about that organ, I beg to say, that it was by my advice that it was so tuned.

I beg also, for the credit of the art in Scotland, to inform your readers, that Mr. Hamilton, organ builder in Edinburgh, has, to my knowledge, built and tuned organs on the equal temperament, twenty years ago in Scotland, and that my organ in St. Paul's here is so tuned, as well as many others I could name. This start in advance may easily be accounted for, as Mr. Hamilton is not only an organ builder, but a player, and studied his art in Germany.

Your giving the above a place in your journal will oblige a constant reader.

ROBT. DAVIDSON,
Organist of St. Paul's, Edinburgh.

Edinburgh, 15th November, 1854.

TRIESTE.—At the Teatro Grande, Balfe has arrived, and distributed the parts of his new oper Il Duca e Pittore, written expressly for this theatre. On the 25th ult., Don Sebastiano of Donizetti was produced, sustained by Signora De-Gianni-Vives, and the Signori Mirate, Ferri, Benedetti, and Carapia. These artists were much applauded.

Wells, Miss J. Wells, Mr. Augustus Braham, Mr. Seymour, and Mr. Farquharson. The band and chorus will consist of nearly 800 performers. Conductor, Mr. Surman, who, during the performance, will be presented with a testimonial for valuable services rendered to the cause of sacred music. Tickets at a reduced price—2s., 3s., and 5s.—to be had at the Principal Musicsellers. The subscription to the Society is One, Two, or Three Guineas per Annum. Two tickets for each Concert, and a valuable musical present from the Conductor.—Only office, No. 9, Exeter-hall.

CHAPPELL'S FOREIGN MODEL PIANOFORTE.—PRICE FIFTY GUINEAS.—This instrument has (unlike the ordinary cottage pianoforte) THREE STRINGS, and the fullest grand compass of SEVEN OCTAVES. It is strengthened by every possible means to endure the greatest amount of wear, and to stand perfectly in any climate. The workmanship is of the best description, the tone is round, full, and rich, and the power equal to that of a Piano Grand. The Case is of the most elegant construction, in Rosewood, (vide the sketch), the touch elastic, and the repetition very rapid. Every possible precaution has been taken to insure its standing well in tune. Mr. Chappell especially invites the attention of the public, the profession, and merchants to the FOREIGN MODEL, feeling assured that no pianoforte, in all respects comparable, has hitherto been made in England at the same price. Every instrument will be warranted, and (if desired) exchanged within twelve months of the purchase. 50, New Bond-street, London.

CERTIFICATE FROM DR. MARX.

"Having reserved to myself the right to publish the present materially altered edition of this my work in the English and French languages, I have transferred my right to the publication of the English edition, by special agreement, dated Jan. 28, 1852, to the Messrs. Robert Cocks and Co., of London.

(Signed) "ADOLF BERNHARD MARX (Dr)."

The Fifth and only Perfected Edition is published exclusively by ROBERT COCKS and Co., New Burlington Street, London. May be had on order (specifying the 5th edition) of any Music-seller or Bookseller.

 A prospectus, with full tables of contents, etc., forwarded gratis and postage free.

DR. MARX'S UNIVERSAL SCHOOL OF MUSIC, imperial 8vo, 367 pages, 15s.—Persons desirous of possessing the Last and only Complete Edition of this work must be particular in ordering the Fifth Edition, which can be published only by the Firm of ROBERT COCKS and Co.

ROBERT COCKS and Co.'s STANDARD OCTAVO EDITIONS of the ORATORIOS (with Books of Words), Edited by JOHN BISHOP—viz., Messiah, from Mozart's Score, with Appendix, etc., 6s. 6d., the Creation, 4s. 6d.

TESTIMONIALS.

From Sir George Smart.—"I consider the arrangement to be most excellent; it includes all that the vocalist can desire, and the instrumentation is adapted in a very masterly manner. The Appendix to 'Messiah' is a valuable addition."

From Mr. Braham, sen.—"The arrangement is the best I have seen. The orchestral points are most accurately taken up, and presented in so clear a light that the musical intellect can fully appreciate all the beauties of the sublime original."

From Herr Carl Czerny.—"An examination of these very elegant and convenient editions has afforded me extreme pleasure. The arrangement by Mr. Bishop is excellent, and evidences a thorough acquaintance with the original scores, and a perfect knowledge of all the practicable and genuine pianoforte effects which a good adaptation ought to embrace."

Also, uniformly with the above, Israel in Egypt, 4s. 6d.; Judas Maccabæus, 4s. 6d.; Samson (arranged by Dr. Clarke), 6s.; Alexander's Feast, 3s.; Zadok the Priest, 6d.; the Dettingen Te Deum, 2s. 6d. Also, Mozart's First Service (Mass in C), 2s. 6d.; Beethoven's First Service (Mass in C), 3s. 6d., etc., etc. Also, to Choral Societies—The Choruses of Messiah (John Bishop's arrangement), each chorus in a wrapper, 3d.

THE OLD HUNDREDTH, transcribed for the pianoforte, by W. VINCENT WALLACE, 4s.—This is a most effective piece in the hands of a pianist gifted with taste and judgment, the full harmonies of the modern chorale contrasting most effectively with the light symphonies which are characteristic of the ancient Jewish music. Also, by the same composer, "The Vesper Hymn," and Haydn's "Surprise," transcribed for the pianoforte, each 3s. "Il Sostenuto" Etude de Salon, 3s.; and "Fading Away," 4s.

MUSICAL CATECHISMS, by HAMILTON, viz.:—On Harmony and Thorough Bass, 2s.; Key to ditto, 1s. 6d.; Catechism on Melody and Composition, 2s.; Ditto on Double Fugue, 2s.; Ditto on the Art of Writing for an Orchestra, 2s.; Ditto on Musical Ideas, 3s.; Ditto on Singing, 3s.; Ditto for the Organ, 4s.; Ditto for Violin and Violoncello, each, 1s.; Art of Tuning Pianos, 1s. 6d.; Dictionary of 3,500 Musical Terms, price only 1s.; and his Musical Grammar, 3s.; also Clarke's Catechism of Music, 1s.; Warren's Hints to Organists, 3s.; James's Catechism for Flute and Guitar, each, 1s.; and Warren's ditto on Class Singing, 1s.; Key to ditto, 1s.; Warren's Rules for Chanting the Church Service, 8d.; Ditto Cathedral, 4d.

MUZIO. CLEMENTI.

This celebrated pianist and composer was born at Rome, in the year 1752. His father was a worker in silver of great merit, and principally engaged in the execution of embossed vases and figures employed in the Catholic worship. At a very early period of his youth, he evinced a strong disposition for music, and as this was an art which greatly delighted his father, he anxiously bestowed the best instructions in his power on his son. Buroni, who was his relation, and who afterwards obtained the honourable station of principal composer of St. Peter's, was his first master. At six years of age he began solfaing, and at seven he was placed under an organist of the name of Cordicelli for instruction in thorough bass; at the age of nine he passed his examination, and was admitted an organist in Rome. This examination consists in giving a figured bass from the works of Corelli, and making the scholar execute an accompaniment, after which he is obliged to transpose the same into various keys. This Clementi effected with such facility, that he received the highest applause from his examiners. He next went under the celebrated Santarelli, the great master of singing.

Between his eleventh and twelth years he studied under Carpini, the deepest contrapuntist of his day in Rome. A few months after he was placed under this master, he was induced by some of his friends, and without consulting his preceptor, to write a mass for four voices, for which he received so much commendation, that Carpini expressed a desire to hear it. It was accordingly repeated in church in the presence of his master, who, being little accustomed to bestow praise on any one, said to his pupil, after his dry manner, "Why did not you tell me you were about to write a mass? This is very well, to be sure; but if you had consulted me, it might have been much better." Under Carpini he was practised in writing fugues and canons in the canto fermo, and his master was frequently heard to say, that had Clementi remained under his instruction a year longer, he might have passed his examination in counterpoint. During these studies he never neglected his harpsichord, on which he had made so great a proficiency between thirteen and fourteen, that Mr. Peter Beckford, nephew of the alderman of that name, who was then on his travels in Italy, was extremely desirous of taking him over to England. The declining riches of the Romish church, at this period, not giving much encouragement to the trade of his father, he agreed to confide the rising talents of his son to the care of Mr. Beckford, and soon after this Clementi set off for England. The country seat of Mr. Beckford was in Dorsetshire, and here, by the aid of a good library and the conversation of the family, Clementi quickly obtained a competent knowledge of the English and several other languages.

With regard to his own art, his early studies were principally employed on the works of Corelli, Alessandro Scarlatti, Händel's harpsichord and organ music, and on the sonatas of Paradies. His efforts to acquire pre-eminence on the harpsichord were in the meantime as indefatigable as they were successful; and at the age of eighteen he had not only surpassed all his contemporaries in the powers of execution and expression, but had written his Op. 2, which gave a new era to that species of composition. Three years afterwards this celebrated work was submitted to the public. The simplicity, brilliancy, and originality which it displayed captivated the whole circle of professors and amateurs. It is superfluous to add, what all the great musicians of the age have uniformly allowed, that this admirable work is the basis on which the whole fabric of modern sonatas for the pianoforte has been erected. The celebrated John Christian Bach spoke of it in the highest terms; but, although one of the most able players of his time, he would not attempt its performance; and when Schroeter arrived in England, and was asked if he could play the works of Clementi, he replied, that "they could only be performed by the author himself, or the devil." Yet, such is the progress which executive ability has made, that what was once an obstacle to the most accomplished talent is now within the power of thousands. A well-known popular air with variations, his Ops. 3 and 4, and a duet for two performers on one instrument, were the next productions of his youthful pen.

Soon after he had quitted Dorsetshire to reside in London, he was engaged to preside at the harpsichord, in the orchestra of the Opera House, and had an opportunity, which he never neglected, of improving his taste by the performances of the first singers of that age. The advantage which he derived from this species of study was quickly shown by the rapid progress he made beyond his contemporaries, in the dignity of his style of execution, and in his powers of expression. This, also, he carried into his compositions; and Dussek, Steibelt, Wolefl, Beethoven, and other eminent performers on the continent, who had no opportunity of receiving personal instructions from Clementi, declared that they had formed themselves entirely on his works. His ability in extemporaneous playing had, perhaps, no parallel. The richness of harmonic combination, the brilliancy of fancy, the power of effect, and the noble style of execution which he displayed, made him stand alone in an age which produced such a host of executive talent. His reputation, without the protection of any patron, rose with such rapidity, that, in a very short time, he received the same remuneration for his instructions as J. C. Bach; and the fame of his works and of his executive talents having spread over the Continent, he determined in the year 1780, and at the instigation of the celebrated Pacchierotti, to visit Paris.

In that city he was received with enthusiasm, and had the honour to play before the Queen, who bestowed on him the most unqualified applause. The warmth of French praise, contrasted with the gentle and cool approbation given by the English, quite astonished the young musician, who used jocosely to remark, that "he could scarcely believe himself to be the same man." Whilst he remained in that capital, he composed his Ops. 5 and 6, and published a new edition of his Op. 1, with an additional fugue. Having enjoyed the unabated applause of the Parisians until the summer of 1781, he determined on paying a visit to Vienna. In his way there he stopped at Strasburg, where he was introduced to the then Prince de Deux Ponts, since King of Bavaria, who treated him with the greatest distinction; and also at Munich, where he was received with equal honour by the elector. At Vienna he became acquainted with Haydn, Mozart, and all the celebrated musicians resident in that capital. The Emperor Joseph II., who was a great lover of music, invited him to his palace; where, to the latter end of the year 1781, he had the honour of playing alternately with Mozart before the Emperor and the Grand Duke Paul of Russia and his duchess. At Vienna he composed three sonatas (Op. 7.), published by Artaria; three sonatas (Op. 8.), published at Lyons; and six sonatas (Ops. 9 and 10.), also published by Artaria.

On his return to England, he deemed it necessary to publish his celebrated Toccata, with a sonata (Op. 11)—a surreptitious copy, full of errors, having been printed without his knowledge in France. In the autumn of 1783, John Baptist Cramer, then about fourteen or fifteen years of age, became his pupil. He had previously received some lessons from Schroeter, and was studying counterpoint under Abel. Clementi, at this time, resided in Titchfield-street, and Cramer used to attend him almost every morning, until the following year, when Clementi returned to France. Previous to his undertaking this second journey, he was engaged at the nobility's concerts, and had published his Op. 12: upon one of the sonatas of which work both Dr. Crotch and Samuel Wesley afterwards gave public lectures in London. In the year 1784, he again went back to England, and soon afterwards published his Ops. 13, 14, and 15. From this period to the year 1802, he remained in England, pursuing his professional labours with increasing reputation; and wishing to secure himself sufficient time for the prosecution of his studies, he raised his terms for teaching to one guinea per hour. His fame, however, was so great, that this augmentation of price rather increased than diminished the candidates for his instruction. The great number of excellent pupils, of both sexes, whom he formed during this period, proved his superior skill in the art of tuition; the invariable success which attended his public performances, attested his pre-eminent talents as a player; and his compositions, from Op. 15 to Op. 40, are a lasting proof of his application and genius Before the publication of this last work, he had produced one, the advantages of which have been and are still felt and acknowledged by almost all professors; we mean his excellent and luminous "Introduction to the Art of Playing on the Pianoforte."

About the year 1800, having lost a large sum of money by the failure of the well-known firm of Longman and Broderip, 26, Cheapside, he was induced, by the persuasions of some eminent mercantile gentlemen, to embark in that concern. A new firm was accordingly formed, and from that period he declined taking any more pupils. The hours which he did not thenceforward employ in his professional studies he dedicated to the mechanical and philosophical improvement of pianofortes; and the originality and justness of his conceptions were crowned with complete success.

The extraordinary and admirable talents of John Field are still fresh in the memory of most lovers of classical music. These talents Clementi had cultivated with unceasing delight. With this favourite pupil, in the autumn of 1802, he paid his third visit to Paris, where he was received with unabated esteem and admiration. This pupil delighted every one who heard him; and what is still more worthy of remark, he played some of the great fugues of Sebastian Bach with such precision and inimitable taste as to call forth from a Parisian audience the most enthusiastic applause. From Paris he proceeded to Vienna, where he intended to place Field under the instruction of Albrechtsberger, to which his pupil seemed to assent with pleasure: but when the time arrived for Clementi to set off for Russia, poor Field, with tears trembling in his eyes, expressed so much regret at parting from his master, and so strong a desire to accompany him, that Clementi could not resist his inclinations; they therefore proceeded directly to St. Petersburg. In this city Clementi was received with the greatest distinction; he played extemporaneously in the society of the principal professors with his accustomed excellence, and to the admiration of his audience; and having introduced Field to his friends, soon afterwards left Russia, in company with a young professor of the name of Zeuner. Zeuner was the principal pianoforte player and teacher in Petersburg; and having received some instructions from Clementi during his residence there, he became so attached to his master, that he left all his scholars for the sake of accompanying him to Berlin. In the latter city Clementi played, both extemporaneously and from his works, before all the most eminent musicians, with his wonted vigour and effect; and, after remaining there two months, took Zeuner with him to Dresden, the place of his birth, where he left him well prepared to acquire the reputation which he afterwards obtained. In Dresden, an unassuming, but very able and excellent young musician, of the name of Klengel, introduced himself to the acquaintance of Clementi, and, after obtaining some instructions, became exceeding desirous of accompanying his master in his travels. Clementi was so much pleased with his character and talents, which have since become well known to the public, that he consented; and after a few weeks' residence at Dresden, he took him on to Vienna, where, during some months, his pupil worked very hard under his instruction.

It was at this time that he became acquainted with and cherished, by counsel and the frequent exhibition of his own powers on the pianoforte, the rising talents of Kalkbrenner, who has since raised himself to such distinguished eminence. During the summer following, Clementi took his pupil Klengel on a tour through Switzerland, and returned immediately afterwards to Berlin, where he married his first wife. In the autumn he took his bride through Italy, as far as Rome and Naples; and on his return to Berlin, having had the misfortune to lose her in childbed, he immediately left the scene of his sorrows, and once more visited Petersburg. In this journey he took with him another promising young pupil, of the name of Berger, who had previously received his instructions, and who is now the principal professor of the pianoforte at Berlin. At Petersburg he found Field in the full enjoyment of the highest reputation—in short, the musical idol of the Russian nation. Here he remained but a short time; and finding relief from the contemplation of his severe loss in the bustle of travelling, he again went back to Vienna.

The following summer, having heard of the death of his brother, he proceeded once more to Rome, to settle the affairs of his family. He then made short residences at Milan and various other places on the Continent, where he was detained, in spite of his inclinations, by the disastrous continuation of the war; and seizing a hazardous opportunity of conveyance, in the summer of 1810, he once more arrived in England, and the year following married. Although, during this period of nearly eight years, he published only a single sonata (Op. 41), his mind and his pen were still occupied in the composition of symphonies, and in preparing materials for his "Gradus ad Parnassum." His first publication, after his return, was the appendix to his "Introduction to the Art of Playing on the Pianoforte,"—a work which has been of infinite use both to the profession and to the public. He next adapted the twelve grand symphonies of Haydn for the piano-forte, and accompaniments for the flute, violin, and violoncello. This work was a great desideratum, since that which had already been published by Salomon was awkwardly and imperfectly done. Before he went abroad, he had adapted Haydn's "Creation" for the piano-forte and voices; and he now published the oratorio of the "Seasons," which he had done in the same manner. He afterwards adapted Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni," besides various selections from the vocal compositions of the same author. The Philharmonic Society having been now established, he gave two grand symphonies, which were received there, and at various other concerts, with enthusiastic applause. He produced several other symphonies at the Philharmonic Concerts, in March, 1824.

Clementi enjoyed the highest consideration in England. Having become rich, in the last years of his life he abandoned the direction of his mercantile house to his associate, M. Collard, and retiring to a pretty country seat, lived in repose, and seldom visited London. Once when he did come, Cramer, Moscheles, and others gave a banquet to the patriarch of the piano, at the close of which he improvised to the astonishment and delight of all present. This was his "swan song." He died on the 10th of March, 1832, at the age of eighty years.

GREENWICH.—Mr. G. Gathercole gave an evening concert on Monday, at the Lecture Hall. The vocalists were Mesdames Weiss and Poole, Messrs. George Tedder and Weiss:—instrumentalists—Mr. Phillips (cornet), Mr. Phaley (euphonian), Mr. Pollard (clarionet), Mr. Hawkes (trombone), and Mr. Farlie (petite clarionet). Herr Wilhelm Ganz and Mr. Godfrey were conductors.

ORGAN.

Our friend, the Magnus Apollo of the Athenæum, with his usual facility and power in attacking all musical subjects, has been lately falling foul of Organs and Organists. In commenting on the epistle of some unlucky writer who, with more zeal then discretion, has recommended organists to study orchestral music, and very thoughtlessly called the organ "an orchestra in itself," the Athenæum thus delivers judgment:—

"Every executant on every instrument (the human voice included) will do well to become 'acquainted with orchestral music and instruments'—to study that branch of musical knowledge as well as the science of harmony and the power of reading at sight.—But an organist who analyzes an orchestra and its varieties with the view of representing them on the organ wastes his time, loses his way, and does not know his duties and their limit. The organ can hardly be called an 'orchestra itself' (even of wind instruments), and the fancy of devoting it to arranged music has brought it into low estimation. How shall an orchestra, the basis of which is the brisk and pungent stringed quartett, be represented by its coarser and heavier tones, among which every staccato becomes a 'quack' and every rapid arpeggio a yawn or a scream—according as the stops are of wood or metal—and every chromatic scale a confusion analogous to the blot of mixed tints on a painter's pallette?—A writer who lays down the law as above is not one to whom the dignity of the organ and its professors can be safely entrusted."

About all this there is, doubtless, some truth; yet, so overlaid with misrepresentation, or, rather, non-comprehension of the facts, as to become really valueless. If an organist "analyzes an orchestra," &c., with the view of reproducing on his instrument precisely the effect of the score, for example, of one of Beethoven's symphonies, he certainly "loses his way," and deserves all the Athenæum may say of him. And it is, unfortunately, true that many organists, not thoroughly conversant either with the orchestra or their own instrument, do commit this very obvious blunder. If, however, it is intended absolutely to prohibit all adaptations for the organ—however artistically contrived—of modern orchestral and vocal music, we must emphatically dissent from the conclusion. In the first place, such an expurgatorial process must be applied analogously to every thing. All "arrangements," of every sort and kind, must be condemned. All "Pot-pourris" and "selections" for military bands, for instance, must be accounted unrighteous proceedings; for how can clarionets, cornet-à-pistons, alt-horns, and the like, represent, better than the organ, the string quality of an orchestra or the voices of the singers? Again, on this principle of rigid exactitude, M. Thalberg and all his fraternity must be summarily interdicted from all further fantasia-making for the pianoforte; for an instrument which has only one quality of tone, must obviously have less chance of imitating an orchestra than one which has many. And, strangest consequence of all, to carry out the integrity of his views, the critic of the Athenæum must straightway forbid a process to which time must have reconciled even him—namely, the playing of Händel's choruses on the organ; for, if it be a question of exact resemblance of effect, we cannot see the slightest difference of impropriety between the transfer to the organ-keys of "For unto us," and a like manipulation of the first movement of the Eroica symphony. The effect of the one will be not an atom more like the orchestra than that of the other. And, indeed, the more modern the music, and, therefore, the more individual the employment of the wind-band in its instrumentation, the less will the organ be at fault in the imitation of its score. That an organ is "an orchestra in itself," no one, who values the meaning of words, has ever maintained. But it can be most justly asserted that the organ affords to the performer a command of the extremes of light and shade, of force and delicacy, of variety of qualities both separately and in combination, which no other single instrument can approach. If it can do nothing towards the "brisk and pungent stringed quartet," it can boast an unrivalled grandeur in the mass of its tone, an almost unlimited command of gradation and variety of character, and a few individual qualities of sound so nearly resembling their orchestral prototypes, as to be sufficient for the exactest purposes of imitation. In fine, without possessing the power of precisely copying, the organ can render more closely a general resemblance, or, rather, perhaps, can suggest more forcibly an idea of the effect, of an orchestral score, than any other instrument; and whoever seeks more from it than this, either "loses his way" in the pursuit, or was a bad judge of his means from the beginning.

On the assertion that the "fancy of devoting it to arranged music has brought it into low estimation," we are again completely at issue with the Athenæum. There are, doubtless, abundance of instances in which vile taste has been manifested in the selection of music for organ-arrangements and in the arrangements themselves; but the habit of cultivating this species of performance in general has, we must maintain, been of the utmost service both to organs and organists. To the players it has opened an entirely new vista of ideas; without in the least deteriorating their love for, or capability of executing, the music of Bach, it has increased their mechanical accomplishment both in finger-skill and the management of their instrument, and has refined and spiritualised their style; while to its urgent demands for improvement, the organ itself is almost wholly indebted for the immense ameliorations in tone and mechanism it has in late years displayed. The English organists are now, undoubtedly, the first in the world, and no long period will elapse, we hope, ere their organs will attain the same supremacy. Whenever this happens, the result will be very mainly due to this "fancy" for "arranged music," in which the Athenæum finds so much to censure.

In his concluding sentences, the critic from whom we quote, gets wrong in his technics, as most people do who discuss matters with which they are not familiar. The information that "every staccato becomes a quack," and "every chromatic scale a confusion analagous to the blot of mixed tints on a painter's palette," can only have originated in the writer's exclusive acquaintance with bad instruments and worse players: while the special effects "yawn" and "scream," attributed respectively to wood and metal stops, evince total ignorance of the qualities of either. All this may be very sharp writing, but it is, nevertheless, very flat nonsense.

In another part of the same paper we find another organ reference, not, to our notion, at all more fortunate than that just noticed. Of the band of the Guides we read that, "the tone is crisp and ready,—brilliant, though (like the tone of French organs) not possessing that rich body and mellowness which the Germans and the English love." Now, what may be here meant by the word "body," is, of course, not for us to say; but if it be intended in the usual English sense, we may, perhaps, effect a practicable breach in the comparison thus insinuated between the French, and English and German organs, by quoting the amount of "foundation stops" in the most celebrated of the former instruments. Thus, the Great Organ of St. Denis contains an open diapason* of 32 feet, one of 16 feet, and four of 8 feet; two stopped diapasons of 16 feet, and two of 8 feet,—the whole number of stops in the clavier being thirty two. The Great Organ of the Madeleine contains two open diapasons of 16 feet, five open diapasons of 8 feet, one stopped diapason of 16 feet, and two of 8 feet; the number of stops in this Great Organ being twenty two. The number and proportion of registers in Cavaillé's new organ at St. Vincent de Paul, also in Paris, are nearly the same as at the Madeleine. Will the Athenæum be kind enough to point out any English or German organ in which the proportion of "foundation stops"—(we purposely omit all mention of reeds)—holds out anything like the promise of "body" of tone displayed in the French examples we have given? Or has it not occurred to our critic that the brilliance he seeks to contrast with "body and mellowness" is more likely to be found on the side of the English and Germans, whose large employment and admirable voicing of mixture work altogether eclipses, by this same "brilliant" quality, the comparatively small use and feeble voicing of the Pleins jeux and Cornets of their French rivals?

* We use the word "open diapason" for want of a better, and to avoid confusion by translation of the French terms. We intend it to apply to all flue stops, whatever be their pitch; and, in the French organs, they are almost invariably of metal, and include every variety of character,—the open diapason, bourdon, salcional, gamba, and harmonic flute.

DRAMATIC.

THREE dramatic novelties have been produced lately, at different theatres, all derived from the Crimean War. At the Surrey, we have had—and have still—Brothers in Arms; at the Strand, The Battle of Alma; and, at the Haymarket, The Sentinel of the Alma. These pièces de circonstance need no further mention than that they have—thanks to the spirit of the times—proved successful. The Haymarket production is from the pen of Mr. Samuel Lover, and is entirely unworthy of his reputation. A more senseless attempt at a dramatic entertainment, or one written in worse taste, we never witnessed. Had Mr. Lover perpetrated a burlesque, he could not more violently have outraged facts, or more ridiculously have coloured known things and persons. It is no compliment—to say nothing of the invention—to the British army, to prove vanquishers over men who have not one quality for soldiers, and whose officers are all cowards and cut-throats. The allusion in the piece to Prince Menzikoff's cowardice was received with a volley of hisses. But the Sentinel of the Alma is worthless in every way. Mr. Lover's humour must have run dry indeed, when he is forced to borrow for his hero one of Joe Miller's oldest jokes. There are, moreover, three ballads introduced, not one of which has a tune. The piece was supported by Messrs. Hudson, Compton, Rogers, Misses Ellen Chaplin and Woulds.— The Battle of the Alma, at Astley's, is a piece well suited to that theatre. It is got up with great splendour and magnificence, and has proved highly attractive.—The new tragedy produced at the Marylebone, called Love and Loyalty, is from the pen of Mr. J. W. Robson, son of a gentleman well known in the literary world. Mr. Robson is a young man, and, we believe, Love and Loyalty is his first attempt in dramatic writing. It is a highly creditable work, and displays undoubted poetical talents. As yet, however, Mr. Robson is but a young dramatist, and must not be criticised too closely in the most difficult field of literature. As yet he shows too much timidity, and his plot and characters bear too strong a resemblance to familiar stories and features to permit us to call him an original writer. Mr. Robson has caught with some felicity the manner of the Elizabethan writers, although he appears to have studied them through the pages of Sheridan Knowles. We shall be glad to see another work from the pen of Mr. Robson, whose first contribution to the drama is really so full of promise. Mr. and Mrs. William Wallack supported the whole weight of the piece, and carried it through with great success.—Two new farces have appeared at the Adelphi—the first entitled The Slow Man; the second, The Railway Belle. The first is a singularly slow affair, and fell flat even with Mr. Keeley's assistance to keep it alive. It is written by Mr. Mark Lemon, to whose talents it does no credit. The Railway Belle is a brisk piece, but wanted better actors than Mr. Charles Selby and Mr. Rogers to do it justice. It was, nevertheless, entirely successful, and will, no doubt, have a merry run.—At the Olympic, the old and favourite piece of the Beulah Spa has been successfully revived, and has a strong cast. Mr. Robson plays the small part of Magnus with wonderful comicality; but the part is not strong enough for him. Miss Julia St. George sings two songs with much effect; the well-known ballad, "By the margin of fair Zurich's waters," being nightly encored. This young lady has capital material, and would sing well if she were well taught. She requires much teaching.—A new drama, entitled The Transformed, was produced at the Surrey, on Monday. It is written by Mr. Courtney, and is a melodramatic piece of the supernatural and blue-fire order, and was successful. Mr. Creswick played the principal character, and Messrs. Widdicomb and Yarnold "did" the comic business. Miss E. Saunders was encored in a song.—A very well written and well-contrived little comedy, called The Balance of Comfort, was produced at the Haymarket, for the first time, on Thursday, with decided success. Mr. Bayle Bernard, a good and practised hand, is the author. The notion of a husband and wife parting by mutual agreement, and, after a time, reuniting their fortunes, is no novelty in the drama. The idea, however, is treated in an entirely new manner, and many of the details are Mr. Bayle Bernard's own. The principal parts are sustained by Misses Reynolds, Ellen Chaplin, Messrs. Howe, Rogers, Clarke, etc. The new "Alma" piece has been withdrawn. It would have disgraced the management, to have retained it in the bills.

PROVINCIAL.

MANCHESTER.—German and Italian Operas.—(From our own, Correspondent.)—Wednesday the 15th, Die Zauberflöte was performed for the second time. Taken in its entirety, it was a worthy performance—Herr Reichardt, as Tamino, sang more sweetly than ever; Mad. Rudersdorff, as Pamina, exerted herself to the utmost; and Herr Formes, as Sarastro, was excellent as usual. Madame Heinrich quite surprised me by the way she got through the terribly difficult music of "The Queen of Night. Her acting, however, was not so good as her singing. Signor Gregorio came out strong as Papageno. He played his bells, he danced, he whistled, and, better still, he both acted and sang the part with real effect. I could not have supposed that there was so much fun and activity in him. He is, nevertheless, always useful and to be depended upon—no small praise. Mdlle. Sedlatzek made much of her small part of Papagena. Herr Zapf was very fierce as Monostaton. The subordinate parts of the hierophant, priests, three lady attendants, &c., were all fairly filled; the three boys or genii, being perhaps the least effective—one of them not singing at all. Herr Reichardt delivered all the music of Tamino with great delicacy, feeling, and finish, his picture song in the first act, "Dies Bildniss," being very fine. The well known quintetto, "Hm! Hm!" went effectively. The still better known duet "Bei Männern," so familiar in the English version as "The Manly Heart," was encored. The three grand solemn pieces for Sarastro and his attendant priests were given splendidly. Herr Formes was recalled after the famous "In deisen heil'gen Hallen"—but judiciously bowed, without repeating it. The chorus, "O Isis" was extremely grand. There was but an indifferent house, I am sorry to say. Mozart seems to possess but little charms for the people of Manchester. I noticed Herr Ernst and Signor Piatti in the front of the dress circle. Their presence seemed to create quite a sensation amongst the gentlemen of the orchestra.

Mr. Charles Hallé opened his winter campaign on Thursday, the 16th inst. Ernst and Piatti are his great guns, strengthened by Herr Baetens and young Carrodus, who is quite a favourite here. With these four, Mr. Hallé was enabled to give a quintet with pianoforte; the one chosen being the E flat, Op. 44, by Dr. Schumann, of Düsseldorf, about whose compositions there has of late been no little controversy. As a matter of novelty for the subscribers, Mr. Charles Hallé was warranted in choosing such an example of modern composition. Of course the quintet had the best chance possible of being heard to advantage. Herr Ernst has now few equals; Mr. Carrodus made a capital second; Herr Baetens is an admirable tenor, and where could a better exponent be found than Piatti for the violoncello—to say nothing particular about Mr. Hallé for the pianoforte? There is nothing to astonish any one in the quintet—but something to please. Beethoven's sonata in G, Op. 96, for pianoforte and violin, is one not often heard. It was no ordinary treat to hear it by such players as Herr Ernst and Mr. Charles Hallé. The applause at the conclusion was hearty and general.

The trio of Beethoven, which opened the second part, is one well known to the frequenters of Mr. Hallé's concerts. It was the C minor, Op. 1, No. 3. I will venture to say it was never heard in Manchester so finely played as on this occasion by Herr Ernst, Mr. Hallé, and Signor Piatti.

Another old favourite of the subscribers was Mendelssohn's "Tema con variazioni," in D, for pianoforte and violoncello. The expressive manner in which Signor Piatti gave out the subject alone was a great treat, the variation which followed giving ample scope both to him and Mr. Hallé for a display of their powers on their respective instruments. The "Tema" was applauded most vigorously. A pleasing selection of short pieces for violin and pianoforte—the joint productions of Ernst and Heller—closed this concert.

The large room at the Town Hall was quite full, containing many familiar faces of former seasons, and the audience was, as usual, appreciative and enthusiastic—a most successful opening concert of the Classical Music Society, and one which must have been highly gratifying to Mr. Charles Hallé himself, as well as to his committee of management.

Since my last, the operas have been chiefly repetitions of those I have before seen and reported in the Musical World—as Der Freischütz—the night of Mr. Charles Hallé's concert, which helped to thin the house. It was, I understand, the best performance this season. Friday, Il Barbiere, as before. Saturday last, as we expected, no Robert le Diable; in lieu of which Acis and Galatea in English—with the last act of La Favorita was first announced—but Lucrezia Borgia was substituted—and that not satisfactorily—since Madame Caradori was hoarse, and Signor Fortini played Alfonso in place of Herr Formes. On Monday, the Huguenots was repeated by desire. Tuesday, I Puritani was announced but was changed for Fidelio. Wednesday, Robert was again put forth, but was changed to Lucia di Lammermoor. Thursday, Robert le Diable was promised for the third time, for Madame Rudersdorff's benefit—and if done will be reported in my next.

Ibid.—We copy the following from the Manchester Courier:—"On Tuesday evening, a concert in aid of the Royal Patriotic Fund was given in the Concert Hall, by the bands of the two regiments at present stationed here, assisted by the members of the Madrigal Society, with Miss Armstrong, Mr. Perring, and Mr. Guilmette, as solo vocalists. The room was not half filled! When the object for which the concert was given is considered, we are at a loss to account for so strange a want of sympathy. Let the cause be what it may, the disappointment to all concerned in the charitable undertaking must have been great, and, as a matter of course, the concert went off flatly. The bands, conducted by their respective chiefs, Herr Brosang and Mr. Wilson, gave the music allotted to them with great care and effect. Weber's Jubilee overture, introducing at its close the music of the National Anthem, formed a very appropriate opening to the concert.".

On Saturday last, Miss Amelia Bellott made her second appearance at the Saturday Evening Concerts, and gave much satisfaction.

Leeds.—The fourth of the People's Concerts took place at the Music Hall, on Saturday evening last. The performers were Miss Witham, Mr. Delavanti, Mr. Jahns, and Mr. Bowling at the pianoforte. The band, which gained the prize a few weeks ago at Manchester, obtained several encores in the course of the evening.

Stalybridge.—A concert, by blind performers, was given in the large room of the Town Hall on Monday evening last, from the works of Händel, Haydn, Mozart, Bishop, Barrowclough, etc. The performers were Thomas Skinner, Mr. and Mrs. Rose, Mr. Ellicott, Mr. Newton, and Mr. Sherwood, who, with the conductor and getter-up of the concert, all received their musical instruction at the School for the Blind at Liverpool, under the tuition of Mr. Platt, and are now holding situations as organists, singers, etc., in Liverpool and the neighbourhood. The concert attracted considerable attention from its singularity, and gave great satisfaction from the merit of the performers.

Stockport.—A concert in aid of the Patriotic Fund was given in the Temperance Hall, on Monday evening last. There was a large attendance, including members of many of the principal families of the borough. The principal vocalists were Miss Shaw, Mrs. Thomas, and Mr. Delavanti, of Manchester, assisted by members of the Stockport Choral Society. We have not heard the amount realised, but we imagine it will not fall short of £20. We understand that the present is but one of a series of concerts to be given during the winter.

Dover.—On Thursday evening, the Catch Club commenced its seventieth season. The vocalists engaged for the season were Mrs. Temple, Mr. Russell Grover, and Mr. W. Pigot. The list of subscribers at the present time is very large. The orchestra, led by Mr. G. Binfield, although not very numerous, is efficient.

Tunbridge Wells.—On Monday and Tuesday evenings, the Tyrolese Minstrels, Herr Haimberger, Madame Kramer, and Madlle. Kramer, gave an entertainment.

Liverpool.—At the Theatre Royal, the tragedy of Antigone, with Mendelssohn's music, has been played several times this week, Mr. Vandenhoff and his daughter sustaining the characters of Creon and Antigone.—At the Royal Amphitheatre, Mr. G. V. Brooke's engagement terminated last Saturday, when he played Macbeth.—During the present week, the Spanish dancers from the Haymarket Theatre have commenced an engagement, which is to last for twelve nights.

Malton.—On Wednesday a concert was given in the public rooms. The principal vocalist was Miss Senior, and the great attraction of the evening Mr. Willy, the violinist. The concert was conducted by Mr. Hunt, and the entertainment gave great satisfaction.

York.—The York Choral Society, on the evening of Tuesday last, ushered in another season of its successful career by giving a very excellent concert, the first of the series for 1854-55, in the Festival Concert Room. There was a numerous auditory. The programme was well chosen, and comprised the works of some of the most eminent composers. A selection from Händel's Samson formed the first part, and some of the peculiar beauties of this great oratorio were given in a manner highly creditable to all. The concert was conducted by Mr. Hopkinson.

FOREIGN.

Italy.—At Milan, Bellini's Il Pirata has been played with considerable success at the Canobbiana. Sig. Carrion seems to have got through his part much better than was expected, considering that the music is much too high for his voice. It must be remembered, that Il Pirata was written for Rubini, and that the music called into play all the peculiarities and eccentricities of his extraordinary voice. No tenor since has undertaken the part with any chance of success, except Mario. Sig. Carrion sang the part as it was written, and in so doing has acted unwisely, as he is not furnished with those high head notes of Rubini, which were equal in power and beauty to the finest chest voice. Besides which, Rubini's medium voice was higher than Signor Carrion's, so that the latter appeared to considerable disadvantage. To have achieved a success under such circumstances, before an audience who remember Rubini, is no small triumph for Sig. Carrion. Madame Viola was not equal to the part of Elvira. She is described as cold, and wanting in execution; Sig. Della-Santa is not a Tamburini. His Riccardo was, however, tolerable.—At Verona, all the operas produced, since the opening of the theatre, have been successively hissed; Nabuco, Don Pasquale, and La Sonnambula, have all shared the same fate.—At Florence, the new opera, Gastone di Chanley, the music by Sig. Vincenzo Capacelatro, was produced at the Pergola, on the 2nd inst., with success. There is much clearness in the vocal writing, and regularity in the form of the pieces; at the same time there is an abuse of reminiscences, and an unfair call on the higher notes of the voice. Sig. Battista's new opera, Ermelinda, has created a furore at the theatre Pagliano. Nothing is now heard but the motivi of Ermelinda about the highways and bye-ways of Florence, and at all the cafés. Mad. Alaimo is described as having a splendid voice and an excellent method. The tenor Asmodio is also spoken of most favourably, as well as Sig. Catani, who is a good buffo singer.

Bologna.—Il Cavalier Nero, a new opera by Signor Badia, has met, at theTeatro Comunale, with the most decided success.

Vienna.—(From our own Correspondent.)—In consequence of the approaching secession, on the 1st December next, of Mdlle. La Grua, the management have determined to make her appear in most of her principal characters before leaving. She has already played Alice, in Robert le Diable, and Leonora, in Fidelio. She was also announced to appear as Amina, in La Sonnambula, but was prevented by sudden indisposition. Fra Diavalo was substituted; but this, too, had to be changed, on account of the unexpected illness of Herr Ander. The third opera "put up" was Der Freischütz, which, as every one required in it was fortunately well, maintained its place in the bills. There is every probability that Madlle. La Grua will be re-engaged next April, the difference between her and the management being, according to report, satisfactorily arranged. Mdlle. Taglioni has made a hit in the ballet of Satanella.—Mdlle. Schmidt, prima donna of the theatre at Gratz, will shortly appear at the Imperial Opera-House.—A new ballet, entitled Die Seeräuber, by Herr Taglioni, is announced for to-morrow, the 19th inst., in honour of the birthday of her Majesty the Empress.—The Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde of the Austrian Empire will give two concerts, on the 3rd and 10th December respectively. A grand concert will also be given, on the 8th December, in the Imperial Theatre an der Wien, by the Academie der Tonkunst. The first Philharmonic Concert, under the direction of Herr Eckert, will take place on the 17th December.

BERLIN—(From our own Correspondent.)—A young danseuse, Mdlle. Agnes Köbish, appeared, last week, for the first time at the Royal Opera-house, as Fenella in Auber's Masaniello. She bids fair to prove an acquisition to the establishment, where she had formerly danced in the ballet. Euryanthe was given on Sunday, with Mdlle. Johanna Wagner, Mad. Köster, Herren Theodore Formes, Krause and Bost, in the principal characters. The entire performance was highly satisfactory.—On the 9th instant, Stern's Gesangverein gave its annual performance, in memory of the immortal Mendelssohn, in the Theerbusch-Saal, the programme being composed of Mozart's Requiem, the 114th Psalm for eight voices, and the recitative and choruses from Mendelssohn's unfinished oratorio of Christus. Mendelssohn's bust, crowned with a laurel-wreath, was placed in the middle of the room.—The third Sinfonie-Soirée took place, last week, in the Schauspielhaus-Saal. The performance was a remarkable one for the composition with which it concluded; I allude to Mozart's Symphony in C major. Previous to this we had Beethoven's lesser Symphony in C major, Spontini's overture to Ferdinand Cortez, and the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Sommernachtstraum. The latter composition was unanimously encored—On the same evening, Herr Bazzini gave his farewell concert in Kroll's Rooms. He played his own compositions exclusively. He was assisted by the two Dopplers, the flautists. The rooms were numerously and fashionably attended.—Last Wednesday, Herr Josef Gung'l, who has returned from St. Petersburgh, began his series of concerts in the Gesellschaftshaus, on which occasion he introduced two new specimens of the particular class of music to which he owes his reputation: the Cajetana Walzer, and Ein Tropfen aus der Walzerwelt, both of which were much applauded.—On the same evening, Herr Kéler Béla produced what he calls an Idyllische Tongemälde (an Idylic Tone-painting), entitled Die Karpathen. It is not without merit, though rather full of reminiscences.—The Abonnements-Concert of Herren von den Osten, Grünwald, and Radecke, took place in the EnglischesHaus. The programme was satisfactory, including Beethoven's charming sonata, in G major, for pianoforte and violin (Op. 96), the same composer's "An die ferne Geliebte," so seldom performed, Franz Schubert's Jäger's Abendlied, Beethoven's well-known romance in G major, and, lastly, Herr Robert Schumann's quartet in E flat, for pianoforte and stringed instruments. The concert was listened to with the profoundest attention by a most intelligent audience, who, at the conclusion, expressed their satisfaction by loud and continued applause.

STUTTGART.—(From the Swäbische Kronik).—Nov. 13.—Concerts have been given in the Oberer Museum by Mdlle. Cäcilie Leich, from the Hague, Miss Arabella Goddard, from London, and two young pianists, Marie Hirt and Pauline Eichberg, of this city. Besides appearing at her own concert, Miss Arabella Goddard played at the first Subscription Concert, where she was received with tumultuous applause. She performed Mendelssohn's Sonata in G minor with a certainty, finish, brilliancy, and melting tenderness that stamped her as an artist of the first rank. Although we do not entirely agree with her reading of this enchanting work, for she took some liberties with the tempo, treating the concluding part, which is only a molto vivace allegro, as a most brilliant prestissimo, we cannot but admire the calm manner in which she overcomes the greatest technical difficulties, the extraordinary purity, smoothness, and warmth of her touch, and the total absence of anything like slurring over the notes with her desperate tempo; and we most sincerely rejoice that she will afford us another opportunity of hearing her inimitable playing. The two other fair concert-givers, who are yet very young, should adopt so beautiful a model, for there cannot be the slightest doubt that it is only by the most rigid system of instruction and a perfectly consistent method that Miss Arabella Goddard has attained such fulness and softness of tone.

BRESLAU.—Herr R. Wagner's Lohengrin has been produced with success.

KÖNIGSBERG.—Herr Marpurg, the director of the orchestra at the theatre, revived Herr Wagner's Tannhäuser for his benefit.

MAGDEBURG.—Johann von Paris has been given, with Mdlle. Bölken as the Princess. The Page and Don Johann von Paris were played by Mdlle. Schramm and Herr Bölken respectively.

COLOGNE.—M. Roger is still singing at the theatre with undiminished attraction.

HANOVER.—The revival of Das Nachtlager zu Granada, which opera has not been performed here for several years, was completely successful. M. Roger is expected very shortly. He will appear in three parts: Georges Brown, Jean de Leyde, and Edgardo. The first novelty next year will be Herr R. Wagner's Tannhäuser.—The Subscription Concerts begin on the 10th December. So popular are they that, when the list was opened, 1550 tickets were taken in the first ten minutes.

BRUNSWICK.—Mr. Henry Litolff has just composed a new symphony for piano and full orchestra. It was played, for the first time, on the 13th of of last month, by the Hautboisten-corps, under the direction of Herr Zabel, and was very well received.

MUNICH.—Otto Nicolai's Lustige Weiber von Windsor has been successfully produced. The principal parts were sustained by Mad. Diez, Mdlle. Schwarzbach, Herren Sigl, Kindermann, and Young, who were all recalled, both during the performance and at its conclusion.

AMSTERDAM.—Lucia di Lammermoor has been produced, with Mad. von Marra in the principal female part. The next operas will be Norma, Die Zauberflöte, Les Huguenots, and Robert le Diable. Herr Dalle Aste has appeared with success, at the German opera-house, as Caspar, in Der Freischütz, and Osmin, in Die Entführung.

COPENHAGEN.—L'Etoile du Nord, with the libretto translated into Danish, has been performed with great success.

GRATZ.—The management of the opera-house displays considerable activity, having produced a considerable number of operas this season. Among them are La Sonnambula, Masaniello, Le Prophète, Les Huguenots, and a host of others.

ST. PETERSBURGH.—The management of the Imperial Opera-house have announced that this season there will not be three performances a week.

MALTA.—Donizetti's Pia de Tolomei has been repeated with but indifferent success. Signore Morra and Marini-Testa, Signori Gamboni and Storti have both succeeded in establishing themselves as favourites.

GENOA.—At the Carlo Felice, Le Prigioni d' Edinburgo of F. Ricci, has had a successful reception, executed by the Signore Borsi-Deleurie and Bottaro, and Signori Stecchi-Bottardi and Frizzi.

AMERICA.—NEW YORK.—Since our last, the elections have suddenly thrown a blight over everything unconnected therewith, so that the Academy of Music has been in abeyance for awhile. The only novelty has been the production of Semiramide, with, of course, Madame Grisi as the Queen of Babylon; Arsace being played by Mad. Donovanni, Assur by Sig. Bernardi, and Oroë by Sig. Susini. With the exception of Mad. Grisi, who produced a very powerful sensation, all the other parts were indifferently filled. We are not at all astonished at this result, when we reflect that Semiramide has not been played in London, because the company was not considered equal to the undertaking, since the secession of Mad. Alboni. Il Barbiere is promised as soon as Sig. Mario has recovered his voice, and there is also a talk of Le Prophète and Les Huguenots. During the last week, the Opera has been entirely suspended, to the serious loss of Mr. Hackett; and it is even hinted that it is in contemplation to bring the present unfortunate state of things to an abrupt close by mutual agreement between the manager and the singers. The Misses Pyne, and Messrs. Harrison and Borrani, have left New York for Philadelphia, where they have an engagement. Their places will be supplied by Mdlle. Nau, Messrs. St. Albyn, G. Harrison, Irving, and Horncastle. Mr. Thomas Baker will be the conductor. The first opera will be Auber's La Sirène.

BOSTON.—On the 5th inst., there was a large gathering at the Music Hall, for the opening concert of the Mendelssohn Choral Society. The programme included an entire oratorio and selections from different composers. The first consisted of Rossini's Stabat Mater, with the recitative and air "Behold, I tell you a mystery" and "I know that my Redeemer liveth," from the Messiah. The second part was devoted to the Widow of Nain, by Lindpaintner. The solos were sustained by Mrs. Wentworth, Miss Bothamly and Miss Twitchell; Messrs. Wetherbee, Adams, Arthurson and Mozart. It is curious to observe that not a single piece of Mendelssohn's was given by this Society, which bears his name. There is a great flourish here about the promised doings of the different musical societies. The Händel and Haydn promise eight concerts and almost as many oratorios, among which are Elijah, Moses in Egypt, the Creation, and the Messiah, with selections from Israel in Egypt and Mount Sinai. The Musical Education Society announces six public rehearsals, meaning concerts no doubt, of which the first has already been given, not with that success which was anticipated, the choruses being anything but perfect. Then there is the Orchestral Union, the Musical Fund Society, the Quintet Club, the Germania, and several others too numerous to mention.

REVIEWS.

"LIDI AMATI." Romanza composed by Adolfo Schimon. J. A. Novello.

A capital song in its way, and this by no means a bad way. It is fashioned on the model of many of the smaller kinds of good concert songs—a recitative followed by a single movement—in this case, an andante. Both recitative and Romanza have many good points to recommend them. In both will be found traits of strong musical feeling, just expression of sentiment, melodic facility, and a fair share of skill in its treatment. Moreover, M. Schimon does not, in the manner of some ambitious vocal composers, neglect the consideration of what is fit for the voice, what singers like to do, and what they can do with ease and effect. The theme of the Romanza is strikingly elegant; and the whole movement, in the style of its phraseology, the harmonic tendency of its development, and its general warmth of colouring, highly suggestive of—not to say, apparently imitated from—Rossini, in his Guillaume Tell humour. Sundry little awkwardnesses, however, which would not have happened to the gran maestro, rather spoil the comparison; and these, as we really like M. Schimon's song, we shall take the trouble to point out. For example, in the recitative, the full close on the tonic harmony at the words "dei padri miei," is about the weakest thing that could here have occurred. The composer seems to feel this, for he tries to make a pretty strong diversion in the succeeding bars; but all—even the very effective passage with which the recitative concludes—will not do; we have had the tonic harmony given us in the baldest and flattest manner imaginable, and everything after that seems like going out of the way for the mere purpose of returning. There is a weak place, again, in the Romanza, at the foot of the fifth page. After passing enharmonically from the key of C flat to that of C natural, the method adopted to secure an arrival at the half-close on the dominant (F) within the space of three bars, has an effect of much abruptness. Of course, in ordinary cases, the mere march, either way, between two keys so nearly related as C and F, need be the least offensive thing in the world; it is the previous extent of the modulatory circuit which, in this instance, gives the point that semblance of a "short cut" to which we object. The coda, also, of this andante, though effective and quite in the style of the remainder, certainly wants extension to satisfactorily match that effect of breadth and size which this movement, short though it be, is made to assume.

All being said, however, M. Schimon's "Lidi amati" is undoubtedly a charming song; and Madame Clara Novello shows much taste in selecting it for frequent performance.

"AH! SE GIUNGO:" Recitative and Cavatina. Composed by Cagnione. J. A. Novello.

This is another song which Madame Novello sings frequently, though we hope much against her own inward estimate of its value. We could, perhaps, best and most briefly describe it by reversing the opening sentence of our notice of M. Schimon's song,—namely, that it is a very bad song in its way, and this by no means a capital way. It is the old story over again. Stamped from a die, cast in a mould, cut to pattern stereotyped—anything you will, it is, form and spirit, body and soul, the very counterpart of any of the display-songs of the heroines of any of the hundred and fifty sixth-rate Italian operas that may first come to hand in an impresario's lumber-room. It has, of course, a short recitative, a lackadaisical larghetto in 12-8 time, and a brilliant allegro, very martial and bombastic in character, trumpery in idea, full of passages, and empty of sentiment. It is not worth disputing that a song of this kind, delivered with all the force and dexterity of a highly-trained vocalist, may, and must, have an effect with that large class of auditors who think only with their ears; but the difficulty is to reconcile one's mind to the ease with which a man can dub himself a "composer" on the strength of such a thing as this. To say that it exhibits no striving after novelty is a very mild way of putting the case. There is about it a swaggering self-sufficiency, while parading other men's cast-off garments, and, withal, an air of contentment and satisfaction under the circumstances, that can be called nothing else than contemptible.

Who is Cagnione? Further than that, like Beethoven, he is too great a man to need the particular identification of a Christian name, we know not. Perhaps he is another pupil of that "great Tritto," to whose discipline—according to some chroniclers—the musical world is already indebted for some of its choicest luminaries.

"PSALMS AND CHANTS." Compiled and arranged by William Shelmerdine. J. A. Novello.

There are few articles of musical utility that are more wanted, or would pay better for the providing, than a good book of Psalm tunes. The assertion of such a want may appear strange in face of the existing heaps of Psalm-tune collections—each professing to compensate the shortcomings of its precursors; yet, we ask any of our musical readers—not being parochial organists grown grey in evil habits and the bondage of churchwardendom—whether what they hear sung, Sunday by Sunday, in our churches, does not amply justify us? We speak not of "Quires and places where they sing," properly so called, nor of those hybrid establishments to which the rubrical distinction we have quoted is now extended by a stretch very widely beyond the intent of those who compiled the prayer-book. We speak of the plain, old-fashioned churches, parish or otherwise, where the PEOPLE do, or ought to, sing of praise and supplication with one voice and one accord, and for whose use nothing has been, or will be, found so suitable as metrical Psalmody. So meaning, we ask our musical readers, on the ears of their conscience, whether this part of the church-service, which, under able guidance, is capable of the most devotional, even sublime, effect, is not too generally made ridiculous and painful to endure by the presence of almost every possible sort of error? That there is no unity of practice on the subject in our churches, seems to be of very small consequence; for wherever good taste presides, latitude in selection may be advantageously conceded. Our charge against the usual Church-Psalmody goes far deeper than this. It is that neither in the choice of music, nor the manner of its performance, does taste or knowledge of any kind appear to be at all enlisted. Everything seems to depend on accident, or the fashion of a particular locality. Thus, at opposite extremes, we find in use the most frightful vulgarities of the conventicle, and some transformations of those dear old "Hymns of the Church," which people will never learn to sing, and will be even longer in learning to like. Another much-petted barbarism is the hewing and hacking into psalm-shape of known airs from operas and oratorios, themes of slow instrumental movements, and the like, whereby the music is inhumanly dismembered, and the people who sing it are reminded of anything but their then present business. Again, should the selection, by chance, adhere pretty closely to the psalm tunes and chorals of the English and Lutheran churches, how frequently do we hear a melody so bespattered with appogiaturas, passing notes, and aggravations of all sorts, that that which was simple and grand in its origin, becomes mawkish and vulgar in its reproduction! And lastly, as if psalm-books had not done evil enough in all conscience, it is sadly too common to find organists, who have just fallen in love with Spohr, and think all musical excellence to lie somewhere on the summit of a pile of chromatic dischords, tricking out the best church melodies in such a garb of dandified harmony, as makes one fairly shudder with disgust.

The causes of this host of abominations in our church-service are many and tolerably notorious. The organist newly appointed, finds a psalm-book installed before him, and must use it; or, perhaps he has compiled one himself, and will use it. Perhaps some influential members of the congregation have special fancies of their own;—they like what, by an odd confusion of dates, they call the "good old tunes," and think "Rousseau's Dream," and "Weber's last Waltz," charmingly adapted to devotional uses. Or, perhaps, the clergyman, in addition to his cure of souls and other onerous duties, labours under the notion that he understands music, and so straightway sets everybody by the ears in the attempt to "Gregorianize" his service. There are, doubtless, other causes than these at work; but the effect of all combined is so generally to produce what we have indicated above, that only in those very few churches where the organists possess, at once, great ability, and strength of character to carry out their convictions in spite of opposition, will the musical listener hear Psalmody that is satisfactory, or, indeed, inoffensive.

It is at all times more easy to point out an evil, than to suggest a means of cure. The remedy in the present case would, at first sight, appear to be the issue, by some central authority, of a Psalm-book for exclusive use. But, to this we are, for every reason, determinately opposed. Any such authority must, of necessity, be ecclesiastical; and, supposing for a moment that faith could be placed in musical knowledge from such a quarter, the known taste of the party now most favoured in high places, would create an insuperable difficulty. By a short expurgatorial cut, all music of Post-Reformation origin would be interdicted; and congregations and organists alike would be condemned to such a dismal routine of decayed rubbish as would make all the other accompaniments of the system—fasting on Fridays included—a cheerful relaxation. But, in any case, no musician of talent and self-respect would work under such a system;—if he knows his duties he requires no assistance,—if he does not, neither priest nor precentor is, at present, at least, able to instruct him. Jealous as, unfortunately all artists are, it is not likely that the English organists will agree to appoint one of their number as director in such a matter, and to obey his decisions; neither will committees work well on this, or any other, musical subject. We see no other course than to leave the desired result in the hands of time, and the increasing acquaintance with the just principles of taste. Let each of our first-rate church organists work with true artist-like zeal at the dissemination of that which is right in his calling, and, by-and-bye, perhaps, a book will come from some of them which the lesser lights may consent to adopt as their guide.

We have said that a good book of Psalm-tunes is much wanted;—Mr. Shelmerdine's, however, is not that book. When we mention that it is but slightly contaminated with the vulgarities of the conventicle, that its score for four voices is, for the most part, correct and praiseworthy, and that very proper taste is displayed in noting the organ part, in "dispersed harmony," or, in other words, making it a literal compression of the score, we reach the extent of our commendation. Creditable care has been exercised in providing a sufficient collection of the required English tunes, besides a number of chorales of German and French origin; but we scarcely remember to have seen a book in which the vice of "adapting" from the classical composers was carried to greater extent. Thus, Händel, Haydn, Mozart, Spohr, Weber, and Mendelssohn, have been laid under contribution, and snatches from the works of all twisted to a most foreign use and with the vilest possible effect. As a few instances, we find Händel's "Lord remember David," Spohr's "Blest are the departed," the slow movement of Beethoven's second symphony, one of Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne Worte," Haydn's "With verdure clad," Rossini's "Dal tuo stellato soglio," the song for Sarastro in Mozart's Zauberflöte, Weber's "Softly sighs the voice of evening," and a host of others, barbarously mangled into the shape of Psalm-tunes. So obvious a departure from the first canons of taste is sufficient, in itself, to condemn any work, no matter what may be its other merits. A most strange mistake has also been made in attributing a very silly and common-place tune called "Martin's Lane," to Händel. Surely, a modicum of reflection might have convinced Mr. Shelmerdine that the style of this production savoured far more strongly of Leech, or any one of the Little Bethel worthies, than of the great author of the Messiah.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 25TH, 1854.

IF all the professions and trades in London were severally to resolve themselves into belligerent corps to defend their country at home, or wage its battles abroad, we have an à priori reason to suppose that the honourable body of the music publishers would prove the most effective and the most deserving of praise. He who reads the advertisement columns in the Times newspaper cannot fail to be astonished at the remarkable enthusiasm lately displayed by the venders of dance music in the selection of their titles. He may therein peruse, as proffered for sale, the "Alma" Quadrille, the "Sebastopol" Polka, the "Balaklava" Schottische, the "Inkermann" Waltz, and other fanciful nomenclatures to well-known dances, having pithy reference to the stirring transactions in the Crimea. The names are pretty and sounding, and, as young ladies are averse to the recital of deeds of warfare, no doubt the dances will serve them in the performance in place of reading the daily journals; and so, indeed, they have their uses, if they only distract the attention of the juvenile portion of the female sex from the investigation of scenes of horror and carnage.

Nevertheless, as enthusiasm is sometimes a mere Will-of-the-wisp, which burns only to lead astray, in the present instance, it so happens that the publishers of music have been allured into a morass from which they cannot readily extricate themselves without carrying with them unmistakable marks of mud and other marks more questionable still. In their mingled intoxication, arising from their delight at the glory gained by the allies at Sebastopol, and their well-grounded hopes of establishing a lucrative sale from some musical morceaux founded thereon, it, perhaps, never occurred to them that there existed any incongruity between a bounding, merry dance and a sanguinary conflict; that there was little in unison between a schottische and wholesale slaughter; or they never contemplated how far removed from merriment were the sights and sounds connected with a field of battle; nor that it was a mistake, in short, to bring two things of such an opposite nature into juxtaposition—the one comprising all that was hearty, joyous, exhilirating, and innocent; the other involving misery, destruction, extermination, death! The "Sebastopol Polka," the "Alma Quadrille," to the thinking mind, are likely to convey anything but thoughts of mirthfulness and gaiety. Luckily, young ladies and music-publishers in general are not too often afflicted with minds that cogitate and reflect, and so the purchase of a polka or waltz, with never so warlike a designation, may take place without producing in the heart of vender or buyer the least consideration as to the unfitness of the title, or the strangeness of the conversion of things, which should have been hallowed by groans and sorrows, into motivos for dancing dogs and their she-fellows.

But the notion is original, and the music-publishers are consequently reaping the benefit of their boldness and dullness, and young ladies, egged on by school-mistresses and gouvernantes, continue to besiege the music-shops and clamour for quadrilles, waltzes, polkas, galops, schottisches, deux-temps, etc., which bear on their title-page the remotest allusion to the passages of arms which lately took place in the Taurian peninsula. It will be well, however, if, in the meantime, sundry military customers of the publishers—for officers now-a-days patronise music as well as dress and the turf—be not cut off by the sword or pestilence; and the boarding-school young miss will be fortunate, indeed, if, while she is enraptured with playing her new "Fort Constantine Galop" she be not greeted, in the reports from the Crimea, with the death of a beloved father or brother.

All we really find fault with in these warlike musical arrangements is the extreme poverty of invention shown in the titles. Anybody would naturally fasten upon "Alma" or "Sebastopol" as catching and characteristic names for their dance tunes. Instead of places, why not single out events in the siege of Sebastopol or battles in the Crimea as suggestive of titles? The "Paddy McGrath Jig," the "Sergeant Sullivan* Polka," or the "Ninety-third Reel" were surely more appropriate baptizings than what we now see blazoning the shop windows. For the last dozen years or more, many of the publishers in England have been remarkable for their total indifference to poetry, sense, or grammar in the words to their songs. They have sunk lower than ever. They have not now ingenuity enough to discover a name for a polka without offending everything that is decent and holy.

We have received many suggestions from correspondents in favour of a "Musicians' Fund for the benefit of the Sufferers from the War." It ill becomes any one to cast ridicule on so humane a project, and it is with much respect for the feelings of those who advocate the Musicians' Fund, that we state our objections to countenance any such undertaking. We cannot believe that an appeal of the kind is required to draw out the sympathy which we are fully assured the musical classes, in common with all others feel towards the army of heroes which is fighting in the Crimea. We have sufficient assurance in the patriotism of Englishmen to believe that every individual, whether he be an artist, or physician, or composer, will feel it his duty to contribute whatever he can afford, without the incentive of emulation, to the public fund which has been established for a national purpose. To our knowledge, musicians have not displayed more public spirit respecting the war than any other classes, unless it be in naming their dances after the battle-fields where their brave countrymen have died. Why, therefore, should they be so desirous of making themselves conspicuous, by having a fund exclusively for their own contributions? Such an act would only imply a wish to be considered more humane and patriotic than the rest of the nation, which is a distinction that would not be easily granted, and which they do not deserve.

Mr. Bright attempted to appear before the country as a man of more than ordinary feeling by enlarging on the horrors and sufferings of the field of war, but the display of humanity which he so inopportunely put forth was regarded by the nation as a studied insult, as indeed it actually was.

We must, therefore, decline receiving subscriptions for the Musicians' Fund, feeling assured that by so doing we shall not stay the stream of benevolence, which will flow as easily through the public channels as by the private means of our office.

PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

November 23rd.

The first event in the new administration of M. Crosnier has been one of no small consequence to the Opéra. The return of Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli to her post, which many believed would never take place, and none thought would occur so soon, may be said to have placed the theatre on its legs again. The occasion was a solemn one for the artist herself, one of great anxiety for her friends and well-wishers, of intense interest for the public in general and the management of the Opéra in particular. Every place had been let nearly a week in advance, and before the curtain drew up, on Monday night, the house was crowded to the ceiling by a brilliant and excited audience. During the first act and part of the second, in which Valentine does not appear, there was little attention paid to the performance, except to the cavatina of the Queen. A débutante, Mdlle. Delly, a pupil of M. Duprez, was the representative of Marguerite of Valois. Being extremely nervous, she sang terribly out of tune. I doubt, however, if under any circumstances this lady can succeed in establishing her position at the first lyric theatre of Paris. She has no personal recommendations, and there is nothing pleasing in the quality of her voice; nor has she either flexibility or a good method. The public was indulgent, but every attempt on the part of the claque to applaud, was immediately "chuté." The moment of Valentine's entry was eagerly anticipated, and the subdued hum of conversation, heard all over the house, was like the rumbling of a far distant storm. At last arrived the long-looked-for apparition. Valentine was seen descending, in a hurried manner, the long flight of steps conducting to the gardens of the Queen; one instant would decide the temper of the audience, and the punishment or pardon of the erring but repentant prima donna. It was expected that the claque, indecorously setting public opinion and public dignity at defiance, would receive Madlle. Cruvelli with the accustomed salvo of applause that welcomes the appearance of artists of distinction. Pas si bête. The claque was dumb! Not a sound, not a sign of recognition. The audience, taken by surprise, were as silent and motionless as the claque, which, perhaps, for the first time since it has been tolerated as an organised institution, or nuisance, in the French theatres, displayed good taste, and entitled itself to respect. It was an anxious moment for Madlle. Cruvelli, who seemed transfixed on the boards, awaiting the tempest that would inevitably break forth on her devoted head. But whether the discretion of the claque, or the very attractive appearance of the singer, who was "costumed" to admiration, and looked as pensive and beautiful as one of Raphael's Madonnas, or the fact of its being a young and gifted lady who was the heroine of so very critical a situation, had an unwonted influence, I do not pretend to say. Suffice it, the audience were disarmed, at least for the instant; and not even a whisper of displeasure was detected. I remember no act so generous and magnanimous on the part of an offended public towards an offending artist. It should be remembered that Mdlle. Cruvelli had not even made an attempt at conciliating her patrons, by an apology or an explanation in the Papers. She came, simply and without hesitation, before the tribunal at whose hands she had every right to expect a summary condemnation—as who should say, "Here I am; chastise me, or forgive. I will not offend again!" The appeal was not to be resisted. A circumstance which on the one hand placed the singer in a more humourous than enviable position, and turned the matter for a time into a quasi joke, on the other militated in her favour. The first words addressed by Queen Marguerite to Valentine are announced in a couplet, somewhat to this effect:

"Allons, ma fille! ne perds pas courage;
Dis-moi le résultat de ton hardi voyage!"

There was no getting over this. So apt and unexpected an allusion to the actual situation could not fail to excite a momentary degree of mirth; and this expressed itself in laughter which gradually spread all over the house, and fairly convulsed the audience. The answer of Valentine, expressing her joy at Count Nevers having refused her hand, increased the general hilarity—although Mdlle. Cruvelli's case would have been more strictly illustrated by the contrary. Of this, however, the majority were unaware. Good humour being established and Valentine having little or nothing of importance to sing in the second act, the performance proceeded as under ordinary circumstances. Between the second and third acts, however, the Régisseur of the theatre stepped forward from behind the scenes, and advanced slowly to the footlights, making, according to custom, three slow and solemn salutations. The words, "Elle est repartie," whispered by one of the "lions" in the orchestra-stalls, were carried from mouth to mouth. The idea that Mdlle. Cruvelli, offended at the silence which greeted her on her entry, had quitted the theatre, like Mario at the memorable concert in Covent Garden, became unanimous, except among those who knew her better. "Il ne manquait que cela," was uttered in a loud voice, by a gentleman in the Jockey-club-box (synonimous to our ancient "Omnibus"), who, more angry than the rest, could not repress his indignation. At last, order being restored, Monsieur the Régisseur, was allowed to be heard. "I am desired," he said, "to entreat your indulgence, Mesdames et Messieurs, for" ——— Here he was interrupted by cries of "Non, non!"—"For whom?"—"This is too much"—"Elle va nous faire poser encore," etc.—till, the apologist being permitted to finish his phrase, the words —"for M. Obin, who has a cold" were followed by shouts of laughter and applause from every part of the house. The opinion was spontaneous and general, on the appearance of the Régisseur, that Mdlle. Cruvelli had taken her departure in a huff. But no; on the contrary she was, as she ought to be, profoundly touched by the kind and generous treatment of the public which had so good a right to be offended; and she resolved to use every exertion to deserve and shew how highly she appreciated it. This was only natural, since never was wayward infant chid with more gentle kindness and considerate affection than Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli by the audience of the Académie Impériale de Musique. I am much mistaken, indeed, if she ever forgets it, and if it does not serve her, as a wholesome lesson for the rest of her artistic life.

It is unnecessary to enter into a description of Mdlle. Cruvelli's Valentine—the most picturesque, complete, and satisfactory that has been seen since Mdlle. Falcon left the stage, and in the great fourth act not surpassed even by that admirable and lamented dramatic singer. That on such an occasion Mdlle. Cruvelli should surpass all her previous efforts, was not to be wondered at. Her performance from the beginning of the third act—where her magnificent voice and splendid energy in the duet with Marcel, brought down the most enthusiastic plaudits, the weak voices of the claqus being drowned in the cheers of the bonâ fide audience—to the end of the opera, was one uninterrupted triumph. She was also recalled at the end of the fourth act, after the fine and passionate duet with Raoul, and again at the conclusion of the opera. Peace was thus made between herself and the Parisian public; and a treaty of amity, dependent on her future good conduct, duly signed and sealed.

Of the rest of the opera the less said the better. M. Gueymard may be admired by those who have not seen Mario in the part of Raoul de Nangis; but those who have will pronounce him loud, commonplace, gesticulatory, and provincial. M. Coulon is, without comparison, the worst St. Bris I have ever seen; M. Massol's Nevers is scarcely the shadow of its former self; M. Obin's Marcel at the best is careful, being utterly destitute of dramatic interest; and the only part except Valentine tolerably well filled is that of Urbain, the page, by Mdlle. Marie Dussy, who is pretty, animated, rather tall, has a clear and pleasant soprano voice, and sings correctly and with spirit. The orchestra, once so famous, is rapidly degenerating, under the tame and unmusical direction of M. Girard, into a second-rate band, without tone, steadiness, or brilliancy. The chorus out of tune, the subordinates all mediocre, and the scenery dingy and dirty, did not produce an ensemble to be dwelt upon with anything like satisfaction. It is to be hoped that the new director, M. Crosnier, will be able to arrest the declining fortunes of this great and important establishment. From all I heard of him he will do his best. One step alone shows him to be a man of resolution and dignity; in his interview with the Emperor, he declined to undertake the responsibilities of management if there was to be any ministerial or other interference. He was assured that there was to be none: that he, M. Crosnier, should be director-absolute, and that the only dernier-appel should be to the Emperor himself. On these conditions M. Crosnier accepted. Sig. Gardoni makes his first appearance, on Monday, as Fernando, in La Favorite, with Mad. Stoltz as Leonora. I hear that, after all, M. Roger has been persuaded to sign, or promise to sign (being now in Germany), a fresh engagement with the Opéra; meanwhile, they are rehearsing Signor Verdi's Les Vêpres Siciliennes, in which Mdlle. Cruvelli has the principal part, and M. Gueymard—not Sig. Gardoni, as was hoped—is to be the hero-ténor. This is explained by the fact that Sig. Verdi composed the music expressly for M. Gueymard, and, of course, could not, under these circumstances, take the part away from him.

At the Opéra-Comique nothing new. L'Etoile and Le Pré alternately fill the house, and what more need M. Perrin wish for? The Sunday performance (always an exceptional one) consisted of Les Noces de Jeannette and Haydée, one of Auber's later operas, as you know. In the last, M. Puget, the tenor, as Lorédan, made me sigh for our own Sims Reeves; and Mdlle. Lefebvre pleased me much, although there is nothing very striking in her, either as a singer or actress, while the part of Haydée demands no inconsiderable powers, both histrionic and vocal. I was, nevertheless, pleased with her general performance. To-night, the entertainment at the Opéra-Comique includes no less than three operas—the Calife de Bagdad (Boïeldieu), the Ambassadrice, and the Rendezvous Bourgeois (Nicolo Isouard). M. Perrin must be careful. The fable of the goose and the golden eggs may apply at all times, since it involves an eternal truth.

At the Théâtre-Lyrique, the rehearsals of the new opera composed for Mad. Cabel by M. Adam, "of the Institute" (M. Clapisson is also "of the Institute"), are going on, and the public is on the tip-toe of expectation. A new chef-d'œuvre, of the school of the "fraises," is confidently anticipated. Bravo! On Tuesday night a new one-act tragedy, called Rosemonde, for Mdlle. Rachel, written by M. Latour de St.-Ybars, was produced at the Français. The acting of Mdlle. Rachel was very fine; but the piece is poor stuff. A very dull comédie-vaudeville, in two acts, entitled Oreste et Pylade, by MM. Désaubiers and Lapointe, was brought out on Sunday, at the Variétés, with doubtful success. The Battle of the Alma, at the Cirque, is full of bustle, and very amusing; and every lover of dramatic literature should go and see Mad. Sand's Flaminio, which, though abused by all the critics, draws a great deal of money to the treasury of the Gymnase. The five-act melodrama of M. A. Maquet, Le Comte de Lavernie, at the Porte St.-Martin, though somewhat prolix, is effective, stirring, and full of a certain kind of French Monte-Cristian interest.

I have had the pleasure of hearing one of the most charming pianists in Paris—Mad Massart, wife of M. Massart, a professor of eminence at the Conservatoire. In Schubert's trio in E flat, with M. Massart (violin), and M. Jacquart (violoncello), both first-rate musicians, and in some of Bach's pieces (on the organ), Mad. Masset displayed a talent with which I was delighted to be made acquainted. M. Lotto, only thirteen years old, at the same soirée, by his masterly performance of Paganini's Moto Perpetuo, showed himself to be literally a "prodigy."

M. JULLIEN'S CONCERTS.

We have arrived at the fourth week of these most popular entertainments, and the numbers exhibit no falling off from the first nights. Not only are the promenade and galleries crowded to suffocation, but the private boxes, the dress circle, and all the available parts of the theatre, where seats may and may not be taken, are occupied to the full. The "British Army" Quadrille being given nearly every night—up to Thursday—the excitement has been as great as ever, and the encores and recalls for the National Anthem and "Partant pour la Syrie" as loud and persistent.

On Tuesday last, the "Beethoven Festival" was announced, but was postponed in consequence of the illness of one or two of the solo performers. It appears that the bills of the day had noticed and accounted for the postponement of the "Festival," and that all the daily papers, with the exception of the Times, had also apprised the public of the change. But the readers of the Times are "legion," and the "legion," relying on the Times, called out lustily for "Beethoven." M. Jullien was not slow in coming forward and explaining. He mentioned in brief words that as soon as he learned of the indisposition of his executants, he dispatched messengers to the morning journals, all of whom altered his programme, excepting the Times; "but," added M. Jullien significantly, "I did not say 'Sebastopol was taken.'" This sally was received by the audience with enthusiastic cheers, and the evening's performance was allowed to proceed without nterruption.

The great feature of the past week has been decidedly the new descriptive quadrille, "The Allied Armies," composed for double orchestra and three military bands, on English, French, and Turkish melodies. We have no hesitation in saying that the "Allied Armies Quadrille" is one of M. Jullien's very best works of this class. It has the symphonic form of the "Swiss Quadrille," and exhibits many passages of original and highly ingenious musicianship. It is admirably scored throughout, and the airs are selected with the greatest possible taste. To describe it at full is not necessary. The description will be found in the bills. To describe the effect produced is impossible. Never was greater effect produced. It was tremendous—unparalleled. The beauty and variety of the melodies, the familiar so happily contrasting with the new, the solos so well distributed in the orchestra, the wonderful instrumental effects, and the dramatic colouring of the whole made the performance absolutely irresistible. A capital surprise was afforded in the withdrawing of the curtain and the marching down from the back of the platform of the two military bands, one French, and one English. At the end of the quadrille, which was received with a perfect furore, a vociferous call was made for the National Anthem and "Partant pour la Syrie," which were instantly complied with.

Signor Monasterio—violinist to the Queen of Spain—made his début during the week. He played a solo of his own composition, and was favourably received. He is an improvement on Signor Robbio.

On Tuesday next, the "Beethoven Festival" is announced to take place.

MISS ARABELLA GODDARD AT STUTTGART.

(From the "Allgemeine Zeitung," Nov. 15.)

A PERSON must himself share in the feeling against the vanity of artists, in order to appreciate fully the grateful effect produced by an honourable exception. Modest reserve, a delicate taste in selecting works of sterling merit, and a sacrifice of self to the music, in a spirit of obedience to the composer, are always rare qualities with pianists who play at public concerts, but they are most rare in a performer possessing such brilliant and technical skill as Miss Arabella Goddard, who leaves us to-day, after having, in two concerts, gladdened many a heart, usually rather distrustful of artists. (A third concert, announced for yesterday, has unfortunately been abandoned.) Miss Goddard has not played any of those showy pieces which so dazzle the masses merely on account of the difficulties they contain; not that she was incapable of doing so, because she has performed works of a higher and more difficult character. Perfect finish, clearness and purity of tone in the quickest tempo, as well as in the softest piano, a comprehensive touch, full of feeling in the andante, without any affected sentimentality, but teeming with power when requisite, and free from the slightest appearance of boastful display, are, it is true, bagatelles in the eyes of those pianists of whom Heine said that they used their hands like powder-puffs; such bagatelles, however, are to be obtained only by a serious course of study, in the old acceptation of the expression. When a person possessing talent brought by such a course of study to perfection applies both hand and heart to a noble musical composition, we then learn what real artistic enjoyment is. I never heard Mendelssohn's beautiful concerto in G minor better played than on this occasion. Enthusiasts of the "sublime sort" will certainly miss a great deal in Miss Goddard's playing, to wit, the gracious raising and sinking of the hands, the ecstatic swaying to and fro of the head, and the lifting of the shoulders, which, at the crescendo, seem as if they were about to fly. The daughter of "unmusical England" sits as quietly and calmly at the instrument as if she were not a great artist, but merely a mortal like other persons; she does not show that she moves her fingers with warm feeling; perhaps her performance is only for those who have ears to hear.

She proceeds, I hear, to Vienna. Her appearance at the concerts here was her first in Germany.

HARMONIC UNION.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—In reply to the letter of Mr. H. J. Lias, jun., dated Nov. 2nd, I will trouble you with a few remarks, as there are many statements therein greatly at variance with the real facts of the case, which require contradiction. As regards the anonymous letter of which he complains, it occurs to me that it would have been quite as prudent in him, if he had been equally modest with the other writers on the subject, and allowed his name to be known only to the editor.

Firstly. Mr. Lias informs us that "the Harmonic Union never ceased to exist; and that the directors will issue their prospectus in the course of a few days, with prospects of success much more favourable than at the commencement of either of the preceding seasons." The position in which Mr. Lias is placed is most unfortunate, as it is now three weeks since the promise of a "prospectus" was made, and, according to all appearance, as many years will pass away without the fulfilment. The "prospects of success" are equally cheering, the weekly rehearsals being suspended, the name of Mr. Benedict taken from all the notice-boards, and nothing doing or likely to be done at the ancient office of the Society. Without comment, I leave your readers to judge how far your editorial remarks were correct in the assertion that the "Harmonic Union no longer exists."

Secondly. The nonsense on the borrowed idea of "Dr. Wylde's Society," and "Dr. Wylde's superintendants," is scarcely worth an answer. The gentlemen who have undertaken that office do not recognise that position. They feel themselves to be superintendants of the "New Philharmonic Society," and, from all appearance, their present position will be a great improvement on their former one.

Thirdly. The majority of the members have gone over to the New

Digitized by Google

Philharmonic Society, and Mr. Lias cannot deny it. The subscription list of the New Philharmonic Society is already opened, and a large amount received: the concerts will commence before the month of March. Respecting "the flat denial," nothing need be said, further than there are but three gentlemen of the late committee who still "hold on" to the forlorn hope of raising a Society, for the performance of some kind of music or another, at some time or the other, and with some kind of conductor or another. The rest have left. Some have joined already, and others have promised to join, the New Philharmonic Society; in a word, I assert, without fear of contradiction, that "two-thirds of the directors, with the superintendants of the different departments, of the Harmonic Union have left, and gone over to the New Philharmonic Society." Respecting the attendance of the gentlemen at the board meetings, there is such a thing as attending those kind of meetings to do business, and attending them to talk. The gentlemen who did the work of the Society attended regularly once a-week; this they deemed enough, and allowed all other meetings to pass over, for the benefit of those who wished to do their business in their own peculiar way—and I dare say they will continue to do so, as they are not likely to gain additional strength to interfere with their future proceedings.

Fourthly. The selection of Tuesday evening for rehearsal gave an opportunity to the ladies and gentlemen of the chorus of passing their judgment in the matter, and of deciding which Society they would prefer. They have done so, and the remaining directors of the Harmonic Union know the result.

In conclusion, I would add that no Society can prosper or even exist which does not recognise the full and entire authority of its conductor in all musical matters: and, in this present case, it was not likely that a gentlemen of Mr. Benedict's reputation and ability, of whom it may be said that he stands second to no one in either, would allow himself to receive dictation from any one in musical matters, especially from those who have no claim to knowledge in the science, either theoretical or practical. Those who have left the Harmonic Union venerate his ability, and respect his character, and are only anxiously awaiting the first opportunity offered to them to manifest their attachment to him, by doing all in their power to serve him.

I am, Sir, yours obediently,

11, Newman Street, Nov. 2. WILLIAM LOCKYER.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—As those of your readers interested in the fate of the Harmonic Union may be misled by the letter from a Mr. Lias, in your last week's impression, you will perhaps allow me to inform them (and that, too, on the best authority) that the Society in question is undoubtedly on its last legs. That this is the fact, few, I imagine, will deny, when told that at the last full rehearsal no more than seven members of the chorus turned up. This melancholy state of things is entirely the fault of the gentlemen of the committee, whose unaccountable behaviour to their late talented conductor caused him to resign his office. With Mr. Benedict went, of course, the majority of the chorus, by whom he was in the highest degree respected; and justly so—for a more honourable man never wielded batôn; or one kinder or more amiable never directed a company of artists. An attempt is now being made to procure the services of Mr. Sterndale Bennett as conductor. We are quite sure, however, that if Mr. Bennett is only aware of the insults to which Mr. Benedict was subjected, he will have nothing to do with the Harmonic Union. Your obedient servant,

Cushion Court, City, 23rd Nov., 1854. CHAS. MOORE.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—As you were kind enough last season to favour your readers with a list of the professional band of the Harmonic Union, with Mr. Benedict as their conductor, could you now oblige them with a list of the present "noble directors," as you are doubtless aware is the custom of the London Sacred Harmonic Society and the Sacred Harmonic Society, not only for the satisfaction of would-be members, but also as a guarantee of the respectability of the concern.

I am, Sir, Your obedient servant,

A MEMBER OF THE PROFESSION.

Nov. 23rd, 1854.

M. BERLIOZ has been nominated member "by merit" of the Dutch Society for the Encouragement of Musical Art at Rotterdam.

LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The Members of this Society gave a performance of Händel's Judas Maccabæus on Monday night, at Exeter Hall, under the direction of Mr. Surman. At the termination of the oratorio Mr. Surman was presented with a handsome testimonial in consideration of the services he has rendered the Society since it was first established.

CHRIST CHURCH HARMONIC UNION.—This society gave its first concert for the season on Wednesday week, in Store-street, when the late Charles Horn's serenata, Daniel's Prediction, was performed, with a miscellaneous selection. The choruses, which are abundant throughout the work, are unambitious, and did not tax the singers greatly. The most effective of these was, "Speak, Prophet, speak." The best song is the barytone air, "Away with paltry fears," delivered with taste and spirit by Mr. Dobson Collet. The contralto song, "Oh! my misguided son," obtained an encore. It was sung by Mrs. Dixon, who possesses a very sweet voice. Mrs. Dixon was afterwards loudly applauded in Méhul's ballad, "In Infancy's Bud," and Mrs. Jno. Roe was encored in "Angels ever bright," which, in place of the organ, had a bad pianoforte to accompany it. Mozart's motett, "Splendente te, Deus," was given by the choir and organ as well as could be reasonably expected.

TOWER HAMLETS.—The Philharmonic Society gave their annual concert on Tuesday evening, at the Beaumont Institution. The whole of the music was vocal, with the exception of a solo on the pianoforte, performed by Herr Wilhelm Ganz. The singers who especially distinguished themselves were Mr. George Tedder, who was encored several times, Misses Alleyne, Birch, and Lizzy Stuart. We have not space to enter into details of the concert, which proved most satisfactory and was well attended.

THE CZAR'S MAGNANIMITY.—It has been intimated to those French actors and actresses who are upon the Czar's pension-list that their pensions will be regularly paid, notwithstanding the war. This magnanimity will doubtless be accepted by the artists without wounding their patriotic feelings. The theatrical season in St. Petersburg is intended to be unusually brilliant; Lablache, Mdlle. de Lagrange, and Madame Tedesco, have been engaged for the Italian Opera at enormous salaries. Overtures were made to Alboni, but previous engagements have compelled her to decline them. All the rich people in St. Petersburg will be compelled to go frequently to the theatres, in order to prove to the Russian public that the state of foreign affairs affords no ground for alarm.

MONSTER FIDDLE.—A musical instrument maker of the Boulevards, at Paris, exhibits in his window a monster fiddle, which is to be his contribution to the Exposition of 1855. Its proportions would send Jullien into ecstasy; the strings are young ropes, and the instrument itself measures about eight feet and a half, so that it would be impossible to reach the upper part with the fingers without the aid of a ladder; but to accomplish this in a more artistic manner, a sliding apparatus is affixed, which acts much in the same way as the tube of a trombone. The tone is fully an octave deeper than that of the double-bass, and with masters of dramatic situations it would doubtless produce astonishing effects.

THE ROYAL PANOPTICON OF SCIENCE AND ART, LEICESTER SQUARE.—The Building comprises a large circular Hall, 100 feet in diameter, and 100 feet high, surrounded by three Galleries, and surmounted by a Dome, the whole gorgeously decorated in the Saracenic style of architecture. The Exhibition includes a splendid Fountain, throwing the water 100 feet, a Crystal Tank, holding 6000 gallons of water, for the display of Messrs. Heinke's Diving Apparatus, of the Electric Light under water, and other subaqueous experiments, a Cosmorama of St. Petersburg with Portrait of the Emperor Nicholas, a Transparent Screen, 32 feet wide, and 36 feet high, for the display of Dioramic Views, of the Chromatrope, and of other optical effects; a magnificent Organ, containing 4,004 pipes, with the bellows worked by steam power, the richest and most powerful instrument of its kind in existence, on which a variety of Sacred and Operatic Music is performed daily at intervals, by Mr. W. T. Best, the Organist of the Institution; a gigantic Electric Machine, the largest ever constructed, the plate ten feet in diameter, with a large Leyden Battery attached; Voltaic Batteries of high power on a novel principle; and in the two Galleries, a variety of machinery and manufacturing processes in action, including the Nassau Steam Printing Machine, a complete series of Whitworth's Machinery, Kirby and Beard's Pin and Needle Machines, Perkins' Apparatus for the Combustion of Steel, Brock's Ornamental Sawing Machine, Prideaux's Patent Self-closing Furnace Valve for the prevention of smoke, &c., an Ascending Carriage, Brett's Electric Telegraph, &c, &c.; a selection of Sculpture, including Monti's Veiled Figure, "The Houri," executed expressly for the Institution, a Gallery of Pictures on sale, and other objects of Art. Distin's celebrated Flügel Horn Union every evening. Attached to the Institution are two Lecture Rooms, in which demonstrations are given several times daily, in various branches of Science and Art, and Lectures delivered from time to time on Literary and Scientific subjects: a spacious Laboratory and Chemical School; a Photographic Gallery, in which portraits are taken. Open daily: Morning, 12 to 5; Evening (Saturday excepted), 7 to 10. Admission 1s.: Schools and Children under 10, half price.

CHAPPELL'S FOREIGN MODEL PIANOFORTE.—PRICE FIFTY GUINEAS.—This instrument has (unlike the ordinary cottage pianoforte) THREE STRINGS, and the fullest grand compass of SEVEN OCTAVES. It is strengthened by every possible means to endure the greatest amount of wear, and to stand perfectly in any climate. The workmanship is of the best description, the tone is round, full, and rich, and the power equal to that of a Bichord Grand. The Case is of the most elegant construction in Rosewood, (vide the sketch), the touch elastic, and the repetition very rapid. Every possible precaution has been taken to insure its standing well in tune. Mr. Chappell especially invites the attention of the public, the profession, and merchants to the FOREIGN MODEL, feeling assured that no pianoforte, in all respects comparable, has hitherto been made in England at the same price. Every instrument will be warranted, and (if desired) exchanged within twelve months of the purchase. 50, New Bond-street, London.

THE LONDON ORCHESTRA.—Conductor, Mr. FRANK MORI; Leader, Mr. THIRLWALL. Messrs. Barret, Lazarus, Baumann, Rémusat, Lovell Phillips, Mount, Tolbecque, Nadaud, Payton, Mann, Carrodus, Vogel, D. Godfrey, Cioffi, Prospère, Chipp, Zeiss, Antoine, Guest, Russell, Standen, N. Mori, W. Thirlwall, Crozier, F. Godfrey, Gleadow, Anderson. This celebrated Orchestra may be engaged to perform at Oratorios, Operas, and Concerts, either in London or the Provinces. Communications to be addressed to Mr. A. Guest, Hon. Sec., 1, Kingston Russell-place, Oakley-square, Camden-town, or to Messrs. Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street.

JUDAS MACCABÆUS.—A selection of the most favourite choruses and airs arranged for the Pianoforte by Rudolf Nordmann. Price 5s. Solo, 6s. Duet.—Boosey & Sons, 28, Holles-street.

SIMS REEVES.—"England and Victory," sung by SIMS REEVES, and composed by Frank Mori, is published at Cramer Beale and Co's 201 Regent-street. Also Frank Mori's Solfeggi as taught by the author.

THE STANDARD LYRIC DRAMA, bound in half morocco. The Publishers have reduced the cost of the binding of these Operas from 5s. to 4s. per volume. 28, Holles-street, Nov. 24th, 1854.

MOZART'S SUCCINCT THOROUGH-BASS SCHOOL.—Paper cover, 10d. FETIS' TREATISE ON CHOIR AND CHORUS SINGING.—Paper cover, 1s. 6d.; being the first four works in the Series of "Novello's Library for the diffusion of Musical Knowledge." J. Alfred Novello, London and New York.

JOHN BLOCKLEY'S "EXCELSIOR."—New Edition, splendidly illustrated in Colours, 2s. 6d.; Duet, 3s. "Blockley's 'Excelsior' in C is a beautiful composition, worthy of Longfellow's poem, which is here rendered entire. 'The Verse of the Maiden,' 'The Old Man's Address,' 'The Monks of St. Bernard's Prayer,' and the Finale, are dramatic and effective, and quite equals the numerous popular works of this composer.'"—Musical Review.

CRAMER, ADDISON, and Co., Regent-street; Duff, Oxford-street. Orders should specify "Blockley's 'Excelsior.'"—"Excelsior" as a Vocal Duet, 3s.

ORCHESTRAL ACCOMPANIMENTS to the Operas of Zauberflöte and Fidelio, complete; and Selections from Idomeneo, Cosi fan tutte, Euryanthe, Norma, La Sonnambula, Oberon, and from the Operatic Works of Bishop, Balfe, and Auber. Also, to the Oratorios Elijah, St. Paul, The Seasons, The Triumph of Faith, Dettingen Te Deum, Rossini's Stabat Mater, and Alexander's Feast. The whole beautifully and correctly written from the Full Score, for two Violins, Viola, Flute, and Violoncello; comprising 2829 pages of manuscript, in twenty volumes, handsomely half-bound, and suitable for Concerts with a limited Orchestra. For price, and further particulars, apply to Mr. W. L. Robinson, Westgate, Wakefield.

POPULAR MUSIC.—The VESPER HYMN, transcribed for the Pianoforte, by W. VINCENT WALLACE, 3s. "This very favourite melody, as treated by Mr. Vincent Wallace, is a most elegant morceau for the drawing-room." Also, just ready, by the same, "The Old Hundredth Psalm," 4s.; Haydn's "Surprise;" "Il Sontenuto," 3s.; and "Fading Away," 4s. Eight Opera Fantasias, 3s. each; 12 Irish Melodies, 3s. each; 12 Scotch Melodies, 3s. each—all by W. Vincent Wallace. London: Robert Cocks and Co., New Burlington-street.

NEW MUSIC.—EXCELSIOR, Words by Longfellow, Music by Miss LINDSAY—FADING AWAY—TRUTH in ABSENCE—The BLACKSMITH—CATALOGUE of EDUCATIONAL MUSIC.—ROBERT COCKS and Co., New Burlington-street, London.—"The above songs are very favourable specimens of Messrs. Cocks' publications, and are far superior to the generality of modern vocal productions. The 'Excelsior' may be termed classical, and will not readily be forgotten. It has about it an air of originality which raises Miss Lindsay to a high station amongst musical composers, as she was the first to set the song to music, and has not been equalled by any imitators. 'The Blacksmith' is an excellent bass song, after the German models, and is equal to many of the same kind now numbered amongst the classical songs of Germany—a spirit-stirring composition for a winter's evening performance. 'Fading away' is also a very pretty simple song, likely to become a favourite with ladies, as it well deserves to be. 'Truth in absence' is a genuine English canzonet, with a very pretty and yet not difficult accompaniment. One great merit of the whole of these songs is, their being within the compass of almost any voice, and that without effort. We are glad to see that musical composers are paying attention to this subject, for nothing can be more painful than to see the efforts at almost impossibilities which some musicians are fond of exciting by difficulties which often mar their compositions. The 'Catalogue,' which is sent post free and gratis, is of itself a valuable index to the best musical publications of the day, as well scientific as recreative, and forms a useful adjunct in musical education."—Vide Indian News, Nov. 18.

DR. MARX'S UNIVERSAL SCHOOL OF MUSIC, imperial 8vo, 367 pages, cloth, gilt, 15s.—The Fifth and the Author's only perfected edition is published exclusively by Robert Cocks and Co. May be had on order (specifying the Fifth Edition) of any music-seller or book-seller. A Prospectus, with full Tables of Contents, &c., forwarded gratis and postage free.

MR. CARPENTER, the Poet.—The following SONGS, &c., sung at this gentleman's popular entertainment: "The Road, the River, the Rail," viz., Tell Me where is Beauty Found, duet by Stephen Glover, 2s. 6d.; "Sweet Dreams of the Past," by A. Mellon, 2s.; "When my Soldier is Married to Me," by G. Pressel, 2s. 6d.; "The Vesper Bells," duet by J. M. Jolly, 2s. 6d.; "Moonlight on the Ocean," by J. W. Cherry, 2s.; "The Pale Blue Light," by J. M. Jolly, 2s. 6d.; and the celebrated duet, by Stephen Glover, "What are the Wild Waves saying?" 2s. 6d. The words of all by Mr. Carpenter. May be had of Robert Cocks and Co.

THE QUADRILLES of the SEASON. By RICARDO LINTER, viz.:—"The Canary," "The Goldfinch," "The Skylark," "The Blackbird," "The Swallows"—each set finely illustrated. Piano Solo, 3s.; Duet 4s. "The spirited character of these favourite dances is beyond all eulogy."

THE VIOLIN and its most EMINENT PROFESSORS. By George Dubourg. Fourth Edition, handsomely bound in cloth, 10s. 6d. "One of the most readable of existing books. The violinist should not by any means be without this book."—Kentish Mercury, July 1

MARY ASTORE: Ballad. By STEPHEN GLOVER. Transcribed for the Pianoforte by Brinley Richards. 3s.

THE RETREAT MARCH, for the Pianoforte. By STEPHEN GLOVER. 2s.

MUSINGS OF A MUSICIAN: a series of Popular Sketches. By HENRY C. LUNN, A.R.A.M. New Edition. Small 8vo. cloth, 3s. "A pleasant little volume, readable alike by musician and layman."—Critic.

SPEAK GENTLY, Song by Miss M. Lindsay, the composer of the popular song "Excelsior." Second Edition, 2s. 6d. The "beautiful sentiments embodied in the words and music of this song has made it an especial favourite."

Also, PULASE. Vocal Duet. Words by Longfellow, Music by Miss Lindsay. Beautifully illustrated, 3s.

WHY THAT TEAR? Ballad: by the Composers of "Fading Away," 2s. "A charming ballad, touching as it is simple." Also, for the piano, "Fading Away," transcribed by W. V. Wallace. 4s.

NEWEST MUSIC.—Presented GRATIS and Postage Free, "SIXTEEN SPECIMEN PAGES of ROBERT COCKS and CO'S POPULAR EDITIONS of the ORATORIOS," etc. "This publication we consider most judicious, as it will satisfy the doubts of those who naturally enough wonder how it is possible to produce such priceless works at the low figure for which they are announced; one glance, however, will satisfy the most sceptical that they are not only the cheapest but the best editions extant," etc.—Vide Port of Portsmouth Guardian, February 8, 1854.

London: ROBERT COCKS and Co., New Burlington-street, Music Publishers to the Queen, and of all music-sellers.

THE VIOLIN MADE EASY.—DEAN'S VIOLIN TUTOR, 200 Easy Lessons, price 6s., sent free; Abridged Edition, 2s. 6d.—Dean's Art of Shifting, 14 stamps.—Thirty Lessons on Time, Bowing, and Fingering, 14 stamps.—Scale Exercises, 14 stamps.—Best Violin Strings, per set, or 5 firsts, 13 stamps—Improved Rosin, 5 stamps.—Dean's Pianoforte Tuner, 7 stamps.—Joseph Dean, Music Warehouse East-road, City-road.

PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

"Reinforcements for the Crimea," is the cry throughout the length and breadth of Great Britain. "Reinforcements for the Opéra," is the watchword of Monsieur Crosnier, its new director. Last week he brought up his "Young Guard," in the person of Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli, who, like the Highlanders at Balaklava, showed so imposing a front that her enemies (if there were any) struck without firing a shot. This week he manœuvres with his light cavalry, Gardoni, being ably supported by Madame Stoltz. La Nonne Sanglante, like her frail sister in Marmion, has been "walled-up." It may be hoped that, by this time, she is fairly deceased, and that her dismal groanings, making night hideous, will not again be uttered within the walls of the Opéra. In fact, since Monsieur Crosnier took the reins of office, matters at the Opéra have progressed more smoothly. He holds undisputed sway, but, although he has a giant's strength, he remembers the proverb, and does not use it like a giant. He is courteous, but firm withal, considerate to all the singers, and a gentleman in his bearing to the female artists.

Madlle. Sophie Cruvelli has repeated Valentine in the Huguenots four times, and on each occasion the house has been crowded to the ceiling. All Paris flocks to see her, and the Duchess d'Albe, the fair sister of the Empress, has been there on three occasions. In fact, the success of Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli has been such, that she will appear in no other part before Christmas, except, perhaps, Alice, in Robert le Diable. At Christmas, Verdi's new opera, which is in active rehearsal, will be produced, and we shall have the opportunity of seeing her in a new rôle. Her "hardi voyage," capricious and indefensible as it was, as matters have turned out, has been of unquestionable benefit to the Opéra, and the public loses no opportunity of expressing its delight at the return of the fair fugitive.

Gardoni made his rentrée on Monday with Madame Stoltz, in La Favorite. The opera is peculiarly suited to both artists, and Gardoni produced a highly favorable impression, being encored more than once—a rare honour at the Grand-Opéra, He has always been in high estimation with the French public. and it was, as you well know, at the Grand-Opéra that he first made his début before a Parisian audience. Gardoni was, as you may readily imagine, admirably supported by the gifted and impetuous Madame Stoltz.

A new recruit, Madame Angles Fortuné, a Spanish lady, has also been added to M. Crosnier's list. She is at present studying French, which she knows imperfectly, and expects to complete her studies in a fortnight. Madame Angles Fortuné* is graceful and pretty; her voice is a light soprano of no great volume, but is flexible and sweet. She makes her début in Lucia di Lammermoor, with Gardoni as Edgardo. Meanwhile, Madame Stoltz is studying the part of Fides, which was originally written for her before she quitted the Opéra, and which she has sung with great success in Italy. Before appearing, however, in Fides at the Opéra, she awaits the return to Paris of Meyerbeer, whom she wishes to consult as to her conception of the part. It is one peculiarly suited to the genius of Madame Stoltz, and I entertain no doubt whatever that she will add another wreath to her well-earned laurels.

The new ballet for Mademoiselle Rosati is in active rehearsal, and will be produced in the early part of December. And, to bring up the rear in this list of novelties, last but assuredly not least is Meyerbeer's long-promised, long expected, anxiously-looked for L'Africaine, for the production of which the necessary arrangements will be made on the return of the maestro to Paris next month.

The usual bals masqués will not take place at the Grand-Opéra this year, as the Government has determined that its magnificent salle shall be devoted to musical performances only.

At the Opéra-Italien, Otello and Beatrice di Tenda have been performed alternately, with but moderate success. Alary's opera of the Tre Nozze, which was first produced here, in 1850, has been put in rehearsal. It was played by Sontag and Lablache during Lumley's management of Her Majesty's Theatre in London. Madame Bosio assumes the part played by Madame Sontag, and Signor Napoleone Rossi that of Lablache. Time will show whether the former judgment of the Parisians will be confirmed.

The Opéra-Comique has been making a fortune with L'Etoile du Nord and Le Pré aux Clercs. Two new petites operas, each in one act, are in active rehearsal. The first to be called Le Chien du Jardinier, is the composition of Messrs. Lockroy and Grisar; the second, Miss Fauvette, is the work of Messrs. Barbier, Carré, and Massé. In the Chien du Jardinier will appear two old favourites of the Opéra-Comique—Mdlle. Lefebvre and Mdlle. Lemercier. Miss Fauvette is entrusted to the clever and artistic Madame Miolan. The male parts in Monsieur Grisar's opera will be filled by Messrs. Ponchard and Faure, and in that of Monsieur Massé, by Sainte-Foy, Jourdan, and Nathan. But, best of all, good news for all true lovers of good French music, Auber, the most sparkling, brilliant, charming, and spirituel composer that France ever produced, has finished a new opera in three acts, which will be speedily put in rehearsal. May it equal—it can never exceed—Le Domino Noir, Les Diamants de la Couronne or L'Ambassadrice.

The Théâtre-Lyrique goes on its way rejoicing, and, night after night, adds to the fortune of its entrepreneur. Madame Marie Cabel is charming and attractive as ever in La Promise and Le Bijou Perdu; and Madame Deligne-Lauters attracts new admirers, three times a week, in Le Billet de Marguerite. In a fortnight, M. A. Adam's new opera will be produced, and, whatever may be its musical merit, it is pretty sure of success, for the principal rôle is entrusted to Madame Cabel, and when she asks for applause, who can say her nay? Not I for one; so M. Adam is lucky in having such assistance. A new opera is also in rehearsal for Madame Lauters, of which, probably, I shall be able to send you particulars in my next.

Monsieur A. Adam's mass was performed at the Church of Saint Eustache on Wednesday, but the cold was so intense that it affected the singers, orchestra, and auditors, to such a degree, that the first could not sing, the second were unable to play, and the last were utterly incapable to listen. Of the merits of Monsieur Adam's mass I am, for these reasons, unable to speak, but I can safely say it met with a cold appreciation.

On St. Cecilia's day, the artists of the Band of the Imperial Guides, with their conductor, M. Mohr, proceeded, at the break of day, to serenade M. Adolphe Saxe, the ingenious inventor of the celebrated family of instruments bearing his name, and the author of all the new instrumental organisations of the military bands of the Foot Chasseurs, Cavalry, and various Infantry regiments. At ten o'clock, the band of the Gensdarmes also serenaded M. Adolphe Saxe, in token of the services rendered by him to the art of manufacturing, improving, and inventing military musical instruments. In the course of the day, the 100 workmen, apprentices, and others, employed by M. Saxe, presented him with a service of plate, and the whole proceedings terminated with a banquet, at which certain officers belonging to the above-mentioned regiments joined the artists, musical performers, and assistants of M. Saxe. Healths were drunk, and among others that of General Mellivet, an amateur musical performer of distinction, charged by the Emperor with the organisation of the Band of the Guards.

Our theatres are dull and stupid. The Vaudeville has a new piece, Les Maris me font toujours rire, in which, for a wonder, the husbands have the best of it. A Lovelace pursues the married women, the motto of his life gives the title to the piece, but the ladies are true and faithful to their lords, and entrap the Faublas, who is rich, into a marriage with a fair young relation who has not a sou. The piece is well played by Felix Delannoy and Mdlle. St.-Marc. The Palais-Royal has also had a success with Otez ma fille, s'il vous plait, in which Levassor and Hyacinthe are sufficiently amusing. Du reste, the weather is dreadful; fog and rain alternate with snow, and all the world is pre-occupied with Sebastopol and the war.

Brentford Harmonic Society.—A concert was given at the Town Hall, Brentford, on Monday evening last, by the members of the above Society. The artists were Miss Brougham, Miss F. Brougham, Miss J. Wells, Mr. Genge, and Mr. Farquharson Smith. Mr. Williams conducted, and Mr. Innes played on the cornet-à-pistons.

Grisi and Mario are really said to be coming to Philadelphia, and the musical and fashionable world are on the qui vive for them. They will probably attract very brilliant audiences, and many of our gentlemen are replenishing their wardrobes, so as to have new and fashionable opera suits.—Philadelphia paper.

The Sacred Harmonic Society's season will open on Friday, 8th December, with a revival of Händel's Deborah, one of his early oratorios, containing some of his finest double choruses, ("Immortal Lord," "See the proud Chief," "Lord of Eternity," etc.). Mesdames Clara Novello, Dolby, and Huddart, and Herr Formes are the vocalists, and Mr. Costa, as usual, the conductor

MUSIC IN STUTTGART.

(From the Neue Wiener Musik-Zeitung.)

It is well known that Händel's oratorios, like those of the earlier composers, were intended to be accompanied by full organs. When this is impossible, the execution of these great musical compositions with due effect is out of the question, unless the place of the organ has been previously filled up by skilful instrumentation. This, however, requires something more than mere experience and readiness in the calculation of orchestral effect; it must, also, be carried out in conformity with the original spirit and peculiar character of the composition. For this reason, up to the present time, only the greatest masters have ventured to undertake the task, and even these great masters have only half succeeded, as a general rule, even if they did not lose courage, before they had completed their work, at the immense difficulty attendant on the attempt to clothe antique forms in a modern garb, without causing either the one or the other to lose its primitive character in the process of amalgamation. But the task must be completely and satisfactorily accomplished, if we would not have these ever wonderfully beautiful and magnificent productions become the sole property of history, but be preserved for every people, and every class among whom the proper musical feeling erects its altar. By his instrumentation of Judas Maccabæus, a work not surpassed by the creations of the most fruitful musical genius, Lindpaintner has proved that, among all who have made the attempt, he is the greatest master of the present time in the accomplishment of it. So much the more pleased will everyone be to hear that Lindpaintner is now engaged on the instrumentation of Israel, the most important and sublime, as we all know, of Händel's oratorios. Mendelssohn attempted it,* and if the superficial character of his additions clearly show that he thought the work easier than it really is, we can draw no other conclusion, from their paucity and scantiness, than that he felt tamed as soon as he perceived what he had undertaken. As I am told, Lindpaintner has already completed the first part, and has, therefore, only the second to remodel.

When this is done, the third and most colossal oratorio of the greatest of oratorio composers will be once more—and because in the garb of the present day—practically restored to life for everyone.

The public are more numerous and more enthusiastic at each successive representation of Meyerbeer's Etoile du Nord. At the last performance, every piece called forth thunders of applause. The dialogue has been somewhat shortened with advantage.

A young piano virtuosa from London, Miss Arabella Goddard, who is also a very handsome person, has performed at several concerts with immense success. Her appearance here was the commencement of a professional tour through Germany; she intends visiting Vienna.—The concerts of the Royal Chapel, of which there are twelve every winter, and which must be called a truly model institution of their kind, take place, this year, in the Theatre Royal. The first, at which, among other pieces, Spohr's Weihe der Töne was performed, came off on the 7th inst. Every place in the large building was occupied, so that the orchestra had to be opened for the public (during the concerts a platform is erected on the stage for the musicians). The classical Trio-Concerts of Herren Barabeck, Bach, and Winternitz will also shortly commence.

* Mendelssohn did nothing of the kind. If he had, it was pretty certain that Herr Lindpaintner would not have attempted to follow in the steps of one so infinitely superior to himself and every other German composer who was contemporary with or has survived him. The editor of the Neue Wiener Musik-Zeitung is evidently knocking his head against the London edition of Händel's oratorios, published by the Händel Society. Mendelssohn was entrusted with the oratorio of Israel in Egypt, and, in obedience to the prescribed conditions of the Society, arranged the instrumental score for organ or pianoforte, which arrangement is printed at the foot of the score as a wholly separate matter. If Herr Lindpaintner, as our contemporary insinuates, is engaged upon an additional organ part to Israel, he cannot do better than consult the edition of the Händel Society.—Ed.

PROVINCIAL.

MANCHESTER.—GERMAN AND ITALIAN OPERAS.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Robert le Diable was produced at last (as announced for the benefit of Madame Rudersdorff), on Thursday, the 23rd ult., to the best house of the season. The performance was not satisfactory as a whole, for Mdlle. Agnes Büry not being up in the part of Isabella, the second act had to be omitted. On Saturday last the opera was repeated, and for the third time on Monday, when I was present. Mdlle. Büry was still unwell, and, in consequence, Madame Rudersdorff volunteered to appear on the same night in both characters—Alice and Isabella. It is not the first, second, or third time that Madame Rudersdorff has shewn her readiness in cases of emergency to take any part, however difficult, at a short notice during the present season; but certainly it did seem an outrageous task to undertake two such arduous characters as those of Alice and the Princess on the same evening. Madame Rudersdorff, nevertheless, acquitted herself with great credit; the only drawback being a slight delay during the repeated changes of dress. Her acting was energetic and earnest as Alice, and dignified and pathetic as Isabella. All the airs of both characters were well given, and the audience loudly applauded the fair artist, and recalled her after some of her songs and after every act. Signor Octave Benedetti, as Robert, would be more effective if he could depart from his formal action, and had more control over his falsetto. He looked the part indifferent well, and sang the music fairly. Herr Formes was exceedingly fine as Bertram. His make-up was admirable, being really that of a fiend in human shape. Herr Formes' singing was as great as his acting. The orchestra went well under the direction of M. Charles Hallé. The mise-en-scène was excellent. The dance of nuns, the organ music in the church, the choirs of priests and demons, were all given with effect. The only portion that was unsatisfactory was the difficult chorus in the opening scene. It wanted firmness and spirit. The unaccompanied trio, for Robert, Alice, and Bertram, was admirably sung, as was also the celebrated trio by the same three, in the last act. The house was thin as ever, I regret to say. On Tuesday, Il Barbiere was given for Madlle. Agnes Büry's benefit, to another very thin house, when, her illness still continuing, Mdlle. Sedlatzek had to take the part of Rosina, for which, however, she is not well suited. M. Zelger made a favourable impression in Doctor Bartolo. The Figaro of Signor Fortini is not at all satisfactory. Lucrezia Borgia for Wednesday, I Puritani for Thursday and last night, and Les Huguenots for Signor Benedetti's benefit, were the promises for the remainder of the week up to to-day, and this day week (the tenth and last week of the operas) the season comes to an end.

IBID.—On Wednesday, the 22nd November, an undress concert was given at the Concert Hall, but, although peculiarly attractive, did not draw a good audience. The principal feature of the evening was Beethoven's overture to Coriolanus—played here for the first time—exceedingly well executed. Mr. Charles Hallé played Beethoven's concerto in G, with his usual finish and taste. Mozart's overture to Zauberflöte, and Mendelssohn's symphony in A minor, were both finely played, and duly appreciated. Several vocal pieces, sung by Miss Armstrong and Mr. Guilmette, filled up the intervals between the instrumental pieces, and the concert terminated, in the most satisfactory manner, with Auber's overture to Masaniello. Mr. R. Andrews officiated at the pianoforte.

Mr. Macready's Lecture on the English Poets took place on Monday last at the Mechanics' Institution to a numerous audience. The reception of the great actor was both hearty and sincere. When he entered the room he was welcomed with a unanimous cheer, which was renewed again and again. Mr. Macready was introduced by Mr. Oliver Heywood, president of the Institution, when he proceeded to read selections from Dryden, Pope, Wordsworth, Milton, and Shakspere. These consisted of Dryden's "Song for St. Cecilia's day," Pope's "Dying Christian to his Soul," Wordsworth's "Cumberland Beggar," Milton's "Paradise Lost" (fifth book), and Shakspere's "Henry IV," part II. (act 4, scene 4.) Leigh Hunt's beautiful little poem, "Abou Ben-Ahdem"—descriptive of the reward bestowed upon those who love their fellow-men—was the appropriate epilogue with which Mr. Macready brought the readings to a termination. Mr. Alderman Shuttleworth then moved, and Mr. Alexander Henry seconded, a unanimous vote of thanks to Mr. Macready, which was carried with the utmost enthusiasm.

IBID.—On Wednesday evening, the Rev. W. Woodman, president of the Old English Fa-Sol-La Association, delivered the first of two lectures at the Mechanics' Institution, on the old English method of teaching sight-singing, known as the "Lancashire system." The system has been in operation in various parts of Lancashire and Yorkshire from time immemorial, and the lecturer showed that by it large numbers might be taught simultaneously with as much success as an individual. Illustrations to the lecture were furnished by a class of Mr. Woodman's pupils, and selections were given from Rossini, Calcott, Bellini, and others. A second lecture by Mr. Woodman was delivered in the same place, last evening.

LIVERPOOL.—On Thursday last Händel's Messiah was given at the Philharmonic Hall, in a style of completeness and perfection seldom witnessed in the provinces. The chief vocalists were Mesdames Clara Novello, Enderssohn, and Lockey; Messrs. Sims Reeves, Lockey, and H. Phillips, aided by the full band and chorus of the society, numbering 250 executants. Madame Clara Novello sang the airs and recitatives incidental to her portion of the oratorio with her accustomed superior taste and feeling, and Mrs. Enderssohn deserves no small praise for her share of the performance; Mrs. Lockey also did full justice to the contralto music. Mr. Sims Reeves was in splendid voice, and created a powerful sensation, and Messrs. Lockey and H. Phillips came in for a portion of the applause liberally bestowed by the audience. The choruses went well, and the instrumental portion was worthy of the rest of the performance.

BLANDFORD.—A morning and evening concert took place at the Assembly Rooms, last Monday, and was numerously attended. Miss Hughes, from the Royal Academy of Music, London, sang several Italian airs, in a style remarkable for purity and neatness.

CHELTENHAM.—On Wednesday a concert was given by Mr. George Marshall's Amateur Choral Class, at the Royal Old Wells. The programme consisted of duets, trios, quartets, choruses, etc., from the works of Händel, Mendelssohn, and other masters, in addition to a chorus, and a quartet and chorus, composed by Mr. G. Marshall. The whole of the pieces were executed satisfactorily.

CLIFTON.—On Thursday evening the Madrigal Society gave a concert, which was well attended. The music was not exclusively confined to madrigals, but was extended to part songs by Mendelssohn, a chorus and fantasia of Beethoven, and Purcell's "Come, if you dare," together with some light instrumental music, making in the whole a very agreeable pot pourri.

BATH.—The Pump-Room Concerts continue to be conducted by Messrs. Milsom and Son in a spirited manner. On Saturday last Miss Featherstone again sang.—Mr. H. Simms's concert at the Assembly Rooms, announced for yesterday morning, was, in consequence of the non-arrival of the artists, postponed to the evening. Madame Novello and Mr. Sims Reeves were honoured with encores, as they deserved, and the concert, with the exception of the mistake above noticed, and the consequent diminished attendance, was very successful.

MARGATE.—The second concert of the Catch Club took place on Friday evening last, at the Royal Hotel, under the presidency of George Ovenden, Esq. Notwithstanding the unfavourable state of the weather, there was a goodly muster of the friends of harmony. The programme was well selected. The principal vocalists were Mr. W. C. Gough, projector of the original Concerts for the People of Canterbury, who sang Hobbs's new song, "What will they say in England?" in a superior manner, and Miss Pillon, who sang "Aileen Mavourneen" sweetly, obtaining two encores. The band played overtures and waltzes with great spirit. The subscription-list already numbers upwards of seventy members.

WORSLEY.—On Friday last, the members of the Worsley and Ellenbrook choirs, assisted by a few musical friends, gave a concert, in aid of the Patriotic Fund, in the beautiful room of the Worsley Court House, under the patronage of the Earl of Ellesmere, George Loch, Esq., Peter Rasbotham, Esq., and the Rev. St. Vincent Beechey. The room was filled by a highly respectable audience. The music, vocal and instrumental, was appropriate, and the performance creditable to the amateur performers. Several pieces were encored, and all applauded. The proceeds, after deducting expenses, amounted to £17 3s. At the conclusion of the performance the Rev. St. Vincent Beechey thanked the audience and the performers for so agreeable a method of collecting contributions.

DEVONPORT.—On Thursday evening last, a concert was given at the Mechanics' Institute in aid of the fund for the families of the seamen and soldiers who have fallen or may fall during the present war. The vocal performers were Mrs. Crowley, Miss Vaughan, Miss Carne, and the Hon. Adele Graves; Messrs. Yonge, Godfrey, Major Sir H. Seale, Bart., and the Right Hon. — Graves. The selection of music was good, and the attendance numerous.

FOREIGN.

VIENNA.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Mdlle. La Grua will, in all probability, appear as Alice in Robert le Diable, Donna Anna in Don Juan, and Valentine in the Huguenots, before the expiration of her engagement, on the 1st December, at the Imperial Opera-House. The principal event, last week, at that establishment, was the production of M. Taglioni's new ballet, Die Seeräuber, of which I spoke in my last. The management is reported to have spent 14,000 florins upon it, a large sum in Germany. The two principal parts were entrusted to Mdlle. Taglioni and Herr Charles Müller. The music, by Herr W. Gährich, is noisy, but sometimes original, and, on the whole, superior to the generality of ballet-music. The new scenery and decorations, by Herr Lehmann, and the dresses, by Herr Franzeschini, are brilliant and tasty.—Mad. von Hasselt-Barth has appeared in two concerts at the Imperial Theatre an der Wien. On the first occasion, she sang the air, "Ozean, du Ungeheuer," from Weber's Oberon, a scena from Donizetti's Belisario, and the scena from Norma, with the air "Casta Diva"—the last two in costume. At the second concert, on the 11th ult., she repeated the two scenas, but substituted an air by Verdi, and "Gretchen am Spinnrade" for the air from Oberon. At the third and last concert, on the 19th ult., Mad. von Hasselt-Barth sang Cherubini's romance from Mozart's Nozze di Figaro, the "letter air" from Don Juan, the grand aria from Ernani, with orchestral accompaniment, and Mozart's "Das Veilchen." I may add that, at the last concert, Herr Suppé's overture to the piece entitled Mozart, lately produced here—a composition in which the author has used some of the finest motives from Le Nozze di Figaro, Don Juan, and Die Zauberflöte—was performed and encored.—Mdlle. Wilhelmina Clauss, who is, at present, giving a series of concerts in Holland, will visit this city professionally in the course of the season.—Herr Eckert has invited M. Vieuxtemps, who is now in Brussels, to play at the first Philharmonic Concert, which will be given by Herr Eckert on the 17th December. M. Vieuxtemps has consented, and will perform Mendelssohn's concerto.

BERLIN.—(From our own Correspondent.)—On the 19th ult., Rossini's Tancredi was produced at the Royal Opera House, with new scenery, dresses, and decorations, in honour of her Majesty's birthday. The performances commenced with a prologue, written for the occasion, and spoken by Herr Crüsemann. This was followed by the National Anthem, which was vociferously re-demanded by the audience. Tancredi, Rossini's sixth opera, first produced in Venice, in 1813, has not been performed at the Royal Opera House, Berlin, since the year 1833. It was played subsequently at the Königstadt-Theater, in 1841, with Mad. Pasta, and in 1846, with Mdlle. Alboni. At the revival, the other evening, Mdlle. Johanna Wagner was much applauded in the principal character, and has made a valuable acquisition to her répertoire. Mad. Herrenburger played Amenaida. The opera was well put upon the stage, and promises to become a stock piece.—A certain Herr Sämann, from Königsberg, has given a concert in the Singacademie, for the benefit of the sufferers by the late fire in Memel. The executants consisted of members of the Singacademie, a comparatively scanty chorus, and members of the Royal class of instrumental music. You will, perhaps, be surprised to hear that the whole programme was composed of the works of Herr Sämann himself, as if Germany were not the birth-place of such men as Mozart and Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Sebastian Bach, Haydn, Händel, and a host of intellectual giants, to whom Herr Sämann is as naught, and whom, to judge by his conduct, he is altogether incapable of appreciating. Instead of calling this display of self-sufficiency a "Concert for the sufferers by the late fire at Memel," he should have designated it, "A vocal and instrumental advertisement for Herr Sämann." This would have been preferable, because more sincere. There were very few persons present. Among them, however, I remarked M. Meyerbeer, and also the King of Prussia. —The first concert of the Königlicher Domchor was the most interesting musical event of last week. The programme included the following pieces:—"Tu es Petrus," by Palestrina, followed by the motet: "Duo Seraphim," Gabrieli's "Magnificat," and Franz Schubert's music to the 23rd Psalm, for male voices. The execution of all these pieces was excellent. We then had Sebastian Bach's Chromatic Fantasia, performed by Mdlle. Ottilie Seiffart; Mendelssohn's Sonata for Pianoforte and violoncello, performed by the same lady and Herr Ganz; and Mendelssohn's chorus for eight voices: "Denn er hat seinen Engeln befohlen über Dir." The whole concert gave great satisfaction to a numerous and highly attentive audience. The king was present.—Last Monday, Liebig's orchestra gave their fifth Sinfonie-Soirée, on which occasion they performed Onslow's overture to Hausirer, Weber's overture to Oberon, Beethoven's Symphony in B flat, and Mendelssohn's in A. The execution, especially of the two overtures and Beethoven's symphony, was very good.—Mdlle. Josephine Hugot gave a concert, on Tuesday, in Mäder's Rooms. It was well attended. The talented bénéficiaire sang several French and Italian airs, and was assisted by the violinist, Signor Bazzini, who performed his Rondo des Lutins. Mesdemoiselles Marie and Sophie Marinak, from London, played a duet for two pianofortes.—At the last quartet concert of Herrren Oertling, Rehbaum, Wendt, and Birnbach, a quartet by Herr Adolph Stahlknecht was played and favourably received. —The following pieces were performed at the Court Concert on the 19th inst:—1. quartet from I Puritani, sung by Mad. Förster, Herren Salomon, Theodore Formes, and Basse; 2. Duo Concertants for two flutes, on motives from the opera of Rigoletto, by Herr Doppler, played by the Brothers Doppler; 3. air from Mozart's Nozze di Figaro, sung by Mad. Förster; 4. Souvenir de Beatrice di Tenda, by Bazzini, played by the composer on the violin; 5. Duet from Donizetti's Belisario, sung by Herren Theodore Formes and Salomon; 6. Fantasia for two flutes, on Bohemian national melodies, by Doppler, played by the Brothers Doppler; 7. Walz-air, by De Beriot, sung by Mad. Förster; and 8. Les Lutins, Capriccio, by Bazzini, performed on the violin by the composer.—The little pianist, Napoléon, will make a tour through Germany, this winter, and has already been engaged by Herr Engel to play in twelve concerts at Kroll's.

MILAN (November 25).—At the Teatro I. R. Canobbiana, Il Pirata, Barbiere, and the opera buffa, Don Bucefalo, have been given alternately for the last fortnight. The representations of the latter have been unfortunate as regards the prime donne, no less than three different ones having sung on successive evenings; the first was Signora Vetturi-Olivi, the second, Signora Marinangelli, both of whom were coldly received (report says that they were indisposed); and the third, expressly engaged, Signora Fumagalli, who succeeded as well as her very small voice and faulty style permitted. The other principal parts were sustained by the tenor Steachi, and the buffo Zucchini; the latter was applauded in his rehearsal scene with the orchestra, and in the aria of composition at the pianoforte, in imitation of the great composer conceiving the inspirations of "Love," "Thunder," and "Lightning." On the evening of the 23rd inst., the first representation was given of the new opera, Anna Campbell, written expressly for this theatre by Signor Torriani, the libretto by Signor Cressoni. The music has had but an indifferent reception: probably the successive representations may prove more fortunate. The principal parts were confided to the Signora Viola, the Signori Carrion, Monari, and Segri-Segarra.—The short autumnal season commenced at the Carcano Theatre, on the 23rd inst., with the Domino Nero of the Maestro L. Rossi, interpreted by the prima donna Rosina Polacco, the tenor Biundi, the baritone Maestri, and the buffo Borella. There are also two other companies engaged—one dramatic, and the other gymnastic—who give representations of short pieces after the termination of the opera. A new opera-seria, Samson, founded upon sacred history, the music by Signor Giacomo Panizza, has been promised.

LEIPSIC.—The Conservatory, according to custom, celebrated the 4th ult., the anniversary of Mendelssohn's death, by the performance of suitable musical compositions, before a select audience, specially invited on the occasion. With the exception of the introductory chorus, "Ecce quomodo moritur justus" by Gallus, only works by Mendelssohn himself were performed. These consisted of a still-unpublished soprano aria, a choral for a chorus of eight voices, the quintet for stringed instruments, Op. 18, and a prelude and fugue for pianoforte. Besides the pupils of the institution, Herren Rietz, David, and Moscheles, three of the professors, were present.—Herr Alexander Dreyschock is stopping here. He will shortly leave for Copenhagen.—Herr Rietz has been nominated Capellmeister in Dessau, in the place of Friederich Schneider. He will, however, remain this winter, and conduct the Gewandhaus concerts.—Mad. Boch-Heintzen, from the Breslau Stadttheater, has appeared in Norma.

STUTTGART.—The members of the orchestra at the Theatre Royal—who, on the first night of L'Etoile du Nord, were under the direction of the composer himself, but, on the succeeding nights, had, as usual, Herr Kücken for conductor—have just received the following gratifying and honourable compliment from M. Meyerbeer, in a letter addressed by him to Herr Kücken: "Let me request you, most respected maestro, to present my warmest compliments to the gentlemen of your excellent orchestra, to whom I owe the most sincere gratitude for their magnificent, fiery, and bold execution at the production of L'Etoile du Nord, and for their zeal, attention, and patience at the rehearsals. My warmest sympathy, as well as my most unqualified respect, are due to this worthy association of artists. (Signed) "MEYERBEER."

NAPLES.—(From our Correspondent).—Nothing new in the operatic line, all the re-productions going out as soon as brought forward, nothing positively but quarrels between the managers and the singers; and the public thoroughly disgusted both with the broken promises of the former and the slovenly execution of the latter. I have, however, to proclaim the complete success of a new ballet, in four acts, by Signor Fuchs, entitled Katty. The music is both gay and brilliant, and the dances as characteristic and sparkling. The success of Mdlle. Taglioni was what the Italians style a fanatismo; she was repeatedly called before the curtain, and cheered and overwhelmed with bouquets. Honours were also conferred on the author of the ballet, and Signor Giaquinto, the composer of the music.

FLORENCE.—The success of the new opera, Gastone di Chanley, seems to continue unabated. The music is both fresh and spontaneous, without, however, any great pretensions to originality. It must be remembered that the composer, Signor Capecelatro, is, to some extent, a new composer, and the success of this opera will doubtless induce him to rely more on his own inspirations in future, than on his reminiscences from extraneous sources. The introduction and air of the tenor in the first act were warmly applauded, and the composer was re-called, as he was also after the cavatina of the soprano; the duet between the soprano and tenor created a great sensation, and all the singers were re-called on the fall of the curtain. The second act was equally successful, the principal pieces being the aria of the barytone and the grand finale.

VENICE.—At the Teatro Apollo, L'Assedio di Malta, by Signor A. Graffigna, has been enthusiastically received, sustained by Signora Orecchia, Signori C. Ziverani, A. Mazzanti, and G. Latry.

DRESDEN.—The usual grand concert, for the Chorus Pension Fund of the Theatre Royal, took place on the 7th ult. The programme included Mozart's Requiem (selected no doubt because the general mourning for the late King concluded on the day the concert was given), and M. Berlioz' Flight into Egypt. The solos were sung by Madlle. Ney, Mad. Krebs-Michalesi, Herren Weixlstorfer, and Abiger. The audience was not numerous.

HANOVER.—M. Roger has achieved a great success as Georges Brown in La Dame Blanche, Edgardo in Lucia di Lammermoor, and Jean de Leyde in Le Prophète.

BARMEN.—The first-Abonnements Concert took place under the direction of Herr Carl Reinecke, from Cologne. The programme was thus composed:—Gluck's overture to Iphigenia in Aulis; Frühlings-Phantasie, for four solo voices, orchestra and piano, by Gade; Recitations and chorus from Mendelssohn's Christus; and the Symphonia Eroica, by Beethoven. The following interesting works were performed at the first concert for Chamber Music, which took place on the 9th ult:—Mozart's quartet in B major, for stringed instruments; Beethoven's trio, No. 1; Hayden's sonata, in E major, for pianoforte solos; and Mendelssohn's trio, No. 1.

COLOGNE.—The French opera company from Antwerp gave only one representation, and then left, on account of the want of interest evinced by the public. The Cologne opera company, on the contrary, have been highly successful in Antwerp, and, according to the local critics, possess certain good qualities which the worthy burghers of Cologne have not yet discovered or even suspected.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—The Cäcilien-Verein will, this winter, give four concerts, at which they will produce the following great works:—Haydn's Seasons, Händel's Israel, Mendelssohn's Christus, and some of Bach's Passionsmusik.

MUNICH.—The Royal Chapel has lost no less than eight of its members—namely, Mesdames Rettich, Pellegrini, Degele, Herren Fichtl, Reinald, Ebling, Hailer, and Werle, by cholera. The survivors have had a mass for the dead celebrated for them in the Frauenkirche, and executed Mozart's Requiem on the occasion.

AUGSBURG.—Herr Von Flotow's Indra is in rehearsal.

WEIMAR.—Mdlle. Clara Schumann will, it is expected, sing here shortly in one or two concerts.—Les Huguenots will, at last, be produced. The late Duke would never permit the performance of this opera.—Dr. Franz Liszt purposes bringing out Herr Schumann's opera of Genofeva.

DESSAU.—The season opened with Rossini's Guillaume Tell.

COBURG.—According to report, Masaniello is to be revived with new dresses and scenery.

CASSEL.—Nicolai's Lustige Weiber von Windsor, is in rehearsal.

ZURICH.—The following operas have been produced in the course of a month: Die Zigeunerin, Lucia, Martha, Stradella, Der Freischütz, Die Entführung, La Sonnambula, and Otello. Die Entführung was repeated at the especial request of Herr R. Wagner, who is, at present, stopping here. Tannhäuser is in rehearsal, and will be performed towards the end of this month.

PALERMO.—Verdi's Trovatore opened the season with success. It was executed by the prima donna Lotti, and the Signori Graziani, Fiori, and Orlandi.

BUSTO.—The autumnal season was inaugurated on the 18th ult., with Donizetti's Linda di Chamouni, interpreted by the prima donna, Augusta Costantini; the tenor, Perillo; the baritone, Giorgi; the buffo, Parodi; and the basso profondo, Ippolito. The prima donna and the majority of the company were much applauded.

VERONA.—At the Teatro Nuovo, Il Birrajo di Preston not having pleased, Nina Pazza, by Coppola, has been produced as speedily as possible, with the prima donna, Sannazzaro; the tenor, Errani; the baritone, Altini; and the buffo, Soares. The interpretation was praiseworthy.

NOVARA.—I Lombardi, of Verdi, has been represented with tolerable success, executed by the Signora Vigliardi, the tenor, Devoti; and the baritone, Bartolucci.

BOLOGNA.—Il Cavalier Nero, (or, Ginevra di Scozia), the new opera by Badia, has been produced with moderate success. The prima donna, Martinetti; the tenor, Kubly; and the baritone, Corsi, have been warmly applauded. Caterina Howard, by the Maestro Salvi, is in rehearsal.

PAVIA.—Lucia di Lammermoor was given, on the 25th ult., for the second opera, with Signora Vaschetti, Signori D'Apice, Mazzoni, and Cervini. The execution gave great satisfaction.

LIVORNO.—Maria di Rohan has been succeeded by Rigoletto, the latter of which has pleased immensely. The following was the cast: Gilda, Signora Scotta; Il Duca, Signor Pagnoni; Rigoletto, the baritone Cresci.

PHILADELPHIA.—(From a Correspondent, Nov. 11th.)—The Pyne and Harrison troupe—as the English operatic company, of which Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. Harrison are the leading members, are styled here—have been performing with great success for the last fortnight at the Walnut Street Theatre. The operas in which they have already appeared were La Sonnambula, Maritana, The Bohemian Girl and the Crown Diamonds. I have been assured that Miss Louisa Pyne's success at the Broadway, New York, was almost unprecedented for an English vocalist. Had the theatre been twice as large, I am told, it would have been nightly filled, despite the overwhelming attraction of Grisi and Mario at the New Opera House. The entire of the New York press has been unanimous and enthusiastic in praise of the new English operatic company. If the critics of our Quaker City be not so loud and one-minded as "Gotham" in their laudations, the artists have no cause to complain. Miss Louisa Pyne is received nightly by crowded houses with a perfect frenzy of delight, which marks her as one of the greatest favourites of the public who has ever appeared on the boards of a Philadelphia theatre. Mr. Harrison, too, is held in high estimation, and Mr. Borrani and Miss Pyne are accounted artists of sterling merit. Taken altogether, no English operatic company, perhaps—with the exception of Mr. and Mrs. Wood and Co.—has created so great a reputation as that of the Pyne and Harrison troupe.

REVIEWS!

"FAIRY FINGERS." Fantasia and Variations for the Pianoforte. Dedicated to Miss Arabella Goddard by W. H. Holmes.

"CHIMES OF ENGLAND; OR, CHANGES ON AN OLD ENGLISH AIR." For the Pianoforte. By W. H. Holmes.

ROMANZA, from Fra Diavolo. For the Pianoforte. By Ch. Voss. Boosey and Sons.

While he has shown himself capable of writing music of a more serious cast, Mr. Holmes has distinguished himself more than the majority of our noted professors in the composition of elegant pianoforte music for the drawing room. The three pieces before us are excellent and attractive specimens of the class of music to which we allude. Without being difficult, the Chimes of England offer enough of mechanical obstacles to interest all players in a certain stage of advancement, and at the same time is written with a purity and correctness for which Mr. Holmes, even in his most trifling attempts, is always remarkable. It is a graceful and highly attractive bagatelle, with a poetical object felicitously carried out.

Fairy Fingers demands execution of a higher kind. It is a very showy and brilliant fantasia, based upon the theme of one of Strauss's most admired waltzes, which is varied and otherwise developed in a very musicianlike manner. This is a real concert piece; and, though it may be played on the piano alone, must owe no little of its effect to the orchestral accompaniments and tuttis, which we can testify, from having heard Mr. Holmes perform it in public, declare the hand of a master.

Herr Voss does not display a great amount of originality in his adaptation of the popular and pretty barcarole from Auber's charming opera. But it is easy and showy—a great recommendation to boarding-school music.

"DEAN'S VIOLIN TUTOR." Selected, compiled, and arranged by Joseph Dean. Joseph Dean.

As good an elementary work in its way as the majority of the many violin tutors that exist. While we can find nothing new in it, we can detect nothing objectionable, and have little doubt that the author will find it extremely serviceable for his own pupils. We object, however, to the somewhat pompous heading which Mr. Dean has attached to his table of scales (page 33—4). "The art of modulating from one key to another," surely involves something more than sharpening the fourth interval of one scale to lead to that of its dominant. Nevertheless, that is all the evidence of "art" which our professor has demonstrated.

"THE HAPPY DAYS OF CHILDHOOD." Ballad: Poetry by Dr. Huie; Music by Mrs. T. Andrews. George Binfield and Co.

A ballad on the accepted model, of which there are probably some millions in the market. The theme of the words is old, and that of the music not new. Both, however, are blameless, while neither is at all exciting. It is hardly enough to be able to say of a piece of music, "There is no harm in it;" yet that is the amount of what Mr. Andrews' ballad is calculated to suggest to the mind of the considerate critic.

"A YEAR AGO."—Poetry by Lord Viscount Strangford, Music by Charles F. Hempel. Haddon, Brothers and Co.

Mr. Hempel takes a higher flight, and succeeds. His melody is not strikingly original but it is graceful; and the accompaniments show the taste and knowledge of a musician so clearly, that we commend and recommend his song—in the smooth and mellow key of A flat, with a second part in the minor, and a somewhat needless translation-chord of F flat prefacing the brief animato which leads back to the first theme—without an instant's hesitation. Lord Strangford, too, is above the line of average-poets, and, though sentimental, writes flowing and sensible verse.

"ANNIE, DEAR, GOOD-BYE." Song written by E. Fitzball, composed by W. Vincent Wallace. Cramer, Beale, and Co.

Mr. Wallace seldom fails to write gracefully, and the ballad before us—though again not painfully new, as far as the melody goes—is eminently graceful, and accompanied with the composer's ordinary tact and finish. It is a war-song—or, rather, the parting song of a soldier to "the girl he leaves behind him." We congratulate Mr. Fitzball, the poet, on an example of sound judgment. He has not made his hero declare, in either couplet, that he is "going to Sebastopol." The occasion, however, was tempting, and hard to resist.

"ON ALMA'S HEIGHTS." National Song. Words by George L. E. Raggett; composed by James Smith, Jun., Esq. R. W. Ollivier.

A martial ballad in the true sense of the term—martial in tune, and martial in the style of its accompaniment. The subject will call attention to the song. Our own opinion about making songs, on the theme of the mighty war in which we are engaged, while the time of the struggle is just impending, has been already expressed. Were Beethoven himself to leap from the grave and present us with a ditty, founded on "Alma," "Balaklava," or "Inkermann," we should not change it.

DRAMATIC.

THE HAYMARKET obtained a great accession of strength by the return, on Saturday, of Mr. Buckstone, who appeared with his usual éclat in Presented at Court. Mr. Buckstone has played some of his popular parts during the week. We hear that Mr. and Mrs. Keeley are engaged at the Haymarket, and will appear after Christmas in the new burlesque.—Madame Vestris opened the Lyceum on Monday with two old pieces and one new. The novelty is called A Comical Countess; it is a translation from the French, by Mr. W. Brough, of La Soubrette de Qualité, and is full of stir and bustle, if it has no other merit. Mr. Charles Mathews, as a gentleman disguised as a livery servant, has a part admirably adapted to his peculiar talent, and appears to singular advantage. Miss Talbot shows well, too, as the waiting maid raised into rank without the tact to support it. Madame Vestris still persists in keeping in the bills such thrice-used-up pieces as the Game of Speculation. Well, she knows best what draws, and we must needs not interfere. It seems strange, however, that while, in every other theatre in the world, novelty is an absolute necessity, at the Lyceum it would appear to be the result of a caprice or an accident. Madame Vestris and Mr. Charles Mathews are both old and deserved favourites of the public, but the public require stimulants in their entertainments, and the managers of theatres must provide them. Madame Vestris still proves herself, as she has always proved, the model of a manageress.—We have nothing further to record in the theatrical doings of the past week. Active preparations are already being made at all the theatres for the Christmas offerings, the getting-up of which always causes a lull for three or four weeks preceding Boxing-day. Bye-and-bye we shall have more than enough to prate about.

MR. HARRIS, regisseur of the Royal Italian Opera, has been offered an engagement at the Théâtre-Italien, Paris.

MISS DOLBY'S SOIRÉES.

The first took place on Thursday evening, at the residence of the accomplished contralto. The programme was well adapted to gratify real connoisseurs, and the performance was quite as good as the selection was interesting. The concert began with Mendelssohn's second pianoforte trio, very finely executed by Mr. Sterndale Bennett, Herr Ernst, and Mr. Lucas. To this succeeded one of the most beautiful and least-known of the cantatas by Mozart, sung with classical feeling by Miss Dolby herself. The Rondo Piacevole, and the romance, Geneviève, two of Mr. Sterndale Bennett's most fresh and charming pieces, were played by the composer to perfection. The pianoforte, one of Broadwood's choicest instruments, was just calculated to display to advantage the round and mellow tone of our great pianist. The most skilful singer may fail to please without a good voice to help him; but the "voice" and the "singer" were worthy of each other in this instrumental performance. The pretty aria, from Figaro, "Deh vieni non tardar," was sung with much taste by Miss Amy Dolby, who continues to make progress; and Herr Ernst brought the first part of the concert to a close with two pleasing and artistic bagatelles of his own composing, which he played to perfection. At the beginning of Part II., the "poet of the fiddle"—as he has been appropriately styled—in conjunction with Mr. Sterndale Bennett, delighted the audience with Beethoven's sparkling sonata in G., from Op. 30; and was followed by Miss Dolby, with Haydn's "Spirit Song," a great favourite with the singer, if we may be allowed to judge from the frequency with which she introduces it in public, and the unexceptionable manner in which she sings it. Mr. Lazarus then played an ingenious fantasia on the clarionet, composed by Mr. Frank Mori upon subjects from the Huguenots. This performance was alike remarkable for fine tone, pure expression, and correct execution. A hacknied duet of Winter, sung by the Misses Dolby, and some ballads, given by Miss Dolby to her own accompaniment, brought the entertainment to a close. Mr Lindsay Sloper, who accompanied the two instrumental solos and the principal vocal pieces, displayed the talent we are accustomed to expect from him. The rooms were fashionably attended, and the programme afforded general satisfaction. There were no encores. Tant mieux.

M. JULLIEN'S CONCERTS.

The Beethoven Festival came off on Tuesday evening as announced, when the theatre was densely crowded in every part. The first part of the programme was dedicated entirely to the works of Beethoven, and comprised the Leonora overture—the grandest of the four written to Fidelio—the allegretto movement from the symphony in D, the first movement of the grand concerto in D, and the symphony in C minor, the complete work. This was a classical entertainment in the strictest sense. Not a single bar of the music belonged to the ad-captandum school; yet the audience were more attentive and absorbed than when listening to the merry tune of a polka, or the exhilarating strains of a quadrille. The solution is easy enough. Some half-dozen years ago, a mixed audience, like that assembled at Drury Lane on Tuesday night, would have repudiated music, however acknowledged, of so serious a cast as that selected on Tuesday, from the works of the most subtle and profound of all composers. Either M. Jullien has taught his audience better taste, and they listen with reverence and respect; or he has really, by oft-repeated lessons, instilled a love for fine music into their minds. In either way he has effected more than any musician who preceded him. We ourselves, indeed, lean to the belief that M. Jullien has created a new taste for music among the middle classes, and that they now listen to Beethoven and Mendelssohn, because they really love and partly appreciate their works—at least those to which M. Jullien has accustomed them at Drury Lane. And so in reality must anybody have thought who witnessed the effect produced upon the assembly on Tuesday, whose conduct was as decorous, and whose marks of approval were as well-timed and legitimate as those of the more instructed audiences of the Philharmonic Societies, old and new.

Of the performance we have to speak in terms of unexceptionable praise. The Leonora overture was played magnificently, and loudly applauded; the Allegretto movement, in B flat, from the 8th symphony, enthusiastically encored; the larghetto from the symphony No. 2, and the movement from the violin concerto—remarkably well executed, by the way, by Mr Blagrove—listened to with deep interest; the whole winding up with a masterly and vigorous performance of the Grand C Minor Symphony, which was hailed with enthusiastic acclamations at the end. The symphony was happily chosen in reference to the times, the last movement being, as the musical amateur is well aware, a description of an advancing army, and concluding with a triumphal march.

The second part opened with the new "Allied Army" quadrille, which is repeated nightly with increasing favour. Of this work we have already spoken, and nothing further need be said than to corroborate our impressions of last week. The "Allied Army" quadrille is a work of great merit, and shows how music may be carried effectively into a region for which it is, to all appearance, unsuited. M. Jullien has elevated a set of quadrilles to unusual importance. Instead of being composed of five tunes, following each other irrespectively, the quadrille under M. Jullien's hands becomes a sort of symphony or fantasia, where all the subjects bear strict relation to each other, where nothing is disjointed, and all in harmony and order. The other features of the Beethoven Night were Madame Anna Thillon's new song, "Minnie," the "American Quadrille," and the "Charge Galop," one of M. Jullien's newest and most spirited dances.

During the week several novelties have been produced; among others, a new song, called "Say, Yes," sung for the first time on Thursday evening, with immense effect, by Madame Anna Thillon, who perhaps never made a greater hit. A double encore would scarcely satisfy the audience.

M. Jullien's Annual Grand Bal Masqué is announced for Monday, December 11.

Drury Lane Theatre.—As soon as M. Jullien's concerts terminate, Drury Lane will be got ready for the production in English, by English artists, of Meyerbeer's L'Etoile du Nord. Who the artists are we have not ascertained, and by what means the score of Meyerbeer's opera has been obtained we cannot certify.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 2ND, 1854.

THE effect of the recent decision of the House of Lords is beginning to be felt. Plaintiff and Defendant, or rather their respective parties, are equally on the alert to take advantage of the chaos that, reversing the natural order of things, has arisen out of what, till the present crisis, represented order. The law-givers spake, and lo! nobody knew whether his property was his own. Hobbes says, "the state of nature is a state of war, every man warring against every one." So, in the actual state of musical copyright, every publisher robs every publisher. It was well done on the part of Lord Brougham, who forgot, however, to consult his own papers on literary property, in one of the penny serials to which, some twenty years ago, he contributed so largely. Had he done so, he might have hesitated ere he ate his own words. They must have tasted bitter in his intellectual mouth—as bitter as the little book that was swallowed by the Evangelist.

It is an enlivening spectacle, this battle of the music-publishers. The 7s. 6d. edition of the Huguenots, put forth in self-defence by Messrs. Boosey, is as cheerful to contemplate as the two-penny sheets upon which their own Rigoletto has been hawked about by the old clothesmen and hucksters of the trade, who have worked hard to pull down the profession of a music-publisher to that of a street-vendor of cocoa-nuts and periwinkles, the fruit and shell-fish of the last being scarcely less tempting to the eye than the paper or rag upon which the incorrect editions of the first are blotted with most execrable printer's ink. If anything healthy issues from this disorderly condition of things we shall be surprised. True, out of corruption springs new life, and some hope may be gathered from the application of this truth in natural philosophy. But we greatly fear that, like the refuse of the sewers, the scum of a contest so unseemly will have to go through all sorts of processes ere it can be purified to act as manure for the soil of a new, a better, and more abundant harvest of the mind's husbandmen.

Meanwhile our professors look on, complacent, although they have lost, say, an average eighth of their yearly income. The composers, however, are the most to pity, since no one will purchase any copyrights except those of a privileged three or four, who, perforce of pale copies of bad foreign models, have jerked themselves out of nothing into a kind of spurious notoriety. We need not name them. Who can blame the publishers? While they can take as much as they please from Talexy, Beyers, and Leopold de Meyer, without paying anything, why should they give good money for —— and —— and ——? and while they can lay hands at indiscretion upon Mendelssohn's Songs without Words, why should they draw upon their bankers in favour of Sterndale Bennett?

There is hope, nevertheless. Instead of producing weak imitations of their German and French contemporaries, let our pianoforte and song composers strive to do something of their own—something, in short, that is English. Every national individuality in every art has its charm, and more especially in music. Why are our painters so highly considered and so handsomely rewarded? Simply because they have created among them an English school of painting. They, for the greater part, prefer to imitate each other, rather than parody their continental rivals. For one copyist of the Italians, French, and Germans, you may see, in our annual Exhibition, one hundred of the accepted English masters. Not so with our musicians—even, we grieve to say it, the best of them—with very few exceptions. What was the secret of Bishop's unrivalled popularity?—how did he manage to obtain more money and more fame than all the rest of the musicians put together, although some were more gifted than he, and better conversant with the theory and practice of their art? The answer is obvious. Bishop was pure English, and nothing else. When he fell into travestying Rossini, Auber, and Weber, he fell into disrepute, and lost his popularity, while he damaged his income.

We have not the smallest sympathy for the "native-musician" cry. If English composers present counterfeit music, they must not be astonished that English amateurs should prefer the originals. Let those who are not blessed with original invention take Bishop as a model, and endeavour, if their acquirements permit, to refine and improve upon him. This will be much better than overloading melodies of the Auber-school with harmonies and progressions à la Spohr, or in making a Rossinian cabaletta dance in the fetters of a Wagnerian orchestra, Our musicians must think for themselves, and—as we are not entitled to look for more than one genius, or at most two, in a quarter of a century—those who must inevitably be imitators, having, like the vast majority of composers all over the world, no ideas of their own, should lend their aid, in so far as their power lies, in consolidating and perfecting a national school. They have Purcell, Arne, Dibdin, and Bishop, as pivots to work upon; let these, or one of these, be their starting point. If a genius appears among us, so much the better; genius has no country, but creates a school for itself. This genius we have not had since Purcell; for though Händel was Anglicised, Händel was still a German, and German composers have made the most of him. We can boast of

Purcell, however, and while he is our glory, he is our shame—since the English musicians who have followed him have reaped no advantages whatever—taken no colour or shape from him. If Auber derives from Grétry—which can hardly be denied, original as he is undoubtedly—why, by this time, should no great Englishman have effected that which, step by step, in retrogression, might be traced back to Purcell? Piccini, Cimarosa, Paesiello, Rossini—say the Italians; Grétry, Méhul, Boieldieu, Auber—say the French; Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, MENDELSSOHN—say the Germans. The English, alas! can say nothing; since, though Purcell was a genius, Arne was not a step onward, while Bishop is equally inferior; and, since Bishop, our composers have presented a medley of styles which, in reality, is no style at all.

The reader may demand, "What has all this to do with the copyright question?" His answer will be found in a consideration of German, French, and Italian music, during their various stages of progress. The earlier melodies of these countries are not a bit superior to those of Ireland, Scotland, Wales, and England; and yet, in this advanced state of the art, England goes to the Continent for music, while the Continent never thinks of applying to England. The moral may be easily pointed—so easily that we do not think it necessary to take the pains ourselves.

SCENE PAINTING has been lately admitted in England to be one of the Fine Arts, and no less artists than Roberts and Stanfield have directed their attention to it. Moving dioramas for the theatres, and scenery (so called) executed by them, were, as specimens of scene painting, exhibited at the back of the stage, splendid works of the kind. But the true dignity of the painter's art, as connected with dramatic representations, appears not to be understood in England or in America. If it were understood, the painter would exert a very different influence; he would not consider that to produce scenery was his only office; but the great dramas would come under his study, as if he had to illustrate them in a pictorial work; their grand and important scenes would, for the chief part, be the realization of his conception, as to the distribution and arrangement of the stage. He would be seen in front of the proscenium an important member of the stage managerial corps, and with his correct eye, and his picturesque imagination, correcting all harsh lines, harmonising colours, heightening effects of contrast, and giving to the foreground the same light and shadow, the same chiaroscuro, which, with a weaker motive and a lesser inspiration, he imparts to the tame and speechless background. But to obtain this light and shade, this chiaroscuro—a thing of the utmost importance, and, for the most part, entirely novel to the stage—the unnatural dispersed light, under the present mode of lighting the stage, would require to be altered.

Here is an addition to the office of stage-manager! Here's work, my masters! Here's consternation among the actors! That crown won't do—that gold is too glittering. To the right and the left he sends red stockings and yellow stockings. Here he is suppressing colour and bringing all into tone; here he adds a white feather, or a little red feather; here he throws a piece of armour upon the ground; here he calls up a piece of drapery. Here a dais, there a column. And thus things of apparently such little importance, as to be now subject to the caprice of a common carpenter or property-maker, might receive the attention and surveillance of the greatest of living painters.

What we should gain by this arrangement, the master genius of the painter alone could inform us, from whom we have all to hope and to expect; but it will convey to us some idea to contemplate, with the assistance of the author of Modern Painters, some dramatic effects which have been the singular production of the painter's genius. The following refers to the treatment of the Massacre of the Innocents, by Tintoret:—

"The artist here does not depend on details of murder or ghastliness of death; there is no blood, no stabbing or cutting, but there is an awful substitute for these in the chiaroscuro. The scene is the outer vestibule of a palace; the slippery marble floor is fearfully barred across by sanguine shadows, so that our eyes seem to become bloodshot and stained with strange horror and deadly vision; a lake of life before them, like the burning sun of the doomed Moabite on the water that came by the way of Edom; a huge flight of stairs, without parapet, descends on the left; down this rush a crowd of women mixed with the murderers; the child in the arms of one has been seized by the limbs; she hurls herself over the edge, and falls head downmost, dragging the child out of the grasp by her weight;—she will be dashed dead in a second: two others are farther in flight, they reach the edge of a deep river,—the water is beat into a hollow by the force of their plunge; close to us is the great struggle, a heap of mothers entangled in one mortal writhe with each other and the swords, one of the murderers dashed down and crushed beneath them, the sword of another caught by the blade and dragged at by a woman's naked hand; the youngest and fairest of the women, the child just torn away from a death grasp, and clasped to her breast with the grip of a steel vice, falls backward helplessly over the heap, right on the sword points; all knit together and hurled down in one hopeless, frenzied, furious abandonment of body and soul in the effort to save. Their shrieks ring in our ears till the marble seems rending around us; but far back, at the bottom of the stairs, there is something in the shadow like a heap of clothes. It is a woman sitting quiet—quite quiet—still as any stone; she looks down steadfastly on her dead child, laid along on the floor before her, and her hand is pressed softly on her brow."

The same writer says:—

"I should exhaust the patience of the reader if I were to dwell at length on the various stupendous developments of the imagination of Tintoret in the Scuola di San Roco alone. I would fain join in that solemn pause of the journey into Egypt, when the silver boughs of the shadowy trees lace with their tremulous lines the alternate folds of fair clouds flushed by faint crimson light, and lie across the streams of blue between those rosy islands, like the white wakes of wandering ships; or watch beside the sleep of the disciples among those massy leaves, that lie so heavily on the dead of the night, beneath the descent of the angel of the agony, and toss fearfully above the motion of the torches as the troop of the betrayer emerges out of the hollow of the olives: or wait through the hour of accusing beside the judgment seat of Pilate, when all is unseen, unfelt, except the one figure that stands with its head bowed down, pale like a pillar of moonlight, half bathed in the glory of the Godhead, half wrapt in the whiteness of the shroud."

When, upon the stage, do we get any such attempts at ideality as this?

Let any one remember the "Belshazzar's Feast," the attitude of Belshazzar—the architecture, the grouping, the chiaroscuro—and suppose only a faint realization of such in the banquet scene in Macbeth.

But how much, we feel, has yet to be learned in this department of the stage, when we contemplate the radical mistake which has been made from the first in scene painting. And that mistake is, the constituting the farthest wings the frame of the painting; thus placing the frame of the picture at the back of the stage. Now, if we look at these things correctly, the proscenium is the frame of the picture and the front of the stage the foreground. We cannot travel to the back of the stage for the foreground of the scene, when the action of the scene is going on in front. Is not this child's play! Surely the principle here laid down displays the only correct method of building stage scenery. We see many improvements that could be made in the machinery of the stage for the accommodation of the painter in working out his perspective; and if it were necessary we could show that it would be perfectly practicable to make the stage represent a mountain summit.

But we will not take up the time of our readers with any further remarks at present on scene painting, but—with these hints—we leave it in the hands of those who understand this subject better than ourselves, that they may tell us what might and ought to be done.

It is evident that it has hitherto been trifled with, and no attempt made at conveying the idea of truth. And truly it is enough to make us blush to think of a few of the absurdities we have seen in this way. What pretty "foot-pieces" we have seen running across the stage as a partition to divide off the river from the "boards." More money is expended upon a scene of fountains and terraces, in one of the ballets at the Italian Opera, than would give truth at least to twenty Shaksperian scenes. But let us once get scenes of truth and connected with actions of thought, and such senseless exhibitions will soon appear "stale, flat and unprofitable." The public will miss the idea, and crave for it; and will not be content with the impossible and the improbable, however gorgeously coloured or however prettily tricked off, since when as taste becomes cultivated into a knowledge and perception of Nature and Truth, it will never receive ——"these tenders for true pay,

Which are not sterling."

THOMAS LLOYD FOWLE'S "HYMN OF PRAISE."

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—I feel sure that, in justice to myself, you will do me the favour to insert this letter in the next number of the Musical World.

After your long criticism on three of my compositions, particularly the "Hymn of Praise for All Nations," composed for and in honour of the Great Exhibition, I really feel bound in justice to myself to write at greater length than under any other circumstances I should have felt justified in doing. I admire an honest, open, and straightforward criticism, and I should generally prefer one that presented an unfavourable appearance to the public, than another which read pleasant to the ear, because the former may usually be looked upon as genuine; the latter, I am sorry to say, are too often like fish which are "caught with a silver hook." But I must be permitted to say, that I think your criticism is rather severe and uncourteous on the composition of one who is only an amateur, and, as you have made several errors which are calculated to mislead the public as to the intention of my little work, I am obliged to answer your remarks severally as they appear. You first say:—"Mr. Fowle is evidently one of a class who have made up their minds that music is one of the most utterly familiar and self-suggestive matters in nature," etc. To this I make no reply, except that I think you have hardly fair ground to come to such a conclusion. You next say:—"To take the 'Hymn of Praise for All Nations,' what can be so utterly destitute of everything that music should possess? In the whole of its twenty-six pages, there is not the ghost of an idea, not a single gleam of artistic accomplishment, except the evidence of those initiatory technical errors which no schoolboy of six months' standing would commit." Although I think this is rather strong language, I am perfectly ready to admit the poverty of the composition. But here I must be permitted to show what my object was in the work, and the Argument at the commencement of the cantata will explain this:—"1. The duty of all nations to worship the Lord, and to sing praises unto Him. 2. The duty to the Sovereign, and the national prayer that God would bless and preserve her. 3. The prayer of the nations, and that God would give us His blessing, and prosper the work of our hands. 4. The uncertainty of life, and that our times are in Jehovah's hand. 5. The manner in which we are to show our gratitude to God for all His mercies. 6. The invitation to all nations to praise and magnify Him for ever." I conceived that the way to show this was to make the composition as simple as possible—so simple, that every person assembled within the building of the Great Exhibition might be able to sing it as easily as the Old Hundredth Psalm. A good musician of the present day, not long since made some such remark to me as the following:—"You might have made so much more of the work; there is subject for a grand composition."—"Yes," I said, "you might have done so, and composed a grand work, and so might Mendelssohn, and many others, but then you must have altered the title of the work, and the intention altogether. How could you compose music, really grand music, or how could Mendelssohn write such fine music as his 'Hymn of Praise,' with the same view as I have had in my Hymn, and then call it as I have done, 'Hymn of Praise for All Nations,' when there would not be one person out of a hundred or a thousand of the vast assemblage at the Great Exhibition that could sing a note of it?" And here I give you the notice of my hymn from the Guardian, because it expresses something of my meaning, and because I am told that it comes from the pen of a first-rate musician:—"This work is within the compass of all players and vocalists; its simple grandeur of style is well fitted for its comprehensive title, and will form a pleasing and appropriate musical record of the great and all-absorbing event of the never-to-be-forgotten year of 1851."

You next go on to say, "We commence with an overture representing the march of the nations, and go on through a series of choruses, recitatives, and solos (including, strangely enough, a verse of the National Anthem, arranged by Vincent Novello)." Why strange that I should introduce the National Anthem? Was it strange that the National Anthem was sung at the opening of the Great Exhibition for which my work was composed? And could I have shown the second point in my argument, viz., "The duty to the Sovereign and the national prayer that God would bless and preserve her," half as well in any other way, as by introducing the National Anthem, which goes more to the feelings of Englishmen than anything else? And Mr. Novello gave me permission to make use of the arrangement by Mr. Vincent Novello.

You next say—and it is really the only part of your criticism that in the least degree annoys me—"It is evident, however (and this is the worst part of the matter), that Mr. Fowle has a very much higher opinion of his bantling than we have been able to arrive at. Had this work been modestly put forth as a first attempt, we might have hoped that an acquaintance with the works of great men would have shown its author how much he had to learn, and, perhaps, stimulated him to the necessary acquirement. Nothing of the kind, however." Pardon me, but you are greatly in error on this point. In the original edition of my "Hymn of Praise," there appeared the following preface:—"It is with unfeigned diffidence that the author submits the following sacred cantata to the indulgence and patronage of the public. To those numerous friends who have so kindly and liberally given their support to this, the first essay of a youthful lover of music, he begs leave to return his most grateful thanks, and to remark that, whilst he did not dare to aim at anything great, he was wishful to commemorate in as simple and pleasing manner as he could a triumph of art and industry unprecedented in the history of the world, the celebration of which has assembled in the capital of England's Queen the admiring nations of the world." The edition you have now reviewed from is one which has lately appeared in a cheaper form, the price being reduced from 7*s.* 6*d.* to 4*s.* and I was advised by Mr. Novello to omit the subscribers' names, and consequently the preface. But I must remind you this is not the first time my little work has been reviewed in your columns. If you refer back to a number of your journal for November, 1851, you will find something like the following, from the pen of no less a person than Mr. Macfarren, of whose opinion I have the highest respect:—"Mr. Fowle, a young amateur of the art, takes occasion to remark, that, whilst he did not dare to aim at anything great, he was wishful to commemorate in as simple and pleasing manner as he could," etc. [quoting my preface]. "After this, of course, we expect not greatness, and we certainly find simplicity, and doubt not but that the work will be pleasing to some. Mr. Fowle has a long list of subscribers, whom he thanks gracefully in his preface, and he dedicates his sacred cantata to Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen, and all her assembled guests from the four quarters of the globe." I think this criticism of Mr. Macfarren hardly coincides with the one with which you have now favoured me. I think it is not very surprising that I should thus dedicate my Hymn to Her Majesty, as His Royal Highness Prince Albert had honoured me by being a subscriber. At all events, Mr. Macfarren did not appear to regard it as a piece of "deplorable impertinence."

With regard to my Hymn for the Fast Day, "Great God of Hosts," I think if you had taken a further glance at the same, you would have seen and acknowledged that it was superior to any piece in the "Hymn of Praise." I do not mean to say that I think there is anything whatever original in it; but I do mean to say that I am neither ashamed of the harmony or the arrangement in any way whatever, and the Morning Herald says:—"This composition does credit to the taste and scholarship of Mr. Fowle." Perhaps the Morning Herald is no judge of such matters. With respect to the "Spring-time Divertisement," if there are really any gross grammatical errors, I shall be greatly indebted to you to point them out to me.

One word more, and I have done. After your long and somewhat severe criticism, I think it right, in justice to myself, to say that I am only an amateur, and one almost self-taught, that the law has been my profession for the last five or six years, and, consequently, that I have had but little time for music—that eight or nine years ago, I did not know a note of music. My sister first taught me my notes, and I have never had any instruction from a master in any branch of the science. If you and your readers will then reflect for one moment, I think that you will not regard it as a matter of very great surprise if I do show some ignorance in music, but that the little I do know, and my being competent to fill the post of organist in my father's church is, under the circumstances, by no means discreditable to me.

I really am very sorry to have troubled you at this length, but I am sure you will, in justice to myself, not refuse to insert this letter in the next number of the Musical World.

I am, Sir, your very obedient servant and subscriber,
THOMAS LLOYD FOWLE.

The Parsonage, Amesbury, November 6, 1854.

[We insert Mr. Fowle's long letter, because he appears to think a special hardship dealt out to him as an amateur. On the letter itself we have to make just three remarks:—Firstly, much as we regret our unintentional laceration of the author's feelings, we cannot, on that account, alter our opinion of his work. Secondly, we could not know that Mr. Fowle is "only an amateur,"—indeed, we inferred, from his title-page, that he was a thoroughly confident practitioner. We dealt with his work as we do with all music printed for public use and sent to us for review—we examined it as so much music, and totally irrespective of the quarter from which it might come. Lastly, we are not influenced by, nor can have any concern with, the opinions of our contemporaries.—ED.]

CRYSTAL PALACE BAND.

SIR,—I was greatly surprised to find, in your publication of Saturday Nov. 18, so acrimonious a censure upon my conduct in discharge of my duty as Director of the Crystal Palace Band; and, in reply to your remarks—which I rest assured are the result of misconception—I need only say, that, were you acquainted with the facts relating to the dismissal of Mr. Manns, you would not have indulged in so ungenerous a strain of criticism, or rendered the columns of your paper the medium of so unmerited an attack upon a public officer.

In reference to the letter of Mr. Manns, I have only to remark, that it abounds with misrepresentations, and, to the meanest capacity, must appear the result of chagrin—because I found it necessary to dispense with his services. However, I shall deem it a favour if you will be good enough to put your readers in possession of the truth, to prevent any further misunderstanding.

Having engaged Mr. Manns to assist me in copying music, and to act as my amanuensis, also to play the second clarionet part in the band—and, in fact, to make himself generally useful—I found, at the expiration of a few months, that I could dispense with his services. On notifying my intention to him, he seemed greatly disappointed, and adopted the expedient of appealing to the Board of Directors, who, after due consideration, declined to entertain his views on the subject, and therefore refused to interfere on his behalf.

In explanation of Mr. Mann's assertion respecting the "Alliance Quadrilles," I have only to say that, having placed in his hands the first figure (of Turkish airs), and the finale—both in my own handwriting—and, moreover, arranged for the pianoforte—also, three volumes, containing 100 English, 100 Irish, and 100 Scotch airs, arranged by various composers, and published in London—besides these, a large volume of French songs and national airs (having previously marked those portions I had selected and wished to introduce)—I then explained to Mr. Manns the order in which I wished to have them placed, and requested of him to make a fair copy for pianoforte, as I had resolved upon that arrangement with a view to subsequent publication. Now, sir, under these circumstances, I cannot see upon what grounds Mr. Manns can lay claim to these quadrilles as a composition, inasmuch as he merely acted as my copying clerk in the carrying out of my views.

As to the position of sub-director, which Mr. Manns erroneously arrogates to himself, I beg to say that the Board of Directors of the Crystal Palace Company have never appointed such an officer as a sub-director. Mr. Manns was merely one of the Crystal Palace band; and if, when absent, I allowed him to act for me, it was merely a privilege which I had given to other individuals, whom I consider equally as efficient as that gentleman.

In conclusion, I may now add that I shall take no further notice of this matter; and I must say that it is my opinion that, if every public officer who may be called upon, under a board of directors, in the discharge of his duty, to dismiss one or more of his staff of assistants, be subject to the unprovoked animadversions of the press for so doing, it will be soon a difficult thing for any man to escape vituperation.

Requesting you will give the above a place in your next publication, I have the honour to be, sir, Your most obedient servant,
Sydenham, 24th November, 1854. H. SCHALLEHN.

[In justice to Herr Schallehn, we insert his answer to Herr Mann's complaint, which appeared in No 46. How far it is satisfactory, we leave our readers to judge.—ED. M. W.]

HARMONIC UNION.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—On my attendance at Exeter Hall on Monday evening last, to hear the performance of "Judas Maccabæus" by the London Sacred Harmonic Society, I was solicited to sign a petition to Mr. Sterndale Bennett to become the conductor to the "Harmonic Union" for this season.

I am not a member of any of the Harmonic Societies, although a very regular attendant at the performances of all, and, being now resolved to join one of them, I should be glad if you or any of your readers would favour me with any information respecting the Harmonic Union; and also whether there is any foundation for a report that I heard from three persons on Monday evening, that the Harmonic Union of last season owes Mr. Benedict, their late conductor, an arrear of about £80, which he is unable to obtain, and which was assigned by my informants as the reason why he declines to resume the office of conductor this season. I am, sir, yours very respectfully,
November 22nd, 1854. AN AMATEUR.

MUSIC WITHOUT WORDS.—"What does it mean?" is often asked of a fine piece of music without words. The truth is, the meaning of music lies hidden in those deeper and more mysterious regions of the human soul's every day experience, which it is as vain to ignore as it is impossible to render into the distinct tones of thought. Music is deeper than speech, and makes its appeal to that within us that is deeper than thoughts of the understanding. Music expresses that part of our best and deepest consciousness, which needs precisely such a fluid, sympathetic language as its tones alone afford. Music begins where words leave off; by it our inmost, spiritual natures commune with each other. Hence the loftiest poetry, the most inspired and subtle charm of conversation, in short, that magical something that distinguishes the utterances of genius in its high hour, in whatsoever form, is an approximation to music, and sets the finest chords to vibrating within us in somewhat the same way. The effect of music could hardly be described more accurately than in the very terms in which the higher ranges of Coleridge's conversation are described by his nephew, in the preface to the "Table Talk." For example:

"I have seen him at times when you could not incarnate him,—when he shook aside your petty questions or doubts, and burst with some impatience through the obstacles of common conversation. Then, escaped from the flesh, he would soar upwards into an atmosphere almost too rare to breathe, but which seemed proper to him, and there he would float at ease. Like enough, what Coleridge then said, his subtlest listener would not understand as a man understands a newspaper; but upon such a listener there would steal an influence, and an impression, and a sympathy; there would be a gradual attempering of his body and spirit, till his total being vibrated with one pulse alone, and thought became merged in contemplation;—

> 'And so, his senses gradually wrapt
> In a half sleep, he'd dream of better worlds,
> And dreaming hear thee still, O singing lark,
> That sangest like an angel in the clouds!'"

CHEAP HANGING.—(From La France Musicale.)—A German pianist, Herr L———, led for some years a life of strict reclusion in a village of Alsatia, whither he had retired to enjoy an easy competency, the fruit of twenty years' exertions. His mind was somewhat touched. After he had cultivated his art with enthusiasm, a sort of splenetic melancholy got possession of him, and at last he cursed both music and musicians, becoming so violent that it was not possible for him to hear a singer or instrumentalist without giving way to the most furious excess of rage. From Berlin he had fled to Frankfort, thence to Mayence, and finally to Strasburgh; and, as he was everywhere pursued by voices and instruments, ended by shutting himself up in a little hamlet with scarcely two hundred inhabitants. From time to time, his eccentricities attracted attention. One day, for instance, he heard an organ playing under his windows He had such a horror of music, that he rushed down into the street, and, taking the screeching instrument from the hand. of the poor Italian, whose fortune it was, threw it beneath his feet, and broke it into a thousand pieces. He was obliged to indemnify the poor devil, which he did not do without a pang, for he was very avaricious. But the following is the most curious part of his history. One morning he proceeded to a ropemaker's at the end of the village, and wanted to purchase a piece of rope ten feet long. The ropemaker asked fifteen pence, but this struck Herr L——— as too much, and he offered the ropemaker one shilling and a halfpenny. Not being able to come to a satisfactory agreement, the poor crack-brained musician went home very contentedly, but returned to haggle for the piece of rope in question the next day. The ropemaker would not abate his price, however, and Herr L——— again retired, and again returned the next day. For a whole month did this system of offering and refusing last, until one Sunday the ropemaker happened to go out, and leave his apprentice in charge of the shop. "Once for all, will you let me have that rope for a shilling and a halfpenny?" enquired the exasperated musician, opening the door. The apprentice, ignorant of what had taken place, folded up the rope, and gave it to the musician. An hour afterwards, Herr L——— was found hanging from a tree. He had committed suicide with the rope on which he had saved twopence halfpenny.

THEATRICAL ENGAGEMENTS IN FRANCE.—It has frequently been decided by the French courts that a married woman cannot contract a theatrical engagement without the express or tacit authorisation of her husband. On Saturday the question was raised before the President of the Civil Tribunal, sitting in chambers, whether or not a married woman can become a dramatic author without such consent:—Madame Roger de Beauvoir, formerly Mdlle. Doze, of the Theatre Français, is separated from her husband. Some time ago she wrote a piece in one act, called Entre Deux Airs, which was accepted by the Theatre des Variétés. Recently it was put in rehearsal. Thereupon M. Roger de Beauvoir gave a formal notice that he would not allow the rehearsals to continue. Mdme. Roger de Beauvoir accordingly, on Saturday, applied to a judge in chambers for authorisation to continue the rehearsals in spite of her husband's opposition. M. Roger de Beauvoir, on the contrary, demanded that they should be positively forbidden until a full court could decide whether or not he had the power to prevent his wife from becoming a dramatic author. The president decided, as rehearsals are not the same thing as a performance, that they may be continued, until the opinion of the court can be obtained on the main question.—Galignani.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MDLLE. ST. MARC begs to inform her Friends and Pupils she has removed to 33, Argyle-street, Regent-street.

MISS RANSFORD begs to announce that she will give her first Soirée Musicale on Monday next, December 4th, at her residence, 59, Welbeck Street, Cavendish Square.

BEAUMONT INSTITUTION CONCERTS.—The First Concert of the Season, Monday, December 11. Artistes engaged: Mrs. Sims Reeves, Miss Clara Henderson, Madame Anna Thillon, late Prima Donna of the Impérial Opéra-Comique, Paris; Mr. A. Wallworth, and the unrivalled English tenor, Mr. Sims Reeves. Piano, Mr. Hirst. Conductor, Mr. Frank Mori. Balcony, 2s.; Reserved Seats, 2s. 6d. Commence at Half-past Seven. Communications respecting these Concerts are requested to be addressed to Mr. D. Francis, the Director, at the Institution, Mile End.

CONCERTINA CONCERT.—MISS LAVINIA MARY TAYLOR begs to announce her Annual Grand Evening Concertina Concert, on Monday, December 18, 1854, in the Large Room of the London Tavern, City, on which occasion she will be assisted by the following eminent artistes:—Vocal, Madame and Mr. Weiss, Miss M. Wells, Miss J. Wells, and Mr. Montem Smith. Instrumental, Mr. Richard Blagrove, Mr. Distin, sen., Mr. G. Case, Mr. J. Case, and Mr. C. Blagrove. Tickets, Dress Reserved Seats, 5s.; Reserved, 3s. 6d.; Unreserved, 2s. 6d. To be had of all music-sellers, the London Tavern, and at S. C. Taylor's music warehouse, 84, Leadenhall-street, City.

CHAPPELL'S FOREIGN MODEL PIANOFORTE.—PRICE FIFTY GUINEAS.—This instrument has (unlike the ordinary cottage pianoforte) THREE STRINGS, and the fullest grand compass of SEVEN OCTAVES. It is strengthened by every possible means to endure the greatest amount of wear, and to stand perfectly in any climate. The workmanship is of the best description, the tone is round, full, and rich, and the power equal to that of a Bichord Grand. The Case is of the most elegant construction in Rosewood, (vide the sketch), the touch elastic, and the repetition very rapid. Every possible precaution has been taken to insure its standing well in tune. Mr. Chappell especially invites the attention of the public, the profession, and merchants to the FOREIGN MODEL, feeling assured that no pianoforte, in all respects comparable, has hitherto been made in England at the same price. Every instrument will be warranted, and (if desired) exchanged within twelve months of the purchase. 50, New Bond-street, London.

THE ROYAL PANOPTICON OF SCIENCE AND ART, LEICESTER SQUARE.—The Building comprises a large circular Hall, 100 feet in diameter, and 100 feet high, surrounded by three Galleries, and surmounted by a Dome, the whole gorgeously decorated in the Saracenic style of architecture. The Exhibition includes a splendid Fountain, throwing the water 100 feet, a Crystal Tank, holding 6000 gallons of water, for the display of Messrs. Heinke's Diving Apparatus, of the Electric Light under water, and other subaqueous experiments, a Cosmorama of St. Petersburg with Portrait of the Emperor Nicholas, a Transparent Screen, 32 feet wide, and 36 feet high, for the display of Dioramic Views, of the Chromatrope, and of other optical effects; a magnificent Organ, containing 4,004 pipes, with the bellows worked by steam power, the richest and most powerful instrument of its kind in existence, on which a variety of Sacred and Operatic Music is performed daily at intervals, by Mr. W. T. Best, the Organist of the Institution; a gigantic Electric Machine, the largest ever constructed, the plate ten feet in diameter, with a large Leyden Battery attached; Voltaic Batteries of high power on a novel principle; and in the two Galleries, a variety of machinery and manufacturing processes in action, including the Nassau Steam Printing Machine, a complete series of Whitworth's Machinery, Kirby and Beard's Pin and Needle Machines, Perkins' Apparatus for the Combustion of Steel, Brock's Ornamental Sawing Machine, Prideaux's Patent Self-closing Furnace Valve for the prevention of smoke, &c., an Ascending Carriage, Brett's Electric Telegraph, &c., &c.; a selection of Sculpture, including Monti's Veiled Figure, "The Houri," executed expressly for the Institution, a Gallery of Pictures on sale, and other objects of Art. Distin's celebrated Flügel Horn Union very evening. Attached to the Institution are two Lecture Rooms, in which demonstrations are given several times daily, in various branches of Science and Art, and Lectures delivered from time to time on Literary and Scientific subjects: a spacious Laboratory and Chemical School; a Photographic Gallery, in which portraits are taken. Open daily: Morning, 12 to 5; Evening (Saturday excepted), 7 to 10. Admission 1s.: Schools and Children under 10, half price.

PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Dec. 6, 1854.

NEVER did city present a drearier appearance than Paris for a week past. Rain, hail, snow, mud, and slush in the streets; cough, cold, influenza, and every kind of catarrhal annoyance at home. Authors unable to obtain any species of inspiration, with their brains heavy as lead, and their fingers cold as a stone. Singers trying in vain to escape the prevalent epidemic, rushing to American overalls and warm wrappers during the day, and to posset and hot grog at bed-time. And the public? that light-hearted, gay, insouciant, careless, and delightful Parisian public, utterly unable to get up a smile, devoured with spleen and blue devils, moody over Sebastopol and the fortunes of the war, coughing, sneezing, and nose-blowing in dismal chorus, and unexcited by novelty at any opera or theatre in the great French metropolis. Here is a beautiful subject whereon to indite an epistle. A correspondent of a well known London journal sent to Italy in hot haste at the outbreak of the revolution of '48, having kept perfect silence for a fortnight, and those who sent him being anxious for intelligence, replied to the letter inquiring of his whereabouts—"There is no news, and Milan is a pleasant city to live in." Such were the fruits of his fortnight's gestation. I might follow his example, and merely say there is no musical news, and, but for the weather, Paris would not be a disagreeable city. In truth, the slow progress of the war has disappointed those who expected the allies had but to come, see, and conquer, and "their ignorant impatience" while all is progressing slowly and surely, has aided the weather in damping the spirits of those who are usually steady supporters of opera and theatre. Consequently, although Sophie Cruvelli at the Opéra, Marie Cabel at the Théâtre-Lyrique, and Caroline Duprez at the Opéra-Comique, have continued to draw good houses to their respective theatres, the managers have wisely postponed the production of novelty until the weather brightens, and the reinforcements arrive at the seat of war. It cannot rain for ever, and sooner or later the steamers will perform their appointed task and convey to the allied armies these numbers in which alone they are inferior to their foe. A day's sunshine, a good report from Canrobert in the Moniteur, and Paris will assume its accustomed tone. The elasticity of the French character will show itself for the hundredth time, and dullness and gloom give place to mirth, gaiety, and joy.

I gave you, in my last, a catalogue of the various novelties in rehearsal, and hope, in my next, to inform you of the amount of success achieved, and of the merit or demerit brought to light by the production of some of them, at least. I may add to the list Berlioz's oratorio, or "trilogy," L'Enfance de Christ, which will be given on Tuesday next, and in which the eccentric but able composer has followed the example of Mendelssohn, and compiled both words and music. Meanwhile, I may say that Cruvelli has improved every time she has appeared in the Huguenots, and has completely disarmed even the criticism which has hitherto been uniformly hostile. When I inform you that the feuilletonists of the Indépendance Belge has grounded his arms, admitted her great talent, and declared that it is a pity her salary is so large as to enable her to despise wholesome and judicious criticism! (his own, by the gods), you can have no stronger proof of her music having had charms to soothe the savage breast.

Meanwhile, place for the Emperor of Russia! who has just appeared in Paris, not in propriâ personâ, with suite of Cossack Grenadiers of the Guard and other savages of various denominations, but represented by his advocate M. Narguier, and as a suitor at the Palais de Justice. "The Emperor of Russia against Berton"—such is the title of the Cause, and the Bill of Complaint is as follows: M. Berton, a French actor of distinguished merit (a son of the late celebrated composer of the same name), succeeded M. Bressant as premier sujet at the Imperial Theatre of St. Petersburgh. His was the joyful task to impart mirth and repose to the imperial heart, when wearied with musings over English ambition or Turkish domination. Was the Emperor charmed with a bulletin from Bebutoff, announcing for the hundredth time the extermination of Schamyl and his villainous band, where could he so well bestow his mirth as at the pleasant French theatre? Did he receive a despatch from Brunow or Kisseloff, whereby his Czarship was annoyed at reports of infidel English and heretical Frenchmen allying for his humiliation, where should he seek distraction save from his French comedians? Did his Majesty preside at a "Te Deum" for the victories over pagan Turks at Citate and Oltenitza, what more charming than to relieve the Greek chaunt by the French witticism? In short, if grave or gay, if lively or severe, the French theatre was a necessity to the Emperor Nicholas. Now Berton had remained at St. Petersburgh for eleven long years; his mother was old, his country sunny and civilized, and so he demanded permission to go to France and to embrace his parent. With difficulty he obtained one month's leave of absence, and General Gudeonoff—for such is the [illegible] of the stage manager at St. Petersburgh—insisted on his return at the expiration of thirty days, under pain of the [illegible] and other marks of Imperial favour. Berton arrived in France at the close of last year, and perceiving unmistakable symptoms of approaching hostilities between the Emperor Napoleon and the Czar, he declined to return, and thereby, unquestionably, broke the terms of his engagement. For this the Emperor of Russia sues the comedian, and a French Court, in the excess of their liberality, award him 50,000 francs damages. Here was a spoiling of the Philistines! here was a good round sum in hard cash towards the expenses of the war! With 50,000 francs, or the produce of it, much might be done to afflict the enemy; and so thought Berton, too good a patriot to furnish arms to his country's foe. He accordingly appealed, the case has just been heard, and a more reasonable tribunal struck off a cipher, and transferred 5,000 francs from the actor to the Emperor. M. Berton has accepted an engagement at the Gymnase, paid the sum awarded to the Imperial suitor, and will take care how he approaches the Russian frontier.

Another scene of a different sort has this week attracted the attention of many of the French notabilities. The young Marquis de G———, a scion of one of the best French families, became devotedly attached to an actress more renowned for her charms than her virtues, Mdlle. Constance, of the Variétés. His infatuation was such that he determined to marry her, who was then his mistress, as she had previously been that of half Paris. His family, hearing of his folly, got him at once shipped off to the Crimea, the fair one remaining at Paris. Love, however (and such love), is determined to vanquish all difficulties, and, accordingly, Mdlle. Constance has left the stage, and this week she sold her mobilier and diamonds. All Paris attended the sale, and I regret to say that some of her bijouterie found purchasers among women of rank who should have known better. Among the articles enumerated in the catalogue were five gentlemen's breast pins in gold. Were they the gift of the Marquis, or of others? In either case their exposure and sale might afford him food for reflection. The total produce of the sale was not less than 300,000 francs, and the eagerness displayed to purchase was little creditable to Parisian good taste, or French morality.*

I was wrong in stating that the Société de Sainte-Cécile had "given up the ghost." It gave its first séance for the season on Sunday week. I was right, however, as to the secession of M. Seghers, the conductor, who has yielded the bâton to M. Barbereau. The last-named, a few years since, directed the orchestra of the Théâtre-Italien. Among the vocalists at the first concert was Mdlle. Camille Berg, a soprano, who made her début, and sang the "Inflammatus" from Rossini's Stabat, and a ballad from Preciosa. The overture to Guillaume Tell, the Pavane, a Chœur de Danse of the sixteenth century, instrumented for the orchestra by M. Weckerlin, the symphony in C minor of Beethoven, and the whole of Weber's Preciosa, were presented with more or less effect. The second concert will be devoted to the works of living composers. Among the works selected by the committee, is a new symphony for full orchestra by M. Georges Mathias, the pianist.

* The Siècle gives a version of this story, which differs materially from that of our correspondent.

Mdlle. Clauss made her début with complete success on the 24th ultimo, in Amsterdam, at one of the concerts of the Society Felix Meritis. The playing of the young and gifted artist was especially lauded by the connoisseur.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

EXCHEQUER CHAMBER, Nov. 20.

(Sittings in Error.—Present, Barons Parke and Platt, and Justices Maule, Cresswell, and Williams.)

HUGHES V. LUMLEY.

Mr. Unthank moved to quash the proceedings in error in this case, on the ground that they did not fall within the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act. It was an action of ejectment brought to recover possession of Her Majesty's Theatre. A special case had been agreed upon, and there had been an undertaking not to bring error. The case had been decided on the 24th of November, and a rule in error had been lodged, so that the plaintiffs were kept out of the fruits of their verdict. There was now an offer of £9,000 a-year for the theatre.

Rule granted.

EXCHEQUER CHAMBER, Dec. 2.

(Present, the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas and Justices Maule, and Wightman, and the Chief Baron and Barons Parke and Platt.)

HUGHES V. LUMLEY.

In this case a rule had been obtained for quashing the proceedings in error, on the ground that the matter had been turned into a special case, and that it had been arranged that error should not be brought.

Mr. Hoggins and Mr. Wise now showed cause, contending that, under the recent Common Law Procedure Act, the defendant was entitled to bring error.

The Court, however, decided that, under the circumstances, error could not be brought.

Rule absolute.

ALBERT SMITH'S ASCENT OF MONT BLANC.

The popular entertainment at the Egyptian Hall has this year received sundry additions, and has undergone various changes without in the least deteriorating from its quality, or setting aside the main feature of its attraction. To the Ascent of Mont Blanc, Mr. Albert Smith has prefixed a Tour through Holland and up the Rhine, which constitutes the first part of the representation, and leads directly en route to the Alps. The new introduction is entirely worthy of being combined with what follows it. If not so exciting and absorbing in its details as the description of the Ascent of Mont Blanc, it is no less interesting and amusing in another sense, is written with equal fluency and vivacity, sustained with the same unflagging spirit, and in an equal degree exhibits that knowledge of the requirements of the modern public, which renders Mr. Albert Smith a true "philosopher of the times," as M. Jullien has been called. The new lecture possesses one advantage over the old, which cannot fail to take with the visitors; the illustrations are better painted and more varied. They are principally from the pencil of Mr. W. Beverley, to whose talent and experience they do infinite credit. The following are admirable specimens of the pictorial art in scene-painting:—Amsterdam on the Rokin Canal, in a bright sunshine; the Village of Broek; and the High Street of Berne. Mr. Beverley has also additionally illustrated the Ascent of Mont Blanc by four views—the Pass of the Gemmi; the Hut lately erected on the Grands Mulets; Lyons; and the Place de la Concorde, Paris. M. Gropius of Berlin has likewise furnished a Panorama of the Rhine, which possesses great merits; so that, on the whole, Mr. Albert Smith's entertainment is more varied and interesting even than before.

The season began on Monday night. There was an overwhelming crowd; Mr. Albert Smith was received with distinguished honour; the lecture amused and delighted everybody; and everybody expressed a determination to come again.

Mr. Albert Smith's Tour up the Rhine is as good as a book. More pleasant facts, indeed, may be pleasantly learned from witnessing his entertainment than from reading any volume of peregrinations up the king of romantic rivers. More amusement, certainly, and—unless to very acute observers bent upon acquiring absolute knowledge—more information, local and legendary, is presented by Mr. Smith in his own light and winning manner, than by the best authenticated work from the presses of Albemarle-street or Paternoster-row.

To conclude, we would say, that Mr. Albert Smith's new version of the "Ascent" is a decided improvement on the old.

There is more relief in the present lecture, more variety, and more "fun." Several of the stories introduced in the first part are "regular screamers." A new song, called "Up the Rhine," is one of the happiest efforts of Mr. Albert Smith's poetic pen, and is a worthy compeer to his famous patter ballad, "Galignani's Messenger," with which the Ascent to Mont Blanc may be said to wind up. It is needless to add, that the entertainment was characterised by strict punctuality as to its commencement and the time elapsing between the parts, and that, as heretofore, the servants in the room were remarkable for their attention and politeness.

ORGAN.

THE NEW ORGAN FOR ST. MARTIN'S.

In the fine church of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields stood, until very recently, an organ said to have been—and indeed, we believe, so announced by an inscription on the case—presented to the church by George the Second. That some such royal gift was made to the parish is likely enough; but the thing so given, George the Second's own organ, if ever erected in the church, must have disappeared long since, for the instrument just removed, to make way for its more pretentious successor, was certainly built by either William or John Gray the elder, the founders of the celebrated firm now practising in the New-road. This organ was thin in quality, probably at no time very remarkable for excellence, and certainly had not improved by keeping. Like many instruments of the same date, it was frequently more abused than it deserved. Its critics, committing the error of comparing dissimilar things, loudly condemned its poverty in contrast with the breadth and volume of modern tone; and entirely lost sight of many points of quality charming in themselves, characteristic of their date, and capable, under proper management, of excellent effect. Neither the maker nor his time was famous for reeds, and his work of this description in the old organ was certainly detestable enough to warrant anything that has been said of it. But had this organ been four times as good as it was, the time was full ripe for its giving place to a more modern instrument. It was altogether out of date. Its compass, composition, and general distribution were wholly and irremediably old fashioned. No player could either make or sustain a reputation on such an instrument; and with the progress which the love of good organ-playing is now making, a fine instrument will be found to be quite as great a temptation to a man of ability as a large salary.

As the church is a very fine one—(it is, beyond doubt, the chef d'œuvre of its architect, Gibbs)—as the locality is the central and best known in the metropolis, and as the authorities had resolved on possessing themselves of a first-class instrument, it was reasonably to be expected that the new organ would come from the hands of one of the three great London builders. But neither Gray and Davison, nor Hill, nor Bishop, were in the smallest degree consulted, nor invited to tender plans about the matter. After a very slight struggle among the organ-builders resident in the parish, the prize fell quietly into the hands of Messrs. Bevington, Greek-street, Soho. The opportunity is momentous for the Messrs. Bevington, and should prove the flood-tide of their fortune. Taking into consideration the comparative magnitude of the instrument, the importance of the building for which it is destined, and the concession made in its favour (and to propriety and good sense, by the way), in allowing it the full range of height from the lower gallery to the roof—(the old organ was stowed away, like something of utter insignificance to the church, in a kind of cock-loft, called the "Upper Gallery")—we may safely say that, for many years past, no London organ-builder has had so valuable an opportunity for the display of his skill;—to what extent the Messrs. Bevington will avail themselves of their fortunate position, remains to be seen.

The compass of the new organ now standing in St. Martin's Church is, on the manuals, from CC to G, 56 notes, and on the pedals two octaves and a-half, from CCC. Its composition is shewn in the subjoined table of registers:—

All this music was very creditably executed by a large body of singers composed of the choirs of the Temple and the Chapel Royal. To Mr. Hopkins, the organist of the Temple Church, was entrusted the duty of giving public speech for the first time to the new organ, and, certainly, the office could not have fallen into abler hands. He accompanied the vocal music, and played several voluntaries, with all the exact skill and refined taste which ever distinguish his performance. Side by side with Mr. Hopkins's name in the programme, and equally "displayed," as the printers say, we find the words "Precentor, Rev. T. Helmore." What the Rev. T. Helmore did on the occasion, except "intoning" the service,* or what was the particular necessity for his presence, it would puzzle any one, even himself, we think, to tell. Assuredly, neither organist nor choir stood in need of any assistance which the Rev. Mr. Helmore could supply. But "precentor" is a sounding title; it smacks relishingly of olden times; and—and the fact is, some people will have a little notoriety at any price.

On the merits of the organ itself, we decline, at present, to offer the smallest opinion. The builders themselves, we are assured, do not consider it yet completely finished; and there would be a manifest unfairness in speaking of a work which may probably exhibit some of the unavoidable crudities of hasty preparation. Neither does a musical service, such as that of Thursday, afford the proper opportunity of testing all the qualities of an organ with sufficient completeness to warrant a full and decided judgment. Its completion, however, will not, we are informed, be delayed more than a few days; and our readers may rely on an account of it consistent with its magnitude and pretension.

In another part of our paper will be found a sensible and modestly written letter from Messrs. Kirtland and Jardine, of Manchester, which, long though it be, we insert, because we appear, unintentionally, to have done them an injustice in classing them among the would-be inventors of that which is, assuredly, the proto-original system of organ building. For this, however, Messrs. Kirtland and Jardine are indebted to some of their injudicious friends who certainly claim for them what, for themselves, they, very properly, disavow. What they do claim, will be seen from their letter. The words, "wrangle in private," which, no doubt, read oddly enough to Messrs. Kirtland and Jardine, will be seen, from an erratum in our last number, to have been a typographical error.

* And this is not necessarily the Precentor's duty. The word "Precentor" is a corrupt or monkish latinity, and obviously means just such an officer among a choir of singers, as does "leading man" among a company of "navvies."

HANDEL, in 1747-8-9, produced several oratorios at the Opera-house, which were unsuccessful, and ill attended. One evening, before the rising of the curtain for Theodora, when scarcely a dozen persons were assembled, some one expressed a regret to the composer that he saw so few there. "Never mint," replied Händel, as pleasantly as philosophically, "de moosic will sount de better." He was rejoiced if any professors not engaged in the orchestra would accept of tickets of admission. When the Messiah was produced, and created such a furore, two gentlemen, who had offended Händel by not attending the performance of his previous oratorios, applied to him for orders to hear it. "Ach!" retorted he, "your serfant, Meinherr! You teufelish dainty! You would not co to Theodora; der vaas room enough to tance dere ven dat was perform!"

PROVINCIAL.

MANCHESTER.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The second concert of the Classical Chamber Society was given at the Town Hall on Thursday, the 30th ult., when the room was again well filled, despite a comfortless wet November night. The following was the programme:—

PART I.—Trio Concertante—Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello (in E Minor, Op. 119), Spohr. Grand Sonata—Pianoforte and Violoncello (in B Flat, Op. 45), Mendelssohn.

PART II.—Grand Trio—Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello (in E Flat, Op. 70, No. 2), Beethoven. Solo—Violin—Two Melodies (Ballade in B minor, and Allegretto Grazioso in F), Molique; Chaconne (with additional Accompaniments for the Pianoforte by Mendelssohn), S. Bach. Solo—Pianoforte—Nocturne (in B Major, Op. 32, No 1), Grand Scherzo (in B Flat Minor, Op. 31), Chopin.

Herr Molique, Signor Piatti, and Mr. Charles Hallé, were the sole executants of the above programme. Spohr's trio was played with the greatest effect by the three. In the andante of Mendelssohn's Duo Sonata, Piatti's playing surpassed all I ever heard from him before in tenderness and expression. It was more like the impassioned outpouring of a human voice than the violoncello. The second part opened with our old favourite—the trio in E flat. The performance was relished immensely by the audience, who applauded each movement most heartily. Herr Molique displayed his peculiar talents as a violinist in the three pieces set down for him—two short melodies of his own, and the quaint Chaconne, in D minor, of the old master. Mr. Charles Hallé selected for his solo displays pieces peculiarly suited to him. The Nocturne in B major was an example of the tender and plaintive; but the scherzo is extremely difficult. And so ended most successfully the second concert of the Classical Chamber Music Society for the season 1854-5.

The German and Italian opera season draws fast to a close, and is still hampered by the difficulties and changes which have been throughout so damaging to its success. On Thursday, the 30th, the second Classical Chamber Concert would, of course, help to thin the audience, but had nothing to do with the change of opera. I Puritani was changed to Der Freischütz. Friday (Signor Benedetti's benefit), Les Huguenots drew a good house. On Saturday, Don Giovanni was announced, and all the lovers of Mozart were on the qui vive, anticipating a great treat; but, lo, and behold! during the day, bills were put forth proclaiming the substitution of I Puritani with part of Semiramide! Monday last, the Zauberflöte was announced. When the people got to the doors, they found, in consequence of the absence of Madame Heinrich, the opera was changed to Robert le Diable; and those who entered the house, after waiting until near eight o'clock, were told that, in consequence of the sudden indisposition of Madame Rudersdorff, Lucrezia Borgia would be given instead. I need hardly say, this continual changing is disastrous to the speculation. On Tuesday last, I again went to hear Don Giovanni. As there was a delay of a quarter of an hour in opening the doors, I expected some other opera would be given, or some apology made. The latter we had, sure enough; but it was luckily merely to solicit the indulgence of the audience for Signor Fortini, who had a cold. Despite of all drawbacks, the performance was a treat of a high order. The music of Mozart's chef-d'œuvre was given most faithfully by the band, under the bâton of Mr. Charles Hallé. Some of the characters on the stage, of course, might have been better filled. The part of the Don was most inefficient in the hands of Fortini. It is but justice to say, in addition to his cold, he is naturally totally unsuited to the part, and most probably had to take it without either knowing the music well, or ever having acted the character before. Signor Gregorio, too, who was so praiseworthy as Papageno, could not do anything with Masetto. Madame Heinrich got through the part of Elvira—but that is all that can be said. Herr Formes was the life and soul of the opera. His Leporello has won him as high honours as almost anything he has done here. Leporello is so totally different to Marcel, or Rocco, for instance, that his humour and liveliness took even his warmest admirers by surprise, and we heard many express a desire to see him in Figaro. Madame Rudersdorff made a very good Donna Anna, and Mdlle. Sedlatzek looked and sang the part of Zerlina very nicely; whilst Herr Zelger was all that could be desired as the Commandant, and delivered the music of the statue with due solemnity. It would take but too much space to notice each individual piece. Herr Formes was recalled after the "Madamina, il catalogo," which I never heard given with finer effect except by Lablache. Madame Rudersdorff received the same compliment after her two great songs, "Or sai che l'onore," and "Non mi dir." The popular trio, "Protezza il giusto cielo," was finely given by Donna Anna, Elvira, and Ottavio, as was, indeed, the whole of the splendid finale to the first act, a part of the chorus being encored, and all the principals recalled at the fall of the curtain. We were glad to see Herr Reichardt back to take the part of Ottavio, after his recent illness in London. His voice had not recovered all its powers, but he gave the often omitted air, "Dalla sua pace," and the famous "Il mio tesoro," both with exquisite taste and feeling. Poor Signor Fortini was in sad trouble with his "Finche dal vino," which, in his fear, he took sadly too quick—(no need, for it is quick enough!)—and got well hissed for his pains. In the serenade, "Deh, vieni alla finestra," he lost his pitch, and it ended flat, of course! With another word of praise to Herr Formes, for his fine acting in the statue scene, and again in the supper scene, I must close my notice of this one performance of Mozart's masterpiece, for which, with all its imperfections, the public should feel grateful. The house was not what it ought to have been—which is scarcely to be wondered at, considering the numerous disappointments. There were many who went to hear Don Giovanni on Saturday last, and had to return home; how could they be sure it would be produced on Tuesday? The remaining arrangements at present are—Wednesday, Zauberflöte; Thursday, Lucia; Friday—one act each from four operas for Madame Caradori's benefit; and this evening, Robert le Diable. The 60th night brings the season to a close; how much of this is really done I may be enabled to report in my next.

Brighton.—Herr Kuhe's annual concert was held at the Town-hall on Saturday last, and was attended by a full and fashionable audience. The performers were Mad. Clara Novello, Mrs. Lockey, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. H. Phillips, Mr. Hobbs, Mr. Lockey, and Mrs. Enderssohn. Herr Kuhe played a piece of his own composition, on a melody from L'Etoile du Nord, and a duet of Osborne's, from Les Huguenots, with Mr. Benedict. This last was finely executed, and loudly applauded. Herr Kuhe also played a brilliant duet with Mr. Oberthür, for harp and piano. Mad. Novello was much applauded in Verdi's "Ernani, involami," as also in a ballad, "Oh, would I were yon silver moonbeam," which was encored. Mr. Sims Reeves sang "Adelaida" in most finished style, and was enthusiastically received. His vigorous rendering of Mr. Frank Mori's new patriotic song, "England and Victory," was equally successful. The Madrigal Union sang four pieces. The violoncello solo of Mr. Paque evinced ability, especially in the adagio. Mr. Land and Mr. Hatton were the conductors.

Dublin.—The first concert for the season of the Royal Choral Institute passed off with the greatest success. The piece performed was The Creation. The audience repeatedly testified their gratification by applause. The principal solo singers were Miss Glover, Mr. Glover, Mr. Geary, and Mr. Kelly. The conductor was Professor Glover.

Bradford.—The performance of Elijah on Thursday evening last attracted an audience to St. George's Hall which filled it in every part. Both band and choir were native Yorkshire, and in every respect equal to the occasion. The solo singers were Mrs. Weiss, Mrs. Lockey, Messrs. Sims Reeves, Weiss, Appleyard, Hincliffe, and Senior. The conductor was Mr. Burton. The Messiah will be given on the 26th.—The promenade concerts are a decided failure.

Beverley.—On Monday evening last a concert of vocal and instrumental music took place in the Mechanics' Hall. Mr. Accy, of Hull, led the instrumental department, and Mr. Bartle, of Beverley, presided at the piano. The concert went off well. The proceeds are to be applied in aid of the Beverley Temperance Society.

Colchester.—Mr. Mattacks gave a concert in the Cups Assembly Rooms on Monday evening. He had made arrangements with Mr. Alfred Bowles, director of the Ipswich Musical Union, and secured the services of its members. The programme contained works from some of the best composers, and there were several performers encored; among them, Mr. Bowles for his performance, on the violin, of Sainton's popular fantasia on the "Standard Bearer," and Herr Oberthür for his fantasia on the harp, "Bonnie Scotland," when he played his étude "La Grâce." Mr. Bowles was also encored in a ballad (MS). Mrs. Gilbert and Miss Cole sang a two-part song by Mendelssohn, in a very pleasing manner. Altogether, the concert gave complete satisfaction, Ipswich.—The Ipswich Musical Union, under the conductorship of Mr. Alfred Bowles, gave its first Matinée at the New Assembly Rooms, on Monday last. It was patronised by the nobility and gentry of the neighhourhood. The singers were Mrs. A. Gilbert and Miss Cole, and the instrumentalists Herr Oberthür (harp), Miss Wheatley (pianoforte), Mr. A. Bowles (violin), Mr. H. Wheatley (viola), and Mr. J. Goodball (violoncello). The accompanyist at the pianoforte was Mr. A. Gilbert.

Coventry.—(From a Correspondent.)—The first concert of the present series announced by the Choral and Instrumental Society, came off on Thursday evening, November 30, in the ancient St. Mary Hall, which was well filled. The only artistes not local were Miss Rainforth and Mr. H. Nicholson. The programme included overtures, a sacred chorus, waltzes, madrigals, etc. We must take exception to the manner in which the words of some of the chorus were altered, as for instance, in the trio and chorus from Judas Maccabæus, and "Disdainful of danger;" the passage written properly thus, "Thy power, O Jehovah," was changed to, "Thy power, O Britannia." More than ordinary attention was called also to the above chorus, owing to the tenor's taking up a wrong lead, which compelled the conductor to commence the piece again. This, by the way, also happened in "God save the Queen," which terminated the concert. Miss Rainforth (who appeared for the first time at these concerts) was very successful, receiving no less than three encores, chiefly for her Scotch ballads. Mr. Nicholson was similarly complimented in his flute solo ("Rule Britannia"). The society is in a flourishing state, and, with a little care, may be rendered equal to that in any provincial town of similar importance.

Nottingham.—(From a Correspondent).—The Beale troupe, consisting of Clara Novello, Mrs. Weiss, Messrs. Sims Reeves, Weiss, Land, and J. L. Hatton, visited this town on Wednesday evening. The concert was given in the spacious room belonging to the Mechanics' Institution, which was crowded to excess by an enthusiastic audience. The artists individually and collectively sustained their well-earned reputation. Mr. Sims Reeves was especially successful.

Belfast.—(From a Correspondent.)—Mr. Albert Dawes has been appointed organist to the Victoria Hall, and the committee of the Classical Harmonists' Society have accepted his design for a new concert organ, to be built under his immediate superintendence. The organ will be on the German plan—scale CC to C in alt. The equal temperament will be adopted, with radiating pedals.

Liverpool.—On Wednesday evening, Mr. B. R. Isaac gave a concert, at the Music Hall. The artists were Herr Molique, Signor Piatti, and Madame Rudersdorf. The concert commenced with Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor, after which Madame Rudersdorf sang "Non mi dir." Herr Molique gave two of his violin melodies, the second encored, and was followed by Rode's variations by Madame Rudersdorf. Mr. Isaac performed Stephens Heller's Improvisata, on Mendelssohn's Maid of the Ganges, and his étude: La Chasse. The second part commenced with Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata for pianoforte and violin, by Mr. Isaac and Herr Molique. Signor Piatti followed with a solo on the violoncello, after which Madame Rudersdorf sang two German songs by Taubert, the concert concluding with the first performance in Liverpool of Spohr's Grand Trio in E minor, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello.—At the Royal Amphitheatre, the engagement of the Spanish Dancers has terminated. One of the great attractions of the week was the play of William Tell, the choruses of Rossini's masterpiece being introduced with much effect.

BIRKENHEAD.—Mr. Percival gave the third of his series of subscription-concerts on Thursday last, at the Craven-rooms, before a fashionable audience. The vocalists were Mr. and Miss Seantley: the instrumentalists, Messrs. E. W. Thomas and Lewis (violins), Wilberforce (viola), Lidel (violoncello), and Percival (pianoforte and harmonium). The programme included Haydn's quartet in D, No. 63, Mozart's in G, No. 1, Gounod's Meditation on a prelude by Bach, for pianoforte, harmonium, and violoncello. Solos for violin and violoncello, and Rossini's "Cujus animam," for the harmonium, were included in the scheme; also, some vocal gems—for instance, Beethoven's "Adelaide," Spohr's "Rose softly blooming," "O luce di quest' anima," from Donizetti's Linda, besides songs by Händel, Balfe, &c., all of which were well performed. The applause and encores were frequent, and the concert passed off in a satisfactory manner. The introduction of high-class music is a step in the right direction, for which the good folks in Cheshire are under obligation to Mr. Percival, director of these entertainments.

CANTERBURY.—The concert by the Crystal Palace Band, under Herr Schallehn, in aid of the Patriotic Fund, came off on Tuesday last. The cathedral choir, under Mr. Longhurst, rendered essential aid.

FOREIGN.

BERLIN.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Of course you have heard, before this, of the grand marriage festivities, with an obbligato accompaniment of rain and mud, which have graced the nuptials of Prince Friedrich Carl. The management of the theatre, a government establishment, could not possibly be behindhand in their manifestations of spontaneous joy, and, therefore, with that delicate perception of the beautiful for which Prussian officials are so renowned, selected Weber's Oberon as peculiarly suitable to the occasion, and revived it with new scenery, dresses, and decorations. The young and royal lovers were, as a matter of course, typified by Oberon and his fairy queen. It is now certain that M. Roger will appear here shortly; but, at present, I am unable to state for what term he is engaged. The concert, which, as I have informed you, is to be given in the Royal Opera-house for the benefit of the Silesian sufferers, will come off either this week or the next. The members of the Singacademie, and Stern's and Jähn's Gesangvereine, as well as the royal chapel, have all volunteered their services, so that the entertainment would probably prove highly attractive, even if not given for so laudable a purpose. Herren Taubert and Dorn will conduct. Among the pieces already decided on are Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Nacht, and Beethoven's ninth Symphony.—The concert season has fairly set in for the winter. The lamps of the old locales have been furbished up, the floors duly swept, the cobwebs carefully brushed away, and the seats newly covered, while the walls of the various buildings about Berlin suddenly exhibit a vast increase in the number of so-called posters!—Among the concerts lately given, I may mention, as particularly worthy of notice, the Second Anniversary Concert of the Neue Berliner Liedertafel, the concert of a young prodigy, Adolph Gross, aged twelve; the second of Löschhorn's series of Trio-Soirées; the third Sinfonie-Soirée; and a Matinée, at which three other "prodigies," rather older, varying from eleven to seventeen, and named the Brothers Brassin, appeared. The Liedertafel Concert went off extremely well. Besides the members, there were a great number of guests present, so that the room was uncomfortably packed. Among the pieces performed were the two prize quartets by Herren Edward Schulz and H. Krigar, a number of other quartets by various authors, and the variations from Beethoven's quartet in A major on the pianoforte. Besides this, we had two songs from Herr Theodore Formes, comic recitations, speeches, etc., which prolonged the entertainments to a late hour. The "prodigy," Master Adolph Gross, who is a pupil of Herr Ries, the Concertmeister, is a promising young artist. A new trio, by a young composer, Herr Riel, who studied under Professor Dehn, was produced at the second Trio-Soirée. If you will forgive a pun, I may justly say that, taking all things into consideration, the new trio was Riel-ly good. The feature at the third Sinfonie-Soirée was Beethoven's Symphony in F Major. The three other prodigies, the Brothers Brassin, the two elder of whom have selected the pianoforte, and the youngest, the violin, as their respective instruments, performed variations by Beethoven, Op. 35, Liszt's fantasia on Mendelssohn's march in the Sommernachtstraum, fantasias by De Beriot, &c. The Masters Brassin possess technical skill, and afford convincing proof, that although boys of eleven and twelve, or youths of seventeen may, by a continued system of "forcing," be enabled to execute note for note the works of great masters, their triumph is mechanical and not intellectual.

DESSAU.—It is now pretty certain that Herr Rietz from Leipsic, will be appointed Capellmeister for life, in place of the late Herr Schneider.

BRUNSWICK.—M. Roger has appeared as Raoul in Les Huguenots.

COBURG.—Masaniello has been revived, after a long interval.—Mad. Dingelstedt, née Jenny Lutzer, once a great favourite, made her appearance here a few days since in Santa Chiara, after having been absent from the stage seven years.

LEIPSIC.—Breitkopf and Härtel are about to publish a life of Mendelssohn, including his correspondence, which could not appear during the lifetime of his widow, as she would never give her consent.—The Brothers Doppler, flautists, and Herr Alfred Jaell are engaged to play at the Gewandhaus concerts.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—Mad. Clara Schumann lately gave a concert in the large room of the Hôtel Holland, and the Brothers Wieniawski are playing in the theatre.

HANOVER.—The management have just concluded an agreement with Herr Langerhans of Berlin, to alter the new Theatre Royal which is very defective in the necessary acoustic qualities. The cost of the alterations is calculated at 30,000 thalers.

WEIMAR.—Dr. Franz Liszt has completed a grand symphony, called Faust, which will shortly be performed, but not in public.

MERSEBERG.—On the king's birthday, Herr D. H. Engel, organist at the cathedral, gave a vocal and instrumental (organ) concert, for the benefit of the sufferers in Silesia and at Memel. The cathedral in which the concert was given was lighted up on the occasion. Besides a hymn, composed in honour of the day by Herr Engel, the programme contained selections from the works of Palestrina, Caldara, and Haydn. The new organ being now built promises, when completed, to be one of the finest and largest in Germany. Of the eighty klingende Stimmen which it contains, only forty were fit for use, while the reed-work was altogether wanting. In spite of this serious drawback, however, its good quality was satisfactorily manifested by Herr Engel's performance of J. S. Bach's "Toccat Doric" and a fantasia on "Was Gott thut, das ist wohlgethan." The builder is Herr Ladegast of Weissenfels.

DUSSELDORF.—The annual subscription concerts have begun, under the direction of Herr Julius Rausch. Mendelssohn's finale to Lorelei was the principal feature at the first concert.

VIENNA.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The only approach to novelty at the Opera house has been the re-production of Don Sebastian, the principal characters being sustained by Herren Ander, Beck, Erl, and Mad. Hermann. This lady has also appeared as Donna Anna in Don Juan, but I cannot say much for her performance. A concert was lately given in the Kärnthner-Thor Theater, for the benefit of the Barmherzige Schwestern The principal vocalists were Madlle. Liebhardt and Herr Ander. Previous to the concert the drama of Velva, die Russische Waise, was performed, Madlle. Marie Taglioni having volunteered her services. On the evening of the same day, for I forgot to tell you that the above came off at noon, Herr Marchesi and his wife, Mad. Marchesi-Graumann, also gave a concert.

I hear that Carl Evers is about to take up his permanent abode here—at any rate, he is coming at the commencement of next year, to produce his new trio for piano, violin, and violoncello. His sister, Cathinka Evers, has, according to report, made a hit at the Carignano Theatre in Turin. Some difficulties have been raised about the production of L'Etoile du Nord, what they are, I do not know—whether political or artistic. One thing, however, is certain, they will prevent the opera from being played for some time. By the way, this last chef-d'œuvre of Meyerbeer will, in the course of the winter, be produced at twenty-seven German theatres. A gentleman of the name of Westerstrand, has been dispatched from Stockholm to this city, by his government, for the purpose of making himself acquainted with the organization of the military bands in the Austrian army. The authorities have shown him every civility. I will not say that the Austrians are irreproachable models in such matters, but I will, at any rate, assert that a good many hints may be picked up from them, and that the English government would have no cause to regret following the above example. English military bands would then have a chance of being a little less drummy, and somewhat more remarkable for the niceties of light and shade. But I suppose this is hardly to be expected, unless the Press takes the question up.

MADRID.—At the Teatro del Oriente, Verdi's Il Trovatore continues to attract large audiences. The Queen was present a few evenings since. Her Majesty was well received by the crowds who surrounded the doors, but the public in the interior of the theatre remained tranquil, and rose from their seats in silence on her entrée. It is true, that the opera had long commenced, the curtain having already drawn up on the fourth act. The Queen was in the royal box, having on her right Espartero, O'Donnell, and Alonzo, and on her left Pacheco, Collado, Allende Salazar, and Santa Cruz. The adjoining boxes were filled by the corps diplomatique, the general officers of the army, and of the national guard. All the nobility of Spain were present: it was a sight truly magnificent. To comprehend the incidents about to be related, it must be stated that in the fourth act of the Trovatore Mesdames Gazzaniga and Nantier-Didiée generally receive immense applause at almost every musical point; but it is the custom, when the Queen is present, for the public to show their respect by giving neither marks of approbation nor disapprobation. A revolution, however, has taken place since this custom was established and observed. After the "Miserere," one of the most effective morceaux, the audience applauded with more than usual energy. Several persons from the boxes cried out that, the Queen being present, applause should be restrained, Some disapprobation was then heard, but it was soon put down. by cries of "Vive la Reine!" "Vive Espartero!" then "Vivent la Reine et Espartero!" After a few moments of silence, two persons cried out, "A bas la Reine!" These words were uttered by some of the artillery of the national guard, and it was soon recollected that these soldier-citizens had that day fêté Bacchus plutôt than Isabella of Spain. Upon this, the public, with one accord, rose en masse to put down this grossièreté, and uttered, in one unanimous shout, "Vive la Reine!" The remainder of the evening, particularly when the Queen retired was a real ovation to her Majesty, which did not cease till she had reached the palace gates.

AMERICA—NEW YORK.—Rumour was for some time rife with the report, during the illness of Mario, and the consequent suspension of all proceedings, of the resiliation of the bond between Mr. Hackett and Sig. Mario and Madame Grisi. It would seem, however, that these reports are but partially true, and the following are the real facts of the case, as it at present stands. Mr. Hackett considers that the terms on which he has taken the new opera house are much too onerous, that the rent is too high, and, above all, he complains of the two hundred and fifty free admissions, the best seats in the house, which, by the terms of his deed, he was bound to make over to the shareholders. The attraction of the celebrated prima donna and great tenor not having equalled the calculations of the speculator, he was driven to the necessity of being ruined, or of rescinding his engagement with the proprietors. The latter arrangement has now been resorted to, and the gentlemen have undertaken to turn managers on their own responsibility. The result is, that Mr. Hackett is retained as acting manager, and all the artists are continued on the same footing as before. Sig. Mario has almost recovered his voice, and, on his re-appearance in Il Barbiere, the house was crowded to overflowing. The papers are all in raptures at the taste and brilliancy displayed by Mario, his handsome appearance and sympathetic voice; neither are they less enthusiastic in writing of Mad. Grisi.—At St. Charles's Theatre, Masaniello has been played in German; The Syren, in English, at Niblo's; and Wallace's Maritana, also in English, at the Broadway; so that there are four opera companies all going on at the same time, and not unfrequently on the same evenings. The Pyne and Harrison troupe are now performing the Crown Diamonds at the Broadway. Next week they will go to Boston. Auber's Syren has drawn full houses at Niblo's, in spite of the inclemency of the weather. On the 18th instant the small but elegant theatre called Placide's Varieties, New Orleans, was burned to the ground.—The Sacred Harmonic Society have given Haydn's Seasons, with moderate success.—At Boston the Mendelssohn Choral Society have given three concerts, the Widow of Nain being performed on each evening. The last concert was somewhat more worthy of its name than the first, when not one piece of Mendelssohn's was to be found in the programme. The concert began with an overture by Gluck, followed by a choral from Mendelssohn's St. Paul, "Sleepers, awake;" next came the grand scena, The Fall of Sion, by Paisiello; "Let the bright Seraphim," "What though I trace each herb and flower," from Händel's Solomon, "Angels ever bright and fair," and the Inflammatus chorus, from Rossini's Stabat Mater. The Widow of Nain again occupied the second part. It will be seen that this society did, on this occasion, really play one piece by the composer whose name it bears.—On the 18th ult., the opera company, consisting of Miss Louisa Pyne, Miss Pyne, Mr. Harrison, and Mr. Borrani, closed a most successful engagement at Philadelphia. Miss Louisa Pyne has won the admiration of all who have heard her. The operas given were La Sonnambula, The Bohemian Girl, Maritana, The Crown Diamonds, Fra Diavolo, and The Beggar's Opera.

SALAMAN'S AMATEUR CHORAL SOCIETY.—This amateur society, under the direction of Mr. Charles Salaman, its founder, gave its first performance for the season, on Wednesday evening week, at the rooms, 36, Baker-street, Portman-square, and executed Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm ("O! come let us worship") and Hummel's Mass in E flat, in a most satisfactory manner. The chorus now includes twenty sopranos, twenty altos, ten tenors, and ten basses, and the training of the sixty voices during the recess does infinite credit to the director, who must have expended no small amount of time and trouble in bringing them to their present efficient state. There are some admirable voices among these amateurs, and they are all evidently desirous of doing their utmost—instigated in their endeavours by the love of art alone. The undertaking to execute such elaborate and grave works as the 95th Psalm, and the Mass in E flat, of itself demonstrates a self-dependence on their own resources which can be found in few amateur societies. But their confidence was not misplaced on the night in question, and the performance of Mendelssohn's grand work, so full of difficulties and "delicacies of beauty," would have reflected no discredit on a musical society of longer standing and greater renown. The firmness and decision displayed in singing the fugues was greatly to be admired. The Amateur Choral Society has now arrived at its fifth season, and, judging from the steady progress it has made from year to year, we are justified in auguring for it a very high position among the musical institutions of London.

JENNY LIND AND THE STUDENTS.—In a certain German town there was a tremendous furore about Jenny Lind, who, after driving the whole place mad, left it early one morning. The moment her carriage was outside the gates, a company of students, who had escorted it, rushed back to the inn, demanded to be shewn Jenny's bed-chamber, and, rushing up stairs into the room, tore up the sheets, and wore them as decorations. An hour or two afterwards a bald old gentleman of amiable appearance, an Englishman, who was staying in the hotel, came to breakfast at the table-d'-hôte, and was observed to be much disturbed in his mind, and terrified whenever a student approached him. At last he said, in a low voice, to some gentlemen near him at table, "You are English, I observe? Most extraordinary people these German students; raving mad." "Oh, no," said somebody, "only excitable, but very good fellows, and sensible." "By heavens, sir!" returned the old gentleman, much discomposed, "then there's something political in it, and I am a marked man. I went out for a walk this morning, and, while I was gone, they burst into my bed-room, took away the sheets, and are now patrolling the town in all directions with bits of them in their button-holes."

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, December 9th, 1854.

If ever there was a genus irritabile it is the genus English musician. If you attempt, by a word of kindly and well-meant advice, to urge on the general body musical of this country to anything like healthy exertion, you are sure to be set down as an alien—or worse, an Englishman with none but foreign sympathies. Yet who, in the name of truth, that has been in the habit of reading the Musical World for these twenty years or more, can, with any show of justice, accuse its contributors of being enemies to the cause of music at home, or unduly prejudiced in favour of foreigners? It is really past enduring. On one hand we are roundly accused of making a dead set at all the Italians, from Verdi downwards; at all the French, from M. Adolphe Adam, "of the Institute," upwards; and at all the living Germans, from Richard Wagner and Robert Schumann, straight along the level of fantastic mediocrity. On the other, our American cotemporaries are furious with us for not believing, or not avowing our belief, that Mr. Fry is a Berlioz, and Mr. Bristow a Haydn-Redivivus. The Spanish musicians have a shot at us now and then, because we pay so little attention to the rapid strides the art is making in Madrid, Barcelona, and Cadiz, while they cast in our teeth, as a reproach, the unauthenticated legend of Daniel Auber being himself a Spaniard. We live in dread even of the Cossacks, who have their savage kind of national music, and should scarcely be surprised if Mr. Henry Russell should set up a howl against us on behalf of the harmony of Israel and Judah. Last, not least, where should we hide our diminished heads if a native-born son of middle Africa were to taunt us with a misappreciation of those lively "nigger" tunes which the Yankees have transplanted, with the composers or their "nephews," from the free shores of the Niger to the southern slave-land of the western world. We do not exaggerate when we say that for years past we have been exposed to all sorts of contumely on account of what is currently termed our unjust antipathy to foreigners, and our bigoted adherence to the "native talent" cry. Conceive, then, gentle reader, our surprise and our concern when the following letter was placed in our hands:—

To the Publishers of the Musical World.

Gents.,—If the pages of the M. World are to be occupied with abuse and misrepresentation the sooner you get rid of your editor the better, otherwise you will find your readers rapidly diminish. Another thing, what do English musicians want to hear about little petty towns in Germany and all parts of the Continent. Depend upon it, they care not one rush about them. One thing is however evident, that the English musical journal is fallen into Foreign hands in more ways than one; and I, for one, shall have nothing further to do with it.

I am, &c.,

Birmingham, Dec. 5. A Brummagem Musician.

While we can manage to get on tolerably well without the hebdomadal 4*d.*, and probably without the moral countenance of "A Brummagem Musician," we not the less deplore the misconception which has induced him to withdraw from us his money and support. Last week, in the faith of being thoroughly understood, we endeavoured to egg on our own musicians, by honest and straightforward counsel, to set up for themselves, instead of leaning upon the shoulders of others. We said nothing then that we are not ready to reiterate, on all and every occasion, until we may find reason to believe that our advice is no longer necessary. When that time comes we shall be truly glad. But, per Hercle! is it our mission, and the mission of our semblables to do nothing but fawn and flatter? Are we to say that what is bad is good, and to have a smooth tongue and a fulsome dose of adulation for every common-place performance that mediocrity, in its credulous egoism, thinks fit to thrust upon the world? The duty of a critic is to tell the truth and not to simper, whine, and bespatter with unmeaning, undeserved, and indiscriminate praise. If eulogistic epithets must perforce be applied to whatever may chance to pass through the hands of an unconscious engraver, what terms can be invented to apostrophise in appropriate language the merits of Mozart and Beethoven?

There is too much of this mistaken feeling abroad. It chokes art, demoralises its professors, and deludes the world. A critic may be mistaken, since man is not infallible; but he must not lie, wittingly, to himself and to the world, or he lowers his credit and degrades his office. When mediocrity takes the public by the button-hole, and will not quit its hold, it is for the critic to warn the public of the imposture. Why should musicians, any more than ministers of state, be exempt from wholesome animadversion? Are they deities, whose ways are inscrutable, and to question whose thoughts and actions is profanity? Nothing of the sort. Although—perhaps because—music is the most graceful of the arts, its followers are the most sensitive, and, in many respects, the weakest and most credulous of human creatures. A composer who is pronounced inferior to Mendelssohn is straightway in a huff, and the critic who cannot find it in his nature to admit it is his "enemy." Every pianist must be equal to Madame Pleyel, every fiddler to Ernst, and every singer to Jenny Lind; otherwise, woe to the unfortunate reviewer!

What greater pleasure can there be for a critic than to be able to give a favourable verdict conscientiously? What greater pain than to be obliged, though in deference to truth and justice, to condemn? The more good music, and the more able executants, the better for all of us who love the art. But if it be the simple vocation of a critic to say that everything is good, without distinction, the result must be, that what is really good, becomes robbed of its due—since, if all is necessarily good there is no absolute merit in being good—while that which is indifferent or bad becomes raised into a fictitious importance, which can only be temporary, inasmuch as it is built upon sand. Why should a system so untenable, so sophistical, so false, in short, be tolerated, much more advocated and insisted upon by our musicians? They may rest assured that their interests are not bound up in a policy which checks emulation and bestows a premium on mediocrity. Is it just that one who may have spent many years of close and assiduous study on the acquirement of an art, both in theory and practice, should be spoken of in precisely the same terms as another who has merely taken it up as a caprice, or who has possessed neither the energy to study nor the method to progress—the genius to invent nor the talent to produce? Surely, on reflection, not one of our readers will answer in the affirmative. The cant of mild criticism is the worst of cants. If a man does well, let it be said so of him, and he will try to do still better; but if a man does ill, and it is said of him, as of the first, that he has done well, he will take no pains to improve. Thus, criticism becomes a dead letter, and two parties are injured, the one who does well and the one who does ill. The first is deprived of his right, and the last is stopped in his career.

The cry against foreigners is the most senseless of all cries. Musicians have no more claim to protection than bakers, and we have as good a right to hear French music, if we please, as to eat French rolls. Let us emulate what is good in foreigners, and avoid what is bad; but let us never forget that we owe to them the grandest productions of the musical art, and that great as is the number of bad composers who have obtained credit here (in consequence of the very system of criticism we have condemned), Mozart and Händel, Bach and Haydn, Beethoven and Mendelssohn, Gluck and Weber, Rossini and Auber, were none of them born in England. A conscientious thinker of the exclusive English school should content himself with the quartets of Mr. Stephens, instead of those of Mozart, and the symphonies of Mr. Calkin, instead of those of Beethoven. If the foreigner is to be excluded, exclude him thoroughly. No compromise—no music, except the compositions of John Bull (not the Dr.) himself. But the question has been too often discussed, and as often settled. The argument of our angry correspondent is quite as Brummagem as his signature, and we have rendered him the worst turn in our power by printing his letter.

We have received a second letter from Herr Manns, who contradicts Herr Schallehn's statement. In proof that he was engaged as assistant musical director at the Crystal Palace, Herr Manns has forwarded to us his agreement with the Company, signed by the Secretary. Any farther letters on this subject can only be inserted in the form of advertisements.

MUSIC IN TRIESTE.

(Extract from a private letter, Nov. 30, 1844.)

I SIT down to give you a full and true account of the late progress in Italy of your talented countryman, Balfe, and particularly to tell you about his new opera, Pittore e Duca, which was produced here, for the first time, on the 21st instant. But before I begin to speak about music, I must give you a description of what an Italian intrigue is; and against what difficulties a poor composer, not Italian, has to fight. On the morning of the day of the first representation of Balfe's opera, news arrived on 'Change here that some Greeks had been killed in Manchester; the cause being, that they had written under Lord Raglan's dispatch, which brought the news of the loss sustained by the British cavalry at Balaklava, the words, "Blessings, blessings," or something to that effect, expressive of their delight at the disaster The Greeks here—and there are a great number of them—immediately got up a strong party to go to the theatre, with the avowed object of putting down "L'opera dell' Inglese Balfe," notwithstanding the great success which had previously been obtained at Trieste by his Bohemian Girl. The Greeks were determined, they said, to revenge the deaths of their countrymen. Powerful as they were, however, and numerous, they only succeeded in throwing cold water, as it were, upon almost every piece which was warmly applauded by the general public. Nevertheless, they could not succeed in preventing some four or five morceaux from creating a decided furore, and the composer, Balfe, from being called upon the stage nine times during the performance—for example:—after a concerted piece in the first act he was brought forward, once; at the end of the first act, once; after the grand scena of the tenor, twice; after the cavatina of the prima donna, thrice; after the duet between the tenor and prima donna, once; and, after a chorus of sailors and populace, once. At the termination of the opera, all attempts at applause and re-calls were put down by the Greek faction with a strong hand. Unfortunately, and entre nous, I must confess that the last scene, in a dramatic point of view, is exceedingly feeble; and here, notwithstanding the evident merits of the music, there was some plausible reason for the opposition. The action briefly is as follows:—A duel takes place between the Painter and the Duke, in which the Painter in his fury kills, not the Duke, but the lady of his love, who has rashly interposed with the vain and womanly (the terms are not synonymous) hope of separating the combatants and appeasing their wrath. This was the great point which your Irish Balfe's good friends, the Greeks, pounced upon, like tigers from bushes upon weary and unsuspecting travellers. The actors, who were anything but expert swordsmen, gave weight and colour to the opposition. When Greek meets Greek then comes the tug of war; but when Greek is opposed not unto Paddy, brawny and belligerent—as was shewn at the outset, when Balfe thrashed them—but to emasculated fencers, half Austrian, half Venetian — which, now-a-days, means all Austrian — there is no tug of war; but an instantaneous rout, as of the Russ by the Guardsman, or Highlander, or Enniskillen, or Welsh Fusil-man, or Zouave, or Vincennes Hunter (Chasseur). Thus, in this one passage, these miserable Greeks may be said to have "gained the day," inasmuch as they succeeded in putting down the obstinate attempt, on the part of the impartial and im-Greek audience, to bring poor Balfe before the curtain and pay him his just dues.

On the second night the opera went off much better. The Duke and the Painter had both taken a lesson in the art of fence after breakfast; and their fighting at night was so much more earnest and so much more natural, that the opposition could not find courage to lay hold even of the blades of their swords. The Greeks, who are neither as munificent nor as brave as the Turks, but as close-fisted as Quakers or "Ebrew Jews," having spent their money to oppose the first representation, felt no desire to re-unclasp their porte-monnaies; and thus, it may be conjectured, that the second essay of the vocal swordsmen (their morning practice allowed for) passed by without an adverse thumb, or ironical apostrophe.

Balfe, like a prudent Hibernian—which is as rare as any rara avis—or like, not the black swan, but the Swan of Pesaro, couleur de rose, ROSSINI, on the second night of his imperishable Barbiere, listened to the advice of his friends and stayed at home. Had he, say my informants, gone to the theatre, and been called out seven times, the Greeks—who, hearing that Balfe would not be there, stayed at home—had vowed to insult him, eight times, to pelt him with putrified quinces, nine times, to wait for him at the stage-door, and summarily despatch him as, flushed with thrice three triumphs, he issued forth into the dirty moonlight thoroughfare of ex-Italian and enslaved Trieste—which would have been less Trieste than triste on the occurrence of a catastrophe so deplorable to music and its most brilliant Irish representative—Vincent Wallace—who, I am charmed to hear, did not go down in the "Arctic"—unexcepted. Of this the alert and dexterous impresario was made aware in the early dawn; and, at his suggestion, the wary Balfe, alive to danger, hid himself, with his gracious wife and charming daughter, in the recesses of a snug apartment, where—while the Duke and the Painter, and the much-beloved of either, were uttering their passion and their hope and their despair and their rage, respectively and alternately, in tuneful rhythm—he read in the Times, with eager eye and brain absorbed, the glowing account of William Russell, his compatriot, of the victory at Inkermann, which, had it been surreptitiously introduced as a chapter in the latest edition of Quentin Durward, under the title of the affair at Schönbrunn, would have passed muster without suspicion, so kindred and of a hue aret he descriptions of the newly-declared Irish minstrel with those of the undying "Wizard of the North."

But is not this too bad? That an opera should be damned on its own demerits, well and good; but that political feeling, or Greek patriotism—which is as the patriotism of the Synagogue, that won five millions sterling from the unconscious speculators on Change (too changeful for their happiness), on the strength of knowing, a week in advance, what none should have known in your free country until it was declared to all, that Austria, like the rat, had abandoned the sinking ship, and boarded peaceably, with Mawworm-mien, the healthy Anglo-French three-decker—should interfere with the success, and put in jeopardy the prospects of an inoffensive and unpolitical musician, is "most tolerable and not to be endured."

I am not astonished that Balfe should begin to be thoroughly sick of his "Dear Italy," although it was the scene of his earliest successes—something more than twenty years ago, be it said with reverence. I must tell you, by the way, that "Young Italy" is exclusively democratic; and thus, in another way, was equally prejudicial elsewhere to Balfe, who, nevertheless, being a rampant Irishman, is naturally a wholesale upsetter of things as they stand, and to any one who should approach him and say, "I come from a power that has a family anointed or what-not" (the adopted jargon of despots), would instinctively reply, "That's an imposter—knock him down." As it is "Young Italy" which applauds and otherwise makes noises in the theatres, it is "Young Italy," of course, that confirms success or proclaims a fiasco. He, therefore, who is not in its good books, must inevitably fail, or at least come out from the ordeal with a wan favour, and an abashed countenance—for if he gets applause it will be hushed down, and if he gets no applause he may safely count on something less auspicious. Instance the Bohemian Girl, at Bologna, which, on the first night, achieved a comparative failure, although it was afterwards well beholden to the public. Balfe was unhappily acquainted with some of the first families in this city, and was seen driving about with them in their private carriages. Thus he was regarded as an "Aristo," and put down without ceremony, while an ill-favoured fellow, by name Badia, arrived with a wretched opera, which, as he was known to have been in the time of revolution an old soldier of Garibaldi, was applauded to the skies. What can a composer without pretension and without politics do against such paltry intrigues. Add to this, the impresarii are continually failing, and, in the midst of their failures, as a matter of course, they fail to pay their salaries. I am told, indeed, that Balfe himself has lost more than £500 sterling by one Ronzani, with whom he had entered into an engagement at Turin. Unable to obtain his money or any part of it, Balfe, with shrewd aftersight, threw up his engagement. He has some other engagement yet to fulfil in Italy; but, in all probability, he will return to London before the end of March, taking in his way Paris, where, I hear, there is some chance of Pittore e Duca being brought out at the Italiens, with the gifted Madame Bosio as prima donna.

Sacred Harmonic Society.—The first performance of the season took place last night. The oratorio was Handel's Deborah. Particulars in our next.

Kensington.—A Lecture on Sacred Music was delivered by Mr. John Wass, at the Assembly Rooms, Kensington, on the 5th instant, when he was very efficiently assisted by Madame Inman, Mrs. Pyne Galton, and Mr. E. Rosenthal. The well-known song from Händel's Theodora, "Angels ever bright and fair, and prettily rendered by Madame Inman, met with great applause. The entertainment appeared to give great pleasure to a numerous audience.

THE BACH SOCIETY.

A BODY of men, artists and amateurs commingled, banded together in pursuit of some beloved study, which, in its very nature, postpones, well-nigh indefinitely, all prospect of reward or public fame,—yielding unflinchingly time, labour, and talent, solely to a conviction of right-doing in the cause of art, is ever a gratifying subject for contemplation. We may criticise its efforts as inadequate to their purpose, we may consider its measures ill-chosen, we may even think its object chimerical; but we must always admit the sincerity of its devotion, and respect in it that unquestionable element of the artist-character—unfortunately, yet but slow of development in this country—the abstract love of whatever is deemed great, apart from all question of its popularity and profit. In this favourable light does the Bach Society present itself to notice. The task it has chosen is almost Herculean, its fulfilment lies far off in the future, and its reward, we fear, is anything but secure. Still it works on, silently, ungrudgingly; and now and then ventures on some demonstration whereby the outside public may gather a taste of its quality, and choose, if so minded, a place in its ranks. But let us at once state that the Bach Society started with no less an aim than to popularize, or, to speak more appropriately, to disseminate a knowledge of the vocal music of Sebastian Bach. Now, considering that the Thuringian giant was all but a contemporary of Händel, and, therefore, might not unreasonably be expected to be of his date in school and spirit,—that his vocal music is still frequently sung in Germany, that a large number of his instrumental works are thoroughly known in this country, that his reputation as the most learned and industrious of all composers is universal, and that few people will now be found with hardihood enough to deny his possession of immense melodic fertility and power of expression in every degree between the extremes of grandeur and pathos,—the Society's self-appointed task might not, at first sight, appear beset with extraordinary difficulties. Much was in its favour. From what was known of Bach's music, great anticipations were justifiable about that which was not;—the charm of novelty, at any rate, would lend its aid to the project. And—to say nothing of the rage that now exists for talking, at least, about the music of this master—no country could, in the number, energy, and enterprising spirit of its choral bands, be in finer condition to attack unknown difficulties, than England. But a very little reflection quickly throws the promising points of this picture into the back-ground. Though living at the same period, reared in the same school, and both undeniably the depositaries of that rarest of gifts—genius, scarcely any two composers more essentially differ than Bach and Händel. Both bred up in all the traditions of the church-style, both disciplined in the same counterpoint, both educationally assimilated to the utmost that study could effect, there was, nevertheless, even at the outskirts of scholarship, a divergence in their courses which grew ever wider with their progress in art. We descry their characters in the music they have left us. Händel is broad, open, massive; sometimes rough and unfinished, but ever, where a blow is required, striking home with the irresistible force of genius. Bach is profound, surprising in contrivance, wonderful in elaboration; never careless of detail, but constantly, in this very fact, depriving his most beautiful thoughts of that power which isolation or slenderer treatment would give them. Händel is never complicated "of malice aforethought;" if, perchance he weaves us a tangled web, we only recognize the workman's skill in the splendour of the designer's pattern—with him the ultimate effect is all in all. With Bach, on the other hand, complication is the essence and character of his work; and if his greater nature breaks out, here and there, in strong, big, shadowy masses, it is surely in spite of that over-schooling which has too much clouded it. Händel's choral music is, with some exceptions, such as occur in Israel in Egypt, exceedingly practicable for singers. Its divisional passages are all vocal and easy, its melodic progressions are rarely awkward, and the compass of its parts is within the range of all fair voices. The choral music of Bach, on the contrary, is the most difficult, and—its effect considered—the most thankless in existence. The number of real parts constantly employed—and, it must be remembered, his orchestra rarely, if ever, doubles his voices—necessitates unlooked for skips in the counterpoint, the excess of elaboration confuses the singer's ear, and England, at least, does not possess soprano and tenor voices capable of the prolonged employment of the higher notes of their scales which the disposition of his parts demands. And here we may conclude this musical parallelism with the remark, that Bach affords, perhaps, a solitary instance of undoubted genius habitually sacrificing breadth of effect to an amount of contrapuntal involution and finesse such as are usually ascribed exclusively to the second-rate order of intellects. We are speaking, of course, in generalities. There are, in his motets, and in some of his orchestrally-accompanied works—especially in the Credo of his Mass in B minor—passages which, for every characteristic of sublimity, have never been surpassed; but these, unfortunately, are merely exceptions to his rule of art.

How far personal peculiarities and exigencies may have governed the differences we have noticed in the works of these two great musicians, would be difficult to estimate:—some points of this nature are, however, obvious enough. Händel was essentially a man of action, of the day, and of the markets;—Bach, though an equally hard worker, was essentially a recluse. The one lived in the world and wrote for it,—the other lived in his own study and wrote for himself. With the known money-greediness of Händel, it is not unfair to surmise that he designedly wrote for popularity. Circumstances, however, which might have ruined a less man, could do him no harm. With whatever view he wrote his oratorios, and whatever the pecuniary result, he has, by them, immortalized his name,—and this, not with the skilled and studious few, but with the whole world. The music of Bach is, to the full, as deathless, but with this difference—that the attestation of its vitality dwells with the few who can comprehend it. To increase the number of these is the task of the Bach Society. That it may succeed is our hope—that it will fail is our fear.

Lest, however, we be thought to overrate the difficulties of the Society's mission, let us turn, for a moment, to what has occurred in this country with regard to the infinitely more accessible instrumental works of Bach. We speak, be it remembered, of music more than a century old, and ask what progress had this country made in the knowledge of it even as lately as but thirty years back? Long before that time, truly enough, the "forty-eight" preludes and fugues, and fragments of the Suites de Pièces and Clavecin exercises were played and enjoyed by a few such men as Clementi, John Cramer, and old Samuel Wesley; but to the mass of our musicians they were utterly unknown. The far grander works of Bach for the organ were certainly unheard in this country until the period we have mentioned, about which time the present Dr. Wesley, then a mere lad, first publicly performed them, to the great wonder and delight of such professors as then thought it worth while to listen to an organ or an organist. And, further, to show the small progress such things had then made, we may adduce the publication (about the same period), by Mr. Benjamin Jacob, then organist of Surrey Chapel, of an arrangement, for four hands, of the fine fugue in E flat—now known to every organ schoolboy as the "St. Anne's" fugue—with a preface in which the duet-shape is justified on the ground that the fugue "in its original form is extremely difficult, and, in the absence of pedals, impracticable!" If, then, the organ-music of Bach has required this lapse of years to become familiarized, even to the present state, among us, what prospect can there be of a speedy acquaintanceship striking up between the English public and a school of vocal music so remarkable for executive difficulty utterly disproportioned to its effect?

Far be it from us, however, even in appearance, to make stumbling-blocks for any musical institution,—certainly not for one so utterly unselfish as the Bach Society. Our only object is to point out the true nature of its difficulties, in order that, if possible, they may be vanquished; and having said our say on this head, we pass at once to a brief notice of the Society's last public effort, namely, a performance, on Tuesday week, of Bach's oratorio, "The Passion," according to the text of St. Mathew.

Digitized by Google

To offer any formal criticism on this performance would be as unjust as out of the question. Every musician present must have felt it to be incomplete and unsatisfactory throughout. Both chorus and orchestra were imperfect, and the principal singers seemed far from being at ease with the music allotted to them. But while, recording the manifest ineffectiveness of the whole, let us not be supposed to rest all the blame on the Bach Society. The work itself has many objectionable points for public performance. The libretto is anything but interestingly framed, the endless recitatives render it tedious; and the rhythmical parts of the music abound in such complexities as seem to defy a clear interpretation,—at least with the means employed on Tuesday evening. We do not blame the Bach Society for not achieving impossibilities,—we only blame it for inviting the public patronage to that which neither was, nor could be, anything more than an imperfect rehearsal. The Society is yet in its infancy, more especially as to funds. It cannot afford to pay adequately for professional assistance; all strength lent to it must be merely voluntary, and we well know that this species of aid is impatient of the practice necessary to any degree of correctness in executing works of such peculiar difficulty as the Passion. We think it would best answer the Society's purpose to abandon for some time, at least, all idea of public performances. They cannot be commercially remunerative; and, if viewed in any other light, rather tend to discredit both the music and the zealous body of its admirers, who, with such slender means, undertake to perform it. There is no reason, however, why private meetings of the Society should not be prosecuted with all the energy that can be pressed into the service. Continuous and minutely careful practice, under the guidance of such an artist as Mr. Sterndale Bennett, may, one day, make perfect this small band of music-lovers in their passage even through the intricacies of Sebastian Bach. When this is done, let them perform his oratorios, his masses, his motets, or what they will. But, meanwhile—and they have our warmest advocacy in everything but this—do not let them ask the public to imagine the effect of great music through the mist of such a mere shadowy and imperfect sketch as they are now only in condition to offer.

M. JULLIEN'S CONCERTS.

We have but time to say a few words on some of the performances of the week. On Saturday the "Beethoven night" was repeated, and M. Alexandre Billet was engaged expressly to perform the concerto in E flat, which the popular pianist did in admirable style, and with enthusiastic applause.

On Wednesday the "Mendelssohn night" proved so attractive, that hundreds literally were turned from the doors, and the body of the theatre was so densely thronged as to create serious inconvenience to the female part of the audience, some of whom were heard to scream aloud from the violent pressure of the crowd, while a few, with difficulty, were carried out fainting. These episodes caused frequent interruptions in the performance; but, before half the first part was over, the people had settled into their places, and all went smoothly.

Part I was, of course, entirely devoted to Mendelssohn. The programme comprised the A minor symphony, Andante and Finale of the violin concerto, the Andante from the A, or Italian symphony, and the whole of the incidental music to A Midsummer Night's Dream. A finer selection from one composer could hardly be made. The performance was exceedingly good.

The second part, commencing with the "Allied Armies Quadrille," presents no feature for special comment. With this week M. Jullien's concerts are brought to a termination, and on Monday, the season, winds up with the grand Bal Masqué.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—In your last impression we find an article on the "direct action system" of organ building. As some statements are therein made which are contrary to fact, you will, perhaps, allow us to correct them through the medium of your columns. In the first place you state that the "direct action system is claimed as an invention by Messrs. Kirtland and Jardine of Manchester;" permit us to say that we do not and never have put forth any such claim. Secondly, you affirm that Mr. Groves, of London, also claims the invention of the "direct action system," and that we "wrangle about it in private;" how far the latter statement is borne out by the facts, you will be able to judge by the following correspondence, which took place in May last. We premise that an organ had been erected by us in Beeston Church, near Nottingham, during the month of April last, and that a notice of the "opening" of the instrument appeared in the Nottinghamshire Guardian. In reference to that notice, Mr. Groves wrote as follows:—

"To the Editor of the Nottinghamshire Guardian.

"SIR,—I find in your last publication a report of the opening of a new organ at Beeston Church, built by Messrs. Kirtland and Jardine, of Manchester, in which you state that the instrument is constructed on the 'direct action principle' throughout, and that this invention, they (Messrs. Kirtland and Jardine) attempt to lay claim to. As I think it only just that the inventor should, at any rate, possess the merit of introducing an improvement, even if he is not disposed to patent, I beg to state that I believe the first organ with two rows of keys CC to F, and pedal organ, 2½ octaves, the whole without a roller and roller board, I erected in the Town Hall, St. Helen's. If Messrs. Kirtland and Jardine have erected one of a similar construction to the above instrument prior to it, they will inform me and the public, through your journal, and thus attain the merit, if justly due to them. I am, sir, your obedient servant,

"May 3rd, 1854." "SAMUEL GROVES.

To the above letter, in which Mr. Groves claims to be the "inventor," we made the following reply:—

"To the Editor of the Nottinghamshire Guardian.

"SIR,—We have seen in your last impression a letter by Mr. Groves, respecting the organ recently erected by us in Beeston Church; its inaccuracies you will perhaps allow us to correct through the medium of your columns.

"In the first place, Mr. Groves states that we 'attempt to lay claim' to the invention of the 'direct action principle.' This is incorrect; we claim only its first introduction into this country. Secondly, Mr. Groves, in his letter of May 3rd, 1854, claims its 'invention' for himself. But this, also, is incorrect; for it is a fact beyond dispute, that the 'direct action mechanism' was invented by the Abbé Vogler, of Mannheim, during the latter part of the last century, and was called by him the 'simplification system.' There was an organ so constructed in the Great Exhibition of 1851, built by Schulze, of Lübeck; it was purchased by the Northampton Choral Society, and now stands in the music-hall of that place. Mr. Groves will, perhaps, explain on what grounds he bases his claim to be the 'inventor' of the 'direct action system,' seeing that it was known at least fifty years ago. The 'simplification system' invented by the Abbé Vogler, adopted and introduced by us, and that 'invented' by Mr. Groves, are two very dissimilar movements; and as our object is the advancement of the art of organ building, we hereby invite him to examine any of the organs* built by us on the "simplification system," and by so doing become convinced that by our adopting the system originated by the Abbé Vogler at the close of the eighteenth century, we are not pirating that 'invented' by Mr. Groves in the middle of the nineteenth. We are, sir, your obedient servants,

"May 8th, 1854. KIRTLAND AND JARDINE."

We trust the above correspondence will suffice to shew that, in this matter, we may relinquish the title of "inventive luminaries," so kindly bestowed upon us in your last impression, in favour of Mr. Groves. We do not enter into the merits or demerits of the "simplification system," feeling that to enter fully into that question would occupy more space than we can reasonably expect you, sir, to concede to us. We are, sir, your obedient servants,

Manchester, Nov. 16, 1854. KIRTLAND AND JARDINE.

* Here we gave a list of about a dozen organs.

EXETER HALL.—The usual first Christmas performance of Händel's Messiah, by the Sacred Harmonic Society, is announced for Friday next. The list of singers includes the names of Madame Clara Novello, Miss Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Herr Formes.

MISS RANSFORD'S SOIRÉES MUSICALE.—Miss Ransford does not aim at the strictly classical in her concerts; she does not follow Miss Dolby; she endeavours to enlist on her side that section of the musical public which does not restrict its admiration to works of the "great masters." The concert of Monday evening—the first of a series of six, and the seventh season—was essentially of a "pleasing" character, having its serenity in no way disturbed by any contribution from the antique or modern "learned" school. The name of Mendelssohn certainly did figure in the programme, but was dismissed, in consequence of Madame de Barry—who was to have played the B minor Rondo—not having "put in an appearance." The highest musical name, therefore, in the bills was that of Sir Henry Bishop; the lowest—but we need not be particular. Miss Ransford's solo performances comprised Drouet's "O dolce concento," with variations; and Linley's ballad, 'I'm the little flower-girl." She also joined in duets, trios, and quartets, with Miss Eyles, Mr. W. E. Ransford, and Mr. Ransford. Miss Ransford sang the ballad charmingly, and displayed powers of no mean order in "O dolce concento," which Drouet originally wrote for the flute; she was much applauded. Miss Eyles, Mr. and Mrs. Weiss, and the Messrs. Ransford sang with various effect. Miss Eyles has a nice voice, and did justice to a Scotch ballad by Mr. Ransford, called "My Jamie, thou wert kind to me." Mrs. Weiss sang the "Minstrel Boy" with much taste, and Mr. Weiss was encored in his own song, "The Village Blacksmith." Mr. Rainsford delivered in his boldest manner the popular ballad, "I am a Gipsy King, ha! ha!" Mr. M. Blagrove performed a fantasia on the concertina, and Mr. Charles Blagrove conducted.

CONCERTINA CONCERT.—MISS LAVINIA MARY TAYLOR begs to announce her Annual Grand Evening Concertina Concert, on Monday, December 18, 1854, in the Large Room of the London Tavern, City, on which occasion she will be assisted by the following eminent artistes:—Vocal, Madame and Mr. Weiss, Miss M. Wells, Miss J. Wells, and Mr. Montem Smith. Instrumental, Mr. Richard Blagrove, Mr. Distin, sen., Mr. G. Case, Mr. J. Case, and Mr. C. Blagrove. Tickets, Dress Reserved Seats, 5s.; Reserved, 3s. 6d.; Unreserved, 2s. 6d. To be had of all music-sellers, the London Tavern, and at S. C. Taylor's music warehouse, 84, Leadenhall-street, City.

CHAPPELL'S FOREIGN MODEL PIANOFORTE.—PRICE FIFTY GUINEAS.—This instrument has (unlike the ordinary cottage pianoforte) THREE STRINGS, and the fullest grand compass of SEVEN OCTAVES. It is strengthened by every possible means to endure the greatest amount of wear, and to stand perfectly in any climate. The workmanship is of the best description, the tone is round, full, and rich, and the power equal to that of a Bichord Grand. The Case is of the most elegant construction in Rosewood, (vide the sketch), the touch elastic, and the repetition very rapid. Every possible precaution has been taken to insure its standing well in tune. Mr. Chappell especially invites the attention of the public, the profession, and merchants to the FOREIGN MODEL, feeling assured that no pianoforte, in all respects comparable, has hitherto been made in England at the same price. Every instrument will be warranted, and (if desired) exchanged within twelve months of the purchase. 50, New Bond-street, London.

MOZART'S REQUIEM.—A new Edition of this great work, arranged for the Pianoforte. By JOSIAH PITTMAN. London: J. A. Novello, 69, Dean-street.

NEW PIANO MUSIC, BY RÉNÉ FAVARGER.—La Course, and La Cloche de Soir, price 2s. 6d. each. Copyright of, and published by, Wessel & Co., 229, Regent-street.

JOHN BLOCKLEY'S "EXCELSIOR."—New Edition, splendidly illustrated in colours, 2s. 6d.; Duet, 3s. "Blockley's 'Excelsior' in C is a beautiful composition, worthy of Longfellow's poem, which is here rendered entire. 'The Verse of the Maiden,' 'The Old Man's Address,' 'The Monks of St. Bernard's Prayer,' and the Finale, are dramatic and effective, and quite equal the numerous popular works of this composer."—Musical Review.

CRAMER, ADDISON, and Co., Regent-street; Duff, Oxford-street. Orders should specify "Blockley's 'Excelsior.'"—"Excelsior," as a Vocal Duet, 3s. By the same authors, "Evangeline," Ballad founded on Longfellow's poem, price 2s.

MENDELSSOHN'S LIEDER OHNE WORTE.

BOOK 1. OP. 19.

THE "Songs without Words" form a distinct class of pianoforte music, which was originated and perfected by Mendelssohn. Musicians never essayed to construct an entire instrumental composition within the limits of a vocal canzonet, until, in the present productions of his boyhood, this great master first showed the world the now obvious truth, that the essentials of beauty exact not, of necessity, in instrumental more than in vocal music, lengthened or elaborate development for their manifestation. The experiment was not less completely successful as an appeal to general taste than as an application of the principles of art; and, besides the many additions to this beautiful collection which our composer made in the course of his career, the form has been very frequently adopted by other writers, with more or less ability to take advantage of what opportunity it affords.

Each of these exquisite little pieces is complete in itself, it having been the composer's custom to write them from time to time as occasion prompted, and to select, from amongst many, such as would best contrast and companion each other, when opportunity occurred for the publication of a number.

We may suppose that each one embodies some sentiment, and, remembering the maxim attributed to Mozart, that he composed his melodies to an idea, not to a poem, that the text was only a vehicle for vocalization, and that the expression of the feeling was for him and not for the author of the words to render, in this supposition we include the belief that the composer has had all the scope without the restraint of vocal music, since in embodying a sentiment his imagination has fulfilled all that words could suggest to it, without being shackled by their fetters. The interpretation of this sentiment is, mostly, left to our conjecture, and we shall, I think, only do justice to ourselves and the composer, if we give liberty to our conjecture to interpret a meaning from his expression.

Let us suppose, for instance, that the first piece in this series presents the meditation of one who flies from the passionate excitement of the world, into the solitude of a summer moonlight, with a glowing heart open to the influences of nature, which still are insufficient to annul a sense of disappointment that is a single exception to the perfect harmony of all things,—still are insufficient to prevent the recurrence of thought to one treasured regret, the offspring of a joy that is no more.

We may imagine that, in the second song, we hear the lament of a bird that has lost her mate, sad, but full of prettiness, the presentation of a most refined and delicate idea of sorrow; save this one stilly sound, all is silence, and the beating of our own heart marks the rhythm of the plaintive melody: in two places (the momentary transition into the key of C), and the recurrence of the same progression in another key, the nightingale's complaint touches a particular spring in our sympathies, and licenses our indulgence in the never dormant thought that we too have loved and lost.

The third number may suggest the feelings of freshness and healthful vigour that are excited by the open air in the early morning, when the world is spread before us, and our hearts are unbounded as the prospect; we may think of the chase, or of any other active exercise that animates our spirits, and quickens the very life-springs within us.

The next piece may be described as a ballad with an opening and closing symphony, of which to hear but a single verse will never satisfy one who feels its beauty; it is surely a love song, and it tells its heart's tale with most irresistible tenderness.

No. 5 is a more important composition than either of the others, but it loses not, in its greater elaboration, its vocal characteristics of melody and expression; it speaks to us of a troubled but not a broken spirit, and of a noble resolve to resist the disappointments of life, and prove an inward superiority to the influences that vex but cannot crush us.

The purport of the Gondola Song can scarcely be questioned; we must all be reminded, in hearing it, of the dark boat upon the silent tide in the stilly moonshine of a sultry night, and of the strains from Tasso murmured by the rowers forming a burden to the secret thoughts of one whose first and last word, "Alone, alone!" expresses that his heart knows no sympathy but with the solitude of the situation and the season, and the world within himself is his only companion.

If more congenial fancies than these be prompted by the music, we should, each according to our peculiar temperament, receive them as its true meaning, and follow them so far as their course may lead us.

BOOK 2. OP. 30.

In remarking upon the first book, I made particular allusion to the poetical expression that eminently characterises this interesting series of pieces, because it is a very high quality which can be, to a certain extent, appreciated, even by hearers who have no practical knowledge of music, and which, attention being once directed towards it, cannot be wholly unfelt by any. What refers individually to the songs in the first book, applies generally to the whole series; that is, each one has, I believe, a meaning beyond its musical beauty, but this meaning depends upon our own imagination for its interpretation.

To do justice to these exquisite little productions, we should examine no less closely their technical merit, than indulge in fantasies regarding the sentiment they embody; and I shall, therefore, here notice how, within their very small limits, the principles of musical construction are always carried out, each piece being no less an example of symmetrical form than of beautiful matter.

The fourth, the most important, piece in the present series is an epitome of the grandest form of musical composition, namely, the first movement of an orchestral symphony, or of a sonata, which is a symphony for one or two instruments. Its first subject, in B minor, is succeeded by a second subject, which commences with a brilliant outbreak of enthusiasm upon the chord of D, and this second subject completes the first part of the movement. The opening of the second part presents the development of the ideas that have thus been announced, and we cannot fail to trace the interesting elaboration of the first subject which is now fragmentarily introduced in a variety of forms and always in an unexpected situation. We then return to the original key of B minor, with the resumption of the subject as it at first appeared, and the second subject follows it, introduced now by the chord of G. After this recapitulation of the chief features of the first part, we have a coda, or epilogue to the whole, which opens with a new idea, that is, however, very soon succeeded by some further development of the first subject, and so the movement is completed.

No. 5 is constructed upon the same model, as regards the starting from a certain key, the varying the effect of this by the introduction of another idea in a different key, which closes the first part; the subsequent return to the opening phrase in the original key, the reappearance of the second idea, and the conclusion, with a coda, in the key of the commencement; but, instead of the development of the subjects of the first parts which, usually, constitutes the opening of the second part of a movement, we have here an episodical idea which is submitted to some little elaboration. Everything in this piece is on a much smaller scale than in the piece last noticed, and the whole movement is proportionably concise, so I have spoken of ideas or phrases, rather than of subjects; but the form is none the less complete for its being less extensive.

No. 1 is another example of the fulfilment of the same design, but with some further slight modification, as must always be more or less the case, dependent mainly upon the ideas of which a movement is composed. Especially, it must be observed, that the Episode, introduced at the opening of the Second Part, is repeated in place of the phrase with which the First Part closes, when we have the recapitulation of the chief ideas. The melody of these two latter pieces is of a more vocal character, and it is more unbroken, than in that first described; but, though they thus render a very different sentiment, they are not more expressive.

The second piece is still symmetrical, though more capricious in its form, and this is in keeping with the fantastic wildness of its expression. It is distinguished by its frequent return to the opening phrase, and by the quaint humour of the bar that always introduces the recurrence of this; and we must further notice how the characteristic eccentricity, prevalent throughout, melts away in the glowing introduction of the major key for the Coda, like a child's waking from troubled dreams to meet the loving eyes that have watched its slumber.

No. 3 is a ballad, completely analogous in form, and very analogous in feeling, with the fourth song in the first book. A feature of singular beauty in it, is the recommencement after the full close in the fourth bar preceding the end of the melody, with the two interrogative phrases which are answered most touchingly by the repetition of the previous cadence.

The Barcarole, the last song in the set, is another presentation of the beautiful idealism in the first book, of seclusion from the society of the world and abstraction from its thoughts, during a night ride in a gondola; and of these two pictures, who shall say which is the lovelier? In the present piece, besides the deep, thoughtful beauty that generally characterises it, there are (as I think most hearers must feel) certain notes of especial purpose, which one may particularise as one may, single words in a poem, distinguishing in them the rich fulness of meaning of entire sentences; such are the bass note, A—which is an expression of the most subtle refinement; and the A sharp—which interrupts the expected recommencement of the melody. Let it not be thought frivolous to enter thus into minute details; we do injustice to a great beauty if we disregard its smallest detail, and it is by such minutenesses as these to which I have alluded, that the highest order of beauty in art is especially stamped.

Book 3. Op. 38.

The first of this number of the "Songs without Words" is remarkable for the many various continuations of its opening phrase, of which it is almost entirely composed; always recommencing with the first idea, it almost always loses this in some yet untried cadence, and it is still so ceaselessly continuous, the constant resumptions of the theme are so naturally connected, that we must always be disposed to doubt the means in judging the effect. Let us fancy, in this, a long course of loving persuasion, ever enforcing the same request, and ever presenting it under some fresh aspect that gives it more urgency, more winningness than before; and, above all, in the half-a-dozen prominent bass notes where the cadence is twice interrupted

(the most beautiful, because the most unexpected point in the whole song), let us fancy a whispered assurance that the entreaty has not been in vain.

Of a very different feeling from this is the expression of restless impatience in the second piece, which we may suppose to be soothed, but not checked, at each occurrence of the beautiful transition that introduces the episodical idea—soothed for an instant, as a fire is lulled by fresh fuel, to burn, afterwards, the more intensely. Besides the charm of this transient repose, we must notice the admirable effect of the recurrence of the principal idea, which steals upon us, even after the second digression, which has led us into a remote key, so imperceptibly, as to make us half forget that it has ever been interrupted. It may seem a small point to remark upon, but still let me draw attention to the recommencement of the opening phrase upon the octave above the original note, at its repetition in the third line of the second page, and I believe there are few who will not find this a point of beauty. The interruption of the full close by the introduction of the opening phrase in the bass, and the contention between the top and bottom parts upon this incident, have so obvious an interest as to supersede all comment.

No. 3 is one of those rapturous renderings of passionate joy which are equally rare in words and in music, and in which Mendelssohn has, more frequently perhaps than any other composer, succeeded;—joy, I mean, so extreme as to be almost pain—joy that a single breath might change into anguish.

No. 4 is another of those most concise and exquisitely tuneful pieces, such as I have described in each of the preceding books as a ballad (meaning a very simple song, of which several verses may be sung to the same music), and this has, like those analogous pieces, an introductory and closing symphony. A passage for especial admiration here, is the resumption of the opening phrase of the melody, after it has been twice anticipated in different keys in the preceding bars, which equally proves a great genius and a great artist.

The very highly impassioned piece that follows, is constructed upon the model of the first movement of an orchestral symphony, which, I cannot too often say, is the grandest form of musical composition known. The first and principal subject is self-evident. What we are to understand as the second subject, relieves this, rather by change of key than by change of character; it commences, even, with the opening phrase of the chief subject, but this soon breaks off into a new idea which is of fully sufficient interest and importance to distinguish it. The first part has no defined conclusion, as is most frequently the case in movements of this form, but is continued into the resumption of the first subject in the original key. This is the beginning of a recapitulation, with some little extension, of the ideas that have already been announced, the second subject now appearing in the original key of the movement, which is succeeded by a brief coda. The present is not a situation to discuss the philosophical principles here embodied, but, in tracing this form in the concise example before us, we see the artistic importance that a small piece assumes in the hand of a master, and we prepare ourselves to appreciate the more extended application of the same form in a grander and more elaborate composition.

The duet admits of no comment; the composer's design and the means by which his effect is to be realised is so obvious, that it would be to waste words to enter upon description, and to dilute the manifest beauty before us, to attempt to give any other expression to the sentiment here embodied than that which is rendered in the music.

G. A. MACFARREN.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY.

We have received from a correspondent the following account of the exercise which lately gained for the Rev. Sir F. A. G. Ouseley, Bart., M.A., the degree of Doctor of Music in Oxford University. We shall be glad to have the opportunity of ratifying by our own experience the very flattering eulogies bestowed upon the work. We need hardly explain to our readers that the composer is known as one of the most distinguished and accomplished musical amateurs in this country.

"On Saturday, 9th ult., an exercise for the degree of Doctor in Music by the Rev. Sir F. A. G. Ouseley, Bart., M.A., and Mus. Bac., was performed in the theatre. The composition, a short oratorio, on the martyrdom of St. Polycarp, is one of extraordinary merit, evidencing not only the skill of a master, but the inspiration of a genius. While it betrays a scholarly acquaintance with standard works, it is free from the too prevalent mawkish apings of Mendelssohn or feeble imitations of Händel, and it exhibits, in many passages, treatment strikingly original. Throughout it is highly dramatic and full of effects, and those not vulgarisms and trickery, but legitimate resources of art. The instrumentation is rich. The portraiture of the venerable saint—his resignation and bold confession—the senseless fury of the heathen mob, and the delicious strains of the angels, are exquisite delineations; while the concluding "Amen," a fugal chorus for eight voices, is an elaborate and noble effort. A choice and practised orchestra of about 100 vocalists, Miss Dolby and Mr. Weiss being the principals, and eminent London instrumentalists, led by Mr. Blagrove under the able conduct of Dr. Corfe did justice to the composition, which will well repay reproduction. The theatre was crowded to the utmost, and the appreciation of the audience was most enthusiastically expressed."

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The usual Christmas performance of Händel's Messiah, was given last evening at Exeter Hall. The following were the principal vocalists:—Mad. Clara Novello, Miss Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Herr Formes. The hall was crammed, and the performance admirably effective.

BEAUMONT INSTITUTION.—The first concert of the above institution came off under the able direction of its secretary, Mr. D. Francis, on Monday, Dec. 11th. The room was so crowded that many were obliged to have seats on the platform. The artistes were Mad. Anna Thillon, Mrs. Sims Reeves, Miss Clara Henderson, Mr. A. Wallworth, Mr. C. Herst, Mr. Sims Reeves; and, as conductor, Mr. Frank Mori. Mad. Anna Thillon sang Auber's pleasing trifle, "Une rose bien fleurie," the ballad of "Minnie," and was very successful in Frank Mori's new song, "I love my little native isle." Mrs. Sims Reeves was much applauded for her able rendering of "Softly sighs;" Silas's song, "Oh, would I were you silver moonbeam;" and a new ballad, "I cannot mind my wheel." Mr. Sims Reeves declaimed the patriotic song of "England and Victory" in a manner that raised a storm of applause, and introduced a new song by Mr. J. L. Hatton, called "True to love and thee," which gave the greatest satisfaction. The concert commenced with the National Anthem, and terminated with "Partant pour la Syrie," arranged as a trio.

FÊTE AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

DURING the last few weeks past the greatest activity has prevailed at the Sydenham Palace, numerous workmen having been busily engaged in making preparations for the approaching Christmas festivities, conjoined with a series of Grand Military Concerts. The directors, with laudable forethought, have determined to combine the dulce with the utile, and to conciliate the younger branches of the community by adding to their stores of science and art the more simple and homely attractions of the holiday season. For this purpose, Parisian artistes of repute were engaged to decorate the great central transept after the most approved fashion of French taste. Accordingly, a platform has been raised on the spot where the grand military trophy was displayed during the fêtes for the benefit of the Patriotic Fund, which consists of three terraces, handsomely covered with crimson cloth. In the centre, or upper flight, is a magnificent Christmas tree, of monster proportions, nearly fifty feet in height, and tricked out in the most gorgeous and fascinating manner. Pendants and ornaments of the richest and rarest kind are seen suspended from the branches, while mirrors in profusion, placed so as to project the light into the body of the transept, render the scene quite magical. On the terrace below, trees of a smaller size, similarly decorated, are deposited; and in the front, in greater numbers, of course, Christmas trees of a tiny form will more enchant the juvenile gaze, because of more recommendable dimensions, and more like what youths of both sexes would desire to behold on the drawing-room tables. The bon-bons are of exceeding fancy, and display a world of invention in sugar and chocolate. The true French art is everywhere exhibited. It is, however, but justice to Mr. Deane—the manager of the interior—to say, that the merit of the suggestion is entirely due to him; that he went to Paris purposely to hold consultation with the most accomplished confectioners; and that, in fact, the entire projection of the festival and its details are attributable to himself.

The rest of the decorations immediately connected with what may be called the juvenile department, is equally conspicuous for its variety and tastefulness. At the four corners of the platform are placed groups of stuffed birds, looking really alive, while festoons of holly and ivy, intertwined with red berries and mistletoe, alternated with silver ornaments, are suspended from the monster tree to the galleries, which forms, as it were, a leafy roof overhead. Outside all, in circular rows, are placed marble tables, upon which are seen the most fascinating forms of confectionary—such as drums, baskets, watches, cocked hats, boxes, etc., all made of sugar, and all filled with choice sweetmeats—enough, indeed, to puzzle and make glisten the youthful eye. The bazaar for toys and trinkets will be confined to the galleries.

The first grand military concert took place on Saturday last. The day at first was warm, but towards evening became bitter cold. The attendance was not so large as was anticipated, but this, in great measure, was owing to the proprietors not having advertised early enough, or to sufficient extent. The numbers present may be estimated at about 4,000. The bands in attendance were the First Life Guards, Grenadier Guards, Scots Fusilier Guards, Royal Artillery, and Crystal Palace. The following was the programme:—

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| 1. | Overture ... ... ... ... | Meyerbeer. |
| 2. | Waltz, "Vereinigungs Tänze" ... ... | Labitzky. |
| 3. | Selection, "Lucia di Lammermoor" ... | Donizetti. |
| 4. | Quadrille, "Nocturne" ... ... ... | Strauss. |
| 5. | Selection, "Il Trovatore" ... ... | Verdi. |
| 6. | Variations, "Carnaval de Venise" ... | Paganini. |

5. Vocal chorus, "Hark, Hark, the Trumpet!" Words by W. J. Robson ... ... Weber.
6. Polonaise, with Chorus—Words by Sir W. Scott ... ... ... ... Kücken.
7. Alliance Quadrille, introducing Popular National Airs—Turkish, French, and British—arranged by ... ... Schallehn.

"God save the Queen."

Part first was distributed among the different bands; the Crystal Palace band leading off, and that of the Scots Fusiliers finishing. In the second part all the bands joined their forces, under the leadership of Mr. Schallehn, and almost rent the vault of the great transept with their musical thunder. The effect was very striking to those of the audience who were somewhat removed from the platform: but to those placed in the immediate vicinity of the orchestra the din was literally deafening. Great was the applause, nevertheless, from far and near, and the roar of the applause vied in intensity and loudness with the bands themselves. Mr. Schallehn is entitled to praise for the manner in which he directed the forces under his command—no mean accomplishment, having five different bands to keep in order. If the pianos were not always as delicate as might be desired, Mr. Schallehn made ample amends by the vigour and persistance of his fortes. The five bands, doubtless, would have gone more smoothly together had they had more rehearsals. The chorus was a failure—not so much because they did not sing well, as that they could not be heard. It would have required ten times the number of "voices" assembled at the Crystal Palace, on Saturday, to make head against the power of five military bands at high pressure. Therefore the chorus was a failure.

The performance was brought to a termination by Mr. Schallehn's new "Alliance Quadrille," the whole winding up with the "National Anthem."

All things considered, the first of the series of Grand Military Concerts must be accounted a decided success.

British Vocal Union.—A number of young artists have incorporated themselves into a Society under the above title, for the purpose, as it would seem, of testing their powers before their friends and acquaintances, previously to appearing in presence of the actual public. Of course their names are entirely unknown to fame; but that does not necessarily infer that there is no talent among them. The first concert on Wednesday evening came off at the Music Hall, Store-street. Of those who exhibited on this occasion, we would specialise Mr. Adams, as having a very pleasing tenor voice, out of which a good singer may be made; Mr. Dyson, as possessed of a nice bass voice; and Miss F. Newby, as having a manageable contralto. Mr. Adams was encored in Wallace's ballad, "Let me like a soldier fall;" and Mr. Dyson received the same compliment in "The Rhein Wine." Miss Alice Clevedaile performed a solo on the pianoforte very neatly, and was much applauded. Several concerted pieces were executed, but they did not tell with the effect anticipated, as Miss Julia St. Clair, the principal soprano, was taken ill, and her place had to be supplied at a very short notice. If the Society of the British Vocal Union intends to admit instrumentalists into its ranks—as, by the pianoforte performance on Thursday night, it would appear to do—its present name is a misnomer, and should be altered incontinently. The Society is founded upon praiseworthy principles, and is entitled to support.

A Pugnacious Actor.—On Wednesday evening last, the play of The Hunchback was performed in the Belfast theatre, Mr. Paumier enacting the part of Master Walter. During the performance, some annoyance was caused by persons laughing and otherwise interrupting the progress of the actors; and Mr. Paumier, conceiving that a part of it emanated from the Hon. Arthur Annesley, of the 92nd regiment, Henry R. Wallace, 92nd regiment, and James Bannatyne, merchant, who were seated in one of the private boxes, went to the box and spat in each of their faces, striking Mr. Annesley. Mr. Paumier was summoned on Saturday to the Police Court for the assault; and, failing to appear, a warrant was issued for his apprehension.

M. JULLIEN'S CONCERTS AT DRURY LANE.

The most successful of M. Jullien's annual series of concerts, since he inaugurated them in London, was brought to a termination on Saturday. The attendance was as numerous as that of any preceding night, and the enthusiasm as great. M. Jullien, however, has not deserved better of the public this season than the last, or any other. He has always done his best, and, consequently, has always been entitled to favour. But the English people are slow to perceive and slow to receive, and it is not until after repeated proofs of good intention and ability, that they yield their confidence. Now, M. Jullien did not take the British public by storm, but by insensible degrees, and by legitimate means insinuated himself into their good graces. While delighting, he was instructing; and while he induced his auditors to listen, he was gradually infusing into their minds a taste and liking for the best music. Therefore, although M. Jullien may not have deserved better of his public this year than before, his worth is more generally acknowledged, and his services more thoroughly appreciated. In this manner we can account for the steady progress M. Jullien has made with his audiences, and for the height which he has attained in popular estimation.

The programme of Saturday night presented no actual novelty. Wagner's overture to Tannhauser, however, was repeated; and as it again failed to render itself comprehensible, it certainly had all the effect of a novelty—which perhaps, was the cause why M. Jullien re-introduced it. To those who incline to mystery, the overture to Tannhauser may prove acceptable. We cannot give any opinion about it, since we really do not understand it. This was not the fault of the band or the conductor, whose exertions were worthy of a better cause. Seldom has a more perfect and vigorous performance been heard. Another, and more agreeable, feature of the programme, was the Andante poco Adagio, from the Symphony in D minor, by Mr. Bristow, an American composer of eminence in his own country, played for the second time in this country. The Andante is so well written and indicates so much real feeling for melody, that the whole symphony would have been acceptable. The Scherzo in G minor, from Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream, was the "point" of the concert, being magnificently played and rapturously applauded. The "Allied Armies' Quadrille" was introduced at the end of the first part and created the usual furore.

In the course of the evening, Mad. Anna Thillon sang "Minnie," and, being twice encored, gave "Partant pour la Syrie" with a grace and vigour which enchanted her hearers. In a Fantaisie Espagnole on the violin, written by himself, Sig. Monasterio displayed qualities of the highest order as an executant. His tone is admirable, his expression free from all exaggeration, and his style remarkable for intelligence and purity. Signor Monasterio is a pupil of the Conservatoire of Brussels, and although very young is already one of the brightest ornaments of the Belgian school. M. Jullien was fortunate in being enabled to add so accomplished an artist to his troupe.

At the conclusion of the last morceau—"The Charge Galop"—M. Jullien was loudly and unanimously recalled, and on his appearance in the orchestra was greeted with applause which lasted several minutes. M. Wuille on the clarionet, and M. Cioffi on the trombone also played solos with well-deserved success; and the sparkling quadrille from Rossini's fresh and exquisite Comte Ory, admirably adapted by M. Jullien, was one of the most agreeable features of the dance music. The Huguenots selection, or fantasia, displayed the talents of several other of M. Jullien's most able soloists, and among others, the excellent tenor player, M. Scheurs, from Brussels.

About the Bal Masqué—the brilliant and exciting pendant to M. Jullien's concerts, the one Carnival night of the London season—it is unnecessary to enter into details. The theatre was decorated and lighted as usual—that is to say, with extreme taste and great brilliancy—and the band was no less powerful and efficient than on previous occasions. At no former Bal

Masqué have we mingled in a greater crowd; but we fancied there was a falling off in variety and novelty of the fancy costumes, and too much license was certainly given to the gentlemen visitors, many of whom appeared in anything but evening dress. M. Jullien of course conducted, and Herr Kœnig officiated as his right-hand man, occupying the place of chef at certain intervals. Some of the most popular dance music played at M. Jullien's concerts was introduced. Among others we may mention the "Nepaulese," "Allied Armies," and "American" Quadrilles; the "Kattydid Polka;" the "Moldavian Schottische;" the "Prima Donna," and "Hyacinth Waltzes; the "Charge Galop," etc., etc. The night passed off with strict propriety, and, notwithstanding the immense crowd, and some occasional disturbances, not in very good taste, on the part of a section of the audience, the Bal Masqué on Monday night left a pleasant impression. A little less formality, and more unrestricted freedom, would have made the entertainment still more enjoyable—especially to the lookers on, who, we can readily fancy, were retained in their places by the sole fascination of the music to the very end. At what hour of the morning the whole assembly had dispersed, we cannot pretend to say.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH MUSICIANS.

The twenty-first season was inaugurated on the evening of the 7th instant, by the first of a series of Chamber Concerts, held in Mr. Erat's Harp Saloon. There was a numerous audience of the friends and relations of the members. The concert began with a clever violin quartet, in D minor (No. 2, MS.), by Mr. James Calkin, which was well played by Messrs. J. Zerbini, Clementi, C. F. Colchester, and W. L. Phillips. Three vocal pieces followed, all well sung:—Meyerbeer's animated "May Song," by Mad. Ferrari; and Mr. S. Waley's expressive setting of Longfellow's "Curfew" by Signor Ferrari; and Mr. Aguilar's graceful serenade, "The stars are brightly beaming," by Miss Messent. An instrumental serenade by Mr. E. Perry, a composition of merit, was then played, in the best taste, by Mr. C. Harper, on the horn, accompanied on the pianoforte. The next piece was Mendelssohn's very fine violin quartet in E minor (Op. 44), executed with great spirit by the artists already named above. To this succeeded the fascinating "Chamber trio" (so called), for piano, violin, and violoncello, in A major, by Mr. Sterndale Bennett, capitally played by the composer with Messrs. Zerbini and Lovell Phillips. The delicate ballad called "May dew," from the same pen, sung with the right feeling by Miss Messent; and Mr. Hatton's very pretty "Goodbye, sweetheart," well given by Mr. Suchet Champion, completed the vocal selection. The concert came to an end with the melodious trio in B flat, of Beethoven (Op. 11) for piano, clarionet, and violoncello, which received every justice at the hands of Miss Calkin, Messrs. Lazarus, and Lovell Phillips. Mr. Aguilar accompanied the songs, with his accustomed ability; and the whole proceedings were under the direction of Mr. H. Graves, one of the oldest and most conscientious members of the society.

Greenwich.—(From a Correspondent).—Lecture Hall—On Thursday the 7th instant, Mr. Henry Morley gave an evening concert. The following artists were engaged:—Madame Clara Novello, Madame Lablache, Mr. J. L. Hatton, Signor F. Lablache, and Mr. Sims Reeves. Conductor, Mr. J. L. Hatton. Solo pianoforte, Miss Ellen Day. A very large and select audience were present on the occasion, and, in consequence of the numerous disappointments by parties being unable to obtain seats, Mr. H. Morley intends giving another concert, with equal attraction, in aid of the Patriotic Fund, on Thursday January 4th, 1855.

THE SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

The members of this Society commenced their concerts for this season, at Exeter Hall, on Friday—last night week—with Handel's oratorio, Deborah. This work was finished by the composer, February 21st, 1733. By command of George II. it was produced at the King's Theatre, March 17th, in the same year.

Mr. Costa was received with a hearty welcome from audience and orchestra on taking his place at his desk. The solo singers were Mad. Clara Novello, Miss Dolby, Miss Huddart, Mrs. Temple, Mr. Smythson, Mr. T. E. Williams, and Herr Formes. The general execution was admirable: the solo vocalists especially distinguished themselves. Herr Formes obtained an encore for his powerful and earnest delivery of the air, "Tears such as tender fathers shed." Mad. Clara Novello greatly distinguished herself by her clear and impressive delivery of the somewhat florid music allotted to Deborah. Miss Dolby was excellent as usual, and the other ladies and gentlemen deserve commendation for the care and pains exhibited in what was entrusted to them. The choruses, in most instances, were very efficient. One or two more repetitions of the oratorio will doubtless, render them more perfect.

Mr. Costa, as in the case of Samson, has supplied additional accompaniments to Deborah.

MISS DOLBY'S SOIREES.

The second and last took place on Wednesday evening, before a fashionable audience. The concert began with the clarinet trio of Beethoven (Op. 11, in B flat), which was played to perfection by Messrs. Lindsay Sloper (piano), Lazarus (clarinet, and Piatti (violoncello), and being rarely heard, was doubly welcome. A selection from the Stabat Mater of Pergolesi, consisting of two duets and an aria, with Italian words by Sig. Manfredo Maggioni, afforded much interest. The aria was sung with great taste by Miss Dolby, and the duets by the same accomplished lady with her promising sister, Miss Amy Dolby. The music is, as the French might say, "un peu pâle." An andante, followed by a Rondo Pastorale, composed and performed by Mr. Blagrove on the violin (accompanied on the piano), obtained much approbation; while the enthusiasm of the room was raised, and no wonder, by Miss Dolby's very artistic singing, in Mozart's grand aria, "Per questa bella mano," to which the violoncello obbligato (not obligato) of Sig. Piatti imparted additional charm. Two graceful little pieces for pianoforte solos—the old English air, "Early one morning," with variations, and Allegretto Scherzando—were performed with exquisite neatness by the composer, Mr. L. Sloper, who in the lovely Air Varié of Mendelssohn (in D) for piano and violoncello, shared with Signor Piatti the genuine and well-deserved applause of all present. Two very nice Italian songs, very nicely sung by Miss Dolby, came next in order,; "Addio" by Signor Piatti, and "E m'e venuto," by Signor Gordigiani; the last, which is eminently graceful, was encored. Signor Piatti, then, in a violoncello solo, both surprised and delighted the audience, and the performances came to an end with a couple of very "taking" ballads—"Would I were with thee," composed by Mr. Schulz and sung by Miss A. Dolby; and the Jacobite song of "Charlie yet," in which Miss Dolby the elder accompanied herself on the pianoforte. Mr. Benedict was the conductor, than whom a better could not have been selected. Everybody was pleased and satisfied with the programme.

Gratz.—The concerts of the Männergesang-Verein have commenced. The last opera produced at the theatre was Norma.

PROVINCIAL.

LIVERPOOL.—Lord Stanley went to the last Saturday evening concert, and made a speech. He said—"I confess that I am glad that the arrangements of this evening have given to me the opportunity of not only expressing, however briefly, to the managers of this society my belief that these amusements greatly contribute to the moral and social benefit of the people of Liverpool —(hear)—but of rejoicing also that I have the opportunity of expressing the pleasure which I feel in finding myself here for the first time—the first, but I hope not the last. (Cheers.) It may be—I believe it is—my fault that our acquaintance has not begun earlier; but I assure you it shall not be my fault if, now that it has begun, it does not prove lasting. (Cheers.) These concerts, as you are aware, have been established now some sixteen or seventeen years; and I believe I may say, with perfect confidence, that the object of those who first set them on foot was not their own profit or personal popularity, but solely the public convenience—(hear, hear)—a desire to supply a cheap, a rational, and an agreeable source of amusement to all; a wish to supersede musical entertainments of a much lower and questionable character. (Cheers.) I am quite sure they have deserved success. (Cheers.) You often hear a good deal said against our modern system of society, which tends to bring together great masses in crowded communities like this great commercial town. No doubt that state of society is attended with some disadvantages; but, then, you must recollect such a state of society has also great countervailing benefits. It is only in a community like this, for instance, where the crowded population may, by combination, obtain at such prices that which at other places, in former times, was considered a great luxury, and reserved comparatively for the few. There is, I believe, a very growing feeling that the amusements of the people are, or ought to be, the subject of general interest. In all the finer arts we, in England, are behind our neighbours. There is no doubt that, consequent upon the alterations of manners, within the last century the number of our national amusements have diminished, and it is only recently that a reaction has set in." The noble lord resumed his seat amidst great cheering. Brief addresses were also delivered by Mr. Brown, M.P., Mr. Thornely, M.P., and by Messrs. Picton and Holt; after which the concert was proceeded with.

LEEDS.—On Saturday last, a concert was given at the Music Hall, under the auspices of the Rational Recreation Society. Händel's Acis and Galatea was given in a very creditable manner. The second part of the entertainment consisted of Rossini's overture L'Italiana in Algeri, followed by Mendelssohn's finale to Lorely. This wonderful creation of the great dramatic composer was listened to with the greatest interest from first to last, and at the end such a shout of applause was raised as has seldom been heard in our Music Hall. This was the first time of its performance in Leeds, and the second in Yorkshire, it having been given at the Bradford Festival, when Miss Louisa Pyne took the part of Leonora. Mrs. Sunderland's singing of the music of the betrayed maiden was full of energy. The general execution reflects high credit upon all concerned, and especially upon Mr. Spark, for the labour it must have cost him. After Lorely, there was a miscellaneous collection, consisting of Purcell's battle song and chorus, "Come, if you dare," a violin solo by Mr. Willy, two other choruses, and the National Anthem. The interest of the concert was much enhanced by the critical remarks of Mr. Spark on Acis and Galatea. The principal solo parts were sung by Mrs. Sunderland, Mr. Miranda, and Mr. Lambert. The room was crowded, and the audience enthusiastic. Miss Birch is announced for the next concert.

BRAMLEY.—On Monday last a concert, arranged by the choir of the church, was given at the National School, and was numerously attended. Miss Witham, Miss Sevier, Miss Walker, and Mr. Iles were the principal vocalists. Mr. Bowling presided at the pianoforte.

EDINBURGH.—Mr. C. J. Hargitt's concert passed off with éclat. The principal morceaux were Beethoven's trio in D, and Mendelssohn's sonata in B flat. The performers were Mr. Cooper Herr Hausmann, Miss Milner, and Mr. Hargitt, who is a pupil of Mr. Hallé's, and made his début as a pianist on this occasion. Mr. Hargitt played in both the concerted pieces with much steadiness, and was favourably received. He also played an impromptu by Schuloff, and one of Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words." Mr. Cooper and Herr Hausmann are too well-known to require special comment.

BLOCKLEY.—Mr. C. Tovey, organist of the Abbey Church, Pershore, gave a vocal concert at the Assembly Room of the Crown Hotel, on Tuesday evening last. The principal vocalists were the Misses Tovey, Mr. Day, of Stow-on-the-Wold, and Mr. Thomas, of Worcester Cathedral.

WORCESTER.—The choristers of the cathedral gave their annual concert on Monday evening last, in the Natural History Room, and were honoured with a very numerous company. They were assisted by the lay clerks; the assistant-organist of the cathedral, Mr. C. H. Redgrave, presiding at the pianoforte, The juvenile vocalists acquitted themselves creditably. Master Caldicott gained an encore in the song "Over the sea," as did likewise Masters Edmonds and Barker, the former in the "Spirit of love," and the latter in "Shells of the ocean." The lay clerks sang some favourite glees, their performance giving much satisfaction.

CANTERBURY.—The theatre has been sold, and is to be converted to nobody knows what.

WE give the following on the authority of the South Eastern Gazette:—The late Concert by the Crystal Palace Band.—To the surprise of almost everybody in the city, the production of this effort to increase the local subscription to the Patriotic Fund, is represented in a paltry balance of (omitting the donations of £2), £6 13*s.* 9*d.*! and yet one of the first bands in the country gave their gratuitous services. The receipts are stated to have been £66 3*s.*, and expenses £59 9*s.* 3*d.* Of course, the conveyance of the band to and from London, and their accommodation, formed a considerable item in the account; the other expenses, however, were needlessly swelled, and the charge for the room, with its necessary adjuncts, exorbitantly high. Who would have imagined that a concert of such a high character, and embracing an attendance of some five hundred persons, at unusually high rates, would have yielded so trifling a profit? But such is the fact, and it will prove a lesson for the future.

MARGATE.—The third concert of the Catch Club took place on Friday evening last, at the Royal Hotel. The principal solo singers were Mr. Penniket and Mr. Pillon; the orchestra executed several pieces, and gave much satisfaction.

WATFORD AND ST. ALBANS.—On Friday the 8th instant, and Tuesday the 12th, concerts were given in the above towns by Mr. Brooks, who was assisted on these occasions by Miss Bennett, Miss E. Bennett, Miss J. Brooks, Mr. Fairbairn, Mr. Genge and Mr. G. Brooks.

LYNN.—Mr. Bray gave a concert at the Athenæum on Tuesday, the 5th instant. The singers were Mad. Newton Frodsham, Mrs. Wallack, and Messrs. Mann, Atkinson, and Burton. The "lion" of the evening was Mr. Lazarus, who, on his clarionet, performed wonders, which electrified and delighted the audience. Mr. Lazarus played several solos, and accompanied Mad. Frodsham and Mr. Wallack in two songs. Mr. Bray took a part in the duet for violin and piano with Mr. Sothern, and in a trio with this gentleman and Mr. Burton (violoncellist). The concert gave general satisfaction.

VENTNOR.—We have just heard, with great pleasure, that Sig. Marras, who is now resting at Ventnor after the fatigue of the London season, intends giving a grand concert there in aid of the Patriotic Fund, and that A. Hambrough, Esq., has had the liberality to offer his splendid rooms at Steephill Castle for the occasion. We believe the concert will take place on Wednesday, the 20th inst. No doubt the residents and visitors of the Isle of Wight will seize this opportunity of testifying their patriotism and enjoying a great musical treat.

FOREIGN.

VIENNA.—(From our own Correspondent.)—In spite of the engrossing intelligence from the seat of war, and the natural curiosity—sufficient to arouse even the politico-apathetic Viennese—to know what course Austria really intends to take in the present crisis, musical matters are looking up, and the great composers, more fortunate than the generals of his Imperial Majesty, the Czar of all the Russias, are not quite eclipsed by the victorious commanders of the allies and their brave, devoted troops. This musical activity, however, is more apparent in the concert-room than on the stage. In fact, the principal events at the theatre have been, if I may so express myself, of a negative character, inasmuch as they consisted of two farewell appearances: that of Mdlle. La Grua, who took leave of the public here, with whom she has become a favourite, as Valentine, in Les Huguenots, and that of Mdlle. Marie Taglioni (a time-honoured name in the history de la danse), who executed her last entrechat in the ballad of Satanella. The élite of Vienna assembled to bid the charming votary of Terpsichore good-bye. The house was absolutely in a blaze with the toilets of the fair and noble daughters of Austria, who occupied the boxes, with their husbands and sons, impelled thereto, firstly, by the desire to witness the fascinating Marie once more before she left, and, lastly, though not leastly, anxious to follow the example set by the Emperor, Empress, and all the Court. To calculate the number of bouquets showered on the stage, and the sum they must have cost, at this advanced season of the year, would be a task for the Statistical Society, and, therefore, one which I shall not attempt; but, I should say, that there were enough to have supplied the Middle Row of Covent-garden Market for one day, and that the price would have been sufficient to gladden the hearts of half the horticulturalists round London. After the performances were concluded, Herr Capellmeister Kaulich and his band serenaded Mdlle. Marie. Donizetti's opera of Belisario, which has not been performed for a considerable time, will be revived next week.

The Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde des Oesterr: Kaiserstaats gave their first concert in the Grosser Redouten-Saal, on the 3rd instant. They began their new campaign well, inasmuch as the core of the entertainment of the 3rd instant was composed of works by three great masters—Mozart, Weber, and Mendelssohn, but they might have chosen something better to end with than Herr Richard Wagner's overture to Rienzi. With all respect for Dr. Franz Liszt's opinion, I cannot help exclaiming with Desdemona, "O! most lame and impotent conclusion!" The concert opened with a symphony in C major, by Herr R. Schumann.

To turn from profane to sacred music, I may inform you that the Namensfest, or Saint's day, of her Majesty the Empress Elizabeth, was solemnized by the performance of a grand mass in St. Annakirche, on which occasion the so-called "Mariazeller-Messe," by Haydn, a hymn to Saint Elizabeth (with full accompaniment), by Herr Ferdinand Schubert, and a "Salve, Regina" by Franz Schubert, were performed, under the direction of Herr Ferdinand Schubert. At the conclusion of the above pieces, Herr Schubert performed an organ prelude, in which he blended the national melody of Austria. When I have added that Mad. Clara Schumann-Wiek, and Herr Gade, the composer, are shortly expected, I have exhausted my stock of news until next week, and shall, therefore, conclude my letter.

MILAN.—(From our own Correspondent, 9th Dec., 1854.)—At the Teatro Carcano, Il Domino Nero has been succeeded by Verdi's Ernani. The mise-en-scène of the latter has been most indifferent, and reflects but little credit on the management. The principal parts were sustained by the prima donna, Signora Donati; the tenor, Signor Biundi; the baritone, Signor Ferrario; and the basso, Signor Mirandola. Il Barbiere will be produced also, at this theatre, in a few days.

At the Teatro Re, a poor countryman, blind from his birth, named Giuseppe Picchi, has, during the last week, made quite a furore in this theatre, by his playing many of the most difficult arias (with variations) from the modern operas upon a simple fife, without keys, and which can be purchased for the value of a third part of a penny.—The season of the T. R. Canobbiana closed on the 30th ult. with selections from La Fiorina, Il Pirata, and Don Bucefalo.

BERLIN.—(From our own Correspondent).—The series of Sinfonie-Soirèen has been brought to a close for this year. The fifth took place last week, the rooms being required for the solemnization of certain festivities incident to the approaching Christmas season. The programme was interesting. It comprised Haydn's symphony in C major, Cherubini's overture to Les Abencerages, and Beethoven's overture to Coriolanus, and Pastoral Symphony. All the pieces were well executed, and the numerous audience were not chary of their applause. At Zimmermann's third Quartet-Versammlung, I had the pleasure of hearing an admirable performance of several works by some of the great masters; among others, Mendelssohn's quartet in E minor, and Haydn's in D major. Mad. Clara Schumann's concert on Monday, and Herr Liebig's on Tuesday, presented nothing worthy of particular comment. Among the visitors here at present is a Herr von Bülow, one of Liszt's best pupils. This gentleman played at the last meeting of the Neue Berliner Liedertafel. He intends giving, next week, a concert of his own, at which he will execute several compositions by Liszt. Meyerbeer has left for Vienna, to be present at the first representation of L'Etoile du Nord.

Great preparations, and many discussions, are taking place daily respecting the grand opening of La Scala on the 26th inst. Marco Visconti is being rehearsed for the first opera.

VENICE.—La Vestale of Mercadante, sustained by the Signore Orecchia, Corvetti, and the Signori Liverani, Mazzanti, and Latry, has had a favourable reception.

GENOA.—At the Teatro Carlo Felice, Il Birrajo di Preston has been produced for the last opera of the autumnal season, interpreted by the prima-donna, Signora Borsi-Deleurie; the tenor, Sig. Stecchi-Bottardi; and the buffo, Sig. Frizzi. The performance had but an indifferent reception.

NICE.—Il Furioso of Donizetti has been represented, executed by the prima-donna, Signora Marietta Villa; the tenor, Sig. Ferrari; the barytone, Sig. Marra; and the buffo, Sig. Grandi.

AJACCIO.—Luisa Strozzi, by the Maestro Sanelli, has been warmly received. The principal artists were Signora Carolina Guerra, and the Signori Banti, Bentivoglio, and Mingozzi.

BOLOGNA.—At the Teatro Comunale, Il Barbiere has been given, sustained by Mad. Persiani; the tenor, Sig. Galvani; the baritone, Sig. Corsi; and the buffo, Sig. Scalese.

PALERMO.—At the Teatro Carolino, Verdi's Attila has been given. The execution was indifferent on the first evening, but improved on successive representations. The principal executants were, the prima donna, Signora Carozzi; the tenor, Sig. Graziani; the baritone, Sig. Vitti; and the basso, Sig. Garcia.

ROYAL GALLERY OF ILLUSTRATION.—Messrs. Grieve and Telbin opened on Monday evening their New Moving Diorama, illustrating the events of the present war in the Crimea. They have again judiciously availed themselves of the assistance of Mr. Stocqueler, whose acquaintance with military matters peculiarly qualifies him to lecture upon this subject. Mr. Stocqueler gave an illustrated lecture on the war, briefly sketched the events antecedent to the departure of the troops for the east, and followed their proceedings to the present time. The Diorama consists of illustrations of St. Petersburgh, Cronstadt, Constantinople, the shores of the Black Sea and the Crimea, with views of the departure of the allied fleets from Varna, the landing in Kalamita Bay, the Battle of the Alma, charge of the Guards and Highlanders, capture of guns in the redoubt, the flank march through the forest, and the forts and harbours of Sebastopol, with various dioramic effects. The lecture was further assisted by diagrams, on a large scale, of bastions, parapets, gabions, fascines, etc. Mr. Stocqueler's lecture cannot be too highly praised. His descriptions of the various incidents represented by the Moving Diorama are exceedingly interesting; and no one, we are certain, could, in so few words, render a more satisfactory and lucid account of the great events now occurring in the Crimea. We strongly recommend all who are interested in the present campaign—and who is not?—to go to the Gallery of Illustration, and we promise them an ample reimbursement for their visit.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, December 16th, 1854.

In 1834, a number of English, Scotch, Welsh, and Irish singers, players, and composers, banded together, under the assumed title of The Society of British Musicians, and gave a series of six concerts in the Hanover Square Rooms. The experiment was very successful, and, the price of a season ticket for the series of performances being only one guinea, the tax was considered moderate by the friends and well-wishers of the associated musicians, who flocked to the concerts in good round numbers, and applauded the efforts both of producers and executants, with genuine warmth. Everyone was satisfied. The members of the Society, pleased with the manner in which they had been appreciated, returned to their task with renewed ardour, and had the satisfaction of knowing that they were working upon a solid foundation, with a tolerable fund to fall back upon in case that public support should be slacker than at the first start. Some atrabilious critic, at the time (the editor of the late Harmonicon, we believe—who, to use his own language, would "flee precipitately" after the second movement of any of the British symphonies) attempted to throw the performances into ridicule, by calling them the "three-and-sixpenny concerts." But in vain. The inauguration was auspicious; and had the incorporated musicians followed out the course they had begun, there can be little doubt but that, at the present time, they would have been in as prosperous and solid a position as the Société des Concerts of the Paris Conservatoire. At the same time, such a title as the Société des Concerts would, we think, have been both more appropriate and more modest than that of The Society of British Musicians—since, even at the commencement, when there was more colour than now for the appropriation of the latter (which events have shown to be simply absurd), a good half of our native composers did not belong to the association.

We have no intention to write a history of the progress of the Society of British Musicians, from its foundation, in 1834, up to the state of positive collapse into which it has degenerated for a considerable number of years past. This has been done already; and few of our readers are unacquainted with the various circumstances that have gradually brought the Society from the rank of an important and useful corporation to that of something as useless at it is insignificant and unmeaning. Let it suffice that, speedily losing sight of the principles upon which they started, the members were ultimately at loggerheads with each other, and disunion became the order of the day. Parties sprang up, each with a different idea, and each with a recognized leader. There were composers, who contested that the Society was intended exclusively for their benefit; orchestral performers, who not only claimed the right to legislate with a strong hand, but to be paid for their services in the orchestra (a thing never dreamed of by the Paris Société des Concerts—a body corporate like the Orchestral Union, the members all giving their services gratuitously and sharing alike in the advantages and profits); and singers, and solo performers, who began to find it rather hard to be compelled to sing and play without remuneration, for the benefit of a number of individuals about whom they knew little and probably cared less. Thus, by degrees, the Society of British Musicians dwindled into a mere coterie, which, unable to get a hearing elsewhere, summoned its friends and the public, annually, to Mr. Erat's Harp Saloon, in Berners-street, in order that they might bear witness to the genius and talent so much neglected by the world in ordinary. The name of the Society has now become a by-word. Nobody knows anything about it, and few beyond the circle of the members themselves are anxious to be informed. What, then, in the name of common sense, is the use of perpetuating the association? Why not dissolve it, and, by an appeal to the entire body-musical of the country, endeavour to form an institution more general in its influence, and more definite in its plans and application?

Here, in the year 1854, after twenty years of existence, and more than twenty appeals to the public, we read, in half-a-dozen advertisements of the morning papers, that the Society of British Musicians has entered upon its twenty-first season, and is about to give its accustomed annual series of Chamber Concerts, at Erat's Harp Saloon. The first thought of an uninitiated reader of these advertisements must be, "What is the Society of British Musicians—and who are they that compose it?" Happily a printed circular enables us to supply the desired information. The members have been careful to publish their names; and we are thus in a position to tell the world who are those very gentlemen who pretend to represent the musical profession throughout the length and breadth of the British empire. Here they are—forty-one "members," and fourteen associates:—

Members—Messrs. T. Adams, E. Aguilar, J. Banister, H. C. Banister, R. Barnett, W. S. Bennett; Madame Bertini; Messrs. H. Blagrove, James Calkin, J. B. Calkin; Miss Calkin; Messrs. J. Clinton, C. Coote, J. T. Cooper, W. Dorrell, W. Erat, A. Ferrari, W. Goodwin, H. Graves, J. H. Griesbach, A. Guest, W. H. Holmes, C. E. Horsley, H. Lazarus, C. Neate, E. Perry, W. L. Phillips, C. Potter, Sir Geo. Smart, Messrs. C. Severn, C. Steggall, Mus. Doc.; C. E. Stephens, S. J. Stephens, J. W. Thirlwall, H. J. Trust, W. Watson, W. H. Webb, J. Weslake, H. Westrop, T. Westrop, and J. Zerbini.

Associates—Miss C. Carbery, Messrs. W. H. T. Champion, C. F. Colchester, W. M. Foster, Miss M. Griesbach, Messrs. C. E. Hirst, G. H. Lake, T. Mellish, A. F. Mullen, W. Redfearn, J. Reynolds, T. Reynolds, G. J. Webb, and J. F. Whitehorn.

Well may an ignorant amateur exclaim—"How does it happen that a body which arrogates to itself the title of Society of British Musicians, should enrol so small a minority of the more eminent British professors in the catalogue of its members?" How, indeed! Let us, impromptu, and at random, compile a list of composers, players, and singers, who, though British, have nothing whatever to do with the Society now just come of age, and, therefore, as might be surmised, nothing to say to the representation of the art of music in this country:—

E. J. Loder (composer); H. C. Cooper (violinist); John Barnett (composer); Arabella Goddard (pianist); Alfred Mellon (composer and conductor); Henry Smart (composer and organist); Samuel Sebastian Wesley (organist and composer); Thomas Best (organist and composer); E. J. Hopkins (organist); George Cooper (organist); Frank Mori (composer); Sir Henry Bishop (composer); G. A. Macfarren (composer); W. C. Macfarren (composer and pianist); T. M. Mudie (composer); Mrs. Kate Thompson (pianist); H. Hill (alto); H. Jarrett (horn); W. Howell (double-bass); M. W. Balfe (composer); W. V. Wallace (composer); Lindsay Sloper (composer and pianist); John Braham (singer); Sims Reeves (do.); Miss Dolby (do.); Miss Birch (do.); G. A. Osborne (composer and pianist); J. L. Hatton (composer); Brinley Richards (composer and pianist); Henry Lincoln (organist and composer); F. B. Jewson (pianist and composer); John Goss (organist and composer); Henry Lealie (composer); Oliver May (organist, pianist, and composer); Henry Wylde (composer and conductor); J. B. Chatterton (harpist); Mrs. Anderson (pianist to the Queen); Mr. Lucas (composer and violoncellist); Clara Novello (singer); T. Harper (trumpet); C. Harper (horn); Louisa Pyne (singer); George Kiallmark (pianist and composer); John Barnett, jun. (pianist); J. Richardson (flautist); J. Willy (violinist); T. G. Reed (composer); Howard Glover (composer); E. Fitzwilliam (composer); E. Chipp (organist and composer); J. Walmisley (composer); A. Nicholson (oboist); G. Anderson (director of the Philharmonic); John Ella (director of the Musical Union), &c., &c., &c.

We could multiply this list, ad infinitum; but we have made it long enough to serve the purpose in hand. We put it to any one of sane mind, what right have the knot of professors, previously quoted, to assume for themselves the name and title of Society of British Musicians, when more than half the most eminent musicians of the country are not included in their ranks? Admit that many of these last, having seceded, were consequently once members; why then have they seceded?—and why have others invariably declined to join? It is as though the treasury of Coutts and Co. being emptied, or nearly emptied, the words "Coutts and Co., bankers," were still emblazoned on the doors of the ancient mansion in the Strand. But the gist of our argument rests not here. The real truth of the matter is "in a nutshell." The notion of a Society like the Society of British Musicians was false and fallacious. Based on that system of protection which is going as fast as possible "to the dogs," unhonoured, and unregretted, it could not possibly endure; and this was evidently the opinion of the Society itself—since, many years ago, the introduction of works of foreign composers was resorted to, as a means of enticing the public. The innovation failing, however, simply established the fact that the Society was altogether and primitively unnecessary; and the longer it drags on its weary existence, the more generally will this conclusion be arrived at, by professors, amateurs, and the community at large. What, indeed, can be the actual condition of a Society, which, year after year, does nothing but give, as a sign that it still exists, a series of chamber concerts of inferior calibre? What is the use of such a Society?—and what reason has it to appeal to the public for patronage? Professors of acknowledged reputation can derive no benefit whatever from having their compositions performed, or from performing themselves, in a small room, before a small audience of indulgent friends and relations; and those who have yet to be acknowleged can gain little by the recognition of their merits on the part of a mere clique. They might, with as much reason, invite a select circle of acquaintances, to hear and pronounce on their essays by their own firesides.

Under these circumstances, and with the views we honestly entertain, we cannot but regard the annual reappearance in public of what is termed (as it were by a sort of copyright in the title) The Society of British Musicians, as a very incongruous pantomime, which the sooner it is dropped the better for the respectability of the musical art in this country, and the better for the ultimate prospects of its followers.

M. Jullien.—We hear, from authority on which reliance can be placed, that M. Jullien has entered into arrangements with Mr. Gye to commence another series of concerts at Covent Garden Theatre; and that, among other engagements, one has been concluded for the season with the great German violinist, Herr Ernst. We have no doubt, however, that full particulars will be announced forthwith.

PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Dec. 13, 1854.

Sunshine through the clouds. A break in the atmosphere, material, political, and artistic. A real and decisive success for an artist who has always commanded the respect and sympathy of musicians—Monsieur Berlioz. The Emperor's first (qy. second) appearance in public this season, and the revival for that occasion of the greatest work of the greatest French composer, the immortal Muette (Masaniello) of Auber, who has made his dumb girl speak with the eloquence of nine orators. Such is the summary of the week's news. Now for the details.

On Sunday last, L'Enfance du Christ, the trilogy or oratorio of M. Berlioz, was performed at the Salle Herz, the first time that the complete work had been presented before the public. Whatever may be the opinions as to the merits or demerits of M. Berlioz, this much at least is certain; he is a man of original genius—he borrows from none, and his inspiration is drawn from himself alone. Therefore no one can claim an interest in any success he may obtain, nor appropriate a portion of the plaudits which were so lavishly bestowed on Sunday last.

It is an unquestionable fact that, while light and lively music has flourished at the Parisian theatres, music which appealed to higher and nobler sympathies, has fallen into disrepute. It seemed as though the French intelligence was incapable of embracing both at once, and that public feeling was withdrawn from the more pure and refined, to dally with the charms of the gayer and prettier fair one. From time to time, some unquestionable inspiration of genius has recalled the fickle public to its admiration of true art, and, ashamed of its past indifference, it has all the more readily accepted the opportunity of humbling itself and exalting the artist whose genius has succeeded in gaining its affections. Such was the case on Sunday, and M. Berlioz produced a legitimate effect on an audience including almost every artist and literary man in Paris. For nearly a fortnight, every reserved seat had been taken in advance; the few "unreserved" were filled directly the doors were open, and hundreds were turned away unable to obtain admission. M. Berlioz himself directed the orchestra, which comprised in its ranks most of the best artists now in the metropolis. Perhaps on that very account it had been impossible to have as many rehearsals as were desirable, and therefore the orchestra hardly went as well as might have been expected—a fault which they will amend at each successive representation.

L'Enfance du Christ is a sacred trilogy, of which M. Berlioz has composed both poetry and music. The poem is partly descriptive and partly dramatic, the link between the two, and connecting both, being formed by a "Récitant," who performs the office of the Chorus in Greek tragedy. The first part commences with the dream of Herod, to whom it has been revealed in a vision:—

"Ton heureux temps s'enfuit!
Un enfant vient de naître
Qui fera disparaître
Ton trône et ton pouvoir."

Herod consults the Hebrew soothsayers, who inform him that his dream is true, and that his safety can only be bought by a massacre of all the new-born innocents. The scene changes to the stable in Bethlehem, where a chorus of angels admonishes Mary and Joseph to depart, with the child, into Egypt. The second part describes the flight, and opens with a chorus of shepherds; the main incidents of the flight are declaimed by the Récitant, and the part concludes with a chorus, "Alleluia." The third is the arrival at Sais; the Récitant describes the return of the Saviour to his country, to accomplish the sacrifice whereby the world shall be saved, and the trilogy concludes on the word "Amen," with a chorus full of poetic and religious splendour. The principal parts are the Virgin Mary (Madame Meillet, from the Théâtre-Lyrique), Joseph (M. Meillet, from ditto), Herod (M. Depasio from the Grand-Opéra), Un Père de Famille (M. Battaille, from the Opéra-Comique), Récitant (M. Jourdan, from the Opéra-Comique). The Récitant commences the piece by announcing the birth of Jesus. A nocturnal march is heard, an armed troop advances, and the orchestra plays a symphony of military and warlike character. Polydorus and a centurion appear, and a short dialogue ensues. Then follows Herod's dream—a melancholy air is sung to a vigorous and graphic accompaniment, which, ere long, changes, and the orchestra repeats the fears of the tyrant, and becomes his echo. This is succeeded by the scene between Herod and the Hebrew deviners. These last proceed to their incantation—an orchestral piece where the mournful notes of the horn are intermingled with the deep sounds of the double basses, producing an effect at once original and striking. This section of the first part winds up with a chorus denouncing the innocents; "Oui, oui, par le fer qu'ils périssent," which is remarkable for energy and force. And now the scene changes to the stable of Bethlehem: a calm succeeds the storm, and nothing can be more simple and touching than the opening air, which was so well sung by Madame Meillet.

"O mon cher fils, donne cette herbe tendre
A ces agneaux qui vers toi vont, bêlant;
Ils sont si doux! laisse, laisse—les prendre,
Ne les fais pas langair, ô mon enfant."

The melody is delicious, and with the accompaniment of the violoncellos, paints an admirable picture of happiness and peace. The chorus of Angels counselling flight, with an accompaniment of the organ (played by Madlle. Sophie Dulcken), brings the first part to a conclusion.

The second part is in no way inferior. An orchestral prelude leads to a chorus of shepherds, which is succeeded by an air for the Récitant, which was encored, and the part concludes with "Hallelujah" (chorus). The Récitant's air is delicious, and would of itself have ensured success; it was well sung by M. Jourdan, and constantly interrupted by bursts of genuine applause.

In the third part, the Virgin and Joseph have arrived at Sais, footsore and weary. A chorus of Romans and Egyptians is heard, and the Virgin is afraid. But none can be found who will give shelter to the way-worn traveller. The Father of a Family at last pities their condition, and affords them shelter; and, in reply to his queries, Joseph answers:—

"Elle a pour nom Marie;
Je m'appelle Joseph, et nous nommons
L'enfant, Jésus."

These words were sung to a strain of music so sweet and tender, that they compose a little religious poem of themselves. The dialogue between Joseph and the host is followed by a trio for two flutes and a harp; and an unaccompanied chorus, blessing the Virgin and child, as they sleep, terminates the work.

M. and Mdlle. Meillet, MM. Jourdan, Battaille, and Dépassio, deserve much praise for the excellent manner in which they sang the music allotted to them. M. Berlioz has been more than once reproached with obtaining his effects entirely from great masses of sound—in other words, from noise and clamour. To this he has replied by a composition distinguished from first to last by grace, innocence, tenderness, and naiveté—violins, tenors, violoncellos, two flutes, and two hautboys, form the combination of instruments by means of which he has mainly produced his effects. The choruses also are written with a rare sobriety, and some critics too have remarked that M. Berlioz, in his choral writing on the present occasion, "seems to have been guided by the same hand which directed Palestrina when he traced the edifying strophes of the Stabat Mater." The composer, they insist, "has imparted to Joseph and Mary that charm of effect and colouring which we find in the pictures of the great Italian school;" and the conclusion of the first part, they continue, "more particularly resembles a painting of Perugino or Fra Angelico—the same simplicity in the production of effect, the same impression produced on the sensibilities of the audience in one case and the beholders in the other."

M. Berlioz was greeted with enormous cheers at the conclusion, and re-called some twenty times. I trust the success he has obtained will encourage him to push onward in the same course, and that we shall in due time have the "boyhood" and "manhood" of the Saviour from the same pen. L'Enfance du Christ is to be repeated on Sunday, the 24th instant.

The Emperor went to the Grand-Opéra on Wednesday, for the first time this season. La Muette de Portici was performed, with Gardoni (Masaniello), Massol (Pietro), Mdlle. Pouilley (Elvira), and Cerito (Fenella). In addition to this, Mad. Guy Stephan danced in the divertissement of the first act; Mdlle. Robert in that of the second; and Mdlle. Rosati, a pas interpolated in the third. Auber himself had for some weeks superintended the rehearsals, and the benefit of his counsels was manifest in the great improvement of the orchestra, and the admirable manner in which the choruses were given. Gardoni sang like an artist as he is, and with great taste; but his physical powers were taxed somewhat beyond their capacity. There is little in common between the slender and graceful figure of Gardoni, and the vigorous, broad-shouldered, revolutionary fisherman of Naples. M. Massol's Pietro is known to all the world; but M. Massol is not so young as he was, and seems to have forgotten how to sing, as of old. Mdlle. Pouilley who made her début in Elvira, is about twenty-two—very fair, and not ill-looking. Her voice is a light soprano, of no great compass, but agreeable enough. She has been well taught, and the impression she made was favourable, but she excited no enthusiasm. Mdlle. Cerito was graceful and animated as Fenella, but her face was inexpressive, and her acting unmeaning. Her whole performance, indeed, was rather that of a dancer than an actress. She looked as though she longed to burst into dancing, and one could not but regret that she did not sweep round the stage with one of those bounding and energetic movements for which she was so famous. Last, not least, comes Mdlle. Rosati, for whom was reserved a real ovation, and who executed one of those short, sharp, crisp, and "ravishing" steps, made up of one entrechat divided into a thousand,

> "Her feet from out her petticoat,
> Like little mice stole in and out,
> As though they feared the light."

and then, suddenly changing the character of the dance, she swept up to the footlights in two bounds, and danced defiance at the audience. The Emperor led the applause; the pas was encored, and Rosati recalled amid a hurricane of approbation.

M. Gueymard has been suffering from cold, and unable to sing but once in the Huguenots during the past week; he has now recovered. Meyerbeer's chef-d'œuvre will be performed three times a week until further notice, and the Parisians again are able to applaud and fête their idol, Sophie Cruvelli. Les Vêpres Siciliennes is in full rehearsal, but cannot possibly be produced before the end of January. Sig. Verdi presides at the rehearsals. M. Crosnier has reversed M. Roqueplan's decision, and has determined that the masked balls shall take place at the Grand-Opéra as usual—the first, with an orchestra of two hundred musicians, conducted by Strauss, will take place on Saturday, the 23rd instant.

Mad. Ugalde has signed an engagement for four years with the Opéra-Comique, and will make her début in a few days. M. Perrin, the director, loses no opportunity of strengthening his troupe, which, next year, will be really first rate, with three such "prima donnas" as Ugalde, Marie Cabel, and the incomparable Caroline Duprez.

Le Tre Nozze, of Sig. Alary, was performed twice at the Italiens with such indifferent success that it has been laid aside for Semiramide and the Barbiere, which will hold the stage until the production of Sig. Verdi's Trovatore at the beginning of next month. The Théâtre-Lyrique has closed its doors three nights this week for general rehearsals of M. Adolph Adam's (of the Institute) new opera Le Mulstier de Toledo. I shall probably apprise you of its production in my next. While one portion of the troupe has been rehearsing M. Adam, the other has been busily engaged with Der Freischütz, which will be produced at the commencement of next month.

While your armies are valiantly combating side by side with those of France, in the Crimea, M. Alphonse Leduc, who has for some time been favourably known to the Parisian public, has produced an Inkermann Quadrille, and another called the Flotte Anglo-Française. Both are possessed of considerable merit, and have had much success here. British quadrille players may safely ally themselves with their French brethren in patronising a deserving musician.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

THE HARMONIC UNION.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—I am not in the habit of noticing any anonymous communications, but as you have inserted one in your last paper which refers to a rumour that, I understand, has been industriously circulated, I think it due to the Society to offer an immediate explanation, so that if there is any cause for blame, it may fall in the proper quarter.

On the 28th September, when the Society's year was on the eve of expiration, a meeting of the directors took place, and an account of the liabilities of the Society was presented. Some of the retiring directors preferred to take upon themselves certain liabilities rather than make a cash contribution to a general fund out of which the liabilities should be paid. The following extract from the minutes will make this clear.

"A proposition was made by Mr. Stroud, that he and Messrs. Lockyer, Roodhouse, and Cook, were willing to take upon themselves the claims against the Society of Messrs. Benedict, Simmons, Sanderson, Tyler, and Ashby.

"Whereupon, it was resolved,

"That such proposition be accepted, and upon the secretary receiving intimation from the said claimants that their several claims are satisfied or withdrawn, the afore-named gentlemen be relieved from all further liability for the season just closed."

I subsequently made inquiry whether the said liabilities had been discharged, and received the following communication:—

"London, Nov. 6, 1854.

"DEAR SIR,—We think it right to inform you of our proceedings with reference to the resolution of the Board under which we, with Messrs. Cook and Lockyer, undertook the settlement of the following claims against the Harmonic Union, 1853, viz:

| | £ | s. | d. |
| "Mr. Benedict ... ... ... | 84 | 0 | 0 |
| "Mr. Tyler ... ... ... | 48 | 0 | 0 |
| "Mr. Ashby ... ... ... | 9 | 18 | 0 |
| "Mr. Simmons ... ... ... | 7 | 0 | 0 |
| "Mr. Sanderson ... ... ... | 2 | 2 | 0 |
| | £151 | 0 | 0 |

"As to the first amount, the following copy of a letter received from Mr. Benedict will satisfy you that no claim will be made by that gentleman against you or any other member of the Board:—

"'2 Manchester Square, Nov. 3, 1854.

"'DEAR SIR,—I will agree to the arrangement you propose, that you and Mr. Lockyer shall pay the amount due to me by the Harmonic Union, viz., £84.

"'I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully,

"'J. BENEDICT.'

"Mr. Tyler's matter is in course of settlement, and in a day or two his letter to the effect you wish shall be sent you.

"Mr. Ashley's claim will be settled as soon as we can meet with that gentleman. Mr. Simmons and Mr. Sanderson are both paid, as I believe you are aware.

"We are, dear Sir, yours faithfully,

(Signed) "T. ROODHOUSE,

"H. J. Lias, jun., Esq." "HENRY C. STROUD.

Upon seeing the note in your paper, last Saturday, stating that there was a report that "the Harmonic Union owes Mr. Benedict an arrear of about £80, which he is unable to obtain," I wrote to Mr. Stroud, and received from him a note, in which he says that he will immediately put himself in communication with Mr. Benedict, and get his authority to give an unequivocal contradiction to the report in the next number of the Musical World.

I have to-day been informed that Mr. Stroud has been unable to see Mr. Benedict, and that, therefore, unless I wrote, no contradiction would appear.

It is not necessary for me to make any further comment, because it must be evident upon whom the onus rests, if Mr. Benedict is not settled with. I think it proper to add, that none of the gentlemen who undertook the settlement of Mr. Benedict's claim are at present directors of the Harmonic Union.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

HENRY JOHN LIAS, jun.

P.S.—SIR,—In reply to various rumours inserted in your paper, I am desired to inform you that, to meet the wishes of a large number of our subscribers, the concerts of the Society will in future take place in the Hanover-square Rooms, and that Herr Molique has been appointed conductor for the season.

Yours faithfully,

THE ORGAN.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—I have been much interested with your admirable and instructive articles lately, on the subject of organ building, and feel assured you render infinite service to the profession, as well as to the science, by giving publicity to the results of your knowledge and experience. I have but little acquaintance with the mechanical details of an organ, and I beg, therefore, to inquire, what is the effect, in a musical point of view, of the diacoton which is introduced into all Mr. Holdich's organs, and, according to his account, doubles the power of every stop?

I quite coincide in your observations as to the quality of tone in his last new organ, which struck me as particularly harsh and disagreeable, and I am at a loss whether to ascribe this to the diacoton or to the defective ear of the builder. No doubt, in organ building, the character of tone depends more on the artist's perception of what is beautiful in quality than in any other instrument; and I have as little doubt that it is owing to the want of this perception that, during the last twenty or thirty years, so many new organs have been set up in England, more unpleasant and unmusical in quality than in any continental city.

Apologising for this intrusion, I am, Sir, yours obediently,
AN AMATEUR.

CHRISTMAS PRESENTS. — The most appropriate offerings for this Season of Festivity, are those which tend to the promotion of Health and Personal Attraction — none can be more acceptable than ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, for imparting a transcendent lustre to the Hair, and sustaining it in decorative charm. ROWLAND'S KALYDOR imparts a radiant bloom to the Cheek, and a delicacy and softness to the Hands, Arms, and Neck; and ROWLAND'S ODONTO, or PEARL DENTIFRICE, bestows on the Teeth a pearl-like whiteness, and renders the breath sweet and pure. The patronage of royalty throughout Europe, their general use by rank and fashion, and the universally-known efficacy of these articles give them a celebrity unparalleled. Sold by A. ROWLAND & SONS, 20, Hatton Garden, London, and by Chemists and Perfumers.—Beware of spurious imitations!

CHAPPELL'S FOREIGN MODEL PIANOFORTE.—PRICE FIFTY GUINEAS.—This instrument has (unlike the ordinary cottage pianoforte) THREE STRINGS, and the fullest grand compass of SEVEN OCTAVES. It is strengthened by every possible means to endure the greatest amount of wear, and to stand perfectly in any climate. The workmanship is of the best description, the tone is round, full, and rich, and the power equal to that of a Bichord Grand. The Case is of the most elegant construction in Rosewood, (vide the sketch), the touch elastic, and the repetition very rapid. Every possible precaution has been taken to insure its standing well in tune. Mr. Chappell especially invites the attention of the public, the profession, and merchants to the FOREIGN MODEL, feeling assured that no pianoforte, in all respects comparable, has hitherto been made in England at the same price. Every instrument will be warranted, and (if desired) exchanged within twelve months of the purchase. 50, New Bond-street, London.

THE ROYAL PANOPTICON OF SCIENCE AND ART, LEICESTER SQUARE.—The Building comprises a large circular Hall, 100 feet in diameter, and 100 feet high, surrounded by three Galleries, and surmounted by a Dome, the whole gorgeously decorated in the Saracenic style of architecture. The Exhibition includes a splendid Fountain, throwing the water 100 feet, a Crystal Tank, holding 6000 gallons of water, for the display of Messrs. Heinke's Diving Apparatus, of the Electric Light under water, and other subaqueous experiments, a Cosmorama of St. Petersburg with Portrait of the Emperor Nicholas, a Transparent Screen, 32 feet wide, and 36 feet high, for the display of Dioramic Views, of the Chromatrope, and of other optical effects; a magnificent Organ, containing 4,004 pipes, with the bellows worked by steam power, the richest and most powerful instrument of its kind in existence, on which a variety of Sacred and Operatic Music is performed daily at intervals, by Mr. W. T. Best, the Organist of the Institution; a gigantic Electric Machine, the largest ever constructed, the plate ten feet in diameter, with a large Leyden Battery attached; Voltaic Batteries of high power on a novel principle; and in the two Galleries, a variety of machinery and manufacturing processes in action, including the Nassau Steam Printing Machine, a complete series of Whitworth's Machinery, Kirby and Beard's Pin and Needle Machines, Perkins' Apparatus for the Combustion of Steel, Brock's Ornamental Sawing Machine, Prideaux's Patent Self-closing Furnace Valve for the prevention of smoke, &c., an Ascending Carriage, Brett's Electric Telegraph, &c., &c.; a selection of Sculpture, including Monti's Veiled Figure, "The Houri," executed expressly for the Institution, a Gallery of Pictures on sale, and other objects of Art. Distin's celebrated Flügel Horn Union every evening. Attached to the Institution are two Lecture Rooms, in which demonstrations are given several times daily, in various branches of Science and Art, and Lectures delivered from time to time on Literary and Scientific subjects: a spacious Laboratory and Chemical School; a Photographic Gallery, in which portraits are taken. Open daily: Morning, 12 to 5; Evening (Saturday excepted), 7 to 10. Admission 1s.: Schools and Children under 10, half price.

TO THE MILITIA.

NOTICE.

MESSRS. BOOSEY and SONS have the honour to announce to the Commanding Officers of the Militia, that they are now ready either to form, or provide their Regiments, with Military, Reed, or Brass Bands at the shortest notice, and on the most moderate terms, including every requisite that may be desired.

BOOSEY and SONS have just completed a most extensive stock of C. Boosé's celebrated Band Instruments, on the newest models, and of the same description as those supplied to the Bands of the Scots Fusilier Guards, and all the leading Cavalry and Infantry Regiments, both of Her Majesty's and the H. E. I. C. Service at home and abroad, including the Band of the Governor General of India, &c. &c.

These instruments and their appurtenances, with C. Boosé's Journals for a Reed and Brass Band, published by them on the 15th of each month, are advantages possessed by no other firm in London.

To meet the requirements of their patrons still further, Messrs. BOOSEY and SONS have invited Band Masters and Musicians to register their names and addresses at their establishment, and they are thus enabled to assist in the formation of bands in every possible manner.

The qualifications of band masters and musicians are tested in co-operation with Mr. Boosé, the band master of the Scots Fusilier Guards, who holds himself responsible for the ability of any he recommends.

In these matters Boosey and Sons will be most happy to give those Regiments who honour their establishment with their patronage the benefit of their assistance and advice without any charge.

London: BOOSEY & SONS, Military Instrument Manufacturers and Music Publishers, 28, Holles-street.

MILITARY BANDS—REED AND BRASS.

C. BOOSÉ'S MILITARY MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—MESSRS. BOOSEY & SONS, in submitting to the Army and the Musical Public a few of the latest improvements in the above CELEBRATED MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, beg to return their sincere thanks for the patronage so liberally bestowed on their establishment; and to assure those who have not hitherto honoured them with their commands, that their undeviating principle of business is to manufacture instruments of the very best description only. By this means, Boosey and Sons trust to ensure the permanent patronage of their friends. A fair and moderate price is fixed on every Instrument. CLARIONETS.—Either of Cocoa-wood or Grenadille, with 13 German Silver Keys; of Box-wood, with 13 Brass ditto; or of German Silver, with 13 keys of the same metal. The whole of these comprise every new improvement. FLUTES AND PICCOLOS.—In the usual keys for Amateurs or Military purposes, either of Cocoa or Box-wood, with German Silver or Brass Keys, and every new improvement. FIFES (Boosé's Improved).—Either of Cocoa or Box-wood, with 4 German Silver or Brass Keys. BASSOONS.—The new French Model, of Maple-wood, with 16 Brass, or German Silver Keys. BOOSÉ'S UNRIVALLED CORNET-A-PISTONS.—The great success that has attended the introduction of Boosé's new patent Cornet, and the many flattering testimonials the beauty of the model and the exceeding richness of its tone have called forth, have induced the manufacturers to extend the improvements still further, and they have now the pleasure of announcing, that they have succeeded in adjusting to the same model the Rotary Cylinder Action. By means of this beautiful and light action, the most rapid passages can be executed with marvellous quickness and dexterity. Price, with Valves, 7 Guineas, with the new Rotary Cylinder Action, 9 Guineas. Either instrument strongly Electro-plated (equal to Silver), 2 Guineas extra. CORNETTO SOPRANO, in D or E flat (for Brass Band); VALVE TRUMPETS, Althorns (Barytone), with Three Valves in B flat, E flat, or F. EUPHONIONS (Bass), in B flat or C, with Four Valves. BOMBARDONS (Bass) in E flat, or F, with Four Valves. All these Instruments can be had either with Valves or the New Rotary Cylinder Action. The Althorns are made on two models—either with Bell up or forward. The Euphonion is a new Valve Instrument, infinitely superior to, and rapidly superseding the Ophicleide. FRENCH HORNS either with Three Valves, or on an entirely new model, with the Rotary Cylinder Action. These Horns Boosey & Sons can with confidence recommend as superior to any yet supplied to the Profession. Better cannot be made.—TROMBONES, Alto, Tenor, and Bass. In the usual Keys, either with Slides, Valves, or the new Rotary Cylinder Action. The Valve Trombone may be had either with the Bell up or forward.—THE NEW ROTARY CYLINDER ACTION, With this Action, which is exceedingly light, the most rapid passage may be executed with marvellous dexterity and quickness. It is, further, more simple and much stronger than any patent actions that have hitherto been made.—VALVE, OR FIELD BUGLE in B flat or C. By a simple contrivance, the valves of this instrument may be detached at pleasure, and placed in a small leather case, and the instrument remains an ordinary Field Bugle.—OPHICLEIDES, in B flat or C, with 10 or 11 Keys. Cavalry Trumpets, Turkish Crescents, Triangles Military Tambourines, Drum Heads, Reeds, Music Stands, Music Paper, and every requisite for a Reed, Brass, or String Band.—DRUMS, (BASS), Boosé's Improved, of Brass. The advantages in these over Wooden Drums, are, an infinitely superior tone and great durability, without any increase in weight. Boosey & Sons have received the most flattering testimonials from the many Regiments they have supplied with these Drums, both at home and abroad. Tenor and Side Drums, also of Brass.—BASS DRUM STICKS. Boosey & Sons have succeeded in manufacturing a Drum Stick of an entirely New Material, which requires no covering, and will last for TEN OR TWENTY YEARS, and thus a remedy is provided for the constant expense of re-covering Drum Sticks. The Regimental Facings, and other colours, being tastefully introduced, render this Drum Stick an exceedingly handsome appendage to the Drum.

AN ENGLISH PIANIST IN GERMANY.

(Extract from a Private Letter.)

Miss Arabella Goddard has been as successful here as everywhere. The public are delighted, and the press gives utterance to its gratification in terms of the highest praise. Of the latter part of my assertion you shall judge yourself. The Augsburger Post-Zeitung of the 28th ult. says:

"Miss Arabella Goddard, has arrived from Stuttgart, where she appeared for the first time before a German audience, and achieved an extraordinary triumph. She will give a concert here to-morrow. We have been fortunate enough to hear the young artist in private, and were even more astonished at her intellectual conception of classical compositions than at her fabulous technical skill. She looks upon the last merely as a matter-of-course means to achieve her end. Proudly does the British maiden—the first, as far as we know, who ever made an artistic tour over the Continent—proudly, we repeat, does the British maiden sit before the instrument, and treat the greatest difficulties as mere child's play, while she causes the spirit of the composition to float in luminous clearness before us. We are delighted at being able to add that—what for Augsburg is a rare treat—among other things, a beautiful trio of Mendelssohn's (that in D minor) will be played."

The same paper of the 30th ult. writes as follows:—

"In her yesterday's concert, Miss Arabella Goddard soon gained the favourable opinion of the public. Even on her third appearance, after having played compositions of Mendelssohn and Bach—two masters whose works cannot be duly conveyed to the perception of the audience by mere bravura, without artistic inspiration—she was received with loud applause, which, if possible, became even louder after the modern compositions which followed, and induced the graceful artist to add one of the most beautiful of Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte, of her own accord. We call Miss Goddard an 'artist,' because, despising the mania of the virtuosi of the present day, to confuse the public by extravagant action, she rather tones them down by classical repose, and thus fits them the better to receive the coy Muse. We never heard Bach played with such perfection and clearness. In the prelude (D major), it seemed as if sparks of melody flew from the piano, while the following fugue stood boldly out, like some bronze statue, before our mind's eye. It was easy to see that, when Bach leaves the public cold, and his compositions pass over without making any impression, it is neither the fault of the composition nor the public; but that the old axiom: 'Art is always ruined by the artist,' once more proves true. We wish the modest artist all success upon the road she has taken; may she never leave it; never make any concession to the bad taste of the majority of the public, but, nobly and purely, continue as she has begun. In Mendelssohn's trio, the airy scherzo of which was played with fabulous rapidity and the greatest elegance, the young artist was admirably seconded by Herren Capellmeister Krähmer and Holzinger."

The Allgemeine Zeitung of the same date thus notices Miss Goddard:—

"Last year, the first lady German pianist of the day, Wilhelmine Clauss, went over to England, where she was enthusiastically received by the lovers of art. England now sends us, in exchange, a charming rival, Miss Arabella Goddard, who will assuredly find no less warm a welcome in Germany than Mdlle. Clauss on British ground, in this respect, more sterile than our own. Her yesterday's concert confirms, by the thunders of applause by which she compelled the public to express their satisfaction, the reputation which has preceded this still most youthful artist from Stuttgart, Baden, and London, and which, we hope, will smooth the way for her in Leipsic, Dresden, Vienna, and Berlin, whither she next proceeds. Instead of imitating many celebrated virtuosi, and limiting herself to three or four ever-recurring show-pieces, Miss Arabella Goddard is always both ready and delighted to give us, with loving devotion and noble simplicity, the most serious works of the greatest German masters. This is a convincing proof of her mental superiority, and so much the more irrefutable, because, in compositions like Mendelssohn's Grand Trio in D minor, the sounds emitted by the piano die away so speedily, and therefore can with difficulty keep their ground against the violin and violoncello, whose quivering strings utter back, as it were, each heart-beat, each breath of the finest nerves of the fingers, so that the artist who is confined to the death-like mechanism of the piano, must possess the greatest intellectuality of touch in order to produce a similar effect. Miss Arabella Goddard was much assisted in her task by an excellent instrument, on the model of the Messrs. Broadwood, of London, from the workshops of Mr. Thenn, of this city."

Lastly, comes the Augsburger Tagblat of the 1st inst., which thus expresses itself:—

"Last Wednesday, we had the pleasure of seeing and hearing the pianist, Miss Arabella Goddard, from London, in the room of the Goldene Traube. That we in Augsburg have, for some time past, always enjoyed the privilege of admiring the wandering notabilities of Art before the inhabitants of the capital, Munich, is owing, neither to the favourable position of our town, at the point where all the railways of the immense net-work of iron encircling our native country meet, nor the golden hall of our Rathshaus, with its walls hung round with pictures, nor our comfortable pavement, nor our ancient gateway, but, according to the confession of the artists themselves, entirely to the Allgemeine Zeitung; a blast in the trumpet of Fame from that paper being absolutely necessary for every artist who wishes to be accredited in Germany. . . . . Miss Arabella Goddard's playing excited the audience to such a pitch that they kept continually applauding and recalling her. Had Miss Goddard lived in Schiller's time, his poem would have been entitled 'Arabella,' and not 'Laura am Piano.' For becoming demeanour and composure, Miss Arabella Goddard should be taken as a model by all those persons who are so fond of twisting and turning about at the instrument. The tones spring forth from beneath her delicate hands with sparkling brilliancy, but there is not one which is not under perfect control. In Mendelssohn's Grand Trio in D minor, the young artist was admirably seconded by Herren Jacob Holzinger and Krähmer. The performance of the whole composition was of a piece from beginning to end. We have just heard that, in obedience to the general wish of the lovers of music in this town, Miss Arabella Goddard will give another concert next Saturday."

Since the above dates, Miss Arabella Goddard has played at the first Gewandhaus Concert, in Leipsic, with the most flattering success.

PARIS.

"L'Etat, c'est moi," said Louis XIV. "L'Opéra, c'est moi," may Mdlle. Cruvelli exclaim with equal truth, for there was never a period in the history of that establishment when its fortunes were so completely dependent on the exertions of one artiste. During the long administration of M. Roqueplan, the Opéra has been gradually sinking from bad to worse. The chorus, the decorations, the orchestra, the ballet, and the principal artistes have been equally neglected, until, at the close of his reign, he resigns his desolate kingdom into the hands of his successor, M. Crosnier, who has before him a task worthy of Hercules. To this labour, however, M. Crosnier has addressed himself with right good will. He has strengthened the orchestra, drilled the chorus, improved the corps de ballet, and set to work all the tailors he could find unemployed, so that there is some hope that, after the approaching 300th representation of the Huguenots, the unfortunate choristers may have new dresses. In one thing alone has M. Crosnier failed—he has been unable to obtain a new tenor or a new prima donna suited to French opera. Mdlle. Pouilley, of whose début in Masaniello I apprised you last week, has, for two seasons, occupied the principal parts in the Opéra at Strasbourg, the only provincial theatre which enjoys a subvention from the Government. When Mdlle. Cruvelli started on her "hardi voyage," the Government, having heard of Mdlle. Pouilley's Alsatian fame, determined on engaging her for the Grand-Opéra. The director, however, was unwilling to part with one who was a favourite with his habitués; but the government insisting, he, at length, agreed to rescind her engagement on receiving 10,000 francs. The money was paid, and the fair lady started for Paris, where she has now sung three times. She has not succeeded, and "La chanteuse ne vaut pas la chandelle" of 10,000 francs, which was paid to secure her services. She may be fair enough at a provincial theatre; she is out of place at the Grand-Opéra. Mdlle. Delly, pupil of Duprez, is much worse than Mdlle. Pouilley: what evil genius can have tempted her to the lyrical stage, for which she has no gift of voice, genius, or person? Mad. Stoltz has broken her engagement—as she had a right to do, on giving notice and paying 50,000 francs fine; she gave the notice, but neglected to pay the money, whereupon M. Crosnier cited her before the Tribunal, which has mulcted her in 50,000 francs and costs—so she is no longer on the establishment. If we leave the fair sex, and turn to the lords of the Creation, we find M. Gueymard—a coarse tenor, with a certain amount of energy, but utterly wanting in true artistic feeling; Signor Gardoni—a true artist, but without physical capacity for the requirements of the Grand-Opéra; M. Massol—whose voice has got into such a condition as to cause a series of shudderings through the house when he sings; and M. Obin—whose merit seems to be that he attempts parts written for a bass voice, while, if he have any voice at all, he never allows the audience to discover the fact. And now who remains? One artist, who, by the fascinations of her genius, fills the house to suffocation every time she sings, and induces you to forget the shortcomings of all the others. Although Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli has sung in no other opera than the Huguenots since her return, there has never been less than 4,000 francs in the house on any occasion, and twice the receipts have exceeded 10,000 francs—an enormous sum for the French Opéra. Alone she does it; and since Malibran [illegible], in many respects, Sophie Cruvelli so much resembles—there has been no artiste who so successfully fixed the attention of the French musical public. She has studied hard of late; she has pruned her acting of all extravagance. Her voice is fresh, limpid, and clear as that of a skylark, and she sings the music as it is written for her. In short, she is as perfect a Valentine as can well be imagined, and M. Crosnier thoroughly knows her value. I do not despair of the task M. Crosnier has taken in hand. That artists can be obtained if directors are active is proved by the list of those on the books of the Opéra-Comique and the Théâtre-Lyrique, both of which houses are making large fortunes. But time is wanted to fill up so many gaps, and although report speaks highly of Mdlle. Angles Fortune, who will make her début next week, he will not be able to place the Opéra in its proper position without much and unceasing exertions. Meanwhile he has commenced by strengthening the base of his column—the orchestra and chorus. I doubt not that in due time he will find artists worthy of completing the superstructure. But M. Girard, the conductor, is a sad clog upon the whole—though much more like King Log than King Stork.

Le Muletier de Toledo was produced at the Théâtre-Lyrique, on Saturday, and was repeated on Tuesday. Anxious to give you an idea of the music, I went on both occasions, but was unable to obtain a seat in any part of the house. By your next publication I shall probably be more fortunate. Meanwhile I may say that the critics for our journals are unanimous in declaring that Mdlle. Cabel has added enormously to her previous reputation, that she has proved herself a most finished vocalist, a charming actress, and an accomplished musician. They also state that the success of the opera is entirely due to her, and that she never quits the scene from first to last, save to change her dress. M. Adam, it appears, has sought his inspiration from a vast variety of sources, and, among other things, he has appropriated "God save the Queen," in the first act. He probably forgot that, since the alliance, this piece of music has frequently been heard by French ears.

Mdlle. Ugalde makes her rentrée at the Opéra-Comique, next Saturday, in Galathée.

A new piece, for the Palais-Royal, with three characters—a Highlander (Levassor), a Zouave (Hyacinthe), and a Vivandière (Duverger), is in active rehearsal. The scene is laid in the Crimea, and the dialogue most flattering to your national feeling.

The Emperor and Empress honoured the Opéra-Comique with their presence on Monday evening, to hear that charming opera, Le Pré aux Clercs, which has been revived with so much success. Nothing can be better than the ensemble of the performance, as given by the accomplished artists of this most pleasant of lyric theatres. Indeed, since the commencement of the season, so great has been the success, that they have played, without ceasing, Le Pré aux Clercs alternately with L'Etoile du Nord, and every night the house has been crowded to excess. Mdlle. Caroline Duprez, in the last opera, seems to improve on each performance. She has most deservedly added greatly to her previous reputation, and she seems to be gaining physical strength, which alone was wanting to make her a perfect chanteuse légère. The Emperor seemed in excellent spirits. The Empress was graceful and charming as ever—a more beautiful creature cannot be found.

THE ORGAN.

THE NEW ORGAN FOR ST. MARTIN'S CHURCH.

Since the merely preliminary notice which appeared in our last number, we have been able to inspect the St. Martin's organ with sufficient minuteness to give a fair opinion of its merits; and as, from the number of letters received on the subject, our promised description of this instrument seems to be expected with much interest, we see no further reason for its postponement.

The general plan of the St. Martin's organ will be seen in the table of its contents inserted in our Number 49; and on this, as the designer's portion of the task, we have but little to remark. If viewed simply with reference to the amount of resonant space its tone is required to fill, this instrument must be deemed sufficient for its purpose; but if considered, abstractedly, as an ideal excellence in organ-planning, the design is open to two objections,—for a small organ, its number of registers is redundant; for a large one, it is incomplete. In the great organ, for example, the quantity of flue-work present, is very inadequately balanced by the two reeds pitted against it. Such a great organ would not only have borne, but would greatly have benefitted by, the addition of a sixteen feet reed and a second large unison trumpet. At present, the great organ reeds are, out of all proportion, weak in the sum total of effect,—a result, perhaps, pre-determined, if the designer should chance to belong to that "mixing" school whose absurd theories we have had several occasions to notice. The pedal-clavier, also, of such an instrument, should, undoubtedly, in addition to its present, have commanded a sixteen-feet metal stop; and, in any other country, would certainly have included a thirty-two feet register, either of the open or stopped species. Yet, with these defects of arrangement, and the additional exception, that no special novelty is attempted—either in the adoption of the harmonic system of flue-work, or of any of those curious facilities to the performer afforded by some of the later mechanical combinations—the St. Martin's plan shows, very satisfactorily, the advance of English opinion as to the required constituents of a grand organ, as well as the determination of our builders to emancipate themselves, one by one, from the dogmas of an antiquated school of construction. Our objections to the plan will, no doubt, be met by the usual statement that the funds were insufficient,—that everything, and more than enough, has been done that the price permitted. And this is, very likely, true enough. But much as we regret this, and every other result of that competition-madness whose only fruit has been to deceive the public mind into a falsely low estimate of the cost of an expensive instrument, it ought not, fairly, to be admitted into the account. Such a matter lies entirely between the church-vestry and their organ-builders. Had the authorities given Messrs. Bevington carte-blanche in all things, money included, all blame would have been easily adjustable to its due quarter. But if, on the other hand, the committee masters insisted on a perfect organ at an imperfect price, they must necessarily be disappointed,—unless, indeed, on the improbable, and, we hope, impossible, supposition that the defects of parochial liberality were to be compensated at the expense of Messrs. Bevington's purse.

Before quitting the plan of this organ, it is worth while to notice two curious mistakes in nomenclature it exhibits. For some years past, the English organ-builders have adopted the Continental habit of marking every stop with the length, in feet and inches, of its longest pipe, or, more properly, of that pipe commanded by the CC on the key-board. Thus, we now see on every table of registers, "open diapason, 8 feet;" "Principal, 4 feet," and so on. The custom is, at any rate, a convenient one; since, by its means, a performer, in first approaching even the newest and most oddly contrived instrument, is certified of the pitch, at least, of the sounds he is about to evoke. But Messrs. Bevington have employed this measurement of tone in a way rather to puzzle than enlighten; for in every case where the stops are "divided," or do not descend through the whole extent of the key-board, the number of feet indicated is merely the measure of the longest pipe actually present, and not that which truly designates the pitch of the stop. Thus, among the great organ stops, we find "double diapason, CC, 8 feet;" "Hohl diapason, tenor C, 4 feet;" and "claribel, 4 feet;" and in all these cases, the given measurements are erroneous, and calculated to mislead a stranger to organ-effect. The first stop is of the sub-octave, the other two of the unison, species; and—without the smallest reference to the particular note of the clavier on which that compass commences—their "feet" should be made to denote their situation, as to pitch, in the general scale of the instrument. To make this still more clear;—every unison stop, of whatever kind, whether it descend only to the middle C of the clavier, or, as in the organs of York Minster and Trinity College, Cambridge, it be prolonged, by an additional octave of key-board to CCC, must be marked "8 feet," although the actual length of the longest pipes would be, in the first case, but two feet, and in the second, would reach sixteen. And this is, of course, equally true of stops of every other pitch. Another strange error in the St. Martin's nomenclature, occurs as to the general pitch of the pedal-organ, Here we find "unison open diapason, 8 feet," "unison stop diapason, 8 feet," "principal, 4 feet," "quint and decima," and "twelfth and fifteenth." The use of the word "unison," in this case, confounds all proper notion of the pitch of the pedal organ, and, like most other wrong beginnings, deranges every thing that follows it. The pitch of the pedal organ is, in reality, an octave below that of the great organ; its unison is 16 feet, and its sub-octave, or "double," if it have any, is 32 feet. The stops we have quoted, are, therefore, all erroneously named. Those called "unisons," are, really, principals, the "principal" should be called fifteenth; and the "quint, decima, twelfth, and fifteenth," are, respectively, misnomers for twelfth, tierce, larigot, and octave-fifteenth, or—as expressed in figures—12th, 17th, 19th, and 22nd. Mistakes of this nature are more worthy of remark than, at first sight, may appear; for, if they proceed from an erroneous estimate of pitch, they may lead to such disproportions in the balance of tone, as would suffice to destroy the office and effect of a pedal organ altogether.

Of the manner in which the builders have executed the mechanical portion of their task, we can speak in high terms of commendation. No part of the instrument that the eye can reach, betrays the least evidence of unjust parsimony of thought or expense. In their printed description of the organ, Messrs. Bevington do not come out as "patentees," or "inventors," neither do they deluge us with astounding and mis-applied technicalities. They allude but slightly to the quality of their work, and put forth no claim to absolute mechanical novelties; yet, on inspection, the former proves considerably better than is usually seen, and the absence of the latter in any striking degree is atoned for by a number of such small ameliorations and elegancies of construction as say much for the care and intelligence which have dictated them. The key-movements are simply planned, and very carefully executed. All the centres are bushed with cloth, and with this precaution and some peculiarities about the mode of attaching the "trackers," we have, for a result, a touch, on all the claviers, at once noiseless and agreeable to the finger. In the mechanism of the pedal couplers however, the abandonment of the usual roller-board, and substitution of the "direct" plan of three sets of long and radiating back-falls, is, we think, a costly departure from ordinary usage not warranted by any practical advantage. The draw-stop and composition-pedal actions are remarkable for the taste and care displayed in their arrangement and manufacture. All those clumsy iron "squares" and wooden "trunnels" which, to a mechanic's eye, so disfigure this kind of work in most organs, are here rejected in favour of a system of wrought-iron shafts with turned journals, which yield at once a finished appearance and a firm, effective, and noiseless action. The connection between the swell-pedal and the Venetian shutters of the box is also effected with a large expenditure of what organ-builders, with characteristic simplicity of expression, call "iron-work," and with similar excellent results. The bellows, of which there are two pair, standing in a chamber behind the organ, are, as to certain details of their construction, very well worth inspection. The designer of the instrument—whoever he might happen to be—had decreed, we understand, that the bellows should "rise" fourteen inches: selecting this unusual amount of motion, we presume, with the idea of thereby ensuring a more copious supply of wind—though it might have occurred to the mildest form of mechanical apprehension, that the supply of wind must be in proportion to the feeder-surface, and not to the capacity of reservoir. The builders, having before their eyes the well-known danger of uncertain pressure resulting from a large "rise," and, consequently, wide "ribs," sought a remedy in the introduction of an extra frame in the reservoir, and the use of three sets of ribs instead of two. But with this alteration, we think it probable another evil will be introduced: for, since with this three-rib arrangement only one can be inverted, while two are direct, or vice versâ, the compensation for variable pressure, on Cummings's principle of the "inside and outside fold," will be but imperfectly secured. But if these points of arrangement are somewhat suspicious, the workmanship throughout is irreproachable. The "parallel motion" of the bellows is novel in form, and constructed with much attention to details; it is formed of thin iron bars, and at all the points of union, either between the bars themselves, or between these and the frames of the bellows, thin brass washers are interposed between the rubbing surfaces. The blowing-action, also, is very highly creditable to the ingenuity and determination to do well of the builders. The connecting-rods, between the blowing-lever and the feeders, are of wrought-iron, and from the peculiarity of their mode of attachment at each end—which, however, would be difficult to describe, without a drawing—have all the advantages of the universal joint, with the addition, that the contrivance is, in its nature, self-lubricating. We have seen nothing of the kind so good—except, perhaps, the blowing action, originally made for the York organ by Elliot and Hill; and this, though equally effective, was inferior in simplicity to that of Messrs. Bevington.

We have been, perhaps, tediously minute in noticing some of the mechanical features of the St. Martin's organ; but we think it right, that when men expend largely care, skill, and money, in perfecting such parts of their work as would scarcely ever attract general observation, and this solely with the artistic desire of doing their best in all things, the fact should be recorded to their praise. In concluding this part of our notice, we cannot entertain a doubt that if such parts of the organ as are inaccessible to the eye—the interior work of the sound-boards, etc.—are as well constructed as all that which can be fairly inspected, the St. Martin's instrument will, mechanically considered, prove as serviceable and valuable to its possessors as it is creditable to its builders.

In dealing with the musical part of the matter—the voicing of this organ, our task will be brief, because it is not agreeable. We have, in this instrument, one more, added to the many existing proofs, of the difficulties which beset the finishing of a large organ in the hands of men not thoroughly versed in the process. It may be, and is, thought, that an organ becomes large simply by an addition sum—that the mere accumulation of like materials around that which is small, must render it large. Nothing, however, can be further from the truth. Size, in the sense we intend, does not depend on numbers of pipes;—all the small organs in the world, heaped together, would not make one large one. Completeness of original idea, knowledge to proportion its components, and experienced skill to assign these their respective amounts of importance in the general effect, are some of the requisites for grand organ-making. We meet with these unfrequently, because the original faculty is rare, and experience for its perfectionment is still rarer. There are hosts of builders who can make small organs quite irreproachably—to any ordinary extent, "for chamber or chapel," as the phrase goes, their talent and experience may serve them without fear of result. But from this point, every step onwards is a painful groping through obscurity;—every increase of magnitude is a dangerous experiment. For their appropriate class of work, their selection of scales and practice of voicing, are fixed and sufficient: but beyond this, almost every effort is a guess, and almost every result a failure. Nearly thus we find matters with regard to the St. Martin's organ. In number of stops it is a large, in tone it is a small instrument. Of mere sound there is enough, but the sound is not of a grand sort. The scales throughout seem injudiciously selected, and the voicing is timid and irresolute. Thus, to take an example, in the great organ, the diapasons are strong, horny, and rather fierce in tone, whence, through all the series of quint, principal, tenth, twelfth, and fifteenth, there is a continual abatement of strength, until we arrive at the ten ranks of mixture which suddenly break out with a crash, that startles us the more from the want of all proper middle-support. The secret of the failure here is, obviously, that the strength lies too entirely at the extremities;—the tone is tolerably strong, and somewhat sparkling, but it has neither body nor breadth. The same effect of thinness and want of balance exists, more or less, in all the manuals,—the best effect being the full swell, which has an approach to grandeur of tone—probably due to the double-reed—not possessed by any other part of the organ. There are several isolated qualities, we most willingly admit, that are finished with charming effect,—such as flutes, gambas, dulcianas, and the like; but these, however useful and admirable as solo-stops, cannot atone for the defects of the general mass. As is the case with most organs not of first class voicing, the flue-work is, throughout, considerably better than the reeds. These last, indeed, we earnestly recommend Messrs. Bevington to replace at their early convenience, for, neither in volume or quality, are they at present creditable performances.

On the whole, we are obliged to confess disappointment with the St. Martin's organ; and regret it the more because an unusual amount of ingenuity, care, and expense, has been bestowed on its mechanical structure,—or, in other words, that portion of its work which the public has the smallest opportunity of appreciating.

Obituary.

We regret to announce the departure from among us of a celebrated organ-builder, Mr. J. C. Bishop, who died on the 3rd inst., at the age of seventy-one. In his profession he certainly took rank as one of the three great organ-builders of the metropolis; while, socially, we may safely record that few men in any walk of life have been more universally esteemed.

Mr. Bishop served his apprenticeship with Messrs Flight and Robson, the makers of the once celebrated Apollonicon, and speedily, after leaving their employment, commenced a career of success which continued unchequered through his life. Shortly after his establishment in business, Mr. Bishop's name was brought into prominent notice in disputing with Mr. Flight, sen., a claim to the invention of those "composition pedals" which are now, on one construction or another, so universally adopted. The dispute was decided by a Committee of the Society of Arts in Mr. Bishop's favour,—the ground of the decision, however, being merely that the drawing exhibited by Mr. Flight, could not have been the original one, since the water-mark on the paper was, by some years, later than the date inscribed on the drawing. Mr. Bishop early gained a special celebrity for the manufacture of a class of small organ, designed for chamber use, and in these he has never been excelled. They had but one clavier, and rarely contained more than seven or eight stops, yet in grace, purity, and a certain unctuous richness of tone, they were altogether unrivalled. During some repairs to the choir of St. Paul's Cathedral, some few years since, one of these little instruments was placed in a side-chapel of the nave, for the temporary accompaniment of the service, and we well remember the strikingly-beautiful effect of its tone in a situation for which it might have seemed so inadequate.

Like most reputed makers of the extraordinary instrument whose properties we now so frequently discuss, Mr. Bishop soon attained, in his larger work, a certain beau ideal of his own,—a limit as to dimensions and kind, in which he excelled, and from which he never safely departed. The organ of St. John's Church, in the Waterloo Road (at least as it was twenty years since) may be regarded as the type and, indeed, master-piece of his work of this kind. Its limited size takes it out of the category of grand instruments, yet it contains so much charm and suavity of tone, as must ever delight the judicious listener. Other instruments, of much the same description, though somewhat different in size, were placed by the same hand in the new church at Bermondsey, St. Edmond's, in Lombard-street, the district churches of Marylebone, and, recently, at Lee Church, in Kent. In some of his later works, wherein Mr. Bishop, unwillingly, as we thought, departed from his settled convictions in search of more modern dimensions and combinations, his success was far from unquestionable. The organ for St. Giles's, Camberwell, though large, has few of the striking points of a grand instrument; and a still later production, the organ of St. James's, Piccadilly, is—its choir manual only excepted—perhaps the least effective instrument, for its size, that ever came from its maker's hands.

An ample fortune, we believe, is the reward of Mr. Bishop's talent and assiduous application to business. Living, he had the hearty esteem of all who knew him; and dead, he leaves behind him a fame, in the estimation of a large circle of his admirers, second to none in his art.

PROVINCIAL.

MANCHESTER.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The Classical Chamber Music Society gave a concert at the Town Hall, on Thursday, the 14th. The following was the programme:—

PART I.—Trio—Pianoforte, violin, and violoncello (in D minor, Op. 49), Mendelssohn. Grand Sonata—Pianoforte, "Les Adieux, l'Absence et le Retour" (in E flat, Op. 81), Beethoven.

PART II.—Quartet—Two violins, viola, and violoncello (in C, No. 9, Op. 59), Beethoven. Solo—Violin, Hungarian Airs, Ernst. Solo—Violoncello, Thème Varié, Piatti. Pensées Fugitives—Pianoforte and violin (Souvenir, Caprice, Adieu), Heller and Ernst.

Mr. Charles Hallé is determined that the subscribers shall have no reason to complain of a falling-off in the concerts. The above selection proved attractive. The room was full; not, perhaps, so full as the first concert a month ago. The executants were Herr Ernst, Mr. Carrodus, M. Baetens, and Signor Piatti. In Mendelssohn's exquisite trio, Herr Ernst seemed more impassioned than ever, and Signor Piatti displayed his usual fine feeling and expression. The scherzo was unanimously encored—an unusual compliment at these concerts. It is needless to say how Mr. Hallé played the sonata in E flat. He was loudly applauded both on his appearance and after his performance. The quartet for stringed instruments was a novelty. It is only in the hands of first-rate executants that this work can be fairly heard. Herr Ernst produced a great sensation by his delicious tone and unparalleled grace. He was admirably supported by Messrs. Carrodus and Baetens, as second violin and tenor, with Signor Piatti, as a matter of course, on the violoncello. In the Hungarian airs, Herr Ernst exhibited his wondrous power of execution—one entire variation being given in harmonics on the fourth string. The solo of Signor Piatti on the violoncello was hardly less remarkable for the command shown over the difficulties of the instrument. Both artists were enthusiastically applauded. The "Pensées Fugitives" are just the sort of pieces to wind up a chamber concert, when a long or difficult performance would be out of place. The next concert is announced to take place on the 20th inst.

The opera season was prolonged, and nine performances given at reduced prices. The experiment was successful, most of the nights the house being full. At the low prices, Robert, the Huguenots, Zauberflöte, and Don Juan were repeated, Masaniello (on Friday) being the only novelty, after which M. Hallé performed Mendelssohn's concerto in G, and was encored, and Madame Caradori appeared in a scene from Semiramide, giving the "Bel raggio," with the chorus which accompanies it. On Saturday last, Don Juan was given for the second time, with Herr Formes as the Don, Mdlle. Agnes Büry as Zerlina, Signor Benedetti as Don Ottavio, and Herr Gregorio, Leporello; whilst Signor Zapf, who is a tenor, appeared in Masetto—a baritone part. In consequence of these changes, part of the opera was given in Italian, part in French, and part in German! so that, on the whole, the performance was, by no means, satisfactory. The second act of Norma went better; Mad. Caradori is more at home in Norma than Donna Anna. The whole operatic force then appeared to give the National Anthem—Mesdames Rudersdorff, Caradori, and Herr Formes each giving a solo verse. The theatre has since remained closed, but is busily occupied within, preparing for the grand Christmas pantomime of Jack and the Beanstalk.

M. Jullien and his matchless band made their appearance here on Monday and Tuesday last, at the Philharmonic Hall. It is a disgrace to Manchester that it can furnish no better hall than this. Of course the place was most uncomfortably crammed on both occasions, and, of course, everybody was as delighted as he could be under the circumstances. We hope, ere another Christmas, to hear M. Jullien give a Mendelssohn or a Beethoven festival in a hall where he can be heard to advantage, and a large audience can be accommodated, seated or standing, with some comfort. I see M. Jullien is to appear again at the Philharmonic Hall, for a third and last concert, this evening.

LEEDS.—The second concert of the Leeds Musical Union took place in the Music Hall on Thursday evening last; the vocal party consisting of Mad. Weiss, Miss Dolby, Mr. A. Braham, and Mr. Weiss; and a full band, led by Mr. Willey, and conducted by Mr. Burton. Miss Dolby's "The Spirit's Song" and "Day and Night," were remarkable for quiet simplicity, and Mr. A. Braham, in the ballad "Oft in the stilly night," sang with feeling and taste, and, in the grand scena from "Oberon," "Yes, even love," displayed power and judgment. Mr. Weiss maintained the popularity with which he has always been received in Leeds. The concerted pieces were carefully sung. The first part concluded with the Masaniello overture, which was admirably performed, as was also the symphony (No. 1, Beethoven) at the commencement of the second part. The concert concluded with the overture to Prometheus. The band acquitted themselves well. The concert was numerously and brilliantly attended.

BARNSLEY.—On Monday evening, a grand miscellaneous concert was given by Miss Morley, in the Mechanics' Hall. The vocalists were Mad. and Mr. Weiss, Mr. Perring, and Masters Giles and Appleyard. Miss Morley presided at the pianoforte. Mr. Weiss was warmly applauded in "The Muleteer" and "O ruddier than the cherry." Masters Giles and Appleyard sang the duets, "Would that my love" and "Gently sighs the breeze," in a pleasing manner. In the former they were encored. Mr. Perring was encored in the song, "The merry maids of England." Miss Morley executed, upon the pianoforte, the "Carnival de Venise" and the "Mosè" fantasia. Mr. Burton conducted.

HUDDERSFIELD.—On Tuesday evening Mr. Mellor's concert came off at the Philosophical Hall. The overture to Tancredi was played by Mr. Dean, Mr. Mellor, and Master Parratt, on three Harmoniums, as was also the overtures to Guillaume Tell and Fra Diavolo. The vocalists were Miss Birch (who was encored in Rode's air and variations), Miss Lascelles, Miss Landon, Mr. F. Bodda, and Mr. Alfred Pierre.

DUBLIN.—The first of Mr. Gustavus Geary's concerts took place on Monday evening last, and was attended by a full audience. The artists engaged for the occasion were Mrs. Smith, Messrs. Robinson, Smith, and Giulio Regondi.

NEWCASTLE.—The efforts of the Sacred Harmonic Society of this town to promote a taste for the highest style of ecclesiastical music, have been successful. Two performances were given in the Music-hall, on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings. The "professionals" on each occasion consisted of Mrs. Craven, Miss Freeman, Miss Megson, Mr. Hemingway, and Mr. Ashton. They were supported by an orchestra of about 200 performers, including wind and string instruments; Mr. Redshaw taking the organ, and Dr. Ions wielding the conductor's bâton. On Tuesday, Händel's Dettingen Te Deum; Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm (As the hart pants,) and Mozart's Twelfth Service (I will call upon the Lord,) were performed. On Wednesday, Elijah was repeated by the same Society, with a different corps of vocalists. The choruses, as a whole, went well, considering their number and difficulty. The orchestra was also deserving of commendation.

BURY.—On Monday evening the members of the Bury Choral Society gave the first of a series of cheap concerts in the Athenæum, assisted by Miss Shaw, Mrs. Brooke, Mr. Slater, and Mr. Delavanti, of Manchester. The choir, about 90 in number, conducted by Mr. D. W. Banks, of Manchester, performed in a creditable manner.

ROCHDALE.—On Saturday evening last, the Oldham Temperance Fife and Drum Band gave a concert in the Public Hall, Rochdale. The performance was interspersed with a variety of songs, recitations, etc.

TUNBRIDGE.—A concert was given by the amateurs of the Catch Club on Wednesday, the proceeds to be given to the Patriotic Fund. After payment of a few incidental expenses, a sum of eight pounds was realized, which, though small, will help to swell the liberal contributions already made in this place for the widows and orphans of our brave soldiers.

BRADFORD.—The third of the people's concerts was given in St. George's Hall on Monday evening last. The vocalists were Miss Birch, Miss Landon, Miss Lascelles, Mr. Alfred Pierre, and Mr. Frank Bodda.

PONTEFRACT.—A concert in aid of the Patriotic Fund was given in the Town Hall, on Monday evening. The officers of the West York Rifles guaranteed all expenses, so that the whole proceeds should be devoted to the fund. We are happy to state the project was thoroughly successful.

FOREIGN.

BERLIN.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The festivities in honour of the marriage of His Royal Highness Prince Frederick still continue in full swing, and seem to have almost more interest for the good folk of Berlin than the great events now agitating the rest of Europe. I mentioned, some time since, that the votive offering of the management of the Royal Opera, was Weber's Oberon, with new scenery, dresses and decorations. The first representation was honoured by the presence of their Majesties: the Prince and his youthful bride, and a whole host of the high dignitaries of the Court, covered with crosses of all sizes, and eagles of every hue and class. Of course, such an opportunity was not to be lost by the wonder-loving Berliners, and, as a natural consequence, the theatre was densely crowded. The grand point of attraction was the royal box, the opera being a mere secondary consideration. The performers—Herren Theodore Formes, Krüger, and Mad. Köster—exerted themselves to the utmost to obtain a share of the public attention, and succeeded tant bien que mal. Herr von Bülow's first concert came off on Wednesday, in the Singacademie. The bénéficiaire—who, as I have already informed you, is a pupil of Dr. Franz Liszt—played Beethoven's Concerto in E flat, Bach's Organ-fugue, arranged for the piano-forte by Dr. F. Liszt, Chopin's Ballad in G minor, and one or two other pieces. He seemed to please the audience greatly. Mdlle. Johanna Wagner was the vocalist, and Liebig's orchestra accompanied. The grand concert so long contemplated for the benefit of the sufferers in Silesia, has come off at last, under the joint directions of Herren Taubert and Dorn, who divided the office of conductor between them: Herr Taubert conducting Beethoven's ninth symphony, and Herr Dorn the overture to Tannhäuser and Die Walpurgisnacht. The concert was most numerously attended. One of the most interesting, if not the most interesting event of the week, was the concert given last Saturday, by the Königlicher Domchor. Among the pieces performed, were Caldara's Crucifixus, Palestrina's Salve, Regina, the chorale, "Wenn ich soll scheiden," from Bach's Passion-Musik, a motet, by Orlando Lasso, another by Mendelssohn, the Thirty-first Psalm, by Otto Nicolai, and several other compositions of a similar description. The next concert takes place towards the end of January. On Sunday, Mad. Clara Schumann and Herr Joseph Joachim gave a concert, in the Singacademie, to a most numerous audience. The two artists performed works by Bach, Beethoven, and other less celebrated composers, and reaped a rich harvest of well-merited applause. Her Van Den-Osten was the vocalist, and sang an air from the Creation, and two songs, "Nachtgesang," by Herr Robert Radecke, and "Widmung," by Herr Robert Schumann. At Liebig's concert, an overture to Maria Stuart, by Herr Vierling, and a symphony by Herr Hertel, were performed.

COLOGNE.—The first soirée of Chamber Music took place lately, in the Hotel Disch. The programme included Mozart's violin quartet in D (No. 10), J. S. Bach's pianoforte concerto in D minor (with quintet accompaniment), Beethoven's "Moonlight" sonata, and the same composer's quintet in C (Op. 29). The instrumentalists were Herren Ed. Franck, Hartmann, Derckum, Peters, Merkum, and P. Breuer.

BRESLAU.—Herr R. Wagner's Lohengrin has been very successful. Cherubini's Wassertrüger (Le Porteur d'Eau) has been revived.

DANTZIC.—Auber's Gustavus, Weber's Oberon, and M. Halévy's Juive have been the last operas produced. Nicolai's Lustige Weiber von Windsor is in rehearsal. A new romantic opera, in three acts, entitled Das Walpurgisfest, by a local composer (Herr F. W. Markull), will be brought out at Christmas. Haydn's Creation will also be performed.

LEIPSIC.—At the second "Euterpe" concert, the programme included Mozart's symphony in C, Gluck's overture to Iphigenia in Aulis, and a posthumous work by Weber, entitled the Ernte Cantata.* Cherubini's Lodoiska has been revived, after having been condemned to oblivion for more than thirty years. In spite of the great defects of the libretto, the opera gave entire satisfaction. Mad. Witt sustained the principal female part.

DESSAU.—The Singacademie celebrated the anniversary of Friedrich Schneider's death by a solemn performance, and the Männergesang-Verein sang at his grave, which was decorated with flowers.

PRESBURGH.—Balfe's Zigeunerin (Bohemian Girl) has been most successfully produced.

PESTH.—Owing to a slight discussion between the shareholders and manager, as to who should pay the expense of firing, the theatre has not been heated at all. As the weather has been very cold lately, the tenor who played Gennaro, at the last representation of Lucrezia Borgia, went through his part well wrapped up in fur!

AMSTERDAM.—Herr D'alle Aste has been successful as Osmin, in Die Entführung, at the Grosses National Theater.

NEW YORK, Dec. 9.—The last fortnight has been one of considerable activity in the musical world—Italian, English, and German opera are all going on at one and the same time. At the Academy of Music, alias the Italian Opera, Il Barbiere, the first two acts of I Puritani, the last scene of Lucia, La Sonnambula, Lucrezia Borgia, and La Favorita, have been played in succession, with more or less success. La Favorita made a great hit, and has drawn some very good houses, the principal parts being filled by Madame Grisi, and Signors Mario, Badiali, and Susini. Signor Mario also seems to have created an immense sensation in the last scene of Lucia. In spite of the energy displayed by the stockholders, who have themselves become managers, the concern does not pay, and next Monday is announced as closing the engagement of Mad. Grisi and Sig. Mario. Mdlle. Nau and company, at Niblo's, have been performing Sirène and Lucia. Mdlle. Nau is in great favour herself; but the same want of ensemble is felt here as at all similar speculations in this country: "My wife and four sticks," as Mr. Valabrecque used to say of Catalani, prevails here as it used to do in England in the early time of the Italian Opera. It is, however, worthy of remark, that this English Opera Company has entirely abandoned English opera for Italian and French exclusively.—The first Philharmonic concert was held on the 2nd of December, at Niblo's Gardens, and drew a crowded audience. The programme included Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; Reminiscences of Ossian, by Professor N. W. Gade; the overture to Abraham's Sacrifice, by Lindpaintner, a solo, for harp, by M. Aptommas, and the grand scena from Der Freischütz, sung by Miss Caroline Lehmann. There is a rumour afloat of another opera company. It would seem that Madame Clara Novello is positively engaged, and that negociations are pending with Mdlle. Johanna Wagner. Signora Brambilla is also mentioned, and Signor Beraldi. It is expected that this new troupe will commence operations about the 15th of January. The Mendelssohn Society is now rehearsing Mendelssohn's Lorely, and Händel's Alexander's Feast. —At Boston the English opera company, composed of the Misses Pyne and Messrs. Harrison and Borrani, have met with decided success. Auber's Crown Diamonds and Wallace's Maritana have attracted full audiences. The chorus and orchestra are good, and the building well adapted for acoustic effects.—The Orchestral Union have given two concerts, and seem to be progressing in public favour.—Mendelssohn's Elijah has been performed at the Music Hall by the Händel and Haydn society. —The Musical Fund Society have given the first concert of the seventh series. The orchestra is composed of forty-five musicians, and gives general satisfaction.

MEYERBEER AND HIS ORDERS.

(From a Stuttgart Journal.)

After the representation of L'Etoile du Nord, Meyerbeer received, from the King of Würtemburg, the Commander's Cross of the Order of the Crown, which confers the rank of nobility (not hereditary), on its possessor. This is the ninth order with which the celebrated composer is now decorated. He was previously a Knight of the Civil Order, Pour le Mérite, Officer of the Legion of Honour, Knight of the Order of the Lion, of Brunswick, third class, of the Orders of the Dukes of Saxe-Ernest, third class, of the Imperial Brazilian Order of the South Star, of the Imperial Order of Francis-Joseph of Austria, of the Royal Order for Civil Merit of Saxony, third class, and of the Royal Bavarian Max-Order, for Arts and Sciences.

REVIEWS.

"Twelve Studies for the Pianoforte." By Louis Berger. Edited by Carl Engel. G. Scheurmann.

These studies derive a special interest from the fact that their composer gave Mendelssohn his early lessons on the pianoforte. Independently of this, however, Berger was a professor of deserved eminence, and knew as much about the mechanical principles of execution as most men of his day. He wrote a vast quantity of music, very little of which is at present known, even in Germany, none in England, although much of it deserves a better fate than the major part of the pianoforte compositions now in vogue. Berger was no genius; but he was a learned musician, and there is great strength and richness in his harmony, which, indeed, is often as essentially modern as if he had followed instead of preceded Mendelssohn. The turn of many of the passages, as well as the peculiar distribution of various harmonies, in the studies before us, suggests to the initiated inquirer the belief that Berger was not without a certain influence on the youthful mind of the future great musician whose studies in a particular branch of the art he had the enviable task of directing. We shall not point to instances, since we cannot doubt that the mere facts we have stated will induce every thoughtful musician, every pianist who believes there is something more in music than mere passage-making, and higher effects than those of the bravura, to possess himself of the first example of Berger's composition which has been published in this country. The studies are not very difficult; but, their style being recondite, none of them can be properly termed easy; and, indeed, practised musicians are likely to get through them with greater facility than mere pianists, whatever their executive powers. At a first reading, let us own, they are likely to appear laboured, if not absolutely dry; and, certainly, their predominant characteristic is by no means fluent melody. Nevertheless, there is about them a degree of earnestness, and an elevation of style, that place them quite apart from the productions of ordinary hands. Moreover, each has a manner of its own, addressing itself to the accomplishment of a special object; and, as far as utility goes, the twelve studies of Berger are, in their way, as available as the famous studies of John Cramer, though, of course, far less varied and comprehensive. At any rate, there is a continuous freshness, and an evidence of masterly musicianship about them, which alone will serve as recommendations to all who are desirous of adding something good and not generally familiar to the shelves of their musical library.

On the title-page of the studies of Berger is inscribed the name of Mr. William Collard, a gentleman well-known and respected for more than half a century in the musical profession; the dedication is, therefore, graceful and appropriate. What M. Carl Engel means by "editing," we are not aware. If he means correcting the proof sheets, that might have been done better, since several errors of the engraver have been allowed to pass. But if he means simply "fingering," that has been skilfully effected, and we can tender M. Engel our compliments.

"Lindsay Sloper's Edition of Classical Vocal Music." Recitative, "Alcandro, lo Confesso," and Aria, "Non so donde Viene." Composed by Mozart. Campbell, Ransford, and Co.

This is the song which was heard with so much gratification at Miss Dolby's first soirée, a fortnight ago. What was then said may be here repeated—that it is one of the most beautiful of Mozart's vocal compositions for the chamber, although one of the least generally known. There must, surely, be orchestral parts extant, and which can be obtained. Their use would at least double the effect; and there is strong evidence in the style of the accompaniments that Mozart did not intend them for the pianoforte.

"Osborne's Beauties of Scottish Melody." Containing, "Scots wha hae," "March of the Cameron men," "Jock O'Hazledean," "Auld Lang Syne," "Roy's wife," and "Comin' thro' the rye." Campbell, Ransford, and Co.

These little pieces were probably composed by Mr. Osborne for some of his younger pupils, at the schools where he "professes" with so much deserved popularity. They all consist of a short introduction, the air simple, the air varied, and a coda as short as the introduction. Beyond this, they present no feature for comment, and none for criticism.

"Tyrolienne," Pour le Piano. Composée par Wilhelm Gans. Cramer, Beale, and Co.

Very pretty, flowing, and well-written, easy to play, and really, in the style, accepted as "of the Tyrol"—everything, in short, except original. There is, however, nothing in the piece that is negligent, vulgar, or otherwise detrimental to good taste. The young pupil can, therefore, get no hurt, if he derives no actual benefit, from learning it.

"L'Allegro," Caprice for the Pianoforte. "Penseroso," ditto, ditto. W. Borrow. Metzler and Co.

The Allegro, in E flat, is a kind of march, with definite subjects, or themes, and chords of the dominant, sub-dominant, and tonic. Penseroso, in D, has no subject, properly speaking; but appears like the accompaniment to some piece, of which the part for the principal instrument is wanting. We can find no merit in either.

"Galop des Guides." By Henri Laurent. "Valse du Carnaval." Ditto. Boosey and Sons.

Both spirited, lively, and rhythmical dance pieces. The Valse is the best, musically speaking; and, except the passage at the end of the fourth figure (page 9), where the suspended notes, F sharp, D sharp, and C sharp (though not unauthorised by precedent), have an effect more quaint than agreeable, we can commend the whole of it. The Galop, however, which is very animated, has the best chance of popularity—for is it not named after our gallant and harmonious allies?

"The Pasha's March." Composed for the Turkish Army, by Her Excellency the Wife of Omar Pasha. Boosey and Sons.

For a similar reason this dashing march, attributed to the accomplished spouse of the valiant and profound generalissimo of the Turkish army on the Danube, (who combines the opposite qualities of Marcellus and Fabius, the sword and the shield,) is likely to find endless admirers. Besides, though showy, it is extremely easy to play.

"The Nunnham Park Waltzes," for the Pianoforte.—By Edward Leader Shepherd.—Boosey and Sons.

The chief characteristic of these waltzes is absence of novelty. In short, there is nothing to distinguish them from some hundreds of others with which the market is clogged. In page three, fourth figure, third line, bar five, the E sharp, which follows the D in the preceding bar, has a bad effect, and, indeed, involves a faulty melodic progression. There are, also, other bad effects in these waltzes.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, December 23rd, 1854.

The Musical World has latterly, it seems, provoked much wrath on the part of a certain class of musicians and composers, by the alleged hostility of its criticisms to English artists and their doings. We have received many letters—the most abusive of the writers, by the way, very considerately abstain from disclosing their identity—taxing us, in unmeasured terms, with passing harsh, unfair, and even ill-natured judgments, and, to top up the meed of our offences, with the still less pardonable vice of not agreeing in opinion with several provincial journals of much respectability. Now, although we have no present intention of surrendering for trial on any such indictments as these, we shall yet condescend to a defensive position just so far as will enable us to extract a few, we hope, wholesome suggestions from the matter of complaint.

And first, let us ask, which is likely to be more serviceable to music, musicians, and the public—a system of truth-speaking, based on adequate knowledge and a determination to further the highest perceivable interests of art, or the effete, meaningless, and thoroughly conventional verbiage, which is so commonly put forth by persons who, with the merest amateur stock of likes and dislikes, venture to criticise, and, still more hardily, to print their criticisms? No one, we presume, would hesitate about the terms of his reply. Ask a poet, a painter, an architect. Ask any one of these, if he were to read, on his least or greatest work, a criticism such as we have last described—pompous, silly, and fashionable in generalities, and for ever blundering when on the sterner ground of technical reason—would he not blush with indignation at the offence to himself, and with shame for the little knowledge of his art evinced by a public who could accept such a guide for its opinions? Would he not turn from its approval with contempt—from its rebuke with ridicule? Would he not embrace, with thankful preference, his chance of praise or censure, when and for what he might deserve either, in some magazine or journal specially devoted to his calling, in which art is discussed in its own language and for its own sake, and from which he might learn the secret of his failure, or the true nobility of his success? Even if, like Byron in the hands of the "Scotch reviewers," he should meet with more cuffs than consideration, would he not rather be snarled at by a giant than caressed by a simpleton? He certainly would, or we know nothing of the character of an artist. But how stands the case with English musicians? If we are to believe the letters before mentioned—and which Heaven forbid!—the majority of musicians indigenous to this soil have so strange a mental organisation, that, while deeply affronted if not thought and spoken of as great men, they are incapable of any sentiments but those of very little ones. To be their "pet" reviewers, it would seem, we must either flatter them at any cost, or do nothing. If, really with the best wishes, we go to much trouble in giving reasons for disapproval, it is "needless severity," even "envy," forsooth! If, from sheer poverty of subject, we only generally express discontent with their music, it is "neglect of native talent." And, finally, should occasion serve to speak in fitting terms of such men among us as really possess the genial and intelligent stuff out of which composers are made, we can in no wise perform this gratifying function and hope to escape the charge of seeking to "bolster up a clique!"

Now, since these would-be advocates of English talent are so dissatisfied with our method of criticism, we ask them, do they like, and are they prepared to justify, another system—its direct opposite—and to which no parallel of degradation exists with respect to any art in any country;—we mean, the habit—with a view to force the sale of some trumpery, or, at least, ephemeral productions—of making pretended quotations from pretended reviews. With shame and disgust, we trace in the advertising columns of the Times and other papers, a succession of announcements in which the compositions of Brown, Jones, and Robinson, are puffed in this impudent and fraudulent manner. Let our readers look for themselves. They will not search far down the long columns of the daily press without coming on the announcement of a "just published" Penelope Polka, for example, wound up by some such lumbering sentences as—"This charming polka will inevitably win its way to the portfolio of every amateur of rank and fashion in the kingdom. We know not which most to admire—the lovely sprightliness of its melody, or the masterly skill of its harmony.—Vide Musical Review." Or perhaps the subject for encomium is a song,—and then we are favoured with something like, "This exquisite ballad (the words of which are founded on a thrilling incident which lately occurred in the beau monde) is decidely the chef-d'œuvre of its gifted composer. No heart of ordinary sensibility can fail to be touched by the tender pathos suffused over its ravishing strains,"—and then again comes the "Vide Musical Review!" We need not, of course, inform our musical readers, but we need and do inform the general public, that no such critiques, no such "Musical Reviews," are in existence; that the whole is a myth, a fable, a vulgar and shameless piece of quackery, which, with the lowest class of tradesmen would be mean enough, but, when applied to the productions, great or small, of a noble and imaginative art, becomes sufficiently base to exclude its authors—whether they be composers or publishers—from all rank or place in its circles. Again we ask our virtuously indignant correspondents, will they patronise this worse than Grub-street style of literature employed on music? Do they think it an appropriate method of rousing public attention to the claims of that "native talent" which, it seems, we so cruelly pass over? Music, indeed, must be a low calling in this country, if it can only fatten on such expedients. Little, verily, can be expected from its professors if they think their productions otherwise than disgraced by contact with such miserable shams.

Once, again, let us imagine a parallel case among the sister-arts. Conceive the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor once more in the receipt of custom in Threadneedle-street. Imagine the usual heading, "Mr. Moon has the pleasure to announce," etc., followed by the advertisement of a superb engraving—say by Cousins, from a new picture—say by Eastlake; and this, in turn, followed by a string of sham quotations from imaginary art-journals, plentifully bespattered with all sorts of folly about "flights of genius," "chiar' oscuro," "the power of the burin," and what not of a like nature. What, think our irate friends, would be the result of such a proceeding? Why, assuredly, that painters and engravers would rise en masse to resent the insult; that both picture and print would be reclaimed from Mr. Moon by their justly incensed authors; and that even the public would feel that a great art, once sanctified by the labours of Michael Angelo and Raffaelle, had been shamefully degraded by the use of practices scarcely venial in the quack vendor of pills and ointment.

It is not for us to dictate to English musicians what course they should take on this, or any other subject;—we shall merely announce and maintain our own. We know no difference of native dignity between music and poetry, or music and painting; and our effort has been, and will be, to discountenance everything—whether a low tone of criticism, or the degrading kind of imposture we have just described—that may tend to impede the march of music in this country to a place of equal importance with the sister-arts. We well know and thoroughly estimate, the amount of real musical talent in England; and we also know that it would be a high failing in duty to laud the trivialities of the mere pretender, who does not scruple to puff himself, by any attainable means, into equal importance with the works of those really able men whose artist-nature would scornfully reject any but a legitimate avenue to public approval.

THE recent performance of Mozart's opera, La Clemenza di Tito, by the students, male and female, at the Royal Academy of Music, brings us back to a period when such incidents constituted the rule rather than the exception. The execution of Mozart's music—which is so thoroughly Orphean that the dullest ear must drink in its melody instinctively—was, for the most part, so creditable, and, in some respects, excellent, that we begin to entertain a hope that the awakening of the Royal Academy of Music from its long and profitless lethargy is at hand. That the Institution has been asleep for many years, and, during its somnolence, has been gradually wasting away, is our conviction and that of the musical community at large. But here we have a sign of reviving life, of new vigour, and refreshed energy, which cannot be otherwise than welcomed with gladness by all who feel an interest in the progress of the musical art in this country. How much better; how much more profitable; how much more in keeping, indeed, with the objects of the Institution, are performances of this nature—performances of complete works by great masters—than the rambling, incongruous, and aimless "entertainments" presented four times a-year in Hanover Square to the friends and patrons of the Academy, who have done no harm that they know of to justify their being exposed to such inflictions. If an Academy Concert, so called, is worth five shillings entrance fee, such a performance as that of Mozart's La Clemenza di Tito is much better worth a guinea—and, yet, for this no charge was made. People were invited, went, as a matter of course, and came away enchanted with the music, and highly gratified with the manner in which it had been executed by the pupils. If those in power are disposed to take the hint, inevitably suggested by this result of their quasi innovation, or rather renovation, and feel inclined to adopt the course now open to them, there will still be some hope that our Royal Academy of Music may be made serviceable to the art, and a credit to the nation. But let us not be too sanguine.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

ON Wednesday week the friends and patrons of this Institution were invited to an entertainment of unusual interest—a performance of the whole of the music, except the parlante recitatives of Mozart's opera, La Clemenza di Tito. The characters were thus distributed:—

| | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Sesto | ... | ... | ... | Miss Williams. |
| Vitellia | ... | ... | ... | „ Spiller. |
| Servilia | ... | ... | ... | „ Banks. |
| Annio | ... | ... | ... | „ Wilkinson. |
| Tito | ... | ... | ... | Mr. Herberte. |
| Publio | ... | ... | ... | „ Bolton. |

The execution generally was entitled to high praise; the principal characters were extremely well filled, and all the subordinate parts carefully sustained. The orchestra and chorus did their duty well. Altogether, the performance gave so much pleasure to everyone present, that the announcement of its speedy repetition would be hailed with unanimous satisfaction. Mr. Lucas conducted the whole performance.

The examination for the two King's Scholarships vacant at this time of the year took place on Monday last. The board of examiners consisted of Mr. Potter, chairman; Mr. Goss, Mr. Lucas, Mr. H. Blagrove, Mr. Lovell Phillips, Mr. Dorrell, and Mr. Robert Barnett. The number of candidates examined was sixteen, ten young gentlemen and six young ladies. The following were elected scholars—Miss Cazaly and Master Izaac. Specially commended—Miss Southgate and Mr. Cheshire. Highly commended—Misses Lazarus and Kilpac; Messrs. Ibbotson, Harrison, Adlington, Masom, Henniker, and Wheeldon.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The Christmas anniversary performance of the Messiah was given last night, at Exeter Hall. The crowd was immense, and the entire performance worthy of all praise. The principal singers were Mad. Clara Novello, Miss Dolby, Herr Formes and Mr. Sims Reeves.

LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—According to annual custom, this Society gave its Christmas performance of the Messiah, on Thursday evening, at Exeter-hall. The audience was a large one, and the execution of some of the pieces was highly creditable to Mr. Surman and his host of 700 or 800. The principal singers were Mrs. Endersohn, Miss M. Wells, Miss J. Wells, Messrs. Augustus Braham, Marshall, and Lawler.

M. JULLIEN'S CONCERTS.—In addition to Herr Ernst, we are informed that Mad. Pleyel is engaged for the new series of concerts at Covent Garden Theatre, and that Mr. Mitchell is in communication with Mdlle Jetty de Treffz at Vienna.

MR. CHARLES SALAMAN has announced two lectures, on "The Keyed Stringed Instruments which preceded the Pianoforte;" to be illustrated by performances on the ancient virginals, spinett, single and double harpsichord, etc.

DEBORAH.

DEBORAH was the first work in which the special features of the modern oratorio were rendered important. The choruses were made more prominent, and were more elaborated and developed to a greater extent. The oratorios of Händel, previous to Deborah, were written somewhat after the form prevalent among the Italian masters. La Resurrezione—Händel's first oratorio, composed for the Easter Festival during his residence at Rome, in April 1708, when he was only twenty-four years of age—is an example of this style. The works we allude to partake of the operatic character, and the personages usually comprise one or two sopranos, an alto, a tenor, and bass. Concerted pieces are rare, and the libretto is almost entirely worked out with recitatives, solos, duets, trios, and quartets. An overture, or instrumental prelude of any kind, seldom or never precedes one of these early works. In Esther, Händel appears to have made the first step towards the modern oratorio. Esther was written in 1720, after Händel had lived in England about ten years. The first representation was a private one, and took place in the chapel of the Duke of Chandos, at Cannons, where Händel was residing as chapel-master. Esther was a decided advance on La Resurrezione. Choruses were introduced with no spare hand, and were constructed upon a larger model. The oratorio was subsequently executed in 1731 by the children of the Chapel Royal, at the house of their master, again in private. It was first performed in public, somewhat altered from the original score, at the King's Theatre, in May, 1732. The reception was so favourable as to induce Händel to set about another oratorio immediately; and having obtained a libretto from one Samuel Humphreys—an industrious, but uninspired poet—he commenced Deborah, and finished it in February, 1733. In the original score, preserved in the Queen's library, the completion of the oratorio is thus recorded by the composer:—"S. D. G.—G. F. Händel, London, Feb. 21, 1733."

All the music of Deborah is not original. Handel drew largely from his former works. In the chorus, "Immortal Lord," the subject at the words, "Oh, grant a leader," had been previously used in an alto solo in the "Ode to Queen Anne's Birthday," composed in 1713; the bass song, "Awake the ardour of thy breast," is also taken from the same source, without any alteration. The themes of the choruses, "Let thy deeds be glorious," and "Despair all around them" may be found in the first and second movement of the anthem, "Let thy hand be strengthened," one of the four composed for the coronation of George II. in 1727. The "Hallelujah Chorus," concluding the first part of Deborah, is identical with the last movement of the same anthem. The chorus, "The Great King of Kings," is taken from the first movement of "The king shall rejoice"—another anthem, written for the coronation of George the Second. In the last chorus, the motive commencing at "Oh, celebrate his name," constitutes the subject of another movement of the same anthem; and the final "Hallelujah" chorus is derived from the same source.

The first representation of Deborah took place at the King's Theatre, on Saturday, the 17th of March, 1733. It was commanded by George the Second, and was given in place of an Italian opera. The greatest preparations were made for its performance. The theatre was decorated and illumined in a particular and appropriate manner, and the prices were fixed at one guinea the body of the house, and half-a-guinea the gallery. It was subsequently repeated, on Tuesday, the 27th of the same month, and on Saturday, the 31st of March, at the usual terms of admission.

Many who went to hear Deborah, a fortnight ago, at Exeter Hall, indulged themselves with anticipations of something wholly unknown to them, but they were disappointed. Deborah is replete with indications of things, which, in a more elaborate form, make some of the greatest features of the subsequent efforts of its composer. In addition to this, nearly the whole of the Coronation Anthem, "Let thy hand be strengthened," as has been hinted, and the greatest portion of "The king shall rejoice" are embodied in this oratorio. Nevertheless, Deborah, as it stands, may be decidedly, pronounced a great work, though not in the foremost rank of Händel's inspirations. The music, generally, is of a somewhat light character; not one instance of elaborate fugue occurs, and the accompaniments to the songs are more simple (less florid—less contrapuntal, so to speak) than is ordinarily the case with Händel. There is, however, abundant character, and a stream of continuous melody, such as few besides Händel ever possessed. The subject, though presenting considerable scope for dramatic feeling in the music, is anything but grateful. A more ungracious character than Jael, the murderess of Sisera, is not to be met with in or out of Scripture. She violates the rights of hospitality, and murders the guest whom she has received with pretended welcome. In the recitative, where Jael exults in a description of the deed, Händel, himself, seems to have been inspired with unwonted dulness. What glorious rubbish, too, are the words!

> When from the battle that proud Captain fled,
> Vengeance divine to my pavilion led
> The travelling fugitive; who, pale with care,
> Besought me, panting, to conceal him there;
> Flaming with thirst, and anguish in his look,
> He asked for water from the limpid brook,
> But milk I gave him in a copious bowl,
> With ecstacy he quaff'd and cool'd his soul,
> And then, with his laborious flight oppress,
> In some few moments he sank down to rest.
> Then was I conscious, Heav'n, that happy hour,
> Had placed the enemy of Judah in my power;
> The workman's hammer and a nail I seized
> And, whilst his limbs in deep repose he eas'd,
> I through his temples forced the wound,
> And rivetted the tyrant to the ground.

In despite of this fashion, and more of the same kind, Händel, as usual, has made the most of his materials. The strength of Deborah is in the choruses; the greater number of which are good, some fine, and some magnificent. As instances of the last-mentioned, we may cite the concluding chorus of the first part, "Despair all around them"—the opening chorus of the second part, "See the proud chief advances now" (the most elaborate in the whole oratorio)—the chorus of the priests of Baal, "Oh, Baal! monarch of the skies!" (the most characteristic thing in Deborah)—the chorus of the Israelites which follow, "Lord of Eternity"—and the short, but deep and passionate lament of the priests of Baal, "Doleful tidings!" all these are in Händel's happiest vein. In "Oh, Baal! monarch of the skies!" the quaint figure of accompaniment, kept up with perverse obstinacy, has a singularly wild effect. Händel seems to have treated the priests of Baal (like the priests of Dagon in Samson) as a tribe of drunken bacchanals, and this renders the contrast to the solemn majesty of the professors of the true faith the more striking and impressive.*

The songs in Deborah are, generally, very feeble—seldom showing Händel in his strength; of course there are fine things among them—but these are rare. We must not forget to say, however, that Deborah, as presented at Exeter Hall, is not Deborah as Händel wrote it. A third part at least is omitted, and, among the rest, we think some of the most striking pieces. The task of curtailing the work of a great master like Händel, however, is one of great delicacy and responsibility; and, on the whole, we find little reason to complain of the manner in which it has been accomplished by the Sacred Harmonic Society. That it might possibly have been better done we admit; and so indeed might the additional accompaniments and fillings-up of Mr. Costa.

* No greater proof can be cited of the decided originality of Mendelssohn's genius than the fact, that while establishing, as Händel has done, a marked and, so to speak, dramatic contrast between the choruses of the Baalites and those of the true believers, he has preserved his own individuality, and avoided even the slightest resemblance with his great predecessor.

DRAMATIC.

At the Lyceum, two new pieces have been produced, Aggravating Sam, and Two Heads are Better than One. The first is taken from the French vaudeville, Un Drôle de Pistolet, and affords Mr. Charles Matthews an opportunity of displaying his coolness and imperturbability to special advantage. Aggravating Sam is, indeed, one of his best parts. Two Heads are Better than One, is a mere bagatelle having little or nothing to recommend it.—The new drama at the Adelphi, produced on Monday night, and entitled, Pierre the Foundling, is a translation, by Mr. Dion Boucicault, of Georges Sand's François le Champi, which, last year, drew all Paris to the Odéon. A priori, we should have said, a piece so delicately constructed, so entirely dependent on character, and which repudiates so determinedly moving incidents and striking situations, must have failed to enlist the sympathies of an Adelphi audience. It was, nevertheless, eminently successful on Monday night. The cast embraced the names of Mad. Celeste, Miss Woolgar, Mrs. Keeley, and Messrs. Keeley and Webster.—At the St. James's, Mrs. Seymour is still adhering to the legitimate comedy. The School for Scandal and the Provoked Husband have been played during the week, Mrs. Seymour and Mr. Geo. Vandenhoff sustaining the principal parts.—Mr. Charles Kean, we hear, will bring out Shakspere's Henry the Eighth with great splendour, soon after Christmas, he himself undertaking the character of Cardinal Wolsey.—An amateur performance was given on Monday evening week, at the St. James's, in aid of the Patriotic Fund. The play was Macbeth, the afterpiece The Waterman. All the performers were amateurs, except Miss Glynn, who appeared as Lady Macbeth. Dr. Joy, the gentleman who accompanied M. Jullien in his tour to America, performed Macbeth with great ability, Mr. Markwell was a very spirited Macduff, and Mr. Walter Maynard sang the music of Hecate in a musician-like style. Mr. Henry Leslie conducted the orchestra, which consisted of the members of the Musical Amateur Society; and the choral force was placed under the direction of Mr. Frank Mori. The performances were highly creditable to all engaged. The theatre was crowded in every part, and the receipts, no doubt, realised a handsome sum for the Fund. The same entertainments are to be repeated to-night, in the same theatre, for the benefit of St. Mark's Hospital.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

HARMONIC UNION.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

Sir,—It has been with much regret that we have observed the correspondence relating to the Harmonic Union, which has lately been inserted in your journal; but as Mr. Lias has publicly mentioned our names with those of two other retiring directors, we beg to be allowed to offer a few remarks by way of explanation, and in so doing we will, as far as possible, confine ourselves to the matters contained in the letter of "An Amateur," published December 2nd, and in that of Mr. Lias, inserted in your last. We are, however, at a loss to conceive what concern either the "Amateur" or the public can have in the pecuniary transactions of a Society which has faithfully performed all its engagements to its subscribers.

As we understand it, the inquiry, which produced Mr. Lias's letter, was, whether the Society owed Mr. Benedict £80, and whether that was the reason why Mr. Benedict declined to resume the office of conductor? To this, Mr. Lias might, with perfect truth, have replied, as we do now,—Most certainly, no! But he prefers (from what we can but suppose to be a motive of spite, because of our severance from the Harmonic Union), to publish a private letter, and a resolution of the Board, which ought also to have been private, apparently seeking to throw the whole onus of Mr. Benedict's retirement upon those directors who had long since resolved to have no more to do with Mr. Lias, or those remaining in office. We may, perhaps, here say, that we faithfully performed all the duties we had undertaken, even up to the very last rehearsal of the season, and we challenge any one to prove one single act against the interests of the Society during our connection with it.

Out of the four retiring directors whose names have been mentioned, three were induced to join the board solely upon the representations of Mr. Lias. They all stated that their means would not permit them to undertake a heavy liability, but Mr. Lias assured them that, there being sixteen directors in all, their liability could not, under any circumstances, exceed £10—and he produced a statement of figures in proof of the assertion. He also stated that he would give a guarantee to that effect, only he would then have to do the same to all the others, which he did not think fair. We, knowing nothing of the internal management of musical societies, unfortunately believed him, and what was the result? Why, at the close of the season, we found ourselves saddled with a liability (including what we had already paid) of nearly £75 each. The sixteen directors having dwindled down to ten.

Now comes the arrangement upon which Mr. Lias rests his reply. It is true we were not in a position to pay down at once so large a sum as was required of us, and it is also true that we undertook to settle the liabilities which Mr. Lias has laid before you in our "private letter;" but it is rather important to explain how it was that Mr. Benedict's claim became incorporated in that list. At the close of the season, when the Society owed Mr. Benedict £84, and he had threatened legal proceedings, Mr. Lias stated both privately and at the board that he had had legal advice, and did not fear an action, for Mr. Benedict could not recover—first, because he had no written engagement as conductor; second, because there had been no agreement as to terms; and third, because the last cheque paid to Mr. Benedict was dated subsequent to the last concert conducted by that gentleman, and might be, therefore, pleaded as a settlement in full. Under these circumstances, and feeling it a disgrace to the board that a gentleman, who had devoted so much talent, time, and labour to the Society as Mr. Benedict had done, should be so treated, we did undertake to see him paid, and he kindly consented to an arrangement proposed by us.

We hope this statement, taken in connection with what another correspondent of yours reported in your journal of October 14th, as Mr. Lias's reply to a question put to him at a rehearsal as to Mr. Benedict's further connection with the Society, will satisfy "An Amateur" that money, or rather the non-payment of it, was not Mr. Benedict's reason for retiring from the Harmonic Union, as at present constituted, and we have no hesitation in declaring our firm conviction to be, that Mr. Benedict resigned only on account of the uncourteous treatment he had experienced, on all occasions, from certain members of the board, and which was carried to such an extent that Mr. Benedict declined again to enter the Society's office.

Apologising for the length to which we have trespassed upon your space, and with the determination to answer no more aspersions or personal attacks from whatever source they may come,

We are, sir, your obedient servants,

T. Boodhouse,
Henry C. Stroud.

December 20th, 1854.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

Sir,—In your number 48 is a letter signed "An Amateur," in which the writer states that, "at a performance of Judas Maccabæus by the London Sacred Harmonic Society, at Exeter Hall (Nov. 20th), he was solicited to sign a petition to Mr. Sterndale Bennett to become the conductor to the Harmonic Union for this season."

Your correspondent then wishes for information respecting the Harmonic Union and its transactions with Mr. Benedict; this I cannot favour him with, as I am not in any way officially connected with any musical society, but as I am the only individual concerned in writing, receiving signatures to, and presenting the letter which "An Amateur" calls a "petition;" and because he does not appear quite clear-headed as to its origin and purport, and therefore writes in a manner calculated to spread wrong impressions, it becomes my duty to explain that part of his letter which refers to it.

First, en passant, "An Amateur" was not a member of any of the Harmonic Societies, therefore he had no interest in that letter, which commenced, "Having been connected (as amateur members of the chorus) with the Harmonic Union, we," etc. He does not say whether or not he signed it, but as I accepted no signature without asking, "Are you a member of the Harmonic Union?" and receiving an affirmative, I presume not.

But the letter of "An Amateur" seems to imply that his signature was solicited either by the London Sacred Harmonic Society or by the Harmonic Union. Now had he read the letter, he would have seen that the last clause distinctly stated it to be non-official, and I am anxious, in justice to the directors of those Societies, to assure him that I had neither spoken to, nor communicated with, those gentlemen, nor with the directors or other officials of any musical society on the subject of that letter.

A rumour was current that an offer of the post had been officially made to Mr. Bennett, and I found that popular feeling in the chorus was in his favour. I wrote to Mr. Bennett simply stating this, and that, should he decide on accepting the offer of the directors, the amateur chorus would be happy to support him.

This I offered for signature to seventy-eight members (all I could meet with during two evenings I allotted myself, one of which was that mentioned by "An Amateur"). Of these, seventy-six eagerly signed it: two required time to consider it.

The erroneous reports this simple matter has given, and might give, rise to, must be my excuse for troubling you, and for begging you to spare room for the insertion of this in your next, if you can.

I am, Sir, yours very respectfully,

114, Dover Road, Southwark, Dec. 13, 1854. J. J. Cayley.

St. Martin's Hall.—A performance of the Messiah, under the direction of Mr. Hullah, was given on Wednesday evening, in the above hall. The principal vocal performers were Mrs. Sims Reeves, Miss Julia Bleaden, Miss Palmer, Mr. Thomas, and Mr. Sims Reeves. The performance was excellent. Mr. Sims Reeves sang magnificently, and produced an immense sensation in "Behold and see," and "Thou shalt treat them," in both of which he was encored. Mrs. Sims Reeves sang with great artistic feeling; Miss Palmer, a debutante, evinced much promise as a contralto singer; and Miss Julia Bleaden was very successful in the second soprano part. Mr. Thomas, too, acquitted himself most creditably in the bass music. The hall was densely crowded in every part.

Miss Lavinia Mary Taylor gave a concertina concert, on Monday evening, in the large room of the London Tavern. Her coadjutors were Misses M. and J. Wells, Madame Weiss, Messrs. Weiss and Montem Smith, vocalists; and Messrs. R. Blagrove, G. and J. Case, and Distin, sen., instrumentalists. The audience was much pleased—the performances on the concertina coming in for the largest share of favour. Miss Lavinia Mary Taylor was especially successful in "Rule Britannia," with variations, which was encored. Mr. Charles Blagrove presided at the pianoforte.

Marylebone Institution.—On Monday evening (the 11th inst.), Mr. Thomas Williams delivered at the above Institution, his popular lecture, on "English Music and English Musicians," in the vocal illustrations to which he was ably assisted by Miss Bessie Williams and Mr. F. Osborne Williams.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MISS REBECCA ISAACS begs to announce to her pupils and friends that she has returned from her provincial tour, and resumes her lessons as usual. All communications respecting engagements to be addressed to her residence, 521, New Oxford-street.

MISS BLANCHE CAPILL (Pupil of Louis Leo—Voice, Mezzo-Soprano e Contralto), Professor of Music and Singing, 47, Alfred-street, River-terrace, Islington, where letters respecting pupils or engagements may be addressed.

LEIPZIG BACH SOCIETY.—EWER & Co. beg to inform the Subscribers that the Fourth Volume, containing the Passions Musik (St. Matthew), will be issued next week. Subscription for the Annnual Volume, £1. Ewer & Co., 390, Oxford-street.

MADLLE. ANNIE DE LARA has the honour to announce that the first of her THREE SOIRÉES MUSICALES will be given at her residence, on Thursday, the 28th instant, under the most distinguished patronage, in aid of the "Crimean Army Fund." She will be assisted by the following artistes:—Mesdames Paravalli, Mrs. Erskine Williams, and Madlle. Annie de Lara; Signors de Paravicini, De Petris, Kinni, Onorati, and Signor Bottura. Pianists, Signor Albert de Freuchel, Member of the Académie Royale, Berlin, his first appearance in England. Violin, Mr. Viotti Collins. Conductors, Signor G. Operti and Mr. Maurice Davies. Tickets for the three, £1 1s., or 10s. 6d. each, to be had at Cramer, Beale, and Co., Regent-street; R. W. Ollivier, 19, Old Bond-street, and at Madlle. Annie de Lara's residence, 14, Torrington-square. Early applications necessary.

Address to the Public.—Whilst the "Widow" and the "Orphan" of the Soldier are being cared for, whilst the wounded receive the attention and succour necessary for their recovery, the "living Warrior" who has yet escaped the bullet or bayonet of the ruthless Cossack, and, in addition to his momentary danger, is fatally exposed to "privations and hardships," he too must bethought of, to cheer him in his loneliness, away from his country, kindred and home. Perishing with cold, he should have Blankets and Covering. Anxious about home, Writing-paper to send one word of solace to his friends, and some of those innumerable necessaries which in an inhospitable and hostile country no money could procure. We must keep limb and body in strength and health, his spirit in cheerfulness, to man him hourly to the task of a momentary death struggle.

The "Crimean Army Fund" is raised to effect this object. Noble spirits have suggested this idea, and lend their "Pleasure Yachts" to carry them "hope and comfort"—May they be amply supplied and richly loaded.

May the "Strains of Music" warble forth its softest notes, to add one tribute to the cause, which must enlist our best and holiest sympathies.

ANNIE DE LARA.

14, Torrington-square, Dec. 8th, 1854.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

M. JULLIEN'S CONCERTS,

NEXT FRIDAY, DECEMBER 29th, 1854.

M. JULLIEN has the honour to announce that, although it had been his intention, as in former years, to have limited the period of his Concerts to one short series, a variety of circumstances have, this season, induced him to depart from his accustomed practice.

The great success which has invariably attended these Entertainments, has increased this year to such an enormous extent that it would really appear as if the omission of the last year's Concerts, in consequence of M. JULLIEN'S absence in America, had, instead of diminishing, added, in an extraordinary degree, to their popularity; and, indeed, as if the public—deprived for one season of their favourite amusement—had, during the next, flocked towards it with a twofold eagerness. M. JULLIEN, in fact, during his late series of Concerts at Drury Lane Theatre, on many occasions found it quite impossible to accommodate the numbers of persons who presented themselves for admission—this great anxiety to attend the Concerts not being confined to one class alone, but extending itself to the mass of persons visiting the Promenade, as well as to the occupants of the Dress Circle and Private Boxes—M. JULLIEN trusts this great success is not solely attributable to any one of the special attractions which he had provided for this year's Concerts, for, unprecedented as has been the enthusiasm evinced at every performance of the "Allied Armies' Quadrille," the great pièce de resistance of the season, and several other portions of the Programmes, he hopes that the increased popularity of his Concerts may be fairly regarded as an evidence of a more widely spread taste for the works of the Great Masters, as well as a rapid and progressive aptitude in the mind of the public generally for the appreciation and enjoyment of the better class of Musical Entertainments.

Under these circumstances, and in accordance with the wishes and advice of many of M. Jullien's Patrons and Friends, he determined to endeavour, if possible, to arrange a second short series of Concerts this season. The great difficulty, however, which at once presented itself, was the finding a building affording such increased space as it might fairly be supposed would be sufficient to accommodate a large additional number of Visitors. In this difficulty M. JULLIEN sought the assistance of the Directors of the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, their Theatre being the only one at all likely to afford the accommodation required; and it is with very great gratification he is enabled to state that the Directors, entering at once into his views, have, in the most handsome manner, placed their magnificent establishment entirely at his disposal, and thus rendered him most valuable aid in his efforts still mor widely to cultivate the popular musical taste; M. JULLIEN has, therefore, the honour to announce that the will commence on

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 29th,

and it will be seen that, popular as they have proved to be, he has not relied entirely for the amusement of his audience on the novelties of the last Series of Concerts, but has provided, though at a very large cost, great additional attraction. He has entered into an engagement with the most celebrated Pianiste in Europe, to perform, for a limited number of nights. He has also entered into an engagement with that most distinguished performer on the Violin, for the purpose of executing the Classical Works of the great Masters.

HERR ERNST,

MADAME ANNA THILLON,

whose charming Vocal Performance has received, nightly, such unanimous marks of approbation, is re-engaged for the whole Series.

SIGNOR BOTTESINI, who is daily expected from America, will appear immediately on his arrival.

HERR KŒNIG

is also engaged.

The above Artists, in addition to those already forming M. JULLIEN'S Unrivalled Orchestra, will constitute a most unprecedented combination of Talent.

It is M. JULLIEN'S intention to repeat, with additional attractions, the evenings of the

BEETHOVEN and MENDELSSOHN FESTIVALS, and also, for the First Time, to give a CONCERT consisting entirely of the Works of Mozart.

MEYERBEER'S celebrated STRUENSEE (the complete Work) will be performed; as also a Selection arranged for full Orchestra, from ROSSINI'S Opera, LE COMTE ORY; a Selection arranged for full Orchestra, from VERDI'S New Opera, RIGOLETTO; a Selection for full Orchestra, from SPOHR'S Classical Opera, JESSONDA, &c., &c.

In order to contribute to the amusement of the many JUVENILE VISITORS whom M. Jullien hopes to see at his Concerts during the CHRISTMAS HOLIDAYS, he has composed a new Comic Quadrille, entitled the PANTOMIME QUADRILLE.

The NEW SLEIGH POLKA, describing, with some curious and novel effects, sledge driving in America, will also be produced.

The NEW GRAND ALLIED ARMIES' QUADRILLE, assisted by the THREE MILITARY BANDS OF HER MAJESTY'S GUARDS, which has created such unparalleled enthusiasm, will be performed on the First Night, and on every evening until further notice. The nightly programme will, in fact, present an unequalled variety and excellence. The whole Area of this magnificent Theatre—the audience portion as well as the stage—will be converted into one IMMENSE SALLE, and exhibit an entirely new and tasteful decoration, the whole being carpetted, warmed, and ventilated.

At the back of the Promenade will be found

THE READING ROOM,

Containing Newspapers and Periodicals from almost all parts of the world, and includes Six London Morning Papers, Five Evening Papers, Fifty-six Weekly Papers, and Twenty Provincial Papers; besides the Irish, Scotch, German, American, Italian, Swiss, Dutch, Indian, Chinese, Australian, New Zealand, Malta, Portuguese, Ionian, Canadian, French, Belgian, and Spanish Newspapers, Magazines, and other Periodicals.

Notwithstanding the vast outlay necessarily incurred by the above arrangements, it is M. Jullien's intention, in the regulation of the admission, to preserve the popular character of his Entertainments, and to retain the usual scale of Prices.

Prices of Admission:

PROMENADE, UPPER BOXES, AMPHITHEATRE STALLS, AMPHITHEATRE, } ONE SHILLING.

DRESS CIRCLE, 2*s.* 6*d.*

PRIVATE BOXES, 12*s.*, 21*s.*, 31*s.* 6*d.*

The Concerts, on each evening, will commence at eight o'clock, and terminate before 11. Places and Private boxes may be engaged at the BOX OFFICE of the Theatre, and Private Boxes of the principal Librarians and Booksellers.

N.B.—In consequence of M. Jullien's provincial engagements into which he has already entered, it will not be possible to extend the concerts beyond ONE MONTH.

WANTED, A CHORISTER BOY for St. George's Chapel, Windsor. Applications to be made to Dr. Elvey, 19, Cloisters, Windsor.

WANTED, a TENOR SINGER FOR THE TEMPLE CHOIR, for alternate months. No one need apply who has not been regularly educated in a choir. The strictest testimonials will be required as to qualifications and character. Applications to be made to the Under Treasurer, at his office, Inner Temple, London, on or before the 1st of January next.

THE LONDON ORCHESTRA.—Conductor, Mr. FRANK MORI; Leader, Mr. THIELWALL. Including Messrs. Barret, Lazarus, Baumann, Rémusat, Lovell Phillips, Prospère, Cioffi, Zeiss, Tolbecque, Nadaud, Chipp, &c. For terms apply to Mr. A. Guest, 1, Kingston Russell-place, Oakley-square, Camden-town, or Messrs. Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street.

MR. CHARLES SALAMAN'S TWO LECTURES on the ANCIENT KEYED-STRINGED INSTRUMENTS, and on the INVENTION AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE PIANOFORTE, illustrated by rare specimens of obsolete keyed-stringed instruments, by diagrams, and by music, will be delivered on Tuesday evenings, Jan. 9th and 16th, 1855, at the MARYLEBONE LITERARY AND SCIENTIFIC INSTITUTION. Reserved seats, 3s.; unreserved, 2s.; gallery, 1s.; at the principal music shops, of Mr. Salaman, 36, Baker-street, and at the Institution, Edward-street, Portman-square.

CHRISTMAS PRESENTS.—The most appropriate offerings for this Season of Festivity, are those which tend to the promotion of Health and Personal Attraction—none can be more acceptable than ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, for imparting a transcendent lustre to the Hair, and sustaining it in decorative charm. ROWLAND'S KALYDOR imparts a radiant bloom to the Cheek, and a delicacy and softness to the Hands, Arms, and Neck; and ROWLAND'S ODONTO, or PEARL DENTIFRICE, bestows on the Teeth a pearl-like whiteness, and renders the breath sweet and pure. The patronage of royalty throughout Europe, their general use by rank and fashion, and the universally-known efficacy of these articles give them a celebrity unparalleled. Sold by A. ROWLAND & SONS, 20, Hatton Garden, London, and by Chemists and Perfumers.—Beware of spurious imitations!

THE ROYAL PANOPTICON OF SCIENCE AND ART, LEICESTER SQUARE.—The Building comprises a large circular Hall, 100 feet in diameter, and 100 feet high, surrounded by three Galleries, and surmounted by a Dome, the whole gorgeously decorated in the Saracenic style of architecture. The Exhibition includes a splendid Fountain, throwing the water 100 feet, a Crystal Tank, holding 6000 gallons of water, for the display of Messrs. Heinke's Diving Apparatus, of the Electric Light under water, and other subaqueous experiments, a Cosmorama of St. Petersburg with Portrait of the Emperor Nicholas, a Transparent Screen, 32 feet wide, and 36 feet high, for the display of Dioramic Views, of the Chromatrope, and of other optical effects; a magnificent Organ, containing 4,004 pipes, with the bellows worked by steam power, the richest and most powerful instrument of its kind in existence, on which a variety of Sacred and Operatic Music is performed daily at intervals, by Mr. W. T. Best, the Organist of the Institution; a gigantic Electric Machine, the largest ever constructed, the plate ten feet in diameter, with a large Leyden Battery attached; Voltaic Batteries of high power on a novel principle; and in the two Galleries, a variety of machinery and manufacturing processes in action, including the Nassau Steam Printing Machine, a complete series of Whitworth's Machinery, Kirby and Beard's Pin and Needle Machines, Perkins' Apparatus for the Combustion of Steel, Brock's Ornamental Sawing Machine, Prideaux's Patent Self-closing Furnace Valve for the prevention of smoke, &c., an Ascending Carriage, Brett's Electric Telegraph, &c., &c.; a selection of Sculpture, including Monti's Veiled Figure, "The Houri," executed expressly for the Institution, a Gallery of Pictures on sale, and other objects of Art. Distin's celebrated Flügel Horn Union every evening. Attached to the Institution are two Lecture Rooms, in which demonstrations are given several times daily, in various branches of Science and Art, and Lectures delivered from time to time on Literary and Scientific subjects; a spacious Laboratory and Chemical School; a Photographic Gallery, in which portraits are taken. Open daily: Morning, 12 to 5; Evening (Saturday excepted), 7 to 10. Admission 1s.: Schools and Children under 10, half price.

MR. GEORGE GENGE respectfully announces that his Annual Concert and Ball will take place in Freemasons' Hall, Great Queen-street, on Tuesday Evening, the 9th of January, 1855. The Concert will commence at Nine o'clock: the Ball at half-past Ten. Tickets, 5s. each, may be had at the Hall, and of Mr. George Genge, Peckham Grove, Camberwell.

CASE'S CONCERTINAS.—Messrs. BOOSEY and SONS have the honour to announce that they have completed arrangements with Mr. George Case, for the exclusive SALE of his celebrated CONCERTINAS. The personal attention of this eminent professor will be given to the manufacture of these instruments, every one of which will bear his name. A large stock of second-hand concertinas, for sale or hire, may be had of Boosey and Sons, 28, Holles-street.

TO MILITIA REGIMENTS.—NOTICE.—Commanding Officers of Militia requiring Bands are respectfully invited to apply to Messrs. Boosey and Sons, 28, Holles-street, Military Musical Instrument Manufacturers to her Majesty's Army and Navy, the Governor-General of India, &c. &c., who undertake to form and supply Bands with every requisite, including Instruments with their appurtenances, music of the very best description and at the most moderate prices, together with Band-Master and Musicians of acknowledged talent.

CHAPPELL'S FOREIGN MODEL PIANOFORTE—PRICE FIFTY GUINEAS.—This instrument has (unlike the ordinary cottage pianoforte) THREE STRINGS, and the fullest grand compass of SEVEN OCTAVES. It is strengthened by every possible means to endure the greatest amount of wear, and to stand perfectly in any climate. The workmanship is of the best description, the tone is round, full, and rich, and the power equal to that of a Bichord Grand. The Case is of the most elegant construction in Rosewood, (vide the sketch), the touch elastic, and the repetition very rapid. Every possible precaution has been taken to insure its standing well in tune. Mr. Chappell especially invites the attention of the public, the profession, and merchants to the FOREIGN MODEL, feeling assured that no pianoforte, in all respects comparable, has hitherto been made in England at the same price. Every instrument will be warranted, and (if desired) exchanged within twelve months of the purchase. 50, New Bond-street, London.

EDWARD GREAVES obtained Honourable Mention at the Exhibition, 1851, for the

PATENT CHROMATIC TUNING FORKS, sounding all the Tones and Semitones of the Octave; a perfect guide for tuning Pianofortes, &c., and for Leaders of Choirs, &c.

THE ÆOLIAN MUTE (a combination of the "A" Æolian Pitch-Pipe and the Mute) for the Violin, is more easily applied and detached than the old Mute.

BLUED-STEEL SOSTENENTE TUNING FORKS, superior to all others in tone and finish. Sold by all Music-sellers. Manufactured by EDWARD GREAVES, 56, South-street, Sheffield.

ÆOLIAN PITCH-PIPES, all Notes in the Octave—Diatonic and Chromatic Sets—Sets for the Violin, Guitar, and Harp.

THE PATENT PORTABLE METRONOME (Registered according to Act of Parliament, 6 & 7 Vict., c. 65), is a very complete and perfect instrument for measuring time in music. It is the size and form of a small watch, and may be carried in the waistcoat pocket, being similar to a spring measuring tape, on one side of which are marked the number of vibrations in one minute (as in Maelzel's Metronome), and on the other the Italian musical terms in general use. From its moderate price, small dimensions, and practical usefulness, it is adapted for all classes of musicians and singers. Price, with case and suspender, Brass, 5s.; German Silver, 6s.; Pearl, 7s.; Shell, 8s.; Electro-plated, 8s.; Gilt, 10s. each.

THE VILLAGE BLACKSMITH.—The words by LONGFELLOW. The music composed and sung by W. H. WEISS. Messrs Cramer, Beale and Co., 201, Regent Street; and Messrs Addison, and Hollier, 210, Regent-street.

MENDELSSOHNS' TWO-PART SONGS, complete, EWER & Co.'s complete and uniform edition of Mendelssohn's thirteen two-part songs will be ready in the course of next week, price, half-bound and gilt edges, at the reduced rate of sixpence per sheet, 8s., or splendidly bound, with the composer's portrait, 4s. Ewer & Co. 390, Oxford-street.

MRS. JOSEPH KIRKMAN.

Comprised in the HARMONIC CIRCLE (2s.)—MODEL SCALE (2s. 6d.); GUIDE (4s.); EXERCISE BOOK (6s.); MUSIC PAPER, 2d. per sheet.

The following Extract from a late Review in THE MUSICAL WORLD, will explain the nature and value of this important work:—

THIS treatise, which is written with unusual clearness and simplicity, is divided into four chapters and an appendix. The chapters treat respectively of Musical Intervals, Concords, the Fundamental Discords, and Modulation. The appendix gives a brief but lucid explanation of several terms and phrases which have relation to the science of Harmony. In order that the reader may fully understand the aim of the authoress, we shall insert her introductory remarks.

"In presenting this work to the musical world, it is the earnest anticipation of the authoress that her efforts may prove efficient in a far greater degree than the generality of elementary works hitherto published. It is not with the intent or presumption of disparaging the intrinsic merits of the various writers on the theory of music that the present work appears, but rather as an auxiliary, to lead the musical student, a principio, gradually forward to the appreciation of the higher branches of the science, counteracting the error almost universal in all treatises on the subject, viz., that of supposing the pupil to be familiar with, if not perfectly grounded in, the first rudiments of harmony. Hence it is, to a certain extent, a just remark, how much time is expended on a musical education, and how rare are the instances of its effectual results. It is hoped that the present work, while it practically subdues all difficulties, and systematically arranges the progressive paths, will henceforth invalidate this remark, by proving that the science of Harmony is adapted to the capacity of all who will apply themselves to its attainment. The affinity between language and music is very striking, therefore the mode of acquirement in each should be the same; as in language, a thorough acquaintance with the alphabet and component parts of speech, with their various inflections, is necessary to attain a proficiency, so in the grammar of music, the intervals with their several inversions and interminable modifications, out of which the powerful language of music is constructed, must be intimately known. To effect so desirable an end, the authoress has invented the Model Scale, and Harmonical Circle, accompanying this work (the Guide to them), and compiled a Dictionary of Intervals; also a Practical Exercise Book, in which the exercises are all prepared to be filled up by the pupil, which, when completed, will form a valuable compilation of all the essential harmonies in music. As the ear is to be educated, the development of the science will be gradually displayed, and each effect progressively pointed out for cultivation, the whole combining the mental with the mechanical powers, thereby imperceptibly leading the student (or classes, to whom this work is particularly adapted,) to the perfect knowledge of the elements of Harmony, and an intimate acquaintance with the subject of Modulation. The work is well adapted for those who wish to attain proficiency in playing the Pianoforte; for while the Exercises, &c. are illustrative of Harmony and Modulation, they are at the same time excellent for practice on that instrument."

That Mrs. Kirkman has well carried out the intentions here expressed, will not be denied by any master or student who shall peruse her book. The "Model Scale," the invention of which is highly flattering to her ingenuity, is admirable alike for its perspicuity and completeness. It presents at once to the learner's view the proper harmonization of the scale, the dispositions of chords and their inversions, the relation of the major and minor modes, the nature and qualities of sevenths, the properties of the chromatic or semitonic scale, and the roots of chords. One week's attentive study of this perspicuous diagram will do away with the necessity of months of arduous and thankless labour. "The Harmonical Circle," in respect to modulation, is equally the foe to mystification. In a single plate you have the chain of natural modulation through every major and minor key, distinctly and unmistakeably expounded, so that nothing but sheer dulness on the part of the learner can prevent his at once understanding and profiting by it. A series of examples for the pianoforte offers various agreeable figures of melody, or arpeggio, by means of which the student may practise the circle of modulations with more amusement to himself than by the use of monotonous chords. The "Practical Exercise Book" is also of high utility; and a "Dictionary of Intervals," placed at the end of the "Analysis" (which declares itself to be a guide to the various diagrams we have individualized), is worthy of no less eulogium for its intelligibility and entireness. The Diatonic, Chromatic, and Enharmonic scales, belonging to every key, are included. Explanations of the signatures and leading notes of each of them are placed at the margin. The nature and relation of the various intervals of the scale are also clearly laid down.

In thus merely glancing at the plan of the work and the method of its development, we have paid but small deference to the talent and research it evinces. We are sure, however, that Mrs. Kirkman aims sincerely at the simplification of what has been too long a mazy labyrinth, from which, once entered, few escape with honour. She will, therefore, be more thankful to us for giving increased publicity to her design, than if we had covered her with a profusion of extravagant praises. To the succinctness, completeness, intelligibility, and usefulness of her work—which has evidently been a long labour of untiring love—we gladly offer our meed of homage. She has well entitled herself to the gratitude of teachers, as well as pupils, since she has saved both a world of trouble and perplexity. She has cleared away the brambles and underwood from the hitherto impeded feet of Harmony, who may now, with her assistance, walk erect, and straight, and swiftly. Mrs. Kirkman, be it remembered, aims not at developing the depths of science, but merely at preparing a clear and open starting-place for the students of Harmony; and this she has accomplished to perfection. We shall look forward with anxiety, however, for the more elaborate work on which she declares herself engaged (see preface), and in which we doubt not we shall find as much depth and learning as in the one before us we perceive lucidity. To conclude, it is no slight compliment to say of Mrs. Kirkman, that a woman has achieved what hitherto no one of the opposite sex has been able to arrive at—in pointing out a simple path to the attainment of the elements of harmony. After what we have advanced, it is scarcely necessary to say, that we warmly recommend this work to professors and to learners.

NOTICE.

THE Proprietors beg to announce that, in consequence of the increasing circulation of the MUSICAL WORLD in London, they will be compelled to discontinue its delivery to all their subscribers in town, after the present number.

THE Publishers have given their list of subscribers to Mr. REID, the well-known News Agent in John Street, (Oxford Street) who has undertaken so supply the MUSICAL WORLD to residents in all parts of London. All applications respecting unstamped subscriptions, must therefore be made to Mr. REID.

THE Publishers request that all accounts due to Christmas, may be paid to them without delay, as the future supply of the MUSICAL WORLD will not be continued to those subscribers whose subscriptions are in arrear.

THE stamped edition (for the country) will be still forwarded from the publishing office, but only to those subscribers who pay a quarter in advance.

PARIS.

(From an occasional Correspondent.)

Paris, 26th December.

Armo virumque cano—I sing Lord Raglan and his army—so runs the burden of all foreign or special correspondence just now. This strain alone finds sure and ready sympathy among all classes of readers. How then shall I hope to interest you, by telling of the piping which proverbially appertains to peace? You ask for news theatrical or operatic? Of such I have scarce any to give. You long since know all about the Etoile du Nord; you know that its author is again in an "interesting condition;" and that the expected offspring of his brain is already named the Africaine. The period of gestation, however, seems likely to be indefinitely prolonged. Of the reprise of the Pré aux Clercs too, —with its fresh sparkling melodies, ever green as the laurels which Hérold won in his brief career—you have had full particulars. Therefore, I will only remark, that, while the present cast at the Opéra-Comique is generally excellent, the principal tenor is a sad muff; and, as the duel in which he triumphs over the terrible swordsman, Comminges (so admirably impersonated by M. Couderc), takes place behind the scenes, one cannot but ascribe its result to foul play; seeing that every posture assumed by M. Mergy betrays the most lamentable ignorance of the first principles of self-defence. Nor does the artist's singing redeem his acting. M. Couderc, so courtly and elegant as Comminges, assumes with equal ease, finish, and verve, the character of a peasant in that pretty little operetta, Les Noces de Jeannette—which has been frequently played of late; while his colleague, M. St. Foix, is perfect both in the Pré aux Clercs, as a courtly intrigant, and in the merry one-act piece, Les Sabots de la Marquise, as servant to a country squire.

The French stage is rich in actors, content to bestow very considerable talent on secondary parts; hence a perfection of ensemble is obtained, which, I fear, we must despair of ever beholding in England, where the immense sums paid to "stars" entail the starvation of their satellites. I do not mean to affirm that this perfection is universal in Parisian companies, whether theatrical or operatic. Witness the Grand Opéra, and the Academie Impériale de Musique at this present moment, where the Muette de Portici is given in a style that recalls the most insolvent days of Drury Lane. The Muette does not stand the test of time so well as the Pré aux Clercs.* It reminds one somewhat of an old "property-dress," the tinsel and frippery of which has become tarnished, and which has passed to the domain of Nathan and masked balls. Possibly this impression of mine may be owing to the very weak and disjointed cast with which the opera is given. True, it comprises Gardoni and Massol—both of whom have fait leurs preuves—but neither are here equal to their reputation; and with them was a débutante, whose name—unknown, and I fear never destined to attain to fame—I may be excused for forgetting. Gardoni sang in French; a disadvantage which may perhaps partly explain the uncertainty which marred his performance. The effective delivery of the famous slumber song demands a perfect command of the mezza voce; and, except for voices so exceptional as that of Tamberlik, a power of passing without break from the chest to the head voice. In these essential points Gardoni appeared very deficient, and, accordingly, failed to produce effect. In the duet, "Amour sacré de la patrie," whilst he was coquetting with a sustained note—which, being between two registers, had a constant downward tendency—Massol jerked out fortissimo his accompanying phrase with a peculiarity of vocalisation and accent irresistibly comic, the effect being rendered still more droll by an attempt to combine the expression of patriotic enthusiasm with that cantatorial angle to which some singers so rigidly adhere. Exaggeration apart, I am convinced that this part of the duet, if introduced and similarly delivered in a burlesque, would have been hailed with shouts of laughter. In fact, the whole performance was really too bad, excepting only that of Cerito (Fenella), whose mimic powers, I think, have been underrated. "C'est la Muette qui a le mieux dit son air," said a Frenchman near me; and the mot was applicable enough. Even the chorus, generally so excellent at this theatre, was less effective than usual; and I came away with the conviction that a nation is more easily governed than an opera house; for you know that the direction is now placed under the immediate authority of the Emperor.

The first bal masqué at this same house took place on Saturday last, and was less brilliant than usual, on account of the predominance of plain black coats and the comparative rarity of costumes. Then, too, M. Strauss, the chef-d'orchestre, whose flourishing position solves the question "What's in a name?"—Strauss, the unreal—leaves much to be desired. Yes! he leaves Jullien to be desired; and Jullien is much.—If Mr. Ella has induced duchesses to listen to quartets, Jullien has made the public at large familiar with the symphonies of Beethoven and Mendelssohn, thus establishing much higher claims as a promoter of musical art; and, it may be added, that all who have served under his banner speak well of their genial conductor.

* We differ entirely from our correspondent. La Muette di Portici, to our thinking, is a work immeasurably superior to the Pré aux Clercs and has stood the test of time much better. The music of the latter is not so hacknied.

So much for the Grand-Opéra, as far as my recent experience goes. Of another theatre, far inferior in pretensions, I can give a more favourable report.

I went some time since to hear Marie Cabel at the Théâtre-Lyrique, in the Promise; but M. Clapisson's music was so little to my taste that I did not remain after the second act. Convinced, however, that the fault lay with the composer, not with his prima donna, I went again yesterday, when Adam's new opera, The Muleteer of Toledo, was announced for performance, and this time I was delighted. You have seen Marie Cabel at the St. James's Theatre, and know that in appearance she is a diamond edition of Sophie Cruvelli—neatly bound as to the feet in the very jauntiest little morocco boots. In other respects she is the very opposite of the Diva Sophia, whose declamation is full of fiery energy, and who loves to indulge in sauts périlleux, in extreme contrasts of light and shade, impossible to a singer less gifted as to power and compass; whereas the hypercritical might perhaps remark that Marie Cabel in some degree sacrifices variety to evenness of tone. But what a fresh silvery voice she has! how elegantly she phrases! What unerring certainty of intonation! She is the fauvette of the Boulevards, the very sweetest of warblers; and her acting is quite equal to her singing. M. Adam's music was written, I presume, expressly for the fair artist. At all events, it is admirably suited to her, being light, graceful, and full of melody, affording constant opportunity for that fanciful embroidery in which Madame Cabel excels. Mr. French Flowers might probably object that the composer has eschewed double counterpoint and avoided fugue; but the audience seemed well contented to do without those graces, applauding throughout right joyously, and, in the height of their contentment, excusing even the flatness of intonation and hot-potato style of delivery which characterised the performance of the tenor, M. Sujol. The other actors were of a tolerable mediocrity, and did good service in the concerted music. The principal and prettiest airs had been allotted to Marie Cabel. I remarked two in particular, both in the second act, which were charming: one of them, "Jadis je riais au Couvent," not unlike in rythm and form that favourite air in the Domino Noir, wherein the heroine recounts her nocturnal adventures. This was encored—a compliment more rare here than in England. The other, "Je suis une paysanne," is a quaint and happy imitation of those melodies which the peasantry in many parts of France sing to the accompaniment of the Vielle. A more ambitious "scena" in the third act, owed its success chiefly to the faultless manner in which it was executed by Madame Cabel. Then there was in the first act a lively and pleasing drinking terzet, for men's voices, and a pleasantly-written trio in the second act for tenor, soprano, and mezzo-soprano. The choruses, if not elaborate, were effective. Sundry divertissements were interspersed, in which most lightly-gauzed damsels displayed their saltatory graces. The mise-en-scène was good; and, on the whole, the opera seemed to find great favour with the audience. The orchestra, too, under the direction of Mr. Deloffre, formerly well-known at the Musical Union, did its part very satisfactorily—the accompaniments in general being simple enough.

But I have exhausted my budget of small talk. The cannons of the Invalides firing in honour of the opening of the Assemblée Législative (!) have put my pen out of joint, and turned my ideas into other channels. Let us hope that the same cannons will are long proclaim tidings that will be music to the ears of every true Englishman.

MR. BLACKBURN, the gentleman who was organist of Clapham for thirty years, died last week, leaving by will £150 to the Royal Society of Musicians.

CHRISTMAS ENTERTAINMENTS.

THE taste for Pantomime is reviving in England. A few years ago, Extravaganza, at Christmas or Easter, was all the vogue. Last year a change took place, and several of the theatres, which previously had patronised burlesque, returned to the time-honoured fashion. This season Pantomime obtains the majority in the London theatres. Of the six principal metropolitan houses, Drury-Lane, the Haymarket, and the Princess's cling to the ancient custom; the St. James's, Lyceum, and Adelphi hold by the novel entertainment. Almost all the other London theatres, eastern and transpentine, abide by the frolics of Harlequin, Clown, and Pantaloon. We side with the majority. Had we space we could show reasons for our predilection. Having no room, our readers must take us at our word. We can barely set forth what has been achieved at each house. This must suffice.

Drury Lane had the audacity to revive George Barnwell. Mr. Smith is a bold manager in times like the present. The pantomime is called Jack and Gill, Harlequin King Mustard, and the Four-and-Twenty Blackbirds Baked in a Pie, and was highly successful. It is put on the stage "regardless of expense." The house was crowded in every part.—At the St. James's a fairy extravaganza is supplied by the author of Shylock. It is entitled Abon Hassan; or, the Hunt after Happiness. The piece is a hit, and is gorgeously put on the stage. A large concourse filled the theatre.—The Haymarket, as usual, comes out strong. In burlesque or pantomime Mr. Buckstone always provides something charming; and this season the pantomime, Little Bo-Peep, who Lost her Sheep, exhibits no falling off from old times. Miss Lydia Thompson—the English queen of the light fantastic toe—is re-engaged. So much the better for the Haymarket.—Mad. Vestris and Mr. Charles Mathews, of course, go in for an extravaganza. Their Honours have never yet condescended to broad pantomime. The name of the present Lyceum eccentricity is Prince Prettypet and the Butterfly. It is a good piece at all points; well constructed and pithily written, and, need we say, magnificently put on the stage. The author is Mr. W. Brough. The last scene is a miracle in the art of scenic illusion. Miss Fanny Ternan made her début as a singing sprite, and achieved a decided success. This young lady has great abilities, and will shine yet, histrionically as well as vocally.—The Adelphi comes forward with an extravaganza, apropos of the times, called Zig-Zag Travels of Messrs. Danube and Pruth, with numerous Cuts. It is a screamer, and was inimitably acted by Keeleys, Woolgar, and Co., and Mdlle. Maraquita, from the opera at Paris, danced with great success. Mr. J. M. Morton is the author of the pantomime—at least of the introduction to the pantomime at the Princess's. It is named Harlequin Bluebeard, the Great Bashaw; or, The Good Fairy Triumphant over the Demon Discord. This pantomime was eminently successful.—At the Olympic the Christmas piece is an extravaganza, written by Mr. Planché, entitled The Yellow Dwarf and the King of the Golden Mines. The plot was no doubt selected to afford Mr. Robson an opportunity of exhibiting his serio-comic powers in the Yellow Dwarf, which he supports with extraordinary power. In this part Mr. Robson almost equals his Shylock.—At the Sadlers' Wells the pantomime is dubbed Harlequin Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves; or, Morgiana and the Arabian Nights; at Astley's, Gulliver's Travels through the Horse Islands; or, Harlequin and Britannia; at the Surrey, Harlequin and Little One Eye, Little Two Eyes, and Little Three Eyes; and at the Marylebone, Young Norval on the Grampian Hills; or, Harlequin and Lord Ullin's Daughter.—Of the entertainments elsewhere which proved most attractive, we would specify Mr. Albert Smith's Ascent of Mont Blanc, the "Gallery of Illustration," the Polytechnic, the Panopticon, the Colosseum, Mr. Charles Cotton's Musical Recitations in Newman-street, etc. Altogether, the Christmas fare presented to the public by the different managers and heads of the different establishments was of the best kind, and thoroughly satisfied all the visitors. Even the critics were forestalled from grumbling—and were all praise.

M. JULLIEN'S CONCERTS AT COVENT GARDEN.

The removal of M. Jullien and his band from Drury Lane to the Royal Italian Opera was little more than slipping from one room into another. Many considered, however, although the entertainments and the orchestra were precisely the same, and the terms of admission alike, that the concerts at Covent Garden would not have the same success as those at Drury Lane. Judging from the first concert, last night, we are bound to say that there was no falling off in the Jullien attraction. The theatre was crowded in every part, and the audience enthusiastic in the extreme. Mad. Pleyel appeared and played with immense effect. We are compelled to postpone particulars until next week, as we go to press on Friday night.

Réunion Des Arts.—The last soiree of the second season took place on Wednesday evening. The artists were Mdlle. Mouatt, Signor and Madame Lorenzo, Messrs. Ella, Silas, Witt, Politzer, Goffrie, Kiallmark, G. Kiallmark, H. Kiallmark, T. Kitchen, G. Cooke, Paque, and Gollmick. The programme presented several attractions. Haydn's quartet (No. 3, Op. 76); a M.S. trio, by M. Silas; and Romberg's Toy symphony were the three principal instrumental pieces. These were well executed, especially the trio, which was greatly applauded. The subscribers seemed much amused with Romberg's juvenile symphony, and bestowed hearty approbation on Mr. Ella's energetic beating of the drum. The vocal music, to which both Signor and Madame Lorenzo, most undoubtedly did especial justice, was not, by any means, new; neither were the solos on the violin and violoncello, by MM. Paque and Politzer, (though well played) sufficiently striking to merit criticism. The remarks which we made in our last notice on the Réunion des Arts still hold good; and we trust that the directors will think it advisable to give them attention in making their arrangements for the new year. The first soirée of the third season is announced for January 31st.

Herr Goffrie's First Soirée Musicale came off on Wednesday evening, Dec. 20th, at the Harley-street Rooms. The performance was of a most pleasing character. The assistants to Herr Goffrie were Messrs. Ries, Webb, and Alexandre Billet, as instrumentalists; and Miss Messent, Mdlle. Julia Mouatt, and Signor and Madame Lorenzo, vocalists. Two quartets by Haydn and Spohr, and Beethoven's Trio in E flat, for piano, violin, and violoncello, constituted the remarkable features of the concert. The last-named was perfectly executed by Messrs. Billet, Goffrie, and Piatti. Miss Messent sang Mozart's "Deh vieni" with charming taste, and Signor and Madame Lorenzo gave a very piquant reading of "La ci darem." M. Billet and Herr Goffrie both played solos.

Cecilian Society.—This old established Society gave their 67th annual performance of Händel's Messiah at the Albion Hall, London Wall, on Saturday, the 23rd. The principal performers were Misses Cox, Pringly, and Ward, Mrs. M. Dixon, and Messrs. Hill and H. Buckland. Mr. Shoubridge conducted, and Mr. J. G. Boardman presided at the organ. The attendance was only moderate.

St. James's Theatre.—An adaptation, by Mr. Henry Spicer, from the Greek and French of the tragedy of Euripides, Alcestes, will be produced early next month, with Miss Vandenoff as the heroine. The chorusses and entr'acte music have been adapted and arranged to some of Gluck's, by Mr. Wellington Guernsey. Sir Henry Bishop will conduct the orchestra on this occasion.

Mdlle. Annie de Lara gave the first of a series of three Soirées Musicales, at her residence, 14, Torrington-square, on Thursday evening. The performances are given by the youthful vocalist, in aid of the "Crimean Army Fund." The names of the artists comprised, in addition to that of the fair bénéficiaire, as vocalists, Mdlle. Paravalli, Mrs. Erskine Williams, Signors de Paravicini, de Petris, Kinni, and Bottura; Signor Albert de Frenchel (pianist—his first appearance in England), Mr. Viotti Collins (violin), as instrumentalists. The performance was of the mildest nature—pleasing withal. Mdlle. Annie de Lara modestly restricted her efforts to four performances. She sang the aria, "O mio Fernando," from La Favorita; a German romance, by Angeline; and joined in a duet and quartet. If the example of Mdlle. Annie de Lara were followed by all the vocalists in England, the army in the Crimea would no longer complain of the want of Welsh wigs and flannels.

Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Gilbert, and Miss Susannah Cole, gave a concert at No. 13, Berners-street, on the evening of Wednesday, the 20th instant. The most noticeable points in the entertainment were the performances of a Duo Concertante for two violins, by the Brothers Henry and Alfred Holmes, which displayed remarkable ability on the part of the young artists; the singing of one of Mendelssohn's two-part songs, by Mr. Alfred Gilbert and Miss S. Cole, perfectly rendered; and the last-named lady's ballads, "Tho' far away," by Pratten, a charming specimen of pure and simple vocalisation. Mr. Blake sang Mozart's "Qui sdegno." This gentleman has a good voice, but is sadly deficient as a singer.

Hackney.—A large audience assembled on Monday week, at the concert given at Hackney, by the Tyrolese Minstrels. Their singing was simple and unsophisticated, and had a natural charm, like the song of birds. Even professional singers might take a lesson from the "minstrels" in the emission of sound. The peculiarity of the so-called "Jodeln," only known in the Tyrol, baffles the experienced vocalist, whilst the natives can all accomplish it without study. Some of the songs executed by Madame Kramer and her interesting little girl, are extraordinary feats of natural vocalisation. Herr Haimberger performed several morceaux on the violin with excellent taste and execution. The audience encored with enthusiasm almost every piece.

Adventures of a Drum.—The 4th Regiment of Infantry in the Crimea has sustained a loss in their big drum, which, on the morning of the great hurricane in the Crimea, deserted in a gust of wind to the enemy within Sebastopol. This treacherous drum is of an unusually large size, and was made by Messrs. Boosey and Sons two years ago, for the 4th Regiment. It was present at the battles of Alma and Inkermann, and was a general favourite among the soldiers. It is said that the Russians received the musical deserter with three cheers.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

Sir,—Knowing the numerous sources from which you are enabled to collect your information, and also the wish you have to disseminate that information, I have troubled you with the following questions, and hope you will be able to gratify my curiosity; if not on all, at least on some points.

Have the astounding rumours that have been circulating during the last few days regarding the old Philharmonic Society any foundation in fact?

Is it true that the superannuated tactics of the Managing Director have caused the retirement of him whose name and talent have upheld the waning influence of the society during his connection with it?

Is it true that, in the predicament above mentioned, Mons. Berlioz and Dr. Spohr have been applied to?

And in the event of the unsuccessful result of such applications,

Is it true that each one of the eight directors is to conduct a concert during the season 1855?

Sincerely do I trust that this last query may be answered in the affirmative, for there are several among those eight gentlemen whose names are wholly unknown to fame; and of whom, as musicians, one has never heard. Talented they must be, or they would never occupy their present position, and I feel sure that opportunity only is wanting for the display of ability which has long remained buried in obscurity.

Glory and honour to art may yet arise in a quarter where it is least expected.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

Inquisitor.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 30TH, 1854.

MR. COSTA has resigned the post of Conductor at the Concerts of the Philharmonic Society. M. Hector Berlioz has been already applied to by one of the directors; but having been already announced for two concerts of the New Philharmonic, it is doubtful whether he can accept the office of the elder. Dr. Spohr has been applied to by another of the directors; but Dr. Spohr, although hale and healthy, is too old for such a labour as that of directing the concerts and conducting the directors. Besides the Elector of Hesse will not part with his favorite Capellmeister for so long a period at a stretch. The ancient system of changing the conductor at every concert can hardly be resorted to again. The seven directors are therefore in a strait.

We are not prepared with any advice to offer under the circumstances. The best step would be to call a general meeting of the members. The crisis is too grave for the seven directors to take the responsibility on their own shoulders. The subscribers, too, might be appealed to in a circular. Every subscriber has no doubt his pet conductor, as well as every member, every associate, and every director. Each of the directors would, we calculate, select himself as the fittest man for the post of chef-d'orchestre; each of the members possibly ditto; each of the associates would pitch on a member or director; but each of the subscribers (and they bring the sinews of war) would look in other directions, a long way from Hanover Square, and the Royal Palaces. For our own parts we have no choice, and prefer standing under arms until the decision is come to. When the conductor is appointed, we can easily make ready, present, and fire at him.

Would it be a good plan to let each symphony, overture, concerto, solo, and vocal piece be under the direction of a separate conductor? The Philharmonic Society is welcome to the hint.

Having arrived at the last Saturday in 1854, we are reminded that an opportunity presents itself, when we may appropriately tender thanks to our numerous readers, who have rallied round us since we commenced a new era of our existence in the volume for 1854. There is no more agreeable task than to acknowledge the support which a watchful public bestows upon earnest exertions; and it is now our pleasant duty to thank our subscribers, one and all, for the encouragement which our attempts to elevate the tone of musical criticism, and to raise the character of musical artists, have elicited from them so unanimously and unsparingly.

As it is well said, that gratitude means thanks for favours to come, so we will make good the assertion by a few remarks on the principal features of our expiring volume; hoping they will be regarded as an earnest of our future intentions, and as a fair claim for a renewal of the patronage, to merit which we shall make still greater efforts.

In the year 1854 the Musical World developed a new scheme of musical literature. It was our direct purpose to combine information and entertainment in our criticisms; and by a series of memoirs and narratives to give a new interest to the life, pursuits, and character of the musician. This mission, we hope, we have successfully accomplished. We have the satisfaction of knowing that we have enlisted among our readers many of that class of amateurs who consider everything relating to music and musicians, excepting their own performances and those of a few popular artists, as tedious and dull. But, while we have thus attempted to treat our subjects in a popular style, we cannot be accused of having descended to the gratification of low tastes and ignorant prejudices, or to the pandering to clique or party. We have only to point to our notices on the opera and concerts of the season; to the organ papers and musical reviews; and to the articles by Mr. G. A. Macfarren, to prove the independence of our views, and the high standard which we have always endeavoured to maintain. It is our belief that mediocrity in music is more generally tolerated than in the profession of all the other arts; and this can only arise from the imperfect musical education which the public receives. We have been compelled occasionally to expose the pretensions which soi disant composers have put forth; but, if in performing this duty, we have, at any time, appeared to our subscribers harsh and severe, we can only beg them to remember that the office we have undertaken is to instruct our readers, without stooping to compliment every tyro or dullard on what he has accomplished. We cannot conceive anything more uninteresting than a journal, which simply reports concerts and performances, without an endeavour, at least, to convey instruction; and we cannot believe such a paper could long exist, since nobody would be tempted to read it but the individuals whose names appeared in its columns. We have, therefore, the double satisfaction in thinking that plain speaking is due not only to those we criticise, but to those for whom we write.

We would add a few words respecting some unfinished projects which have been commenced in this volume. The music presented with the first monthly numbers was discontinued, because the subscribers generally were opposed to it on the grounds that it was an expense to the journal which would be better spent in another department. We took the hint, and have no reason to repent the step. The few particulars we collected of Madame Grisi's early life we were unable to continue, not being able to procure authentic details beyond her first appearance in Paris. In an early number we shall conclude the sketch of Madame Mara, having just received the necessary papers.

We now come to 1855. A new Life of Beethoven, a series of articles by Mr. Macfarren, on Mendelssohn's Quartets, and several Original Memoirs, which will include Henry Purcell, Sterndale Bennett, and others, will be among the immediate contributions to the new volume. Other arrangements, which étiquette forbids us to disclose, will be recognised as important improvements. We have only to bid our readers a hearty farewell, wishing them a happy and prosperous new year.

We perceive by the prospectus of the New Philharmonic Society, that the concerts of the ensuing season will be resumed in Exeter Hall. We are sorry for it. Why the necessity of such a change? We have on several occasions spoken in favour of the locale in Long Acre; we have pointed out its acoustical advantage for concerts like those of the New Philharmonic Society; and we have no sooner gained a number of proselytes to our opinion, than we are to be carried back nolens volens to Exeter Hall. Surely St. Martin's Hall was large enough for all purposes of the Society. Why should the "grumblers" of last season, who could not procure "free tickets," have their hopes now raised by the prospect of more disposable places? That St. Martin's Hall was often crammed to suffocation, we will not deny; but why not, if necessary, raise the price of the professional tickets? Are the professors in London so poor that they cannot afford to pay more than a "one guinea" subscription—and so, for pecuniary consideration, render the removal of the concerts to Exeter Hall obligatory—or is it that the host of noble patrons now appended to the prospectus of the Society object to St. Martin's Hall, as they objected at first to Covent Garden Opera House? We have heard the story of a noble lord, who, being asked on the first establishment of the Royal Opera, why he did not patronise that house in preference to Her Majesty's Theatre, replied that his horses could not bear the smell of cabbages. Prejudice, however, such as these are overcome by perseverance; and we had hoped the New Philharmonic Society would have rested content with its new choice.

The bâton, we find, will be again entrusted to the hands of M. Hector Berlioz and Dr. Wylde. We hail with much pleasure the engagement of M. Berlioz. A more able conductor could not be found. Dr. Wylde has earned his position, and, by his able conducting of the last concert of the past season, has won the confidence of the subscribers and public. M. Berlioz and Dr. Wylde should work together for the good of the Society, and success must attend their efforts. The remarks we felt it our duty to make on the disorderly mode of rehearsal last season, must not be forgotten. Irregularity in attendance and inattention are not tolerated under the sway of Mr. Costa; why should they be suffered under other conductors? The directors should look to this. Let some of that resolution of purpose which surmounted difficulties of no small kind in establishing the Society, characterise the management in the rehearsals; let not the whole orchestra have to wait whilst a "crotale" in Q is being found for M. Berlioz's works; or a "tam-tam" large enough to frighten all good people is discovered for Dr. Wylde's Paradise Lost. Division of labour is the secret of success in most enterprises. So must it be in the management of a large society. It is absolutely necessary that the officials know their duty and be made to attend to it, that order may prevail in every department.

We have alluded in jest to two slight accidents which occurred on two different occasions at the concerts of the Society; others happened which were no jesting subjects. It is well known what the New Philharmonic orchestra can do; with what precision and delicacy the most elaborate and difficult symphonies can be interpreted. We look for still more perfection at their hands; a little more of that "finish" which is so remarkable a feature in the orchestra of the Paris Conservatoire would be acceptable. The second violins must be weeded—a few more accomplished artists engaged in this department, and then the New Philharmonic orchestra may challenge the world.

The announcement that the receipts of the concerts will, in future, be devoted to charitable purposes, is another proof of the liberality which has characterised the direction. This arrangement—very different from those we have felt it our duty, on more than one occasion, to animadvert upon—meets with our cordial approbation.

Lord Suffield has accepted the office of chairman of the board of directors. Cherubini's Mass in C is announced for the first concert in February.

A retrospective glance at the year now on the verge of expiration presents little that is remarkable in a musical point of view. A few incidents excepted, the past season has been unusually dull and uninteresting. Every branch of music seemed to conspire, as it were, to render the year of our Lord 1854 immemorable in the art. The two Philharmonic Societies remained almost at a stand still. The elder was satisfied with its ancient prestige, and made no move forward. The younger showed an inclination to advance, but was retarded by a lack of energy and self-reliance. The production of Bach's Grosse Passions-Musik was a step in the right direction, but the attempt to pass off the overture to Tannhäuser on the subscribers, even as a novelty, was a retrogression. The Sacred Harmonic Societies were content to abide by their old répertoires. The performance of Beethoven's Mass in D, by the former society, however, constituted an honourable exception. The introduction of this extraordinary work to the English public created a marked sensation, and provoked an endless controversy. The Mass in D was not eminently successful. The audiences of Exeter-hall did not seem to understand it; and, after two or three performances, it was wisely withdrawn. The Musical Union proved as exclusive as ever, and the Quartet Association displayed hardly as much spirit as in the former season. The Harmonic Union evidenced unmistakeable symptoms of a general decay. At St. Martin's Hall, by means of cheap prices—the only "open sesame" to Fortune's cave, nowadays—and his own untiring exertions, Mr. Hullah was making progress with the public gradually but surely. Those, by the way, who desire to ensure success, should follow the example of M. Jullien and Mr. Hullah. Let them look to cheap prices. But this by the way! In the concert rooms matters were still more flat and unprofitable. We cannot call to mind a single new vocalist or instrumental performer who achieved a second-rate reputation. We would except Signor Monasterio, the young violinist, who lately appeared at M. Jullien's concerts, Drury Lane.

Let us turn to the opera—the Royal Italian Opera—which, since it has been deprived of all opposition by the closing of Her Majesty's Theatre, seems to have lost one of its principal causes of attraction. The prospectus was tempting, and the season full of promise. An especial interest attached to the Royal Italian Opera in 1854, inasmuch as it was Grisi's last season in England. The public and subscribers were naturally excited, but the excitement had its drawback; what filled the theatre one night, emptied it another. The Grisi performances had their negative as well as their positive attraction. To make amends, the manager of the Royal Italian Opera engaged Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli, who appeared, for the first time at that theatre, in May, as Desdemona, one of Grisi's acknowledged great parts, in place of Fidelio, which is a character emphatically her own. Mdlle. Cruvelli's success at first, for the reasons above stated, was not exactly what her friends anticipated. Lablache made his first appearance at Covent Garden soon after. The prospectus of the Royal Italian Opera had promised, among other works, Meyerbeer's L'Etoile du Nord. For some reasons unexplained, this opera was not given, but in its stead Rossini's Matilda di Shabran was produced—a most delightful and charming substitute. The production of Rossini's Il Comte Ory—a still more delightful and charming opera than Matilda di Shabran—was most creditable to the management; it achieved an eminent success at the end of the season. Grisi adhered to her old répertoire, and did not attempt a new part. This exhibited policy; but it was hardly to be expected she would have left the stage without appearing in two of her most celebrated characters—Semiramide, and Ninetta in La Gazza Ladra. On the whole, the Italian Opera did not prove as remunerative as many were led to suppose would be the case when first they perused the prospectus.

At the commencement of the year, the promise of an English opera, at Drury Lane, on an unusual scale of completeness and splendour, was held out to the public. The manager was installed, the company formed, the new operas decided on, the rent fixed, and money paid in advance, and lodged in the bank as security. A flaw in the agreement, however, enabled the lessee of Drury Lane to back out of his bargain; and the theatre was consigned to a German-Italian company, which wriggled through a brief existence, and died of mismanagement.

Perhaps the most interesting event of the musical season of 1854 was the introduction of Madame Marie Cabel to the British public. This took place on June the 7th, at the St. James's Theatre, in M. Clapisson's opera, La Promise. Madame Cabel's success was not in doubt one moment. The striking quality of her voice, the perfection of her singing, her beauty, her grace, and the charm of her acting, created a sensation not easily surpassed, and not soon forgotten. The St. James's Theatre was crowded every night Madame Cabel appeared; and the return of the fair artist to London next season is already looked forward to with pleasure.

In March, Herr Ernst, the great German violinist, returned to England after an absence of two years, and played at the Musical Union. On the 6th of April, John Sebastian Bach's Grosse Passions-Musik was performed for the first time in England, by the Bach Society, at the Hanover Square Rooms, under the direction of Mr. Sterndale Bennett. The general execution of the work did not afford entire satisfaction. In May, the Cologne Union of Male Voices arrived in London, and exhibited at the Hanover Square and other concert rooms. Their performances excited general admiration.

The opening of St. George's Hall in Liverpool, on the 18th of September, must be chronicled as one of the memorabilia of the past year. This spacious and magnificent structure found its disapprovers as well as its admirers. Much was said on both sides—laus et vituperium—and with equal truth; whence it may be fairly inferred, that St. George's Hall is not perfectly adapted to the purposes intended.

On Monday, October the 30th, M. Jullien re-appeared with his band at Drury Lane, after an absence of more than a year from England. The celebrated chef-d'orchestre was received in the most enthusiastic manner, and his concerts proved more attractive than in any former season. Their unprecedented success, indeed, has induced M. Jullien, in conjunction with Mr. Gye, to give another series of concerts of the same kind, at the Royal Italian Opera. The first of these came off last night.

In the latter end of October, the band of the Imperial Guides of France came to this country for the first time, and on Saturday, the 28th, performed at the Crystal Palace on the occasion of the Grand Fête given in aid of the Patriotic Fund. The presence of this distinguished regimental band was one of the remarkable features of the Fête, and their performances were the theme of universal eulogy.

As events of a different character—but which will serve to mark the year just past with greater emphasis than any we have named—we have to record the deaths of Rubini and Mad. Sontag. The death of the lady—attended with the most melancholy circumstances—filled Europe and America with regret.

We have noted down all that occurred to us as worthy of commemoration in the year gone by. The survey is not satisfactory. We trust, however, that ample amends will be made in the season to come; and that 1855 will prove more smiling and less clouded than 1854. There is much good in hoping. Let us hope!

PROVINCIAL.

VENTNOR.—We have to record the perfect success of Signor Marras's concert, at Steephill Castle, on Wednesday, in aid of the Patriotic Fund. The room was crowded to overflow by the élité of the residents and visitors of the island. The programme was composed of the most favourite pieces of Mozart, Rossini, Meyerbeer, Bellini, Donizetti, etc., etc. Beethoven's "Adelaide," sung by Signor Marras, and "Partant pour la Syrie," and "God save the Queen," given with great spirit and energy by all the singers, were the features of the entertainment. Mr. Richard Blagrove played a solo on the concertina, and A. Hambrough, Esq., and Mr. Austin, a duet for corno and cornet-à-piston, Messrs. Erard forwarded one of their grand horizontal pianos for the occasion.

LEEDS.—A concert was given by the Recreation Society, on Saturday evening last, being the sixth of this season. The vocalists were Miss Birch, Miss Landon, Miss Lascelles, Mr. Alfred Pierre, and Mr. Frank Bodda. Mr. Spark was the conductor.—Miss Brown's concert took place in the Music-Hall, on Monday evening last. The performers were Mrs. Sunderland, Miss Senior, Mr. Perring, Mr. Delavante, and Master Iles; Mr. Spark was conductor.—Mr. Willy, the well-known leader and solo violinist, has given two chamber concerts in this neighbourhood during the past week, the former in the saloon of St. George's Hall, Bradford, on Monday evening, and the latter in the picture gallery of the Music Hall, Leeds, on Thursday evening. The performances were almost exclusively instrumental. Mr. Willy on each occasion was assisted by Mr. Pew, Mr. Bowling, and Mr. Priestley, with Miss Freeman as solo vocalist at Bradford, and Miss Senior at Leeds. Mr. Broughton presided as pianist at the first concert, and Mr. Spark at the second concert. Mr. Willy obtained as he deserved the warmest applause in his solos, a fantasia on national airs, and solo recollections of Paganini.

HALIFAX.—PEOPLE'S CONCERT.—The Sixth Concert of the series was given in the Odd Fellow's Hall on Monday. This being a grand extra night, the Hall was filled to excess, and several could not obtain admission. The following vocalists were engaged:—Miss Birch, Miss Lascelles, Mr. Alfred Pierre, and Mr. Frank Bodda, who were loudly applauded. The performance concluded with the National Anthem.

BATH.—The directors of the Saturday Concerts gave a performance of sacred music on Saturday, at the Assembly Rooms. Mr. and Mrs. Pyne and Mr. Gibbs were the vocalists; the choruses being efficient and the band strong in numbers. The Grand Pump Room was well attended on Saturday, the audience being attracted by the announcement of a sacred concert adapted to the season—consisting of selections from the Messiah. The vocalists were Mr. and Mrs. Snary, Mr. Collins, and Mr. Hemons, Mr. George Field, conductor.

DUBLIN.—On Thursday last the Messiah was given by the Royal Choral Institute at the Ancient Concert Rooms in a very superior manner. The solos were sung by Miss Cruise, Miss Keane, Mrs. Mahon, Miss Glover, Mr. Haigh, and Mr. Smith, and the oratorio was conducted by Professor Glover. The Hall was crowded in every part.—Signor Regondi has given three concerts during the last week at the Rotunda. He was enthusiastically applauded and encored almost every time he played. He was assisted by Mr. Geary, Mr. Kelly, and Miss Kate Shepherd.—The Madrigal Society gave their first concert on Tuesday evening.

MANCHESTER.—The theatre opened with the pantomime of Jack and the Bean Stalk on Saturday night. The feature of the performance was Mr. Flexmore, who, as the clown, kept the house in one roar of laughter from beginning to end.—At the Mechanics' Institution the Messiah was performed. The solos were delivered by Miss Whitham and Mrs. Brooke.—At the Philharmonic Hall Elijah was performed. The principal parts were sustained by Miss Birch, Miss Lascelles, Mr. Pierre, and Mr. Frank Bodda, the band being led by M. C. Baetens, the whole forming a total of a hundred singers and performers, under the bâton of Mr. Banks. The building was filled in every part, and the entire performance went off in the most satisfactory manner.—On the evening of Christmas Day, the Messiah was performed by the members of the Manchester and Salford Sacred Harmonic Society, in the Town Hall, Salford, which was crowded in every part. The principals were Mrs. Sunderland, Mrs. Winterbottom, Mrs. Tomkins, Mr. Delavanti, Mr. Bednal, and Mr. Hird, of the Blind Asylum, York.

BOLTON.—Mendelssohn's Elijah was performed in the Temperance Hall, Little Bolton, on Wednesday evening, and the performance was eminently successful. The principal vocalists were Miss Birch, Miss Lascelles, Mr. Pierre, and Mr. F. Bodda, of the Philharmonic Concerts, London; and Mrs. Brooke, Mrs. Tomkins, Mr. Walton, and Mr. Moore; with a chorus and band of more than a hundred performers. The performances were led by Mr. Seymour, of Manchester, and Mr. John Fawcett, Mus. Bac., Bolton, officiated as conductor.

STRETFORD.—The opening concert of the Stretford Musical Society was given on Wednesday evening last, in the New Public Hall. The artists were Miss Birch, Miss Lascelles, Mr. Alfred Pierre, and Mr. Bodda.

RADCLIFFE.—On Saturday evening, a concert of vocal and instrumental music was given in a large room on the works of Messrs. Richard Bealey and Co., in aid of the Patriotic Fund. The vocalists were selected from the various choirs in the neighbourhood, assisted by Messrs. Thomas, Baxter, Holt, and others from Manchester, with Mr. William Waddington as pianist, Mr. A. M. Coulthurst being leader of the band. The performances, both vocal and instrumental, gave entire satisfaction to a highly respectable though not very numerous audience.

BIRKENHEAD.—The Philharmonic Society gave a full-dress concert on Monday evening, at which Mad. Rudersdorf, Miss Dolby, and Herr Formes were the principal vocalists, and Mr. Frederick Chatterton, the solo instrumentalist. The best points of the performances were Mozart's "L'addio," sung by Miss Dolby and Mendelssohn's four-part song, "When the West." Both were encored. Herr Formes was encored in "O, ruddier than the cherry." The band played the overtures to Jessonda and Euryanthe.

BURY.—On Friday evening, the first concert connected with the Bury Musical Union took place in the large lecture hall of the Bury Athenæum. The principal performers were Miss Birch, Miss Lascelles, Mr. Alfred Pierre, and Mr. Frank Bodda; solo violoncello, Herr Lidel; conductor, Mr. D. W. Banks.

FOREIGN.

BERLIN.—(From our own Correspondent).—The management of the opera seem exhausted with the effort to revive Oberon on the occasion of the late royal marriage. To compensate for want of novelty in the theatre, we have found it in the concert-room. The Singacademie has given a performance of Händel's Sampson. The employment of the word "novelty," in conjunction with Sampson may seem strange. It might be so in England, but not here, where Händel's masterpiece is so rarely performed that it is really a novelty to most of the audience. The manner in which it was executed does great credit to the members of the Singacademie, and Herr Grell, who is now at the head of the institution. Madame Clara Schumann, and Herr Joachim, have given a second concert, which was as numerously attended as the first. Beethoven and Mendelssohn were the principal names in the programme. The bénéficiaires were admirably seconded by the members of Stern's Gesangverein, who sang several four-part songs, among them Mendelssohn's "Verschwunden ist der lichte Tag." The third Trio-Soirée of the Brothers Stahlknecht and Herr Löschhorn comprised, amongst other pieces, Beethoven's sonata in E major (Op. 12), Mendelssohn grand trio in C minor (Op. 66), and Onslow's in D minor (Op. 20).

VIENNA.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The first Philharmonic Concert this season took place on the 17th inst., in the Grosser Redoutensaal. To Herr Carl Eckert belongs the merit of having revived these concerts, originally founded, and subsequently rendered famous throughout Europe, by Nicolai. The service rendered by Herr Eckert to the Viennese is the greater as they have fewer opportunities of hearing performances of grand instrumental compositions than the inhabitants of most of the other great cities of Germany. The concert opened with the overture to Euryanthe, and concluded with Beethoven's symphony in C minor. Mendelssohn's violin concerto was played by M. Vieuxtemps magnificently; Beethoven's air, "Unter blühenden Mandelbäumen," was sung by Herr Ander; and the quintet from Mozart's Cosi fan tutti, by Mesdames Cornet, Schwarz, Herren Ander, Beck, and Draxler. To-morrow (the 23rd inst.) and the next day, a grand concert will be given in the Imperial Opera-house, in aid of the pension fund for the wives and orphans of musicians. Haydn's Seasons will be performed on both occasions. It is asserted that Flotow's new opera, the libretto of which is written by Herr Mosenthal, and the principal part destined for Mdlle. Wildhauer, will not be produced until next season. There is also a report that Hector Berlioz contemplates including Vienna in his German tour, and having his new trilogy performed under his own direction in the old "Kaiserstadt."

HAMBURGH.—The Philharmonic Society celebrated the 25th anniversary of its existence by its 100th concert, on the 2nd inst. The performances consisted of Beethoven's ninth symphony, Mendelssohn's Meerestille und glückliche Fahrt, and two violin solos, executed by Herr Singer.—Madame Nissen-Salomon will appear at the February concert.

GRATZ.—Mozart's Symphony in E flat, and Mendelssohn's Walpurgisnacht, were performed at the third concert of the Musikverein. Mozart's Zauberflöte is in rehearsal, and will very shortly be produced. Die Franzosen vor Nizza, opera by Herr J. F. Kittl, was performed for the first time here on the 2nd inst., and was successful.

HANOVER.—The first subscription concert was given in the Theatre Royal, and went off well. Beethoven's symphony in D major was executed in fine style by the orchestra, under the direction of Herr Cappellmeister Fischer; the Brothers Doppler found their efforts as flautists duly appreciated; and Herr Joachim, in a solo, completely electrified the audience. The concert concluded with Weber's Jubel-Ouverture. Herr Wagner's Tannhäuser is in active rehearsal.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—Haydn's Seasons, Händel's Israel, Mendelssohn's Christus, and Bach's Passionsmusik will be performed at the four concerts of the Cäcilien-Verein. A Herr B. Damcke, from St. Petersburg, has announced a series of eighteen lectures on the history of music, with musical illustrations by Herr Rühl. The lectures will be given in the rooms of the Mozarthaus.

"VIVIER—Who does not know Vivier?—The eternal traveller, the Wandering Jew of Music" (writes M. Fiorentino)—"is as Berlin, if he has not yet quitted it, where he has obtained an extraordinary success, at the Court and in the city, as artist, as author, as composer, and as homme d'esprit. Nobody plays the horn like Vivier; no one knows better how to astonish when he wishes it, or how to touch the heart when he desires to cause emotion. He played last before the King of Prussia, and has had no reason to repent it. When Meyerbeer was unable to accompany him (having by accident mislaid his music), Vivier was assez bon enfant to be contented with a Prince of the Blood as accompanyist. Notwithstanding all these marks of distinction, all these triumphs, I advise him strongly to return to France, if he does not intend to leave his skin in Germany. They do not give him a moment's repose or leisure. No sooner does he arrive in one town than the electric telegraph is at work, and he is obliged to pack up his horn, and his game-cock (Vivier will not separate himself from this beloved companion), and start off for another. You may, therefore, easily imagine that both the fowl and the artist, from excess of triumphs and of kindness, stand the chance of being killed.—Constitutionel.

CHRISTMAS PRESENTS. — The most appropriate offerings for this Season of Festivity, are those which tend to the promotion of Health and Personal Attraction — none can be more acceptable than ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, for imparting a transcendent lustre to the Hair, and sustaining it in decorative charm. ROWLAND'S KALYDOR imparts a radiant bloom to the Cheek, and a delicacy and softness to the Hands, Arms, and Neck; and ROWLAND'S ODONTO, or PEARL DENTIFRICE, bestows on the Teeth a pearl-like whiteness, and renders the breath sweet and pure. The patronage of royalty throughout Europe, their general use by rank and fashion, and the universally-known efficacy of these articles give them a celebrity unparalleled. Sold by A. Rowland & Sons, 20, Hatton Garden, London, and by Chemists and Perfumers.—Beware of spurious imitations!

THE ROYAL PANOPTICON OF SCIENCE AND ART, LEICESTER SQUARE.—The Building comprises a large circular Hall, 100 feet in diameter, and 100 feet high, surrounded by three Galleries, and surmounted by a Dome, the whole gorgeously decorated in the Saracenic style of architecture. The Exhibition includes a splendid Fountain, throwing the water 100 feet, a Crystal Tank, holding 6000 gallons of water, for the display of Messrs. Heinke's Diving Apparatus, of the Electric Light under water, and other subaqueous experiments, a Cosmorama of St. Petersburg with Portrait of the Emperor Nicholas, a Transparent Screen, 32 feet wide, and 36 feet high, for the display of Dioramic Views, of the Chromatrope, and of other optical effects; a magnificent Organ, containing 4,004 pipes, with the bellows worked by steam power, the richest and most powerful instrument of its kind in existence, on which a variety of Sacred and Operatic Music is performed daily at intervals, by Mr. W. T. Best, the Organist of the Institution; a gigantic Electric Machine, the largest ever constructed, the plate ten feet in diameter, with a large Leyden Battery attached; Voltaic Batteries of high power on a novel principle; and in the two Galleries, a variety of machinery and manufacturing processes in action, including the Nassau Steam Printing Machine, a complete series of Whitworth's Machinery, Kirby and Beard's Pin and Needle Machines, Perkins' Apparatus for the Combustion of Steel, Brock's Ornamental Sawing Machine, Prideaux's Patent Self-closing Furnace Valve for the prevention of smoke, &c., an Ascending Carriage, Brett's Electric Telegraph, &c., &c.; a selection of Sculpture, including Monti's Veiled Figure, "The Houri," executed expressly for the Institution, a Gallery of Pictures on sale, and other objects of Art. Distin's celebrated Flügel Horn Union every evening. Attached to the Institution are two Lecture Rooms, in which demonstrations are given several times daily, in various branches of Science and Art, and Lectures delivered from time to time on Literary and Scientific subjects: a spacious Laboratory and Chemical School; a Photographic Gallery, in which portraits are taken. Open daily: Morning, 12 to 5; Evening (Saturday excepted), 7 to 10. Admission 1s.: Schools and Children under 10, half price.

TO MILITIA REGIMENTS.—NOTICE.—Commanding Officers of Militia requiring Bands are respectfully invited to apply to Messrs. Boosey and Sons, 28, Holles-street, Military Musical Instrument Manufacturers to her Majesty's Army and Navy, the Governor-General of India, &c. &c., who undertake to form and supply Bands with every requisite, including Instruments with their appurtenances, music of the very best description and at the most moderate prices, together with Band-Master and Musicians of acknowledged talent

CHAPPELL'S FOREIGN MODEL PIANOFORTE.—PRICE FIFTY GUINEAS.—This instrument has (unlike the ordinary cottage pianoforte) THREE STRINGS, and the fullest grand compass of SEVEN OCTAVES. It is strengthened by every possible means to endure the greatest amount of wear, and to stand perfectly in any climate. The workmanship is of the best description, the tone is round, full, and rich, and the power equal to that of a Bichord Grand. The Case is of the most elegant construction in Rosewood, (vide the sketch), the touch elastic, and the repetition very rapid. Every possible precaution has been taken to insure its standing well in tune. Mr. Chappell especially invites the attention of the public, the profession, and merchants to the FOREIGN MODEL, feeling assured that no pianoforte, in all respects comparable, has hitherto been made in England at the same price. Every instrument will be warranted, and (if desired) exchanged within twelve months of the purchase. 50, New Bond-street, London.

EDWARD GREAVES obtained Honourable Mention at the Exhibition, 1851, for the

PATENT CHROMATIC TUNING FORKS, sounding all the Tones and Semitones of the Octave; a perfect guide for tuning Pianofortes, &c., and for Leaders of Choirs, &c.

THE ÆOLIAN MUTE (a combination of the "A" Æolian Pitch-Pipe and the Mute) for the Violin, is more easily applied and detached than the old Mute.

BLUED-STEEL SOSTENENTE TUNING FORKS, superior to all others in tone and finish. Sold by all Music-sellers. Manufactured by Edward Greaves, 56, South-street, Sheffield.

ÆOLIAN PITCH-PIPES, all Notes in the Octave—Diatonic and Chromatic Sets—Sets for the Violin, Guitar, and Harp.

THE PATENT PORTABLE METRONOME (Registered according to Act of Parliament, 6 & 7 Vict., c. 65), is a very complete and perfect instrument for measuring time in music. It is the size and form of a small watch, and may be carried in the waistcoat pocket, being similar to a spring measuring tape, on one side of which are marked the number of vibrations in one minute (as in Maelzel's Metronome), and on the other the Italian musical terms in general use. From its moderate price, small dimensions, and practical usefulness, it is adapted for all classes of musicians and singers. Price, with case and suspender, Brass, 5s.; German Silver, 6s.; Pearl, 7s.; Shell, 8s.; Electro-plated, 8s.; Gilt, 10s. each.

NORDMANN'S GHOST SCENE, 2s. Nordmann's Greek Pirates' Chorus, 2s. Nordmann's Nun's Prayer, 3s. Nordmann's Rigoletto, 3s. Several thousands of each of these pieces have been sold. Boosey and Sons, 28, Holles-street.

G. A. OSBORNE'S "LA DONNA E MOBILE."—For the Pianoforte, price 3s. G. A. OSBORNE'S "D'UN PENSIERO," price 2s. 6d. G. A. OSBORNE'S "A TE O CARA," price 2s. 6d. These three new pieces are just published by Boosey and Sons, 28, Holles-street.

THE WIFE OF OMAR PASHA.—Just published, The PASHA'S GRAND MARCH, composed for the Turkish Army, by Her Excellency the WIFE of OMAR PASHA. This extremely interesting piece was received in MS. by the publishers, and may be relied on as the authentic composition of the distinguished lady. Price 2s. 6d. Boosey and Sons, 28, Holles-street.

THE UNIVERSAL SINGING METHOD.—Just ready in a large volume (60 pages), price 6s., cloth. The Universal Singing Method, containing complete instructions how to produce and cultivate the voice without the aid of a master, followed by a number of Solfeggi and Exercises by Rossini, Righini, Vaccaj, Lablache, Bordogni, Garcia, and others; also useful lessons on singing with taste and expression, concluding with four celebrated songs and a duet by Handel, Bellini, Donizetti, Verdi, &c. Boosey and Sons, 28, Holles-street.
